SIMEON of Beth Arsham (d. before 548). Bishop of Beth Arsham on the bank of the Tigris River, Simeon was a vociferous defender of miaphysite theology in the *Sassanid Empire, which earned for him the nickname the "Persian debater" (dārōšā parsāyā). His ordination followed, in fact, a public disputation with the catholicos Babai (ordination 497, d. 502/503), in which Simeon was victorious. From his writings one polemic treatise against *Barsauma of Nisibis and against the gradual "Nestorianization" of the Eastern church has survived. It seems that the final redaction of the letter was after 518, the date of the emperor *Anastasius's death, who within it is mentioned as "blessed," although it was perhaps originally written around 505/506. Two letters of great historical value have also been preserved, which Simeon wrote on the recent *martyrdom of certain Christians of Yemen, esp. in the city of Najran, who were put to death by the Judaizing Himyarite king Du-Nuwas (the date of the martyrdom is uncertain: 518, 522 or 523). The so-called *Book of the Himyarites was also attributed to him, another account of martyrdom, but this attribution is hardly likely; this book and also the two aforementioned letters could in fact be some later revisions of one or more of the original texts written by Simeon. He died at *Constantinople before 548, i.e., before the death of the empress *Theodora, who came to visit him.

Baumstark, 145-146; BBKL 10, 361-363 (more complete bibl.); BO I, 341-386; Duval, 358-359. Letter Against Barsauma: BO I, 345-358: the text preserved in the third part of the Chronicle written by ps.-Dionysius of Tell-Mahre; I. Guidi: Atti della R. Academia dei Lincei, s. 3, vol. 17, 471-515 and P. Bedjan, 1, 372-392: independent text; J.N. Land, Anecdota Syriaca, Lugduni Batavorum 1862-1875, III, 235-242 (text preserved in ps.-Zacharias's Ecclesiastical History). Letters on the martyrs of Nagran: I. Guidi, La lettera di Simeone vescovo di Beth-Arsham sopra i martiri omeriti, Atti della R. Academia dei Lincei, s. 3, vol. 7 (1881) 471-501; A. Mobers, The Book of the Himyarites, Lund 1924; A. Jeffrey: Anglican Theological Review 27 (1945) 195-205 (tr. of the first letter); I. Shahid, The Martyrs of Najran: New Documents (Subsidia Hagiographica 49), Brussels 1971 (with tr. of the second letter and an extensive study); I. Shahid, The Martyrs of Najran: Miscellaneous Reflections: Muséon 93 (1980)

150-157; Id., The Martyrs of Najran: Further Reflections: Muséon 103 (1990) 151-153.

K. den Biesen

SIMEON of Edessa (Emesa), The Holy Fool (1st half of the 6th c.). Leontius, bishop of *Naples (modern-day Limassol, at Cyprus), a hagiographer of the 1st half of the 7th c., wrote among other things a Life of Simeon the Mad, a saint from *Edessa who died at *Emesa around 550. Along with his friend John, Simeon traveled to *Jerusalem, settled for forty years in the monastery of Gerasimo, and then transferred to Emesa, where he lived the life of a "fool for the love of Christ" (σαλὸς διὰ Χριστόν—see *saints, foolish). "For Simeon, his feigned madness was his way of obtaining exclusion from society, while also living in it: his madness and his eccentric behavior during the day were balanced by his secret prayer during the night; his presence in society was seen as a way of proclaiming the gospel" (Patrologia V,246). Only after his death was Simeon recognized as a saint, and from that time onward many who had known him earlier began to gather all their memories about his life. The importance of this Vita, for which *Leontius used oral and written sources, is that it is the first representative of a genre that would become very popular in the *Byzantine and Slavic tradition. For this reason the Life of Simeon the Mad came to establish the model for the Life of St. Andrew the Fool.

CPG 7883; Bardenhewer V, 137-138; BBKL 11 (1996) 351-353; BHG 1677-1677b; BHO 1127; AASS. Iulii, 1719, 129-169; Patrologia V, 246; L. Rydén, Leben des hl. Narren Symeon von Leontios von Neapolis, Uppsala 1963; L. Rydén, Bemerkungen zum Leben des heiligen Narren Symeon von Leontios von Neapolis, Uppsala 1970; D. Krueger, Symeon the Holy Fool: Leontius's "Life" and the Late Antique City, Berkeley-Los Angeles 1996.

K. den Biesen

SIMEON of Jerusalem (d. ca 107). *Martyr. Son of Clopas (Jn 19:25; cf. Cleopas, Lk 24:18), he was the cousin of the Lord. He was the second bishop of *Jerusalem and therefore the successor of *James the Less, but only after some time, if we consider the chronological information provided by *Eusebius of Caesarea: "after James's martyrdom and the conquest of Jerusalem" (HE 3,11). Under his episcopate, the community of Jerusalem fled to *Pella. His election emphasizes the tendency at that time to give utmost importance to blood ties in the Jewish-Christian community. From the writings of *Hegesippus we know that the emperor *Vespasian (Eus., HE 3,12) and also *Domitian (HE 3,20,1-6) had their men search for the descendants of *David. In all likelihood Simeon was able to escape these investigations. He was finally martyred under the reign of the emperor *Trajan (Eus., Chron. anno 107) through crucifixion after extensive torture. Although many identified him with the apostle Simon Cananeus (Simon the Zealot), ancient tradition distinguished one from the other. His feast day is 18 February.

J. Blinzler, Simon der Apostel, Simon der Herrenbruder und Bischof Simon von Jerusalem, in Passauer Studien, Festschr. Simon Konrad Landersdorfer, Passau 1953, 25-55; DCB 4, 904; BS 11, 1103-1104; J. Verheyden, De vlucht van de christenen naar Pella, Brussel 1988; Id., The Flight of the Christians to Pella: EThL 66 (1990) 368-384; R. Bauckham, Jude and the Relatives of Jesus in the Early Church, Edinburgh 1990.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

SIMEON STYLITES the Elder (d. 459; feast day, 27 July among the Syrians, 1 September among the Greeks). Born before 400 on the border between *Syria and *Cilicia, a shepherd of flocks, he lived for two years with some *ascetics in the area, then for 10 years at Teleda, in the monastery of Eusebonas (but later all the monasteries contended for the honor of having trained him). Because he outdid everyone in austerity, he was asked to go elsewhere. He adopted the life of a recluse, spending the whole Lent without eating any food. Finally, to withdraw from the influx of pilgrims, he began the life of a Stylite, settling on a column, always exposed to the elements, in a tight space. The columns that he later climbed on were always taller (the last was 16 m [52 ft] high). A community at his feet served both him and the crowds of his admirers. Around 430, bishops and *archimandrites, compelled by his sanctity, granted him their approval; the eulogy delivered by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (Histoire des moines de Syrie: SC 257,158-218) offers a convincing example of it; one should also see, moreover, the *Syriac and Greek biographies. He was admired in the whole world, even in *Paris. The emperor *Marcian pressured him to profess his adherence to the doctrinal decrees offered at the Council of *Chalcedon. The sanctuary built around his column during the time of *Zeno was a second, incomparable wonder.

On the letters attributed to the saint: CPG 6640-6650; BS 11, 1116-1138; H. Delehaye, Les saints stylites, Brussels 1923; A.J. Festugière, Antioche païenne et chrétienne, Paris 1959, 388-401; A. Vööbus, History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, II, Louvain 1960, 207-223; G. Garitte, Compléments à l'édition de la vie géorgienne de S. Siméon Stylite l'Ancien: Muséon 75 (1963) 79-93; Patrologia V, 177-178; BBKL 11, 353-356.

J. Gribomont

SIMEON STYLITES the Younger (521–592). The cult of the second Simeon, a stylite on Mons Mirabilis in the vicinity of Antioch, seems to have been an attempt to replace the cult of *Simeon the Elder, who had been appropriated by the *monophysites. In 541, the young *ascetic established himself on a column; in 551 he went upon a higher one. He allowed himself to be ordained a priest in 554, to confirm his *orthodoxy. The memory of his mother St. Martha has also been preserved. Several ascetic speeches and letters (CPG 7365-7370) could be authentic, but with later amendments. Characteristic of Simeon are the images on lead or wood, which were widespread even in the West in the 8th c.

CPG 7365-7366; BS 11, 1141-1157; DSp 14, 1267-1275; P. van den Ven, Les Écrits de s. Siméon Stylite le Jeune: Muséon 70 (1957) 1-57; P. van den Ven, La vie ancienne de s. Syméon Stylite le Jeune, I-II, Brussels 1962-1970; Patrologia V, 229-230; BBKL 11, 357-358.

J. Gribomont

SIMON, apostle (apocryphal). According to ps.-Abdias, who narrated his life (6,7-23), Simon was the brother of *Judas Thaddeus and *James, and carried out his apostolate in Babylon along with Thaddeus; they were martyred in the city of Suanyr. The acts of Simon's *martyrdom exist in *Coptic and in Arabic and *Ethiopian translation. A curious Coptic legend of the 4th c. is tied to Simon, which has been preserved in fragments: the legend on the Theonoe, a virgin from the monastery of the Mount of Olives in *Jerusalem, who was imprisoned in the palace but miraculously saved by the Virgin *Mary upon the prayer of Simon. She settled the matter for her persecutor, the emperor *Trajan (Hadrian); Simon and Theonoe were killed. Simon's disciples took his body to *Egypt.

CANT 282-283; BHG 1636; BHL 7749-7754; BHO 1112-1116; LCIK 8, 367-371; Lipsius 1, 117-178; A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 435-436; Eastern Acts: in Arabic: A. Smith-Lewis, Horae Semiticae 3-4, London 1903, 96-100, 115-119 (with Eng. tr.); Ethiopian: E.A. Wallis Budge, The Contendings of the Apostles, London 1899-1901 (Amsterdam 1976) 1, 67-72; 2, 58-64 (Eng. tr.); ps.-Abdias: It. tr. Erbetta 2, 561-571; Moraldi 2, 615-629; Simon and Theonoe: F. Morard, Langues orientales anciennes: Philologie et linguistique 4 (1993) 147-183 (Fr. ed., tr. and comm.); EAC 1, 1529-1551 (Fr. tr.).

M. Starowieyski

SIMON BARQÀJĀ (end of the 6th c.–beginning of the 7th c.). Simon Barqàjā, or rather Garmĕqàjā, who was a native of the Persian province of Betgarmai, lived at the time of *Chosroes II (590–628) and was the author of a *Syriac translation of a Greek chronography, which was subsequently of great importance for *Nestorian circles, who maintained that they recognized *Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicle in it. The presence of a passing reference to a certain Andronicus who lived at the time of the emperor *Justinian is insufficient to affirm that Simon's work has reproduced the Greek text that has been lost of this individual named Andronicus.

A. Baumstark, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur mit Ausschluss der christlich-palaestinensischen Texte, Bonn 1922, 135-136 (with information on the names and places of the MSS and bibl.); A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa 2/1, Brescia 1996, 65.

C. Dell'Osso

SIMON MAGUS - SIMONIANS

I. Simon Magus and the Simonians - II. In the apocryphal texts.

I. Simon Magus and the Simonians. Contemporary of the apostles, born probably at Gitton in Samaria, where he met the deacon *Philip who had gone there by order of the apostles to spread the gospel (Acts 8:1-8). Simon was overcome by the enthusiasm and the people's acclamations for the astounding deeds that Philip performed: "This man is that power of God which is called great" (Acts 8:10). He was baptized along with other Samaritans but was puzzled by the signs and wonders that Philip did; when Peter had come to lay hands on the recently baptized, he offered him some money to acquire that mysterious power which he did not possess. Peter harshly cast him out and threatened divine punishment because he had reduced the charisms of the Holy Spirit to a good that could be purchased with a price (Acts 8:18-25). From Simon's action derives the term simony, which consists in purchasing spiritual goods with money.

Heresiologists attribute the origin of the sect of the Simonians to Simon Magus, which did not possess heavily *gnostic traits. The most salient points of the teachings were as follows: Simon was considered to be the chief God and Helen, a prostitute whom he had rescued from a brothel in Tyre, was the Thought (Ennoia) that had emerged from his mind. Helen had created the intermediary powers (angels and archangels), which in turn had created the world. Envious and jealous, these created beings had enclosed Helen within a human body, forcing her to transmigrate from one body to another. To deliver Helen and all humankind from the power of the intermediary powers, Simon descended to earth, granting people the ability to know God, as the Son in Judea, as the Father in Samaria and as the Holy Spirit in other regions. Salvation was obtained through faith in Simon's liberating power.

These teachings do not appear very much in line with gnostic systems, and the most difficult problems that arise coincide with the individuation of their primitive and central nucleus, because traits and analogies with a certain type of preaching in Samaria can be considered either as primordial or later additions. The following have a gnostic stamp: the hostility of the intermediary powers toward God and human beings, the view that the human body is a prison of the divine element and disregard for the OT. Other traits are indefinable or at least without justification as a gnostic theme: the deification of Simon and Helen, their claimed immortality, the failure to link a specific fault that justifies Simon's descent, the lack of connection between redemption and the knowledge of Simon's nature. One has the impression that this movement had moved toward *Jewish-Christian gnosticism but had not yet entered gnosticism properly speaking.

Sources: Justin: 1 Apol 26, 1-3; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. I, 23,1-2; 24,1-2; Hippolytus, Refut. VI, 3-18,7. Studies: A. Amman: DTC 14 (1939) 2139-2140; H. Waitz, Simon Magus in der altchristlichen Literatur: ZNW 5 (1904) 112-143; L. Cerfaux, La gnose Simonienne, in Recueil L. Cerfaux, Gembloux 1954, 191-258; J.M.A. Salles Dabadie, Recherches sur Simon le Magicien, Paris 1962; R. Grant, La gnose et les origines chrétiennes, Paris 1964, 63-82; J.M.A. Salles Dabadie, Recherches sur Simon le Mage, Paris 1969; M. Simonetti, Testi gnostici cristiani, Bari 1970, 1-3; J. Daniélou, La Teologia del giudeo-cristianesimo, Bologna 1974, 99-106; K. Beyschlag, Simon Magus und die christliche Gnosis, Tübingen 1974; A. Ferreiro, Simon Magus and Priscillian in the Commonitorium of Vincent of Lérins: VChr 49 (1995) 180-188; Id., Simon Magus: The Patristic-Medieval Traditions and Historiography: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 147-165; M.J. Edwards, Simon Magus, the Bad Samaritan, in Portraits: Biographical Representation in the Greek and Latin Literature of the Roman Empire, ed. M.J. Edwards - S.C.R. Swain, Oxford 1997, 69-91; F. Haintz, Simon "le Magicien," Paris 1997; A. Ferreiro, Simon Magus, Dogs, and Simon Peter, in The Devil, Heresy and Witchcraft in the Middle Ages, Essays in Honor of Jeffrey B. Russell, ed. A. Ferreiro, Leiden 1998, 45-89; G. Theissen, Simon Magus - die Entwicklung seines Bildes vom Charismatiker zum gnostischen Erlöser: ein Beitrag zur Frühgeschichte der Gnosis, in Religionsgeschichte des Neuen Testaments: Fs K. Berger, ed. A. von Dobbeler et al., Tübingen 2000, 407-432; S. Haar, Simon Magus: The First Gnostic, Göttingen 2003; A. Ferreiro, Simon Magus in Patristic, Medieval and Early Modern Traditions, Leiden-Boston 2005.

E. Peretto

II. In the apocryphal texts. The Acts of the Apostles (8:9-24) describes the conflict between Peter and Simon Magus, who desired to acquire the gifts of the Holy Spirit, thereby arriving at full conversion. According to various apocryphal texts on St. Peter and acc. to the ps.-Clementine literature, where Simon Magus had an important role, this was owed to his departure from *Palestine with his wife Helen for *Rome; there he received *Nero's favor and had drawn to himself many proselytes. After having received information about the matter, Peter also departed for Rome. The long struggle between Peter and Simon Magus was described in a dramatic and picturesque manner in the apocryphal texts. Finally, Simon, wishing to demonstrate his power, flew over the Campidoglio, but, overcome by Peter's prayer, plunged to his death. His disappearance was the cause for the persecution of the Christians, who were accused by the emperor of having assassinated Simon.

L.H. Vincent, Le culte d'Hélène en Samarie: RBi 45 (1936) 221-232; J. Frickel, Die "apophasis megale" in Hippolit's Refutatio VI, 9-18: OCA 182 (1968); J. Frickel, Apophasis megale, Rome 1968; A. Ferreiro, Simon Magus in Patristic, Medieval and Early Modern Traditions, Leiden-Boston 2005.

M. Starowieyski

SIMON (Simeon) of Taybutheh. Monastic author of the 2nd half of the 7th c. and an excellent representative of W Syrian mysticism. According to information provided by Barhebraeus (13th c.), Simon lived at the time of the catholicos *Henanisho (685–700) and was called a man "of grace" (or "gracious") by the name of one of his books. A collection of seven centuries has been effectively transmitted to us, which is called the Book of Grace, which the MS tradition once attributed to *Isaac of Nineveh, but now attributes to "Simon the Recluse." In this document one reads that the author lived in a monastery near Mt. Matut, in Bēt Ḥuzāyē (Susania or Khuzistan, in the S of modern-day Iran). Other sources say that Simon was the disciple of *Rabban Shabur, and therefore they allow us to posit that the Book of Grace spoke of the monastery of Rabban Shabur near Shushtar, not far from Mt. Matut, where they passed or spent a certain amount of time and where various such influential monks as *Dadisho' of Beth Qatraya and Isaac of Nineveh dwelt. In addition to the Book of Grace, a few brief writings are attributed to Simon, among which was the Speech Spoken on the Day of the Consecration of the Cell, in the Departure of a Brother from the Cenobium.

According to Barhebraeus, Simon was known as an excellent doctor, and this explains the numerous traces of medical knowledge in his writings. In fact, he was not only a well-learned monk who commented on the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, knew the writings of *Evagrius of Pontus, and cited the works of *Mark the Hermit, Abbot Isaiah, *Macarius (Simeon) and *Basil, but he was also an expert physician who developed a scientific understanding of the various faculties of the soul in their relation to the body. This integral vision of the human being, in fact, stands at the basis of his gnosiological theory concerning the various levels of "knowledge" (which are six and go from scientific knowledge to the mystical nonknowledge of the Creator) and his articulation of the subsequent phases of the mystical development of the monk (which number seven and go from simple obedience to superior to the ineffable contemplation of God).

Editions and Translations: A. Mingana, Early Christian Mystics (Woodbrooke Studies VII), Cambridge 1934, 1-69, tr. 201-230: small works and extract of Simon's book; S. Brock, Spirituality in the Syriac Tradition (Moran Etho 2), Kottayam 1989, 113-116 (tr. On Various Kinds of Prayer); Holy Transfiguration Monastery, The Ascetical Homilies of Saint Isaac the Syrian, Boston 1984, Appendix B, part I: tr. of select texts from the Book of Grace; P. Bettiolo, Simone di Taibuteh, Violenza e grazia—La coltura del cuore, Rome 1992 (It. tr. of texts published by Mingana and the hitherto unpublished Discourse Proclaimed on the Day of the Consecration of the Cell). Studies: Baumstark, 209-210; BBKL 10, 360-361; Patrologia V, 486-487; Bettiolo, Lineamenti, 591-593; G.G. Blum, Vereinigung und Vermischung, Zwei Grundmotive christlich-orientalischer Mystik: OC 63 (1979) 41-60; G. Bunge, Mar Isaak von Ninive und sein "Buch der Gnade": OS 34/1 (1985) 3-22; P. Bettiolo, Povertà e conoscenza. Appunti sulle Centurie gnostiche della tradizione evagriana in Siria: PdO 15 (1988-1989) 107-125; R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne 1990, passim.

K. den Biesen

SIMON the ZEALOT, apostle. Endowed with the nickname "the Cananaean" by Mk 3:18 and Mt 10:4, he was appointed to the eleventh place before *Judas Iscariot; *Luke, however, places him at the tenth place before Jude the son of James and Judas Iscariot and gave him the epithet "zealot" (Lk 6:15; Acts 1:13). The two epithets "Cananaean" and "zealot" have given rise to differing interpretations. Starting from the questionable identification with the homonymous cousin of the Lord, better known as Simon (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3), the brother of *James the Less and his successor as the bishop of *Jerusalem from the years 62–106, *Coptic and Byzantine Christians maintain that under this name Nathanael of Canaan, or even the master of ceremonies at the wedding described in the gospels (Jn 2:8-9), lies hidden. This interpretation cannot be held because "the Cananaean" does not derive from the word "Cana" but from the Aramaic term qĕnā'na', which means zealot. This title for some scholars has the meaning of an ardent religious sense of zeal, an enthusiast (see Gal 1:14); for others it would be an open indication of his membership to that religious movement of integralist fanatics, widespread and active esp. in Galilee, which had transformed during the Jewish war into a political faction, which did not permit one to distinguish a religious from a political point of view. After *Pentecost he proclaimed the gospel probably in *Egypt and *Persia, where he bore witness to Jesus Christ with the shedding of his blood. According to a late piece of information (9th c.), his tomb was to be found at Nicopius in W Caucasus, and a church was dedicated to him (Epiphanius, Vita Andreae: PG 120,244).

BS 11, 1169-1173; J. Blinzler, Simon der Apostel, Simon der Herrenbruder und Simon Bischof von Jerusalem, Passau 1953, 25-55; O. Cullmann, Gesù e i rivoluzionari del suo tempo, Brescia [2]1971, 20-22; M. Hengel, Die Zeloten, Leiden 1971, 72-76; M. Borg, The Currency of the Term "Zealot": JTS 22 (1971) 504-512; G.R. Edwards, Jesus and the Politics of Violence, New York 1972, 55-59; J.A. Morin, Les deux derniers des Douze: Simon le Zélote et Judas Iskariôt: RBi 80 (1973) 332-349; G. Jossa, Gesù e i movimenti di liberazione della Palestina, Brescia 1980, 61-77; LTK[3] 9, 597; S. Mayer, Die Apostel Simon Zelotes und Judas Thaddäus. Eine Bibliographie zu Legende, Ikonographie und Verehrung, Winhöring 2004.

E. Peretto

SIMONY. Simony consists in the acquiring and selling for money of spiritual goods such as priestly functions—from those of the presbyter to those of the pope—and the administration of the *sacraments. It is defined by Thomas Aquinas as "the sought after and pondered choice of buying or selling something spiritual or connected with the spiritual" (S. Th. II, II, q. c. a 1). The term simony derives from the name *Simon Magus, who acc. to the Acts of the Apostles (8:18-23) sought to purchase from St. *Peter the power of transmitting the *Holy Spirit with the imposition of hands. Peter answered him: "May your money perish with you because you have dared to think of acquiring the gift of God with money" (Acts 8:20). Its exceptional gravity derived from both the commerce of spiritual things and the concession of goods freely received. Several forms of simony also existed during the OT (see 2 Macc 4:7, 24); even the Jewish patriarchs in the 4th c. practiced a form of simony (Palladius, Dial. de vita Johan. Chrys. 15 [SC 341,295]).

In the first three centuries there were no clear testimonies to simony; it developed from the 4th c. onward, when by the imperial concession of benefits connected to clerical functions several men had the ambition of venturing into the clergy, esp. the higher levels. Moreover, there was also the influence of the secular practice of purchasing with enormous sums of money certain public offices, from which one obtained noteworthy economic, social and political benefits. There were several irregular ways of obtaining an ecclesiastical ministry: a payment in some form to the one who performed the ordination, intimidation of lay and ecclesiastical electors, recourse to powerful individuals, intrigue, distribution of money, promises to bestow rewards once elected, etc. It was also important to obtain the support of the Christian people (Jer. Ep. 69,9; Pelag., Com. in Ep. ad Galatas 1,1). The electoral system almost naturally led to a certain form of propaganda for which the best people fled from posts and the ambitious were elected (Jer., Adv. Iovinian. 1,34; Cassiodorus, Variae 9,15). A Roman synod in the year 499 observed that "because of the frequent intrigues, the bothersome avarice of those who desire the office of the bishop without authority has caused the desolation of the church and the disunity of the people" (MGH AA 12,403); it was also mentioned in the synod of 501 (MGH AA 12,438-455) and 502 (MGH AA 12,426-437).

The so-called Council of *Elvira prohibited money from being received for the administration of baptism (can. 48). In the trial before Zenophilus in 320, Victor and *Maiorinus were charged because their ordination occurred after payment (Optatus De schism., App. 1,1). *Athanasius rebuked the *Arians for practicing simony (Hist. Arian. 73: PG 25,781B). *Basil of Caesarea, in an encyclical letter to the *chorbishops, warned about ordaining ministers for money (Ep 53 and 54; Ep. 50; can. 90: Joannou 3, pp. 175ff.), "because some people receive money from those who are ordained" (Ep. 53,1). *John Chrysostom gathered a synod at *Ephesus in relation to the ordinations made by Antoninus, who had placed episcopal sees for sale in proportion to the revenues of the diocese; the seven ordained bishops answered that they had paid to escape curial duties, even using their wives' jewelry as a form of payment (Palladius, Dial. de vita Johan. Chrys. 13 [SC 341, 276] and 15 [SC 341, 292ff.]). One of the accusations against *Ibas of Edessa in the Council of Beirut was that he had received money for conferring ordinations (ACO II,1,3, 24 [383]). The Apostolic Canons severely condemned both the person ordained and the ordainer any time there was an act of simony: "If a bishop, presbyter or deacon has obtained office by means of money, he and the one who ordained him are to be deposed and completely excluded from communion [i.e., of the church], as was the case for Simon Magus by Peter" (can. 29). This was the first text that connected the purchase of ordination with Simon Magus. Canon 30 required the deposition of the bishop who with the support of the secular authorities has obtained a diocese (see also can. 31). Pope *Damasus (or *Jerome, who may have been the editor of the text), almost during these same years, at Rome connected simony to Simon Magus because it was thought that one could obtain a ministry Simonis pecunia through goodwill or popular support (Ep. ad Gallos V,13: PL 13,1191; ed. Duval, 42). At the request of the emperor *Marcian, the second canon of the Council of *Chalcedon brought forth this condemnation: "If a bishop performed an ordination for money or put on sale a grace that cannot be sold, and consecrated for money a bishop or a chorbishop or a presbyter or a deacon or another such cleric, or promoted someone to the post of administrator or public defender or guardian or any other ecclesiastical role for his own wicked gain, when proof has been obtained for this matter, let that person forfeit his office; and let the one who has been ordained not profit from the purchased ordination or promotion, but let him be removed from the dignity and the duty that he has obtained for money. And if anyone turns out to have been the middle-man of this exceedingly wicked and illicit activity, let that person too, even if he be a cleric, be deposed from his own office; if he be a layman or a monk, let him be anathematized." After this council the condemnations were repeated both in the East and the West.

In the East *Gennadius of Constantinople in 458/459 sent a circular letter, which was the product of the synod, to the *metropolitans against simoniac ordinations (Grumel, Regestes I,104; PG 85,1613-1620; Mansi 7,911-916); the Council *in Trullo (691/692) in can. 22 prescribed: "We decree that those who have been ordained after making a monetary payment and not as a result of an examination of the conduct of their life should be deposed, whether they be a bishop or any other type of cleric, along with those who ordained then"; in can. 23 it prohibits the exacting payment for the giving of the *Eucharist. The Second Council of *Nicaea (787) has three long canons that condemn every form of simony: can. 4, on the necessity for the bishops to abstain or to keep themselves from every barter; can. 5, those who rebuke the clerics for the fact that they were not ordained without monetary donations should be punished; can. 19, the admission of priests, monks and nuns must occur without donations, which harkens back to the Council of *Chalcedon. In *Armenia the Council of Shahapivan (444 or 447) in can. 16 goes on at length in condemning the practice of simony and, among other things, orders that "a bishop or priest who receives a gift for this purpose or any other motive should be anathematized in all the assemblies and defrocked of his authority and priestly title." *Gregory the Great writes to Isaac of Jerusalem: Quia vero pervenit ad nos in Orientis ecclesiis nullum ad sacrum ordinem nisi ex praemiorum datione pervenire (Ep. 10,46: PL 77, 1166A). For the Egyptian church, the Athanasian canons attest to a similar practice: many people were chosen because they were wealthy, although the saints, because they were poor, were rejected (can. 4; cf. 5 and 9; ed. Riedl-Crum); moreover, various individuals became bishops because they desired financial gain (can. 5; cf. can. 9).

Even the civil authorities condemned the acquiring of ecclesiastical ministries. The emperor *Leo I (457–474) in 469 prohibited ordinations performed for money: Nemo gradum sacerdotii pretii venalitate mercetur (CI 1,3,30), but requests conduct worthy of this office and that this flagitium be eliminated. The emperor *Justinian intervened many times on this prohibition (CI 1,3,51; Nov. 3,2; 6,1,5 and 6; 56; 123,2,3 and 16; 137,2). In the West, the emperor Glicerius (473–474) condemned the acquisition of the episcopate so that one could become equal to a secular authority: potestas saeculi putaretur, et tyrannopolitas (PL 56,896B); similarly, the *Ostrogoth king Atalaricus (526–534) prohibited commerce over the episcopate (Cassiodorus, Variae 9,15).

*Isidore of Pelusium, a city E of *Alexandria, in his letters described a situation of generalized corruption in his diocese for the abuse of the priesthood both in ordinations (selling of ministries) and the administration of the sacraments (see Ep. II,127; II,178; II,264; III,260; II,199; III,17; III,408; V,426; V,393; V,532, etc.). In *Egypt the phenomenon also continued in subsequent centuries with a heavy spike during Arab rule (see M. Aoun, 194ff.). Simony was referred to with the term cheirotonia (see M. Aoun, 195, n. 43 and Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 517).

In the West Pope *Damasus (d. 384) wrote that in the choice of the ministries of the altar one must look at an individual's conduct, who meritis enim et observationibus legis ad istiusmodi dignitatis culmen accedunt; non Simonis pecunia vel gratia quis poterit pervenire favore popolari (Ep. ad Gallos 5,13: PL 13,1191; ed. Duval, 42). Pope *Gelasius asked that payment be not sought for the conferring of baptism and confirmation (Ep. 9,5: PL 59,50). The election of the ministers by the community and by noteworthy citizens had its advantages, but it also gave place to bartering and propaganda, in which the best candidates were excluded. *Caesarius of Arles in a letter to Pope *Symmachus criticized corruption in the elections: data pecunia sibi potentes homines suffragatores adhibeant (Ep. 5 among Symmachus's Letters: PL 62,54); Symmachus (d. 514) responded that such a practice must be forbidden: Si quis episcopatum desiderat, data pecunia potentes personas minime suffragatrices adhibeat: nec ad decretum sibi faciendum clericos vel cives subscribere, adhibito cuiuslibet generis timore, compellat, vel praemiis aliquibus hortetur (Ep. 6,6: PL 62,55D). The speech attributed to Pope Leo the Great, but somewhat later, condemns the buying and selling of ministries: Hoc apostolicae sententiae gladio effossi sunt omnes qui ecclesiasticos honores vel emere inhiant, vel vendere non formidant (Sermo 14,5: PL 54,507D; see CPPM 1,5491). In the subsequent period the practice of simony became even more burdensome, likewise because of the political situation. Gregory the Great (d. 604) laments the situation often: Vobis enim sacerdotibus lugens loquor, quia nonnullos vestrum cum praemiis facere ordinationes agnovimus spiritalem gratiam vendere, et de alienis iniquitatibus cum peccati damno temporalia lucra cumulare (Hom. in Ev. 17,13: PL 76,1145; see 5,4: PL 76,1091): Gregory spoke of the simoniaca haeresis (Ep. V,54: PL 77,787). In *Gaul, at the time of the Merovingians, simony reached a pathological form through the mixing of political and ecclesiastical power. Aside from the Council of Orléans II (533), canons 3 and 4, and the Council of Orléans V (549), can. 10, the Council of *Tours (567), can. 28 (27) and Chalon (647/653), can. 16, Gregory the Great's numerous interventions are an eloquent testimony to it. In a letter, the pope wrote: Quibusdam namque narrantibus agnovi quod in Galliarum vel Germaniae partibus nullus ad sacrum ordinem sine commodi datione perveniat (Ep. V,53; see V,55; V,58; IX,11, 106, 107; 109, 110; XI,55, 56, 57, 59, 60, 61). The testimonies for the Iberian Peninsula come from the Councils of *Toledo (638), can. 4, and *Braga (675), can. 7. The situation did not improve with the passing of time, but during the period of the fight for the investitures, it became a strong reason for the conflict between the papacy and the civil authorities.

DTC Tables 4045-4047; 14, 2141-2145; LTK[3] 9, 607-608; TRE 31, 276-277; LexMitt 7, 1922-1925; Hefele II, b, 887; 1078; 1133; IIIa, 197; 279; 313; 315; 566; RAC 9, 797-907; M. Vaes, La papauté et l'Église franque à l'époque de Grégoire le Grand (590-604): RHE 6 (1905) 537-556; 755-784; N.A. Weber, A History of Simony in the Christian Church from the Beginning to the Death of Charlemagne, Baltimore 1909; M. Rosati, La teologia sacramentaria: nella lotta contro la simonia e l'investitura laica del secolo XI, Tolentino 1951; C. Vogel, Les sanctions infligées aux laïcs et aux clercs par les conciles gallo-romains et mérovingiens: RDC 2 (1952) 5-29; 171-194; 311-328; H.J. Horn, Giezie und Simonie: JbAC 7/8 (1965-1966) 189-202; A. Nothum, La rémuneration du travail inhérent aux fonctions spirituelles et la simonie du droit divin, Rome 1969; G. Picasso, Gregorio Magno e la condanna della simonia nel Medio Evo: a proposito della Causa I del "Decretum Gratiani," Spoleto 1994; L. Di Salvo, Simonia e malversazioni nell'organizzazione ecclesiastica, IV-V secolo, in Corruzione, repressione e rivolta morale, Catania 1999, 367-392; M. Aoun, Aspects de la simonie en Égypte (VII^e-XII^e s.): RevSR 76 (2002) 185-200.

A. Di Berardino

SIMPLICIANUS of Milan (d. 400/401). Perhaps originally from *Milan, he was a presbyter at Milan and from 397 the successor of *Ambrose in the episcopate of the same city. A learned theologian and one acquainted with *Neoplatonic philosophy, Simplicianus took part in the conversion of *Marius Victorinus and *Augustine; moreover, he was close to Ambrose in his spiritual formation (Confess. VIII,2,3). Ambrose sent him some letters (37, 38, 65, 67 = Maur.); Simplicianus's letters to Ambrose and Augustine, however, have been lost. Augustine dedicated to him his treatise "on various questions to Simplicianus" (De diversis quaestionibus ad Simplicianum), in which were discussed several points on the books of Kings and Paul's epistle to the Romans, and also sent him Epistle 37. Simplicianus died around 400/401.

F. Savio, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia dalle origini al 1300 descritti per regioni. La Lombardia, Florence 1913, 145-150; EC 11, 648; L. Crivelli, Simpliciano, vescovo della Chiesa milanese. Una guida dal silenzio, Cinisello Balsamo 1994; PCBE 2, 2075-2079.

S. Zincone

SIMPLICIUS, pope (468–483). Native of Tivoli (*Italy), he succeeded Pope *Hilarus during a moment of disorder in Italy that was marked by Ricimer's revolt and the fall of the Roman Empire in the West with the deposition of Romulus Augustulus by the *Arian *Odoacer (476), who forbade the disposal of ecclesiastical *property without his authorization (PL 62,74) and ordered that he be asked for his opinion during the election of the pope. We know of very few of Simplicius's interventions in the West: he reprimanded John of *Ravenna, who had consecrated a man as bishop of Modena against his will, who rejected the office since Modena was outside John's territorial jurisdiction (Jaffé 583); he established Zeno of Seville as his vicar for *Spain (Jaffé 590); in 475 he rebuked Gaudentius the bishop, who had proceeded to perform ordinations, for not following the canonical norms (Jaffé 570). All of his attention was directed toward the East without any success: this would also be a recurring theme in subsequent decades. He refused to recognize can. 28 of the Council of *Chalcedon (Jaffé 569), which was accepted by the Emperor *Leo I with the support of the Patriarch *Acacius. The canon recognized a primacy of honor for the patriarch of *Constantinople, inasmuch as it was the "New Rome." Moreover, in the East, *Basilicus seized control, supported monasticism and condemned the Council of Chalcedon with his Encyclical (475): thus *monophysitism enjoyed a moment of triumph in many Eastern episcopal sees, which out of fear accepted the imperial decision. Acacius's opposition was weak and inconsistent. A record has been made of an intense epistolary correspondence between Pope Simplicius with the emperor *Zeno, who had returned to power in 476, and with Acacius, the patriarch of *Constantinople, who conveniently did not inform the pope of the grave events that had occurred with respect to orthodoxy. The pope was concerned with the situation of the *Alexandrian church first with *Timothy IV (III) Salophakiolos, who then adhered to orthodoxy, and then with the imposition of *Peter Mongus. He died, however, before becoming aware of Zeno's Henoticon. Simplicius established a parochial type service for penitents and *baptism for the Roman basilicas (St. Peter's, St. Lawrence's and St. Paul's; see LP I,249). Moreover he completed many works of restoration in other Roman churches and also composed dedications for newly established churches. His feast day was 2 March; from 1971 onward it was moved to 10 March.

CPL 1664; Verzeichnis 543; PL 58, 35-62; Collectio Avell.: CSEL 55, 124-155; Thiel 175-214; LP I, 92-93, 249-251; III, 86-87; DTC 14, 2161-2164; CE 13, 232; Fliche-Martin IV, 366-367, 421; F.X. Seppelt, Storia dei Papi, I, Rome 1962, 134-137; Patrologia IV, 124-125; EPapi 1, 447-450.

A. Di Berardino

SIMPLICIUS of Vienne (d. 439?). Tenth bishop of Vienne in *Gaul (end of the 4th c.–beginning of the 5th c.; what is said by Gams, Series Ep., Regensburg 1873, is imprecise); he was included by *Paulinus of Nola (d. 431) in the group of prelates "who are truly worthy of God." At the Council of *Turin in 398 he defended his rights as a *metropolitan. Pope *Zosimus reminded him of the prerogatives of *Arles (PL 20,665; Jaffé 334: one should note that no. 335 is not authentic), because he did not accept the organizational changes introduced by the pope; in fact there is no evidence that he followed them. The date of his death is unknown, which was perhaps around 439. His feast day is on 11 February.

P. Courcelle, Fragments historiques de Paulin de Nole, conservés par Grégoire de Tours, in Mélanges Halphen, Paris 1951, 146-148; DACL 15, 1351-1360 (s.v. Vienne); Vies des SS 2, 245; BS 11, 1201; R. Savarino, Il concilio di Torino, in Atti del convegno internazionale nel XVI centenario del concilio di Torino, Turin 1998, 202-227; Cath 14, 104; R.W. Mathisen, Ecclesiastical Factionalism and Religious Controversy in Fifth Century Gaul, Washington, DC 1988, passim.

A. Hamman

SIN

I. Personal sin - II. Original sin.

I. Personal sin. There were essentially four *theological and *liturgical places where Christian thought on the theme of personal sin developed: prebaptismal catechisms for *catechumens, the *penitential remission of sins committed after baptism, antiheretical polemic and the *monastic experience.

The most ancient lists of sins appeared in the prebaptismal instructions directed toward *pagans and Jews who were preparing to receive the sacrament of baptism for the remission of sins (ἄφεσις τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν). Outside the NT (see Gal 5:19ff.; 1 Cor 6:9ff.), the texts of the Didache 1-6 and the *Letter of Barnabas 18-20 illustrate the two ways of life and death, i.e., virtue and salvation on the one hand and sin and perdition on the other. In order of importance, the most grave sins were always *idolatry followed by *fornication, homicide, fraud, *magic, *abortion etc. But even many professions held by catechumens were considered sinful inasmuch as they were intrinsically involved in the idolatry of *paganism and therefore had to be abandoned (ps.-Hipp., Trad. Ap. 16).

The deep-rooted conviction of primitive Christianity was that before the Christian revelation sin reigned supreme in the world and was universally spread, producing its fruit of the moral and physical death of humanity (Rom 5:12; Mel. Sardis, De Pasch 48ff). Only with the advent of Christianity and its sacramental means of salvation was the possibility of opposing the universality of sin and death introduced.

Actual daily experience, however, must have made the church's leaders realize very early that after baptismal rebirth, Christians continued to sin, even grievously, losing the privilege of the inhabitation of the *Holy Spirit and the life-giving connection to divine *grace. The penitential remission of sins committed after *baptism must have sparked a long and touchy debate on the nature of sins, on the possibility of remitting them once they had been committed and the church's power to mediate God's mercy to sinful humanity. Above all, it established that there existed a fundamental distinction between the sins that lead to death because of their intrinsic gravity and those that are lighter and in a certain sense inevitable in the everyday life of the Christian who lives in this world (1 Jn 5:16). Although there was the awareness in the Catholic communities that all sins were considered equally pardonable on the condition of the sinner's sincere repentance, the rigorist circles inspired by *Montanism imposed the view that the ecclesiastical authority retained the power of remitting, in public *penance, only the lightest sins, though the remission of the most grave sins was reserved to God's inscrutable mercy and the violent purification of *martyrdom. It is interesting to follow the evolution of *Tertullian's thought on this question, from the Catholic positions he set forth in the De paenitentia to his more rigid ideas inspired by Montanism found in the De pudicitia. During this time, church leaders vigorously debated the efficacy that had to be accorded to martyrdom and the intercession of the *confessors of the faith for the remission of grave sins. Later, the rigorous perspective of the Montanists was adopted and developed by the *Novatians.

Afterward, various attempts to classify and enumerate the most grievous sins were not lacking. Tertullian counts seven of them: idolatry, blasphemy, homicide, *adultery, *rape, false witness and fraud (Adv. Marc. IV,9,6; see a very similar list in Pud. 19,25), but in Idol. I,1,2 (and again in Pud. 5 and 12), basing himself on the so-called Western text of the apostolic decree of Acts 15, he enumerates three: idolatry, fornication and homicide. This triad of grave sins was already present in *Irenaeus's writings (A.H. III,12,14) and later reappeared e.g. in *Origen's writings (Orat. 28,10) and *Pacian of Barcelona (Paraen. 3). *Augustine later criticized this reduction (Speculum, de libro Act. apost.: CSEL 12, 199-200), reaffirming the distinction between grave, mortal sins and light, everyday and venial sins, whose remission has been entrusted not to public penance but to works of *fasting, *almsgiving and above all *prayer ("Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," reads the *Lord's Prayer; see Ep. 167; Serm. 351 and 352; In evang. Joh. 56,4, etc.).

*Caesarius of Arles would take the same position (Serm. 19,2; 202,1). In the theological terminology of the 4th c., a distinction seems to have been made between the peccatores and the impii: the first were those Christians who had sinned though still having faith and who nonetheless would be judged; the second, however, did not believe and as a result would be condemned without judgment (Hilary, In Psalm. 1).

The Greek ecclesiastical writers, though not overlooking the problems relating to the classification of personal sins, closely investigated the question of free will as the sole efficient cause of human negative moral behavior. *Clement of Alexandria affirmed that the origin of sin is to be located in free choice and desire (Strom. I,84,2); to sin derives from not knowing how to judge what one must do (Strom. II,62,3) and is nonetheless a question of will, not of nature (Strom., IV,93,3). For Origen, all of history has been put in motion by the willful disobedience of rational beings, which has thus given rise to variety in the world and the distinct categories of angels, human beings and demons (De Prin. II,9,2-6). In this sense, he navigated between the speculative tradition of Greek intellectualism, esp. *Aristotelian and *Stoic, but also the polemical necessity of refuting the moral determinism preached by various *gnostic sects. It is well known that the gnostics divided humanity into three categories: the hylic or χοϊκοί, those predestined to perdition; the pneumatikoi, those predestined to salvation; and the psychikoi, the only group from which free choice of the will is required. One can say that for the gnostics good and evil are in a certain sense innate to each category of human beings. At the beginning of the end of the 3rd. c., the *Manicheans inherited this predestinarian theology, replacing the gnostics of the 2nd and 3rd c. as the target of the orthodox controversialists. Under the condemnation of this group fell all those sects which, though not rigorously predestinarian and dualistic, preached the connaturality of evil with the physical, bodily nature of man. In particular, the *Messalians were repeatedly criticized during the course of the 4th-6th c. for maintaining the doctrine of "natural evil" and "the sin of birth."

Numerous church writers between the 4th-5th c. made sure to emphasize that only the sins freely committed deserved punishment and eternal damnation, in contrast to the impurity contracted from being born, which instead needs to be purified (Did. Alex., Job X, 15; Ambr. In psalm. 48,8-9); the sole agent responsible for evil is the individual's free will, starting from the age of reason (Did. Alex., Exp. in Ps. 57,5; Ambr., Cain et Ab. II,7,25; Jac. I,3,10). *Theodore of Mopsuestia wrote an entire work titled Against Those Who Maintain That Man Sins Through Nature and Not by His Free Will (summarized in *Photius, Bibl., cod. 177); at the same time, however, Augustine, after he had been delivered from the chains of Manicheism, dedicated a work in defense of free will. For Augustine, the sin of every person follows the same mechanism operative in *Adam: it essentially consists in a turning from God (aversio a Deo), and a simultaneous turning toward created things (conversio ad creaturas), caused by the autonomous and rebellious use of free will not illumined and aided by divine grace (Quaest. Simpl. I,2,18). Sin is, therefore, acc. to this well-known definition, the will to entertain and obtain what justice prohibits, and that from which one is free to abstain (De duab. anima. 11,15). Augustine's answer to Manicheism developed from his acquisition of the *Neoplatonic idea that evil is not a substance, an autonomous nature opposed to the good, but a privatization, a deficiency of the good itself that sinful humans undergo by distancing themselves from God and dividing themselves among the multiplicity of natural creatures. The existence of human freedom presupposes that the ethical life must match the precepts contained in the law, i.e., the will of God manifested in the commandments of the *Decalogue. Only by adhering to the salvific norms of God can we hope to attain the profound deliverance from slavery to sin. Monastic meditation strove primarily along this path, often reaching openly rigorous positions such as those of *Basil and *Pelagius. According to these teachers of the ascetic life, obedience to God's will must always be immediate and total, because even one very small transgression could cause one to risk the loss of all one's previous ascetical efforts and thwart the results (Basil, De jud. 7; Mor. XII,1; Reg. fus. prooem.). God condemned Adam not for eating an apple but because he transgressed the commandment (Pelag., De div. leg. 5; De oper. 13; Virg. Laus 6). From this point of view, all sins are equal, inasmuch as all equally express the will to disobey God's precept, and thus every attempt to classify sin acc. to the human standard of their relative gravity loses all meaning. In the rigorism of this ethical approach, the well-known Stoic paradox of the equality of all faults seems to reappear (see Cyprian, Ep. 55,16), but perhaps it comes from Jas 2:10 as well, where it is written: "For whoever keeps the whole law and yet stumbles in one point has become guilty of all." In any case, on several occasions Christian authors intervened against such rigorism judged theoretically erroneous and inadmissible for the mass of the faithful (Aug., Ep. 167; Jer., Adv. Iovin. II,18ff.).

Ancient *monasticism also dedicated itself to the study of the psychology of *temptation in the fight against the devil. According to the learned monastic tradition of *Evagrius of Pontus (Cap. Pract. 6-33; De octo vit. cog.) and *John Cassian (Instit. V-XII; Coll. V), one must certainly attribute the first elaboration of a true and proper system of sins or the capital vices which, being eight in number, it was believed, were controlled by specific demonic forces: gluttony, fornication, avarice, *acedia, anger, sloth, vainglory and pride. These elements reelaborated and synthesized here date back to a very ancient Jewish-Christian tradition, already present in the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Shepherd of *Hermas and Origen's writings, and which underwent at the beginning of the 5th c. a noteworthy literary reinterpretation in the Hamartigenia and the Psychomachia of the poet *Prudentius. Nevertheless, it was left to *Gregory the Great to offer a definitive synthesis of earlier patristic thought on the question: he believed that the seven capital sins derived from pride, which, acc. to Augustine's teaching, he considers the root sin, the queen of the vices (Mor. XXXI, 45,87-91).

M.W. Bloomfield, The Seven Deadly Sins, East Lansing, MI 1952; G. Teichtweier, Die Sündenlehre des Origenes (Studien zur Geschichte der katholischen Moraltheologie 7), Regensburg 1958; var. aus., Theologie du péché (Bibliothèque de théologie, série II, 7), Paris-Tournai 1960; S. Visintainer, La dottrina del peccato in S. Girolamo (Analecta Gregoriana 117), Rome 1962; M. Huftier, Le tragique de la condition chrétienne chez S. Augustin, Paris-Tournai 1964; K. Rahner, La penitenza della Chiesa. Saggi teologici e storici (Biblioteca di cultura religiosa 60), It. tr. Rome [2]1968, 311-876; M. Spanneut, Tertullien et les premiers moralistes africains (Recherches et synthèsessection de morale), Gembloux 1969; P.F. Beatrice, L'allegoria nella Psychomachia di Prudenzio: Studia Patavina 18 (1971) 25-73; A. et C. Guillaumont, Évagre le Pontique. Traité pratique ou le moine (SC 170), Paris 1971, 38-112; W.E.G. Floyd, Clement of Alexandria's Treatment of the Problem of Evil, Oxford 1971; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Märtyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst (MBTh 36), Münster 1973; H. Karpp, La penitenza. Fonti sull'origine della penitenza nella Chiesa antica (Traditio christiana 1), It. tr. Turin 1975; var. aus., Commandements du Seigneur et libération évangélique. Études monastiques proposées et discutées à Saint Anselme 15-17 février 1976 (SA 70), Rome 1977; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale (SPMed 8), Milan 1978; Th. Špidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique (OCA 206), Rome 1978; C. Rambaux, Tertullien face aux morales des trois premiers siècles, Paris 1979; R. Staats, Hauptsünden: RAC 13 (1986) 734-770 (bibl.); C. Stewart, Working the Earth of the Heart: The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431, Oxford 1991; P. Géhin - C. et A. Guillaumont, Évagre le Pontique. Sur les pensées (SC 438), Paris 1998; P.F. Beatrice, Lord's Prayer, in Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopedia, ed. A.D. Fitzgerald , Grand Rapids, MI 1999, 506-509; P.P. Karavites, Evil, Freedom, and the Road to Perfection in Clement of Alexandria (VChrS 43), Leiden 1999; J. Wetzel, Sin, in Augustine Through the Ages, 800-802; G.-H. Baudry, Le péché dit originel (Théol. Hist. 113), Paris 2000; P.F. Beatrice, Sünde, V. Alte Kirche: TRE 32 (2001) 389-395 (bibl.).

P.F. Beatrice

II. Original sin. The expression "original sin" indicates both the personal sin of *Adam (the original sin) and the state of sin transmitted to every person from birth (derived original sin). Even if the doctrine of original sin is not formally contained in Scripture, there are nevertheless several texts that establish a biblical foundation for the slow development of the doctrine of original sin: we are referring in particular to Gen 3:1-20 (the account of Adam's sin and its consequences) and Rom 5:12-21 (the necessity and universality of Christ's redemption), but also to other passages such as Ps 51:7 (50:7 LXX), Job 14:4 and Eph 2:3. Neither can we ignore the ancient *liturgical practice of infant *baptism and the theological notion of the universality of salvation accomplished by Christ. From these foundations, the patristic tradition before *Augustine adhered to the conviction that humanity inherited corruption and death from Adam.

Before Augustine. The typological relationship described by the apostle *Paul, i.e., Adam–Christ, as well as Eve–*Mary, respectively the cause of death and life, frequently appears in the writings of the early Fathers (Justin, Dial. 100,4-6; Irenaeus of Lyons, Adv. haer. 3,22,4; 5,19,1). *Melito of Sardis developed this position and maintained that people as a consequence of Adam's sin inevitably sin and spoke of the "sin that stamps its mark on every soul and those on whom it stamps are destined to die" (Peri Pascha 54). Even the principle of the solidarity of every person with Adam and Christ is present and frequently appears already in the writings of *Irenaeus, who for the first time introduced into theological literature the explicit statement: "In the first Adam we offended God by not observing his commandment; but in the second Adam we have been reconciled, having become obedient until the point of death" (Adv. haer. 5,16,3; see also 3,18,7). In the West, *Tertullian, though unfavorable to the baptism of newborns (Bapt. 18,5), recognized sin as a vitium originis, which, through the devil's work, has become naturale quodammodo, and explained its transmission with a theory of traducianism (De anima 40-41). And even if it is not easy to determine the connection of transgression (collegium transgressionis) that connects the nonbaptized with Adam (De res. 49,6), this, however, indicates a participation in the Fall that occurred in the Garden of Eden. *Cyprian, however, maintained the necessity of baptism for children through which sins are remitted "which are not their own, but that of another," because, even if they have not sinned personally, by being born from Adam they contract "the disease of the ancient death" (Ep. 64,5). For each theologian, therefore, every person is born into a sinful condition, from which baptism liberates.

In the East, *Origen, recalling the tradition of baptizing children, affirms that the apostles themselves were aware of that stain of sin which had to be washed away with water and the *Holy Spirit (Comm. Rom. 5:9; Hom. Lev. 8:3; Hom. Luc. 14:5). It was this *Alexandrian father who drew the connection between Job 14:45 an Ps 51:7 (50:7 LXX) to demonstrate that every person, born in the flesh, is stained by sin. (*Basil depended on him for the same idea, using the same texts: see Bapt. 1,2,7-9.)

Likewise in the East, in the following century, several testimonies in favor of original sin come from *Syria (Aphraates, Tract. 6,14; 23,3; Ephrem, Hymni 4,1) and the Alexandrian tradition: *Athanasius, though never emphasizing our participation in Adam's guilt, declared that "when Adam sinned, sin was transmitted to all people" (Contra Ar. 1,5); and *Didymus the Blind explicitly declared that human generation was the means of the transmission of the ancient sin of Adam, from which Christ alone has been exempted because he was born of a virgin (Contra man. 8).

In sum, the East, which had a more optimistic vision than the West and was more attentive to emphasizing humanity's freedom and responsibility, seems to have excluded a true and proper doctrine of original sin, in particular the concept of our solidarity with Adam and therefore our participation in his sin, even though there are not lacking clear testimonies regarding the transmission of Adam's sin and its consequences.

But in general, before Augustine, the condition of humankind was seen more as a state of corruption that led toward sin, and there only rarely emerged the idea that every person was in some way involved in the same disobedience of Adam. The appearance of the affirmation that we have all sinned in Adam gradually increased in the writings of the Fathers, with specific reference to Rom 7:9-10 and 1 Cor 15:22 (Tertull., De res. 49,6; Orig., Hom. Jer. 8,1; Meth. Olymp., De res. 2,24; Hil. Arles, Comm. Matth. 18,6; Basil, Hom. Sal. 94,3; Greg. Naz., Serm. 19,14; 38,4; Cyril Jer., Cat. 2,4-5; Ambr., Exp. Luc. 7,234, often cited by Augustine). Through his grammatically imprecise translation of Rom 5:12, where ἐφ' ᾧ was translated as in quo omnes peccaverunt, *Ambrosiaster would make a definitive contribution to the formation of that doctrine on original sin, which was subsequently developed in the West with greater precision.

Augustine. Only with Augustine did the theology of original sin obtain its own formulation and its own terminology, even if he himself had to admit that there is nothing more difficult to understand than the nature of the "ancient sin" (De moribus Eccl. I,40). He was the one to create the ancient expression "original sin": it seems to have appeared for the first time around 395 in the De div. quaest. ad Simpl. 1,1 to refer to the sin of Adam, but only in the book De peccatrum meritis et remissione (1,9-10), written in 411–412, does he refer to the sin transmitted as a result of Adam's offense.

In any case, it is certain that Augustine gradually developed his reflection on the matter, even in conjunction and as a consequence of the development of various other theological themes (the origin of *evil, the efficacy of the *sacraments, the necessity of *grace, *anthropology and *soteriology). Moreover, Augustine was convinced that he stood within the church's tradition, which through great thinkers had defended and maintained the truth of original sin. On several occasions he collected patristic testimonies on the topic, citing the most representative authors of the East and West: Irenaeus, Cyprian, *Hilary, *Ambrose, *Gregory of Nazianzus, Basil, *John Chrysostom and *Jerome (Contra Iul. 1,3,5-10; 1,4,13-6,27; 1,7,30-34; 2,10,33.37; 3,17,32; Contra Iul. opus imp. 4,72-73).

Already during the period of the *Donatist controversy, Augustine, when defending the doctrine of the efficacy of the infant baptism (Bapt. 4,24), referred to the ecclesiastical practice of maintaining that baptism given in remissionem peccatorum implies that they too are in some way sinners, because, even though morally innocent (Pecc. merit. 1,17,22; 35,65; Retract. 1,13,5), without Christ's redemption their entrance into the kingdom of heaven is denied (Sermo 294,3).

But it was primarily in the controversy with the *Pelagians that he was led to emphasize and develop the theological meaning of humanity's corruption and the absolute and universal necessity of the redemption, without which Christ's cross would be emptied (De natura et gratia 7; 9; 19).

To defend the integrity of humanity's free choice and will even after the Fall, Pelagius rejected the idea of a transmission of an original sin, thus reducing it to an evil example, which would certainly have had disastrous consequences with the introduction of death and a habit of disobedience, but it did not intrinsically corrupt human nature. As a result, baptism is a therapeutic and regenerative sacrament, a simple blessing for children. Grace is only an exterior help and consists fundamentally in the revelation of the divine law.

Against Pelagius, Augustine defended the absolute necessity of grace, affirming that all are born with a "sin," in the sense that the situation in which every person is born is truly similar to that in which a person commits a personal sin, deprived of grace and with a will perverted by the control of concupiscence. His firm belief in the sinful condition in which every descendant of Adam lives led Augustine to thus devote himself to the theme of concupiscence, understood as the inheritance from Adam and the origin of personal sin and, in this perspective, considered to be the cause of sin in the nonbaptized. One understands, then, why the theology of Augustine concentrated on developing his anthropology, precisely during the most mature period of his reflection on original sin. At the center of the question was the category of freedom: the free will of Adam, whether a sinner or not, was capable of authentic freedom, i.e., of a choice on the level of being well deserving of eternal life (the true human end), only if supported by the grace of God.

The Augustinian notion of original sin therefore includes three interrelated aspects: the existence of concupiscence, the privation of grace or the death of the soul, and the moral solidarity of each person with Adam's sin, the transmission of which in a certain sense makes all his children guilty (De nupt. 2,28,42; Pecc. merit. 1,10,11; Contra Iul. opus imp. 1,47; Civ. Dei 13,14). Hence the absolute need of being saved by Jesus Christ.

The results of Augustine's doctrinal reflection were accepted by the ecclesial magisterium. After the interventions of the Council of *Diospolis (*Palestine) in the year 415, which, though absolving Pelagius, condemned the claims of his disciple *Caelestius (Aug., De gestis Pel.: NBA 17/2, Appendix, 502-507), and the African Synods of *Carthage and *Milevis in 416, which were approved by Pope *Innocent (Sermo 131,10; Contra duas litt. Pel. 2,3,5), the "plenary Council of all Africa," held at *Carthage in 418, confirmed the doctrine of original sin (DS 222-223), and Pope *Zosimus's Epistula Tractoria (a few fragments are found in Augustine's writings, Ep. 190,23; Grat. Chr. 2,21,24; De anima 2,12,17; DS 231) during the same year renewed the council's condemnation of Pelagian teachings and those who had devised them. The Council of Ephesus (431) ratified the Acts of the Roman synod for this condemnation (Mansi 4,1338; for the letter of Pope Celestine, see Mansi 4,1026). A subsequent intervention took place a century later at the Council of *Orange (529), which reaffirmed the doctrine of original sin (DS 371-372). In that circumstance, *Caesarius of Arles assumed the duty of resolving the controversy between *Faustus of Riez and *Fulgentius of Ruspe. The former, who tended to be anti-Augustinian, maintained that original sin, connected to the concupiscence of the procreative act, represented a factor in death only for the body and not the soul. Fulgentius opposed him, insisting on the truly sinful character of original sin. The decisions of Orange were approved by Pope *Boniface II (DS 398-400), who made sure to insist that free choice, after sin, is certainly fallen but not extinct.

Augustine's theology on original sin was frequently reiterated both in the theological literature of the West and in the documents of the ecclesiastical magisterium. As a result, his theology of original sin would pass into the teaching of scholasticism and its core confirmed by the Council of Trent.

A. Casamassa, Il pensiero di S. Agostino nel 396-397, Rome 1919; J. Tixeront, Histoire des dogmes dans l'antiquité chrétienne, Paris 1924; J. de Blic, Le péché originel selon St. Augustin: RecSR 16 (1926) 97-119; 17 (1927) 414-433, 512-531; J. Mausbach, Die Ethik des heil. Augustinus, Freiburg i.Br. 1929 (I, 139-416); N. Merlin, St. Augustin et les dogmes du péché originel et de la grâce, Paris 1931; A. Pincherle, La formazione della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Cagliari 1939; F. Floëri, Le pape Zosime et la doctrine augustinienne du péché originel: AugM, II, Paris 1954, 755-761; J. Gross, Entstehungsgeschichte des Erbsündendogmas, 1: Von der Bibel bis Augustin, Munich-Basel 1960; Ch. Boyer, Le péché originel, in Théologie du peché, Tournai 1960, 243-291; A. Sage, Le péché originel. Naissance d'un dogme: REAug 13 (1967) 211-248; Id., Le péché originel dans la pensée de St. Augustin de 412 à 430: REAug 15 (1969) 75-112; H. Rondet, Le peché originel dans la tradition patristique et théologique, Paris 1967; V. Grossi, La liturgia battesimale in S. Agostino. Studio sulla catechesi del peccato originale negli anni 393-412, Rome 1970; E. Testa, Il peccato originale nella patristica (Gen III), Jerusalem 1970; M. Flick - Z. Alszeghy, Il peccato originale, Brescia 1972; J. Liébaert, La tradition patristique jusq'au Ve siècle, in var. aus., La culpabilité fondamentale. Péché originel, Gembloux 1975, 34-55; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius. Die theol. Position der römischen Bischöfe im pel. Streit in der Jahren 411-432, Stuttgart 1975; P.F. Beatrice, Tradux peccati. Alle fonti della dottrina agostiniana del peccato originale, Milan 1978 (see A. Trapè, "Tradux Peccati." A proposito di un libro recente: Augustinianum 19 [1979] 531-538); A. Trapè, Introduzione generale a S. Agostino, Natura e grazia, NBA XVII/1, 7-215 (with another bibl.); V. Grossi - L. Ladaria - P. Lecrivain - B. Sesboüé, L'homme et son salut, II, Paris 1995; I. Sanna (ed.), Questioni sul peccato originale, Padua 1996; A. Scola - G. Marengo - J.P. López, La persona umana. Antropologia teologica, Milan 2000.

A. Trapè - L. Longobardo

SINAI. The term Sinai today refers to the entire peninsula between the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aqaba; during antiquity, however, it only referred to the mountainous range in the S part. The peninsula was part of the Roman province of *Arabia established by the emperor *Trajan in 106. It was populated by nomadic tribes, and a Roman garrison was stationed at Klysma (Suez Canal). According to Christian tradition, already established since the 4th c., the events narrated in the book of *Exodus pertaining to *Moses and the giving of the law occurred here (see Ex 3:1ff; 17 and 19:16-32:20). The mountain of the giving of the law is actually identified with modern-day Djebl Mousa (the mountain of Moses, 2285 m [=7500 ft.] high), situated 35 km (21.7 mi) from ancient Pharan (modern-day Feiran) (see Egeria, Itin. 1-5). Because of the veneration that Christians maintained of the place already in the 4th c., the surrounding areas of the mountain were populated by hermits, who were visited by Julian Sabas (Theodoret, Hist. rel. 2,13: SC 234, 222ff.), Silvanus and his disciple Zachariah (Sozomen, HE 6,32,8), and Mark of Scete (PG 65, 296C and 312D) etc. Initially the Christian hermits established themselves in the fertile valleys of Pharan and Raithou and only subsequently on the mountain. The pilgrim *Egeria went there at the end of the year 383, finding numerous hermits close to the peak of the mountain (it was forbidden to live on the peak of the mons Dei), and there were four small churches for liturgical services (see also Itin. Ant. Plac. 37,4). Egeria, during her visit, was accompanied by the monks and the local presbyters (deductores), who showed her the places where the events narrated in the book of Exodus took place and read together on that spot the respective biblical texts. On the N side of Djebel Mousa was located the burning bush, and there was already a small church at the site (Egeria, Itin. 4,6-7). On this spot the emperor *Justinian, in the 6th c. to protect the monks from the *Saracen invasions, ordered the construction of the fortified monastery that was dedicated to the Mother of God (Procopius, De aed. 5, 8; see PG 111, 1071-1072). Sinai became the center of monastic life where famous writers lived such as *John Climacus, *Anastasius the Sinaite and *Nilus of Ancrya. In the 7th c., because of the attacks of the Arabs, the episcopal see of Pharan was transferred to Sinai. Only in the 9th c. did the monastery assume the name of St. *Catherine (307), whose body, acc. to legend, was transported there by the angels. Being a place of pilgrimage, it had an international character; in 6th c. there were three abbots who spoke *Latin, *Greek, *Coptic and Ge'ez (Itin. Ant. Plac. 37, 4). The monastery is today still very rich with *icons that were spared from the iconoclasm of 726–823. Moreover, it possesses an important collection of Greek, Arabic, *Syriac, *Georgian and other MSS; the monastery once possessed the famous 4th-c. biblical MS known as the Codex Sinaiticus, which included a large portion of the *Septuagint translation and the NT, to which were also added the Shepherd of *Hermas and the *Letter of Barnabas.

DACL 15, 1463-1490; G. Garitte, Catalogue des manuscrits géorgiens littéraires du Mont Sinaï, CSCO 165, subs. 9, Louvain 1956; H. Skrobucha, Sinai, Oxford 1966; F. Mian, Caput vallis al Sinai in Eteria: SBF 20 (1970) 209-223; Id., L'anonimo Piacentino al Sinai: VetChr 9 (1972) 267-301; B. Lifshitz, Inscriptions du Sinaï et de Palestine: ZPE 7 (1971) 151-163; P. Compagni - P. Acquistapace, Il Sinai. Sulle orme dell'Esodo, Milan 1975; K.W. Weitzmann, The Monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai. The Icons, I: From the Sixth Century to the Tenth Century, Princeton, NJ 1976; K.W. Weitzmann, Studies in the Arts at Sinai, Princeton, NJ 1982; J. Galey, Il Sinai e il Monastero di S. Caterina, Florence 1982; R. Solzbacher, Mönche, Pilger und Sarazenen. Studien zum Frühchristentum auf der südlichen Sinaihalbinsel. Von den Anfängen bis zum Beginn islamischer Herschaft, Altenberg 1989; J.J. Hobbs, Mount Sinai, Austin, TX 1995; Egeria, Itinerarium = Reisebericht, tr. and ed. G. Röwekamp et al., Freiburg 1995. For additional bibl., see Arabia*; ODB 3, 1997-2000; DBS 12, 1383-1389; Giovanni Climaco e il Sinai, ed. S. Chialà - L. Cremaschi, Magnano 2002; S. Heid, Der Sinai - Berg der Gottesschau in frühchristlicher Tradition: RivAC 79 (2003) 313-358.

A. Di Berardino

SINGIDUNUM (Belgrade). The place of meeting between the Sava and Danube Rivers, inhabited since prehistoric times, it became in the 3rd c. BC a fortified center for the Stordisci, a Celtic tribe. Occupied at the time of the emperor Octavian, and belonging to the province of *Moesia, Singidunum became an important military stronghold between *Sirmium (modern-day Sremska Mitrovica) and Viminacium (modern-day Kostolac) in a strategic position along the Via Militaris (Via Diagonalis), which connected the fortifications along the Danube River; the seat of the Legio IV Felix. The stronghold, which was first a municipium and then a Roman colony, was an important center for the defense of the empire in the province of Moesia Superior, and was the homeland of the emperor *Jovian. With the division of the empire in 395, Singidunum was the W border. In 441 the *Huns reduced its habitants to slavery. In the 5th c. it was often plundered by the barbarians; the emperor *Justinian reconstructed the city in 535; after 584, after a brief parenthesis, it fell definitively to the Avars, but by that point it had lost its importance. In a letter from the year 878 of Pope John VIII to the Bulgarian leader Boris I Mihailo, the name Belgrade ("the White city") was used for the first time. We do not know when Christianity arrived at Singidunum, but scholars think that it occurred in the 3rd c. because the city was situated on an important communication route. Some archaeological sites in the vicinity of the cathedral have Christian symbols. Certainly various *martyrdoms took place there: during the persecution of *Diocletian, the presbyter Montanus and his wife Maxima (BS 9,574; Zeiller, 106); at the time of *Licinius, the deacon Hermylus and Stratonicus.

Bishop *Ursacius, an early supporter of *Arianism, was present at the Synods of Tyre (335), *Serdica (343), where he was excommunicated, *Milan (347), *Arles (353), Milan (355), *Rimini (359) and *Constantinople (360); in 369 he was definitively excommunicated by Pope *Damasus, and not much later he died. Another Arian, *Secundianus of Singidunum, succeeded him and was present at the Council of *Aquileia (381), where he was condemned and deposed alongside *Palladius of Ratiaria.

PW 43, 234-235; H. Delehaye, Saints de Thrace et de Mésie: AB 31 (1912) 255ff.; J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire romain, Paris 1918 (repr. Rome 1967); M. Mirkovic, Singidunum et le Nord-Ouest de la province (Inscriptions de la Mésie Supérieure), Belgrade 1976; A. Mócsy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London-Boston 1976, 325-338; I. Opelt, I dissidenti del concilio di Serdica: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 783-791; Y.-M. Duval, La convocation du concile d'Aquilée de 381, in I concili della cristianità occidentale, secoli III-V. XXX Incontro di Studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 3-5 maggio 2001: SEA 78 (2002) 421-437.

A. Di Berardino

SINGULARITATE CLERICORUM, De. A ps.-Cyprian work which was transmitted by 50 MSS which are variously attributed to *Origen, *Augustine and *Cyprian of *Carthage. From the 12th c. onward, however, the work often appears in the catalogs of Cyprian's works. Erasmus (1520) was the first to demonstrate that this attribution was incorrect. In the 20th c., several scholars attempted to find a new identification, e.g., with *Macrobius the *Donatist (Morin, Harnack) or *Novatian (Blacha)—but none of these so far seem to be convincing. We can only say that the writer speaks with authority, as would a bishop to his clerics, and that he is to be dated perhaps at the end of the 3rd c. With respect to the place of the redaction and the community to whom he speaks—whether it was orthodox or heterodox—we do not know. All the attempts to resolve the mystery of the author are only more or less plausible hypotheses.

The treatise has 46 chapters distributed in three sections in which the author seeks to combat the widespread custom of clerics living together under the same roof with women. The introduction (1-7) explains the scope and the circumstances of the work's redaction. The author here presents himself as an ecclesiastical authority who exhorts his readers with speeches marked by rigidity. Already in the first verses he shows a very negative attitude toward women, who for him are an aculeus peccati and have created the concupiscentiae pestilentiam. In the central part (8-36) the author refutes straw-man arguments that are used by his opponents to justify the practice of living together, primarily with extensive use of Holy *Scripture: the citations and allusions total nearly 200. Refuting these arguments, the author rarely has recourse to theological or philosophical lines of reasoning but makes an appeal to good sense. In the conclusion (37-46) he also exhorts his readers, but here he finds more encouraging words, asking them to act in such a way that semper in clericis ecclesiae senatus candidus constet.

Finally, the work does not engage in a theological defense of celibacy. The author only seems to be worried that this form of behavior not hurt the church's reputation, that the testimony of singularitas not be overshadowed, neglected and scorned. The treatment is therefore of the same issue addressed in the third canon of the Council of *Nicaea (325).

W. Hartel, CSEL 3, 3, Vienna 1872, 173-220; F. Blacha, Der pseudocyprianische Traktat "de singularitate clericorum," ein Werk Novatians (Kirchengeschichtliche Abhandlungen 2), Breslau 1904; A. Harnack, Der pseudocyprianische Traktat de singularitate clericorum, ein Werk des donatistischen Bischofs Macrobius in Rom (TU 24, 3), Leipzig 1903; H. Koch, Cyprianische Untersuchungen, Bonn 1926; B. Melin, Studia in Corpus Cyprianeum, Uppsala 1946; G. de Plinval, Les écrits de Cyprien: BAug 21 (1966) 529-554; P. Schepens, L'épître "De singularitate clericorum" du Ps. Cyprien: RSR 13 (1922) 178-210; 297-327; RSR 14 (1923) 47-65; E. Cattaneo, La preghiera liturgica come esperienza di uguaglianza tra uomo e donna nello pseudo-ciprianeo De singulariate clericorum, in La preghiera nel tardo antico. Dalle origini ad Agostino, Rome 1999, 237-248.

S. Samulowitz

SIRICIUS, pope (384–399). After having spent a long career in service of his church, after the death of Pope *Damasus, Siricius was elected bishop of Rome, with the consent of the emperor *Valentinian II. Although *Ambrose's dominant role eclipsed his authority over the Western churches, he notably developed the Roman claims of jurisdiction, which had already been advanced by his predecessor. His letters sent to the following people bear witness to this: *Himerius of Tarragona (385), the bishops of *Italy and *Africa (386), and *Anisius of Thessalonica (392). Composed in the decretal style of the imperial chancery, these letters pertained to disciplinary questions (Ep. 1), explained the meaning of religious virginity (Ep. 4 and 7) and expressed an awareness of the sollicitiudo omnium ecclesiarum, to which Siricius felt himself called (Ep. 6, 1). Siricius vociferously condemned the execution of *Priscillian and intervened in favor of his adherents. In 390 he consecrated the new basilica of St. *Paul.

CPL 1637; PL 13, 1131-1178 (Coustant); PLS III, 567ff.; CCL 149, 59-63; BS 11, 1234-1237; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, esp. 888-909; D. Callam, Clerical Continence in the Fourth Century: ThS 41 (1980) 3-50; J. Gaudemet, Droit de l'Église, Paris 1985, 57-64; D. Jasper, Canones synodi romani ad Gallos episcopos – die älteste Dekretale?: ZKG 107 (1996) 319-326; LTK^{3} 9, 631; J. Woch, "Portamus onera omnia qui gravantur." Il Pontificato di Papa Siricio (384-399), Rome 2001.

B. Studer

SIRMIUM

I. Christian origins - II. Councils.

I. Christian origins. Situated on the left bank of the Sava River in modern-day Sremska Mitrovica in Serbia, the city of Sirmium came into existence during the 1st c. AD as a castrum militare on the border of the Roman Empire. The urban expansion began in the 3rd c., and a chain of fortified walls was built. The greatest development then took place from the beginning of the 4th c. until the death of the emperor *Valens. At that time Sirmium was the residence of the emperors (one of the seats of the emperor *Galerius), whose palace towered near the hippodrome. The area of Sirmium was fortified with city walls. Aside from the termae, horrea and other buildings for public service were also found.

During the period of the great *persecutions numerous Christians were put to death. At that time Sirmium was the chief city of *Pannonia Secunda and the see of the most important diocese of the region. The first known bishop, *Domnus, signed the creed of the Council of *Nicaea. In 441 the city passed into the hands of the *Huns; in 567 it was occupied by the *Byzantine army. The church and ecclesiastical hierarchy were then reorganized, but again, in 582, the city was destroyed by the Avars, who were led by Baian. The last bishop, Sebastian, fled to *Rome. The most ancient Christian buildings are to be found outside the city. Already in the 19th c. the martyrium of St. Sinerotis was discovered, and in the E necropolis a martyrium was found in a trilobate layout. A fourth martyrium, found in terrible shape, was excavated on the modern right bank of the Sava River. The cathedral has not yet been found.

At the end of the 4th c. the steady decline of the city began, which seems to have been destroyed by a large fire. A basilica was built over the ruins, of which only the E part has been well preserved. Perhaps it was a new cathedral built in the 2nd half of the 5th c. The building had three aisles with a towering apse and a synthronon (i.e., the semicircular bench combining the bishop's throne and stall for clergy behind the altar).

Many precious fragments were found at Sirmium of mensae of the C-type with figures on the borders, in addition to many inscriptions, capitals and other architectural pieces as well as objects of cult and small handmade objects of metal etc.

M. Mirkovic, Sirmium: Its History from the 1st Century AD to 528 AD: Sirmium 1 (1971) 5ff.; V. Popovic, A Survey of the Topography and Urban Organization of Sirmium in the Late Empire: Sirmium 1 (1971) 119ff.; A. Mócsy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London 1974; J. Guyon, Sirmium chrétienne dans la Basse Antiquité et le Haut Moyen Âge: MEFRA 86 (1974) 621ff.; V. Popovic - E.L. Ochsenschager, Der spätkaiserzeitliche Hippodrom in Sirmium: Germania 54 (1976) 156ff.; N. Duval, Sirmium "ville impériale" ou "capital": CCAB 26 (1979) 53ff.; Ch. Pietri, La géographie de l'Illyricum ecclléstiaque et ses relations avec l'église de Rome (V^{e}-VI^{e} siècles), in Villes et peuplement dans l'Illyricum protobyzantin, Collection de l'École française de Rome 77, Rome 1984, 21ff.; B. Bavant, La ville dans le nord de l'Illyricum, Pannonie, Mésie I, Dacie et Dardanie, ibid., 245ff.; A. Poulter, The Use and Abuse of Urbanism in the Danubian Provinces during the Later Roman Empire, in The City in Late Antiquity, ed. J. Rich, London-New York 1996 (^{1}1992), 105ff.

N. Cambi

II. Councils. 347. *Hilary of Poitiers (Frag. hist. B. II 9, 1) dates to this year a council of Eastern bishops who gathered at Sirmium against *Photinus. This statement, however, does not seem to be entirely precise because it conflicts with other information.

351. Various Eastern bishops who had *Eusebian and moderate *Arian tendencies gathered in the presence of the emperor *Constantius to bring charges against Photinus. *Basil of *Ancyra supported dialogue with Photinus, at the end of which he was condemned, deposed and sent to exile. The council published a formula of faith, which repeated the one from *Antioch of 342, furnished with 27 anathemas directed against the teaching of *Marcellus of Ancrya and Photinus.

357. Around the middle of the year, *Germinius, *Valens, *Ursacius and a few other pro-Arian bishops gathered together and published a long formula of faith which, without repeating the more radical Arian expressions, clearly subordinated the Son to the Father and prohibited the doctrinal use of the terms homoousios and homoiousios*, although they did not do likewise for the Arian teaching. Catholics both in the East and West considered this formula to be openly Arian (blasphemia Sirmiensis).

358–359. The publication of the Formula of Sirmium from 357 provoked a strong reaction from the *homoiousians, who were led by Basil of Ancyra. Following the Council of Ancyra of 358, Basil and some of his followers went to Sirmium and, taking advantage of the emperor Constantius's momentary favor, gathered a small council, at which several Eastern bishops who were present on site (in loco) participated (Sirmium was an imperial residence) and three pro-Arian Illyrians: Valens, Ursacius and Germinius. The arguments of the homoiousians prevailed, and the homoiousians obtained the condemnation and deposition of many pro-*Arian supporters, among whom were Eudoxius and the *anomoians *Aetius and *Eunomius. The three Illyrians signed the council's decisions, which republished the (second) formula of Antioch (341), furnished with the anathemas of the Council of Sirmium (351) and by a document, which has not survived, on the terms homoousios and homoiousios. The succession of continuous upheavals between 357 and 358 made many churchmen feel the need for an ecumenical council, which was called for at *Rimini for the West and *Seleucia for the East. In preparation for these councils some Eastern bishops met at Sirmium with Valens, Ursacius and Germinius. This time Basil was in the minority among a concentration of moderate Arians and so-called *homoians: Eudoxius, *Acacius and *Mark of Arethusa. On 22 May a formula of faith was published which served as the basis for the work of subsequent councils: the formula is generic in describing the relationship between the Father and the Son, which becomes more specific in the expression of generic likeness: the Son is similar to the Father in all things, acc. to the *Scriptures.

377/378. On the basis of the information supplied by the church historian *Theodoret (HE IV,8.9), a council in favor of Arianism is to be dated to this period, which was held at Sirmium. The bishops who had been called there reaffirmed the Nicene faith. They affirmed the consubstantiality of the entire *Trinity, they condemned some Arian bishops, and they signed the encyclical letter to the Asian bishops to inform them of their decisions and to strengthen them in their fight against Arianism. The information pertaining to this council contains several difficulties, and not all modern scholars are convinced such a council took place.

V. Blazevic, Concilia et synodi in territorio hodiernae Jugoslaviae celebrata, Vicenza 1967; Y.-M. Duval, Aquilée et Sirmium durant la crise arienne (325-400): AAAd 26 (1985) 331-379; W.A. Löhr, Die Entstehung der homöischen und homöusianischen Kirchenparteien. Studien zur Synodalgeschichte des 4. Jahrhunderts, Witterschlick 1986; 347, 351: Hfl-Lecl 1, 852-862; Simonetti 202-203; 357: Hfl-Lecl 1, 899-902; Simonetti 229-233; 358–359: Hfl-Lecl 1, 903-933; Simonetti 241-247; H.Ch. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 5-23; 377/378: J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes, Paris 1918, 310-327; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 86-87; M. Simonetti 439-441; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, for the various councils, see the index p. 907.

M. Simonetti

SISBERT of Toledo (7th c.). Successor to *Julian as bishop of Toledo from 690 to 693, that is to say, until the XVI Council of Toledo, which deposed him with the accusation of high treason for having conspired against the king (can. 9: De Sisiberto episcopo, and can. 11: Decretum iudicii ab universis editum, Mansi XII,76-77 and 80). Sisbert, to be identified perhaps with the abbot of the same name who signed the acts of the XIII (683), XIV (684) and XV (688) Councils of Toledo, to give evidence of his repentance and to request forgiveness for all that he had done, could have written the Lamentum penitentiae, the Exhortatio penitendi, Oratio pro correptione vitae flenda semper peccata, three works that have been transmitted to us along with the majority of the codices and on account of the argument and the style that are well-suited to an individual of high social standing who was severely punished for his faults.

CPL 1227-1228, 1533; Díaz 304-306; PL 83, 1251-1274; K. Strecker (ed.), MGH, Poet. karol. IV, Berlin 1929, 762-780; J. Orlandis, El elemento germánico en la Iglesia española del siglo VII: Anuario de Estudios Medievales 3 (1966) 27-64; Id., Historia de los concilios de la España romana y visigoda, Pamplona 1986, 491-493; J.F. Rivera Recio, Los arzobispos de Toledo en el siglo VII: Anales Toledanos, III. Estudio sobre la España Visigoda, Toledo 1971, 181-217 (esp. 214-215); U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispanolusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 482-484.

P. Marone

SISEBUT of Toledo. King of the *Visigoths of *Spain (612–621), he is remembered for his military successes obtained through the generals Rechila and Suintila over the Austurians and the rebel Basques; for the successful campaigns he led against the *Byzantines, whose presence in Spain was reduced under his reign to certain strongholds in the region of the Algarvi (Isid., Hist. Goth. 61; ps.-Fredeg., Chron. IV, 33); through the fervid religious activity that unfolded in the establishment of churches such as that of St. Leocadia at *Toledo (Isid., Chron. a. 516); and esp. in the forced "conversion" of the Jews (Leg. Wisig. XII,II,13-14). His activity as an author was of great importance for the history of Christian literature in the West: several of his letters have survived, one of which he sent to *Theodelinda (Ep. 9) on the trinitarian faith and another to his son Theudila (Ep. 8), who had accomplished, with a conversio toward contemplative solitude, a vocation already nourished by his father; the Vita Desiderii ep. Viennensis; and a poetic letter, the Carmen de luna, written in 61 hexameters and composed in 613. Attributed to him is also the hymn titled De ratione temporum. As a result of his patronage, we owe the works dedicated to him by *Isidore of Seville, who was for him a teacher and spiritual director, and titled De natura rerum and the Etymologiae.

The Carmen de luna, due to the number of editions (Baehrens, Goetz, Riese and Fontaine) and differing interpretations, has had particular importance. It represents Sisebut's response to Isidore's dedicatory letter to the treatise De natura rerum. The writings of these two authors, therefore, were united in the MS tradition until the 7th-8th c. and were, at an even earlier time, united in the common objective of giving explanations for recent celestial phenomena such as the complete eclipse of the moon on 29 August 611 and that of 2 August 612, which, in the mentality of that era, probably incited worries concerning the end of the world. In it, the king, after having lamented his sadness of not having been able to follow, on account of his military, legislative and governing duties, the teacher in contemplation and in the poem on nature, he describes, acc. to the information provided by the then-current astronomy, with precise scientific language, a lunar eclipse (vv. 15-58) and, more briefly, a solar eclipse (vv. 58-61) (Isidore de Séville. Traité de la nature, ed. J. Fontaine, Bordeaux 1960, 328-335). It turns out to be a short poem in which the deep Lucretian tone is softened, in dry concision, by the polished Alexandrian workmanship: an "enlightened" response to Isidore's religious *allegorism, acc. to Stach; a literary exercise of a king who was nostalgic for a life consecrated to study, acc. to Fontaine. In my opinion, this short poem represents a man's regret who, having nourished as a young man a vocation to monastic solitude and seeing himself hindered by the congeries turbida rerum from following the contemplative endeavors of his teacher, describes his spiritual condition with the symbol of the moon upon which is cast the earth's cone-shell shadow, which prevents his seeing the sunlight. Nonnumquam vero, Isidore says in the work to which the poem responds (De nat. rer. XVIII, 6), eadem luna etiam ecclesia accipitur, pro eo quod sic ista a sole sicut ecclesia a Christo inluminatur ("Sometimes, however, the church is also understood as the same moon, because it is illumined by the sun just as even the church is illumined by Christ"). With respect to the history of salvation, there is no break in continuity between the symbolic interpretation of the signs of nature, an interpretation which is indicated by Isidore in the treatise De natura rerum, and the image used by Sisebut to express the state of his soul. In Isidore's work requested by the Visigothic king, the natura rerum and the causae astrorum are assumed, equally with the letter of the biblical littera, as means for the study of God and the communication of religious experience in the Christian world. This is one of the foundational aspects of medieval culture.

Editions: CPL 1186, 1298-1301; PL 80, 363-384; 83, 1112-1114; 94, 605-606; 129, 1369-1372; MGH, Scr. rer. mer. III, 630-637, 662-675; MGH, Poet. lat. IV/2, 682-686; E. Baehrens, Poetae Latini minores, V, 357-360 (1883); G. Goetz, Jena 1887; A. Riese, Anthologia Latina, I, n. 483; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville, Traité de la nature, Bordeaux 1960, 329-335.

Studies: M. Méndez Bejarano, El rey Sisebuto astrónomo, Madrid 1919; W. Stach, Bemerkungen zu den Gedichten des Westgotenkönigs Sisebuts (612-621), in Corona Quernea, Leipzig 1941, 74-96; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville, cit., 151-161 (intr.); V. Recchia, Sisebuto di Toledo: il "Carmen de luna," Bari 1971; J.C. Martín Iglesias, Un ejemplo de influencia de la Vita Desiderii de Sisebuto en la hagiografía merovingia: Minerva 9 (1995) 165-186; Id., Una revisión de la tradición textual de la "Vita Desiderii" de Sisebuto: Emerita 64 (1996) 239-248; Id., Notas críticas sobre el texto de la "Vita Desiderii" de Sisebuto: Archivium Latinitatis Medii Aevi 56 (1998) 127-177; V. Recchia, Ancora sul "Carmen de Luna" di Sisebuto da Toledo: Invigilata Lucernis 20 (1998) 201-219.

V. Recchia

SISINNIUS, Novatianist (late 4th c.). A contemporary of *John Chrysostom, he was taught by the philosopher Maximus. While a lector at the time of *Agelius, the Novatian bishop of *Constantinople, he was appointed by this bishop to succeed him, but the Novatian laity preferred Marcian over him, whom Sisinnius later, however, succeeded in 395. *Socrates (HE VI,22) and *Sozomen (HE VIII,1) present Sisinnius as a temperate person, affable, eloquent, prepared by debate, an expert in the Scriptures and well-versed in dialectic. According to Socrates's judgment (HE VI,22.), Sisinnius wrote various works, in which he displayed his elegant culture in expression and taste for poetic sayings; he was more highly regarded, however, in speaking than in writing. On account of his gifts, he was generally welcomed, even by the bishop Atticus (see Socr., HE VI,22.).

S. Zincone

SISINNIUS, pope (d. 708). Native of *Syria, he succeeded Pope *John VII. His pontificate was very brief: only 20 days, from 15 January to 4 February 708. Suffering from a serious form of gout, Sisinnius walked and used his hands with much difficulty. From the Liber pontificalis we know that he had intended to restore some of the walls of *Rome (even because of the dangerous times), but his untimely death hindered him from completing the project.

LP I, 388; Mansi 11, 179; Jaffé I, 247; O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 413 and 706; J.-M. Sansterre, Les moines grecs et orientaux à Rome aux époques byzantine et carolingienne I-II, Brussels 1983: I, 39 and 107; II, 76-7, nn. 112 and 115; Lexikon des Mittelalters VII, 1995, 1939-40; LTK³ 9, 636 (M. Heim); EPapi 1, 640-641 (V. von Falkenhausen).

M. Spinelli

SISINNIUS, MARTYRIUS and ALEXANDER, martyrs (d. 397/398). *Paulinus of Milan writes about "Sisinnius, Martyrius and Alexander, who in the land of Anaunia [Val di Non, Trent] during the persecution of the Gentiles, obtained the crown of martyrdom in our times, i.e., after the death of the venerable *Ambrose" (Vita Ambr. 52,1). These three men settled in the Val di Non for many years in order to evangelize the area, which at that time was still entirely *pagan. The deacon Sisinnius, the oldest, was a *Cappadocian; the other two were brothers and likewise from the East. They had built a church at Anagnia (= Sanzeno), which was looked after by the lector Martyrius, who had abandoned his military career, and his brother Alexander, a *doorkeeper. They devoted themselves to asceticism and evangelization, obtaining some conversions. For having in some way impeded the celebration of the pagan feast (a lustratio), they were massacred in May 397/398. The killing, which occurred during a time of peace, immediately had much resonance. *Vigilius, the bishop of Trent, immediately went to the site and provided information on the type of life they led in two of his letters: one sent to *Simplicianus of Milan and the other to *John Chrysostom. Sisinnius "had the primacy of blood and leadership" (Ep. to John Chrysostom v. 172, ed. Pizzolato). Martyrius "was full of" missionary "zeal" (Ep. a Simpl. v. 57); "a teacher who never stopped teaching, a man eager to win souls" (Ep. a Simpl., vv. 31ff.). Liturgical song had a missionary function: Martyrius "was the first to resound the song of the divine praise to the ears of a deaf region" (Ep. a Simpl. vv. 29-30). Vigilius had in mind the idea of constructing a church on the site of their martyrdom (Ep. a Simpl., vv. 70-71). The three martyrs were mentioned by other authors such as *Augustine, who wrote in 411: "I know in fact that in the trial of the clerics of the Val di Non, who were killed by the pagans and are today honored as martyrs, the emperor adhered without a doubt to the request that the murderers, who were at that time held in prison, be not condemned by the same death penalty" (Ep. 139,2); *Gaudentius of Brescia (Tract. 17); *Maximus of Turin (Serm. 105-106: CCL 23,414-418); and *Venantius Fortunatus (Carmina I, 2: MGH AA 4,1,8-9). The remains were taken to Trent, where a church was built by Vigilius; some of the relics were also taken to *Milan, where a blind man was healed on the very day of their arrival (Vita Ambr. 52,1-2); they were placed in the basilica of S. *Simplicianus. Their cult arose soon, and the Mart. hier. is also a witness to it, as well as some of the Ambrosian and Tridentine *sacramentaries; their *liturgical memory is set for 29 May, the date of their death, and 15 August, the date of the translation of their *relics.

BS 11, 1251-53; PCBE 2, 2087-2088; I martiri della Valle di Non e la reazione pagana alla fine del quarto secolo, Bologna 1985; E.M. Sironi, Dall'Oriente in Occidente: i santi Sisinnio, Martirio e Alessandro, Sanzeno 1989; L'Anaunia e i suoi martiri, ed. R. Grégoire, Bibliotheca Civis, Trent 1997; Vigilio vescovo di Trento tra storia romana e tradizione europea. Atti del convegno, Trento 12-13 ottobre 2000, ed. R. Codroico - D. Gobbi, Bibliotheca Civis, Trent 2000; L.F. Pizzolato, Studi su Vigilio di Trento, Milan 2002.

A. Di Berardino

SISINNIUS of Constantinople, archbishop (426–427). Sisinnius was a priest working in Elaia, a suburb of *Constantinople, when, upon the death of *Atticus (10 October 425) the people from the capital, after considering his piety and love for the poor, preferred him for the episcopal succession over the candidates of the clergy, *Proclus and *Philip of Side, the latter of whom, then, in his Christian History, criticized this popular election that occurred on 28 February 426. The same day, or shortly thereafter, the newly elected archbishop of Constantinople, along with *Theodotus the archbishop of *Antioch, promulgated a very harsh synodal letter condemning the *Messalians. The ordination performed by Sisinnius in that or the subsequent year, of Proculus as the *metropolitan of Cyzicus, met opposition from the faithful of that city. They had elected *Dalmatius and pointed out to the new archbishop of Constantinople that his presumed right of intervening in the episcopal elections of Cyzicus was a personal privilege of his predecessor, Atticus. Sisinnius died on 24 December 427. He was succeeded by *Nestorius.

PG 103, 89; DCB 3, 704-705; Grumel, *Regestes*², 49-49a; G. Dagron, Naissance d'une capitale. Constantinople et ses institutions de 370 à 451, Paris 1974, 470, 492.

D. Stiernon

SIXTUS I, pope (ca. 115–ca. 128). He perhaps succeeded *Alexander I in 115. According to the Liber pontificalis, he was of Roman origin, from the region of the Via Lata, the son of a certain Pastor. The same source attributes to him the following *liturgical and disciplinary ordinances: it was only permissible for priests to touch the sacred vessels; before the canon, the people sing the Sanctus with the celebrant; the bishops who were called to *Rome return to their diocese and display the testimonial letters of the apostolic see (I,91 and 128; cf., Jaffé 31-33). Sixtus did not distance from ecclesiastical communion those who celebrated *Easter on a day different from Rome (Eus., HE 5,24,4). According to the Roman Martyrology, he was put to death on 6 April (3 April in the 1922 ed.). He exercised his pontificate perhaps until 125, but *Eusebius of Caesarea places his death around 127–128 (HE 4,5). The later tradition maintains that Sixtus was buried in the Vatican near St. *Peter; but acc. to more recent and rigorous studies, his sepulcher is to be found in the Alatri Cathedral (see L. De Persis, Del pontificato di S. Sisto I papa e martire e della traslazione delle sue reliquie da Roma in Alatri, Alatri 1884).

LP I, 54-55, 56-57 and 128; Cesare Baronio, Annales ecclesiastici II, Rome 1590, 79 and 95-98; LTK² 9, 643 (G. Schwaiger); EPapi 1, 216-218 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

SIXTUS II, pope (257–258). He succeeded Pope *Stephen I in August of 257. According to the Liber pontificalis, he was of Greek origin and a philosophus: this title was given to him much later because *Rufinus of Aquileia had regarded him as the author of the *Sentences of Sextus in the prologue of his Latin translation of that work; the Decretum Gelasianum regards the work as apocryphal. *Pontius, the author of the Life of Cyprian, refers to him as "a good and peaceful priest" (CSEL 3/3, CV). *Cyprian spoke of his *martyrdom which occurred in a cemetery (the catacomb of *Callistus) along with some of his deacons following the Edict of *Valerian (Ep. 80: CSEL 3/2,840), i.e., 6 August 258, and shortly before that of Cyprian himself. A few days later, his first deacon *Lawrence the great Roman martyr was put to death. Harnack attributed to Sixtus the treatise *Ad Novatianum (To Novatian) (Quasten I,598). The episode of his death was also mentioned by Pope *Damasus (A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, nn. 16 and 17). *Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to him various letters in relation to the problem of rebaptism, which was defended by Cyprian, and informed him about the spread of *Sabellius's teaching in Cyrenaica (Eus., HE 7,4-6; 7,9,2-6); Dionysius was able to achieve a peaceful agreement between Sixtus and the African church.

AASS Aug. II, 124-142; LP 1, 155-156; III, 75; BS 11, 1256-1262; 8, 108-129 (Lawrence); P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Un recente studio sul luogo del martirio di Sisto II, in Note agiografiche, ST 33, Vatican City 1920, 145-178; H. Delehaye, Recherches sur le légendier romain: AB 51 (1933) 43-49; EPapi 1, 286-292.

A. Di Berardino

SIXTUS III, pope (432–440). Of Roman origin, he was already a presbyter in 418 under Pope *Zosimus. He was elected on 31 July 432. It seems that in his earlier years he had a soft spot for the *Pelagians, from whom he quickly distanced himself: there remain two letters written to him by *Augustine on the matter of Pelagianism (Ep. 191 and 194, ca. 418; see also the inscription of the Lateran baptistery: LP I, 236). With the condemnation of the Pelagians by Pope Zosimus, Sixtus also distanced himself from them and wrote to *Aurelius of Carthage and Augustine. In 439, he did not readmit *Julian of Eclanum to ecclesiastical communion because the latter did not retract his error (Prosper of Aquitaine, Chronicon ad a. 439: PL 51,598). Upon his episcopal consecration in 432, 200 Eastern bishops were present, to whom he entrusted two letters of a conciliar character, one for *Cyril of Alexandria and the other for the Eastern bishops (Jaffé 389-390: PL 50,583-590), to settle the disagreements following the Council of *Ephesus, and he intervened in many other ways (ACO I,IV, 93; PG 84,640). The agreement between Cyril and *John of Antioch was achieved in 433, and both men communicated information about this matter to Sixtus (ACO I, I, 4, 33 = Mansi 5,286; see Sixtus, Ep. 5). The pope responded to both men, rejoicing over the peace that had been achieved (Ep. 5 and 6), and affirmed the centrality of the Roman see. Moreover, Sixtus reaffirmed the rights of the Roman see over the bishops of Illyricum, who often turned to *Constantinople, which was also aiming to extend its powers in that region (Jaffé 393-396), where the bishop of *Thessalonica was performing functions as the vicar of Rome. He wrote to *Perigenes of Corinth, who was trying to become a metropolitan to the demise of Thessalonica (Ep. 7 and 8: PL 50, 610-612). In the West, however, the barbarian invasions impeded the pope's close contacts with the bishops. At the time of Sixtus's pontificate numerous sacred buildings were built at Rome. In particular, the basilica of S. Maria Maggiore was rebuilt—the first Roman church dedicated to the Madonna—with the famous triumphal arch, covered with a mosaic, which narrates the infancy of Jesus Christ and

*Mary's involvement in those early events, all with the objective of magnifying Christ, the God-man and the Son of Mary (the Theotokos of the Council of Ephesus) (Diehl 975a-976). This fervor for construction has led scholars to refer to Sixtus's period as the "architectural renaissance," even though it began in the 4th c. The document titled Gesta de Xysti purgatione is a forgery composed by the partisans of Pope *Symmachus during the trial held against him in 501 (PLS 3,1249-1255).

CPL 1655; Verzeichnis 545; PL 50, 571-626; PLS 3, 21-23; LP I, 232, 237; III, 85; Patrologia III, 556-557; DTC 14, 2196-2199 (see tables 4050); BS 11, 1262-1264; G. Wilpert, La proclamazione efesina e i mosaici della basilica di S. Maria Maggiore: AST 7 (1931) 197-213; R. Krautheimer, The Architecture of Sixtus III: A Fifth-Century Renaissance?, in Essays in Honor of E. Panofsky, New York 1961, 291-302 (now found in Studies in Early Christian, Medieval and Renaissance Art, London 1971, 181-196); Id., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae, III, Vatican City 1971, 1-60; G. Bovini, I mosaici romani dall'epoca di Sisto III (432–440): CCAB 10 (1963) 67-80, 81-101; F. Magi, Il calendario dipinto sotto Santa Maria Maggiore, Vatican City 1972 (see REL 51 [1973] 41-48); N.A. Brodsky, L'iconographie oubliée de l'arc éphésien de Sainte Marie Majeure à Rome, Brussels 1976 (cf. RivAC 46 [1971] 179-183); Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976 (see the index p. 1700); L.I. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974, 246-277; G. Zecchini, I "Gesta de Xysti purgatione" e le fazioni aristocratiche a Roma alla metà del V secolo: RSCI 34 (1980) 60-74; S. de Blaauw, Cultus et decor. Liturgia e architettura nella Roma tardoantica e medievale, Vatican City 1994, passim; EPapi 1, 415-423.

A. Di Berardino

SLAVERY. The social structure of antiquity viewed slavery as one of its numerous institutions. This factor, logically speaking, influenced the *Fathers' teaching on this topic. Nevertheless, the patristic teaching witnessed a slow evolution that led to a substantial transformation with the theory and the practice of slavery. As a general principle, we can affirm that in the first centuries equality of all humanity before God was maintained, for which reason there did not exist distinctions of race, gender, social, political or legal status. Again from the gospels (Jn 8:31-35) and from the teaching of the apostle *Paul (1 Cor 7:32; Gal 3:28; Eph 6:5-8 and Col 4:1), the discussion centered on what true freedom was, and slavery, without abandoning the social level, was also considered within the spiritual and moral sphere. Patristic thought hinged on two centers: on the one hand, the natural equality and the original freedom of all (in line with *Stoic thought) and, on the other, the observation that *original sin was the origin of slavery. It was therefore seen as a divine punishment to stop the wicked inclinations of humankind once deprived of its original innocence.

The church from the beginning received slaves within its communities without any distinction. They participated in a normal way in the *liturgical celebration, received the same *sacraments and could obtain the same ecclesiastical posts, including the episcopal office, with the same rights as free persons. *Marriage, e.g., was considered a true coniugium, sacred and indissoluble, and not a mere contubernium.

The exhortation to mutual respect between slaves and masters was a constant theme in patristic texts from the beginning (Did. 4,10; Ign., Ad Polyc. 4,3; Hermas, Past., Mand. 8,10; Comp. 1,8; 9,28,8). We also find significant texts in the writings of *Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, Paedagogus) and *Cyprian of Carthage (Ad Demetrianum 8). The works of the famous authors, esp. starting from the 3rd c., are replete with references to slavery. The writings of *Augustine (Exp. Ep. ad Galatas 64), *John Chrysostom (In I Cor. hom. 40,5), *Gregory of Nyssa (In eccl. hom. 4) and *Gregory of Nazianzus (Poem. th. II, 36), just to cite a few examples, demonstrate this teaching well. Slavery was the fruit of sin, which was reflected in the division of the world caused by evil. The Fathers agreed in demanding a worthy treatment for slaves, whose master must behave himself as a true father, rejecting any type of violence and cruelty.

Starting from the 4th c., the church already exercised an important social role; the doctrine of slavery was developed not only in the writings the Fathers but also in the decisions of councils and in the imperial laws (see CTh 9,12,1).

Christianity was opposed to slavery through a slow and gradual work, which was often imperceptible, and which respected the social positions acquired over the course of history, without ever having recourse to violence. In this way the church was able, little by little, to replace the institutions and the customs that made slavery something necessary with other institutions and other customs that became incompatible with the very existence of slavery.

S. Talamo, La schiavitù secondo i Padri della Chiesa, Rome 1905; P. Allard, Gli schiavi cristiani: dai primi tre secoli della Chiesa fino al termine della dominazione romana in Occidente, Florence 1915; G. Barbero, Il pensiero politico cristiano, I, Turin 1962; H. Gülzow, Christentum und Sklaverei in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Bonn 1969; P. Maraval, L'Église du IV^e siècle et l'esclavage: Studia Moralia 8 (1970) 319-346; J. Vogt, Sklaverei und Humanität: Studien zur antiken Sklaverei und ihrer Erforschung, Wiesbaden 1965 (Eng. tr. Oxford 1974); P.A. Milani, La schiavitù nel pensiero politico I: dai greci al basso medioevo, Milan 1972; A.A. Rupprecht, Attitudes on Slavery Among the Church Fathers, in New Dimensions in New Testament Study, eds. R.N. Longenecker - M.C. Tenney, Grand Rapids, MI 1974, 261-277; O. Robleda, Il diritto degli schiavi nell'Antica Roma, Rome 1976; N. Brockmeyer, Antike Sklaverei, Darmstadt 1979; G. Corcoran, Saint Augustine on Slavery, Rome 1985; G. de Bonfils, Gli schiavi degli ebrei nella legislazione del IV secolo: storia di un divieto, Bari 1992; J.A. Harrill, The Manumission of Slaves in Early Christianity, Tübingen 1995; P. Garnsey, Ideas of Slavery from Aristotle to Augustine, Cambridge 1996; A. Postiglione, La schiavitù nella società e nella cultura antica attraverso le testimonianze degli scrittori greci e latini, Naples 1998, 213-235; I.A.H. Combes, The Metaphor of Slavery in the Writings of the Early Church: From the New Testament to the Beginning of the Fifth Century, Sheffield 1998; M. Melluso, La schiavitù nell'età giustinianea: disciplina giuridica e rilevanza sociale, Paris 2000; J.A. Glancy, Slavery in Early Christianity, Oxford 2002.

J.A. Cabrera Montero

SMYRNA. An Asian city and port of *Asia Minor (Anatolia), on the Aegean Sea, Smyrna was one of the most important cities of Turkey. The most ancient site dates back to the second millennium BC, on the hill, a few kilometers from the modern city, which occupies the same site of that Hellenistic city. Before 677 BC, it was conquered by the inhabitants of Colophon and underwent influence from Ionia; it then gave resistance to the Lydians, and subsequently it was occupied and destroyed by Alyattes in 580. It ceased to exist for two centuries until it was rebuilt through a project undertaken by Alexander the Great and brought to completion by Antigonus Monophthalmus and Lysimachus on the modern-day site. Among its alternating fortunes, its history unfolded through the *Seleucids, the kingdom of Pergamum (228) and the Romans. Around 60 BC, it made up part of the Roman province of Asia. It experienced great affluence during the imperial age, and under the emperor *Hadrian it received a second imperial temple. Destroyed in 178 by an earthquake, it was reconstructed through the initiative of Aelius Aristides.

It was one of the first Christian centers and one of the seven churches of Asia mentioned in the book of Revelation, where one finds the letter of St. *John to the bishop of Smyrna (Rev 2:8-11).

During his trip to *Rome, to undergo *martyrdom there, Bishop *Ignatius of Antioch passed through, and from that city he wrote the letters to the communities of *Ephesus, Magnesia and Tralles, in addition to the letter to Smyrna; all these cities had sent delegates to greet him and bear witness of their solidarity with his suffering. Likewise from the city of Smyrna, he wrote to the members of the church of Rome, asking them to not hinder his desire to die for Jesus Christ.

*Polycarp of Smyrna, bishop of the city, was put to death in the amphitheater at 86 years old. The treatise Martyrium Policarpi speaks of his and his companions' courage when facing death and torture.

*Pionius was also a martyr of Smyrna, whose Passio (BHG, n. 1546) speaks about him, a source for the Hieronymian Mart. hier. (10 and 12 March) and some of the Greek synaxaria (Synaxarium Eccl. Constant., col. 530, on 11 March).

*Irenaeus, who then became the bishop of *Lyons, was a native of Smyrna (between 140 and 160), who in the letter to the Roman priest Florinus states that during his youth he had heard the sermons of Bishop Polycarp.

According to *Polycrates of Ephesus, *Thraseas bishop of Eumenia was martyred at Smyrna (Eus., HE 5,18,14; 24,4). On 22 January the Mart. hier. celebrates for Smyrna the bishop Valerius. Under *Byzantium, which held the city until the 11th c., Smyrna was a center of modest importance. Today it is still the see of a Catholic archbishopric.

W.M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, London 1904; H. Delehaye, Les passions des martyrs et les genres littér., Brussels 1921, 28-53; L. Lemmens, Hierarchia latina Orientis (1622): Orientalia Christiana 1 (1923) 253-254; V. Schultze, Altchristl. Städte und Landschaften, II, Leipzig 1926, 50-61; G. Hofmann, L'arcivesc. di S.: Orientalia Christiana Per. 1 (1935) 434-466; E. Iosi, s.v. Smirne: EC 11, 820-821; C.J. Cadoux, Ancient Smyrna, Oxford 1938; L. Storari, Guida con cenni storici di Smirne (Turin 1857), repr. with a preface by G. Bowersock, Pisa 1999.

T. Sardella

SOCRATES. The figure of Socrates did not fail to leave an impression on numerous patristic authors: G. Giannantoni (see bibl.) has collected all the ancient testimonies that pertained to him that are present in the Martyrium S. Apollonii (19 and 41), the Martyrium Pionii, and in the writings of *Justin, *Tatian, *Athenagoras, *Theophilus of Antioch, *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen, the *ps.-Clementine Homilies, *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Tertullian, *Minucius Felix, *Cyprian, *Lactantius, *Jerome, *Augustine and *Basil of Caesarea. For many of these authors, esp. for the Greek apologists, for Clement and for Origen, Socrates became the ideal symbol of the wise man, the teacher of morality, who believed in the one and only God and for this reason was unjustly persecuted and condemned. Immediately there arose a parallel between Socrates's death and that of the first Christian martyrs, who, as in the case of the Athenian philosopher, were likewise guilty of believing in the one and only God and of rejecting official polytheism. Origen even found it natural that there was a parallel between Socrates and Jesus Christ (C. Cels. III,41; VII,56). For St. Augustine, Socrates was the magister omnium qui tunc maxime claruerunt tenens in ea parte quae moralis vel activa dicitur principatum (Civ. Dei XVIII,35). Among the authors of the early centuries of the Christian church, only Tertullian, in keeping with his negative attitude toward Greek philosophy (see *Hellenism and Christianity), was not very favorable toward Socrates.

G. Melinossi, Socrate nella tradizione cristiana dei primi secoli: Didaskaleion 9 (1930) 125-176; E. Benz, Christus und Sokrates in der alten Kirche: ZNW 43 (1950-51) 155-223; G. Giannantoni, Socrate. Tutte le testimonianze da Aristofane e Senofonte ai Padri cristiani, Bari 1971; D. Jackson, Socrates and Christianity: CF 31 (1977) 189-206; I. Opelt, Das Bild des Sokrates in der christlichen Literatur: JbAC Ergänz. 10 (1983) 192-207; M.O. Young, Justin, Socrates, and the Middle-Platonists: SP XVIII, 2 (1989) 161-166; E. Dassmann, Christus und Sokrates: JbAC 36 (1993) 33-45; A.M. Ritter, Sokrates und Christus, in M. Baumbach (ed.), Mousopolos Stephanos, FS H. Görgemanns, Heidelberg 1998, 8-19; M. Fédou, La figure de Socrate selon Justin, in Les apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, ed. B. Pouderon - J. Doré, Paris 1998, 51-66; E.W. Stegemann, Paulus, Sokrates und Seneca: zu den Anfängen christlicher Literatur- und Philosophiegeschichte, in Literarische Philosophie-philosophische Literatur, ed. R. Faber - B. Naumann, Würzburg 1999, 77-93; E.R. Sandvoss, Die Wahrheit wird euch frei machen: Sokrates und Jesus, Munich 2001.

S. Lilla

SOCRATES of Constantinople (Scholasticus). Church historian (d. after 439). The only source for the biography on Socrates is his Church History, which describes the events from the beginning of *Constantine's empire in 305 until 439. Socrates (whose conventional added appellation Scholasticus is only attested rather late, in an 11th-c. MS, and is therefore to be abandoned) was born around 380 or shortly thereafter, and was educated at *Constantinople by the pagan rhetoricians Helladius and Ammonius, natives of *Alexandria, where they had fled during the violent conflict between Christians and *pagans in the year 391 (HE 5,16,9). Socrates was a Christian, perhaps a cleric, and belonged to the circle of scholars in the Eastern capital. He wrote his history with special interest for the church of the *Novatians (see, e.g., HE 5,19-22); he used Novatian sources (HE 1,10), and in many cases he was also partial toward them. In all likelihood, the author was himself a member of the Novatian church. Moreover, *Origen's theology, Eusebius of Caesarea's thought, his great predecessor in the field of history and the homoousios of the Council of *Nicaea were points of reference in his theological profile, even if he did not have deep interest in doctrinal speculation.

Eusebius, the "father of church history," was also a point of departure as a literary genre and a chronological framework: Socrates made it his objective to continue the work of his predecessor, updating it to his own day. On the methodological level, the largest challenge with respect to pre-Constantinian history was the role of the state and the emperor. Between Constantine and *Theodosius II, the church had also grown in part thanks to the support of imperial politics, but at the same time, during the debates on *trinitarian theology, it was also immersed in imperial politics, even though this intervention could be problematic. Socrates took into consideration the emperor's new role in his presentation of history (structured in seven books acc. to the period of the reigns of the individual emperors) and there reflected on it also on a theoretical level (5, pr.).

From the proemia, which are of a methodological character, it turns out, moreover, that the church history was written at the request of a certain Theodore (6, pr., 1) and that the first two books were modified and expanded (a second "dictation": 2,1,6) because of the patron's criticisms. These changes probably pertain esp. to the insertion of a large number of original documents on the *Arian controversy. Aside from this firsthand source material, Socrates indicated his primary source as *Rufinus's Ecclesiastical History written in Latin. Alongside this work, however, he also used the Greek work of *Gelasius of Caesarea (without mentioning it). Other important sources were Eusebius of Caesarea's Vita Constantini (used but not without reservations 1,1,2); the enigmatic Synagōgē written by *Sabinus of Heraclea; chronicle information; the works of such authors as *Athanasius, *Julian and *Libanius; and—esp. toward the end—even information that had come to him orally. As historical personages, the emperor Julian and the bishop *John Chrysostom drew the attention of the author in a special way (books 3 and 6); in both cases, Socrates provides an image that is distinguished with some nuances by the prevailing tendencies in other sources; moreover, Socrates's long excursus on the varieties of liturgical uses in various churches deserves more attention from scholars (5,22). Socrates claims to write in a clear style and that he is understandable even for simple readers (the ideal sermo humilis, 6, pr., 5); nevertheless, his Greek is refined, and the work is marked by much care. The historical method is oriented toward the methodology found in the historical works of Eusebius of Caesarea, even if for certain verses it comes close to secular historiography. As a historical source it is of great value because of the sober manner, detached and not polarizing, in which Socrates treats history, which places him close to the modern ideals of "tolerance" and "objectivity" (in contradistinction to *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, e.g.).

As a basis of information, he was a great resource, therefore, to many subsequent readers and authors, esp. his immediate successor *Sozomen, who used a large portion of the material presented by Socrates and rendered it in a more “classicizing” form. Through *Cassiodorus’s Historia tripartita, Socrates was also the basis of knowledge on the ancient church for the medieval West. His work was translated very early on into *Armenian, and this very faithful translation is an important witness for the establishment of the text.

The historical work of Socrates is to be placed within a certain widespread classicism at Constantinople under the emperor *Theodosius II in the 1st half of the 5th c. In ecclesiastical and secular historiography, in the codification of law (Codex Theodosianus), in the lists of administrative and urban structures (Notitia dignitatum and Notitia urbis) “the archives of the past” are set in order and a new “Byzantine” identity is formed. In this framework and from a Novatian perspective, peace in the church and the reciprocal understanding of all Christians of goodwill appear as the objective of church history (7,48,6-7).

Editions: CPG 6028; PG 67, 28-842; R. Hussey, Socratis Scholastici Ecclesiastica Historia, I-III, Oxford 1853; Sokrates, Kirchengeschichte, ed. G.C. Hansen, contributions by Mirinjan (GCS NF 1), Berlin 1995; Socrate de Constantinople, Histoire ecclésiastique, vol. 1 (= book 1), trans. by P. Périchon - P. Maraval, intr. and notes by P. Maraval (SC 477), Paris 2004.

Studies: P. Périchon, Pour une édition nouvelle de l’Historien Socrate: les manuscrits et les versions: RecSR 53 (1965) 112-120; H. Leppin, Von Constantin dem Großen zu Theodosius II. Das christliche Kaisertum bei den Kirchenhistorikern Socrates, Sozomenus und Theodoret (Hypomnemata 110), Göttingen 1996; M. Wallraff, Der Kirchenhistoriker Sokrates. Untersuchungen zu Geschichtsdarstellung, Methode und Person (Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte 68), Göttingen 1997; Die Welt des Sokrates von Konstantinopel. Studien zu Politik, Religion und Kultur im späten 4. und frühen 5. Jh. n. Chr., ed. B. Bäbler - H.-G. Nesselrath, Munich 2001; D.F. Buck, Socrates Scholasticus and Julian the Apostate: Byzantion 73 (2003) 301-318; P. Van Nuffelen, Un héritage de paix et de piété: étude sur les histoires ecclésiastiques de Socrate et de Sozomène, Leuven 2004.

M. Wallraff

SODOM (iconography). In the episodes that illustrate *Lot’s departure from Sodom (Gen 19:24-26), there appears, behind the shoulders of Lot’s wife, who became a pillar of salt, the representation of the city destroyed by God to punish it for the perversity of its inhabitants. The city usually appears surrounded by very high walls and at times among flames. The most ancient scene is attested to in a *painting from the catacomb of the Via Latina at *Rome (Ferrua, Via Latina, tv. XXX) between 320 and 360. There then follows the *sarcophagus of Lot (a. 340 - Rep 188) from the catacomb of St. *Sebastian, where Sodom is rendered by an upright door supported by a spiral column with trabeation and a hint of gable. Prominent in the background, one catches a glimpse of the city’s walls and the rows of the windows from which tongues of fire escape. Just one example can be found in miniature, namely in the 7th-c. Pentateuch of *Tours (f. 18a, pl. VI).

L. de Bruyne, Il sarcofago di Lot scoperto a S. Sebastiano: RivAC 27 (1951) 112; J. Porcher, in J. Hubert - J. Porcher - W.F. Volbach, L’Europa delle invasioni barbariche, Milan 1968, 128; U. Könen, Die brennenden Stadt: Sodom in spätantiken Darstellungen, in Actes du XI^e Congrès Int. d’Archéologie Chrétienne, II, Vatican City 1989, 1356-1367.

A.M. Di Nino

SODOM, De. A short poem of 166 hexameters, which in some codices is attributed to *Cyprian and in others to *Tertullian, but it belongs to neither author, inasmuch as it dates to the beginning of the 5th c. The date of the work has led some scholars to conclude that it was written by *Cyprian the Poet. Some authors have attributed the poem to *Avitus of Vienne because of the similarities with his short treatises, an opinion challenged by Roncoroni and then by Morisi. The author remains unknown, as does the place and time of the poem’s composition (however, after the mid-5th c.). The short poem intends to call people to repentance and conversion. For this reason, drawing inspiration from the text of Genesis (ch. 19), it narrates the destruction of the two sinful cities, the transformation of *Lot’s wife into a pillar of salt and God’s attitude toward him. The anonymous author writes at length in describing the horrific natural calamities that occurred during the destruction of Sodom for the sins that had been committed. It is closely connected to the treatise De Iona, also referred to as De Ninive, composed of 105 verses. The text of the treatise De Iona is in a bad state: in fact, the author, after having mentioned God’s patience, who awaits the repentance of human beings, having laid out the invitation directed to *Jonah to go to preach at Nineveh, then moves on to narrate the vicissitudes Jonah experienced until the point of the storm that had been subdued, without saying anything about his preaching. The two short poems must have been written by the same author.

CPL 1425-1426; CPPM 2, 2146 and 2155 (De Sodoma); CPPM 2, 2147 and 2156 (De Iona); PL 2, 1159-1162 (De Sodoma); PL 2, 1166-1172; CSEL 3/3 (1871) 289-301; CSEL 23 (1891) 212-226; M.

Dando, Alcimus Avitus as the Author of . . . De Sodoma and De Jona, Formerly Attributed to Tertullian and Cyprian: CM 26 (1967) 258-275; A. Roncoroni, L'epica lirica di Avito di Vienna: VetChr 9 (1972) 303-329; Patrologia III, 298-299; R. Hexeter, The Metaphorosis of Sodoma: The Ps. Cyprian "De Sodoma" as an Ovidian Episode: Traditio 44 (1988) 1-35; M. Bertolini, I mirabilia di Sodoma (Carmen de Sodoma 21-167): Studi Classici e Orientali 39 (1989) 185-202; D.M. Kriel, Sodoma in Fifth Century Biblical Epic: Acta classica 34 (1991) 7-20; L. Morisi, Versus de Sodoma. Intr., testo critico, tr. e comm., Bologna 1993.

A. Di Berardino

SOGDIAN. The lingua franca of the Iranian family, attested to, with discontinuity, from the 1st (?) to the 10th c. in Central Asia (from Turkmenistan to Mongolia). Through the use of an Aramaic alphabet, it was used primarily to transcribe not only Buddhist texts but also *Manichean and Christian texts. Generally translated from *Syriac, the Christian texts include parts of the NT, the Apostolic Canons, the Shepherd of *Hermas, *Evagrius of Pontus, *Dadisho of Beth Qatraya and the *apophthegms, in addition to some *hagiographical works and anonymous *homilies.

F.W.K. Müller, Soghdische Texte. I, Berlin 1913; O. Hansen, Berliner Soghdische Texte. I. Bruchstücke einer soghdischen Version der Georgspassion (C 1), Berlin 1941; Id., Berliner sogdische Texte. II. Bruchstücke der grossen Sammelhandschrift C 2: Abhandlungen der Akademie der Wissenschaften in Mainz 15 (1954) 819-918; O. Hansen, Die buddhistische und christliche Literatur: Iranistik. Literatur. 1 (= Handbuch der Orientalistik I, 4, 1), Leiden-Cologne 1968, 77-99; Id., Die christliche Literatur der Soghdier. Eine Übersicht: Jahrbuch der Wissenschaften und der Literatur in Mainz (1951) 296-302; Id., Über die verschiedenen Quellen der christlichen Literatur der Sogder: Acta Orientalia 30 (1966) 95-102; B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the New Testament, Their Origin, Transmission and Limitations, Oxford 1977, 279-281; E. Benveniste, Études sur quelques textes sogdiens chrétiens: JA 243 (1955) 297-337; 247 (1959) 115-136; D.N. MacKenzie, Christian Sogdian Notes: Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 33 (1970) 116-124; W.B. Henning, Selected Papers I-II (Acta Iranica II, 14-15), Leiden-Téheran-Liège 1977; N. Sims-Williams, The Sogdian Fragments of Leningrad: Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 44 (1981) 231-240; N. Sims-Williams, The Christian Sogdian Manuscript C2 (Schriften zur Geschichte und Kultur des alten Orients. Berliner Turfantexte 12), Berlin 1985; W. Sundermann, Ein manichäisch-sogdianisches Parallelbuch . . . (Schriften zur Geschichte und Kultur des alten Orients. Berliner Turfantexte 15), Berlin 1985; N. Sims-Williams, Tradition Concerning the Fates of the Apostles in Syriac and Sogdian, in Gnosisforschung und Religionsgeschichte. Fest. K. Rudolph, ed. H. Preissler - H. Seiwert, Marburg 1994, 287-295; M. Compareti, Evidence of Mutual Exchange Between Byzantine and Sogdian Art, in Conv. int.: La persia e Bisanzio, Atti dei Convegni Lincei 201, Rome 2004, 865-922; N. Sims-Williams, A Greek-Sogdian Bilingual from Bulayïq, ibid., 623-631; É. de la Vaissière, Histoire des Marchands Sogdiens, Paris ²2004.

S.J. Voicu

SOLEMNITATIBUS ET SABBATIS, Disputatio de. This disputation on feasts and sabbaths in letter form was falsely ascribed to *Jerome (the author refers to himself as peregrinus). Scholars attribute it to different authors, who lived from the 3rd c. to the period of *Columbanus (d. 615). It has no information on the recipient and ends with the expression: ora pro nobis, venerabilis papa. It is impossible to identify the peregrinus and the papa. According to Jones, on account of his style, the author seems to have been of Irish origin, but it is not the work of Columbanus. The author maintains that the feasts, new moons and the *sabbath prescribed in the OT should be observed spiritually and no longer materially (spirituali observantia celebrantur); these are only a figure and not the truth. Just as the bloody sacrifices have been abolished, so too the ancient celebrations. The author proves this point with citations from the OT and the NT. The *Passover, in which the lamb was slain, a type of Christ, was changed by Jesus Christ himself, who is the new lamb. Christ changed the sacrifice when he said: "This is my body" (Mt 26:26). Christians must therefore celebrate Passover on Sunday (una sabbatorum) after the 14th day of the first month (he does not mention the equinox of spring). Sabbath, a day prescribed for rest, has become for Christians a day of abstinence from sin. Likewise, the feasts of booths (Scenophegia) and "new moons" (neomeniae) should be observed spiritually. The latter signifies that the one who has been illuminated with knowledge must not cease to preach, i.e., to illuminate others.

CPL 2278; CPPM II, 530 and 826; PL 22, 1220-1224; CSEL 56, 357-363; MGH, Epist. 3, 177-180; F. Cabrol - H. Leclercq, Reliquiae liturgicae vetustissimae, II, Paris 1913, 71-73 (they maintain that the letter was written before the Council of *Nicaea); C.W. Jones, Bedae, Opera de temporibus, Cambridge, MA 1943, 108-109.

A. Di Berardino

SOLOMON (iconography). The figure of Solomon is connected to a double *symbolism. The most well-known is that which sees Solomon as the supreme judge and wise man (a symbol, therefore, of wisdom); the second, and less known, connects him to the figure of the victorious one in the fight against wicked forces. The most ancient examples of Solomon's judgment (1 Kgs 3:16-28) are on a caricatured fresco from Pompeii and, perhaps, a scene from the synagogue of *Dura Europos accompanied by an inscription pertaining to Solomon from the 1st half of the 3rd c. In a Christian context, however, the most ancient representation was applied on a silver case at St. Nazarius at Milan (in the 4th c.), the most recent is a 7th-c. *painting. In the underground church of St. Mary on the Via Lata in Rome (WMM 37,1). Scenes relating to Solomon are very frequent in the minor arts, as on a sculpted marble, a piece of ivory in Berlin and a glass medallion. The symbolism pertaining to Solomon, the hero of the good and the triumphant one over *evil is illustrated in a series of small objects. During the Middle Ages, Solomon, who in the writings of Flavius Josephus (Ant. Iud. VIII, 2,5) acquired exorcist virtues, was considered a magician in the true and proper sense of the term. In testimony to this idea are a group of talismans and medallions inspired by such beliefs. A series of medallions from the Beidun Museum in Jerusalem, in relation to the Testament of Solomon, show Solomon, the horse rider, intent on spearing with a lance a female figure (the demon Hormias), who is under the horse's belly. This iconography has inspired the Christian iconography of St. *George and the Dragon. In a *papyrus from Oslo, Solomon is invoked along with Christ.

DACL 15, 588-602; EC 10, 1693-1694; LCI 4, 15-24; A. De Longpérier, Une intaille antique inédite: CRAI 24 (1880) 275; O. Wulff, Altchristliche und mittelalterliche byzantinische und italienische Bildwerke, Berlin 1909, I, p. 237, pl. 56, n. 1152; L.A. Costans, Une amulette chrétienne sur papyrus: JS 20 (1922) 181-182; O. Wulff - W.F. Volbach, Altchristliche und mittelalterliche byzantinische und italienische Bildwerke, Ergänzungsband, Berlin 1923, II; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura-Europos, The Synagogue, New Haven, CT 1956, 349; Volbach - Hirmer, 80, pl. 115; B. Bagatti, Altre medaglie di Salomone cavaliere e la loro origine: RivAC 47 (1971) 331-342; J. Gutmann, Was There Biblical Art at Pompei?: Antike Kunst 15 (1972) 122-124.

A.M. Di Nino

SOLSTITIIS ET AEQUINOCTIIS, De. The text of an anonymous author whose title in the MSS is De solstitia et aequinoctia conceptionis et nativitatis Domini nostri Iesu Christi et Iohannis Baptistae. Published in the 15th c. among the spurious works of *John Chrysostom, it was not used by historians of *liturgy. It corresponds to the 17 sermons of the broad collection of 38 Latin homilies attributed to John Chrysostom and studied by Wilmart. In some MSS, the work was attributed to an author known as Pontius Maximus. According to Botte, its modern editor, because of the biblical citations, the small work was redacted in *Africa, at least in its modern-day form, and not at *Rome, as maintained by Wilmart and Lietzman; nevertheless, the original comes from a *Syriac context (Botte, Engberding). Talley, however, maintains its Western origin, because of its interpretation of Roman names of the months. The emperor *Justinian, in his letter to the inhabitants of *Jerusalem, cites the letter, attributing it to St. *Augustine; this attribution could indicate that a Greek translation also circulated. The anonymous author affirms the seasons acc. to the conception (equinox of autumn) and the birth (solstice of summer) of *John the Baptist and the conception (equinox spring) and the birth (solstice of winter) of Jesus: "Our Lord was conceived on the eighth day of the calends of April, in the month of March, which is the day of the Lord's passion and also his conception. This is the case because he suffered on the same day he was conceived" (PLS 1, 562-563).

CPL 2277; PLS 1, 557-567; B. Botte, Les origines de la Noël et de l'épiphanie, Louvain 1932, 93-105; A. Wilmart, La collection des 38 homélies latines de Saint Jean Chrysostome: JTS 19 (1917-1918) 305-327, esp. 316-317; A. Vaccari, Rassegna italiana di lingue e letterature classiche 2 (1920) 326-328; H. Engberding, Der 25. Dezember als Tag der Feier der Geburt des Herrn: AL 2 (1952) 25-43, esp. p. 36 (Syriac origin of the work); M. van Esbroeck: Une lettre de l'empereur Justinien sur l'Annonciation et la Noël en 561: AB 86 (1968) 351-357, here 354; Patrologia IV, 236-237; T.J. Talley, Le origini dell'anno liturgico, Brescia 1991, 94-100; S.K. Roll, Toward the Origins of Christmas, Den Haag 1995, 97-99.

A. Di Berardino

SOLUTIONES OBJECTIONUM ARIANORUM. The work, redacted in a dialogical form, presents the themes of the *trinitarian controversy, which is treated with rational and biblical arguments. The treatise defends the Catholic teaching on the Son's generation and preexistence and the same nature of the Father and the Son. The text was attributed by some scholars to *Vigilius bishop of Thapsus, who participated at the dramatic colloquium between Catholics and *Arians, which had been convoked by the *Vandal king *Huneric in the year 484. Today only the following works are considered authentic: Contra Eutychetem and the Dialogus contra arrianos. It seems difficult to identify with certainty the author of the Solutiones, which begins with the phrase: Prima eorum obiectio est, qua dicunt impossibile esse Deum Patrem, et incorporeum, et invisibilem, de sua substantia generare (PL 72,469). Facing the question, the author clarifies the meaning of some key terms (natura, generatio, Deus and omnipotentia) and refutes the opinions of the Arians who asserentes impossibilem eum qui sit omnipotens (ibid.). The other questions refer to the birth of the Son, to the theme of his "existence" and the "space" in which he was found before his Incarnation: in corde Patris, in utero Patris, in sinu Patris, id est occultis naturae arcanis (ibid. 470). The subsequent objection pertains to the themes ingenitus Pater, genitus Filius and sub- stantia geniti atque ingeniti, which are refuted by the author of the Solutiones with a brief procedure concluding with the affirmation: Patrem et Filium unius esse naturae (ibid.). The logical and theological arguments are supported with biblical passages, esp. those coming from the gospel of *John, the book of Wisdom and the book of Genesis.

CPL 812; CPPM II/A 1696; PL 72, 469-472. G. Ficker, Studien zu Vigilius von Thapsus, Leipzig 1897, 10-25; M. Schanz, Geschichte der römischen Literatur, vol. 4, 2, Munich 1920 (Handbuch der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, 8), 570-571.

W. Turek

SONG OF SONGS (Canticle of Canticles). "The whole world is worth less than the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel. All the Scriptures, in fact, are holy: but the Song of Songs is the holiest of holies" (Rabbi Aqiba, Yadayim 3, 5). The Song of Songs reveals the mystery of love to Israel: the love of the bridegroom for the bride, the immense love of God who creates humanity and guides his people, and the even greater love that will be manifested in the history that is to come. Israel lives the *ascesis of waiting. The Song of Songs is a paschal hymn which unites history and prophecy: God "has passed over" into the world to visit the chosen people, and "will pass over," one day, on his final visit to humanity. "Prophetic history" becomes musical prayer in "psalms" and in "canticles." At the summit is the Song of Songs: Solomon, king and prophet, surpasses David. Christ is the "one greater than Solomon" (Lk 11:31).

God is faithful to his love for his bride, which is the community, often unfaithful but always longing for the bridegroom's embrace. For a people who takes the Word of God literally, this is not just an *allegory. It is the discovery that God is "literally" in love with human beings: "Yes, as a young man marries a virgin, so your creator will marry you" (Is 62:5). Prophecy becomes history with the coming of the Messiah. The echo of the Song of Songs resounds in the gospel: the friends of the bridegroom feast because the bridegroom is present (Mt 9:15). Joy will be perfect in the "new earth," when the community will descend from heaven "prepared as a bride, adorned for her bridegroom" (Rev 21:2). Christians sing the Song of Songs for the feast of Easter: the start of spring, the time of weddings, the feast of the resurrection. God's voice is clear and needs no *exegesis: for more than a century, a reverential fear kept any Christian writer from handing down an interpretation of the Song of Songs. Only the fragrance of its perfume spread, with the perennial question: who is the bride?

*Hippolytus, echoing Paul (Eph 5:22-33) and accepting all that was spousal in the synagogue, responds: "The bride of Christ is the church." *Origen adds that this is when the idea of the bride-church is a lived truth and invites everyone to spousal love: the soul-bride is the one who takes seriously the commitment to live a holy life in the bride-church, until all humanity will be the bride of Christ. The Christian community, not yet thinking to draw a spousal theology from the Song of Songs that would illuminate the mystery of marriage, finds the "fire" of its spirituality in the mystery of God, who celebrates his marriage to humanity. The mystery of love is deepened, between eros and agape, between human love and mystical love, which speak the same language: "The lover seeks in the beloved object a fullness of happiness that it is unable to give him: he thus puts it in the place of God, making of it a supreme end. Only God is the true and adequate object of human passion" (H. Crouzel, Le thème du mariage mystique, 37). The *gnostics used the Song of Songs, creating with its fragrance a mystical atmosphere in which the theology of life was suffused with ritual illuminations (Iren., Haer. I 4,1 and 21,3; Hipp., Ref. V 19,3-4 and VII 22,13-16). Ecclesiastics discovered in the Song a synthesis of all biblical history and sing the event of liberation in the form of prophecy. Every image is a symbol leading to life, and the Song of Songs as a whole has an existential importance. The bride, who until now lives in the earthly garden perfumed by the presence of the divine lover, will be received in the wedding chamber at the perfect vision of God. The history of the interpretation of the Song of Songs must be based on all the allusions, citations and hermeneutical reflections spread throughout the Fathers' works, beyond just the Commentaries on the Canticle. The diachronic reconstruction of the interpretation of individual verses is a labor that is prior to a focus on the overall meaning of the Song of Songs for the patristic age.

The earliest Christian commentator is Hippolytus, whose commentary is preserved in a *Georgian version (Ct. 1,1–3,7: ed. G. Garitte, CSCO 263-264), and in *Armenian, *Syriac, *Paleoslavonic and Greek fragments. His typological exegesis, the first to identify the bridegroom with Christ and the bride with the church, follows Asiatic *Christology, centered on the humanity of Jesus and contemplating the *Trinity in its orientation to the *incarnation. The marriage of God with humanity is accomplished on the cross: Christ, consumed with love, immerses his humanity in the divine sonship already possessed by the Word and draws humanity toward the *resurrection. In Christ's death life is not lost, since his perfume spreads over his body, the church, so as to then reach all humanity.

The next commentator is Origen, who "in the other books surpassed everyone, and in the Song of Songs surpassed himself" (Jerome, prol. to Orig., Hom Ct. prol.). We know his two Homilies in *Jerome's *Latin version (Ct. 1,1–2,14: ed. W.A. Baehrens, GCS 33) and four books of his Commentary in Rufinus's translation (Ct. 1,1–2,15: GCS 33), besides the Greek fragments reported by *Procopius's Catena and the Philocalia (PG 87, 1545-1554 and 13,35-36). His *ecclesiological interpretation is enriched by an *anthropological one: the human person is urged to union with God in the church. Love is the energy of the *Holy Spirit, which transforms the person's senses, making possible the penetration of the mystery. The Song of Songs reveals God to the "perfect," those who with their "spiritual smell" sense the bridegroom drawing near, to reawaken in human beings the aroma of the image of God.

*Gregory of Nyssa raises Origen's exegesis to the heights of perfect contemplation (Ct. 1,1–6,8: ed. H. Langerbeck, Leiden 1960). The soul is called to detach itself from all passing things so as to ascend to the royal bed of the vision of God. The aroma of a life lived in virtue is enlivened by the breath of the Spirit in the church, through the intoxicating ecstasy of the bread and wine of Christ, which unite the bride to the bridegroom. *Philo of Carpasia's Commentary offers the first complete interpretation of the Song of Songs: we know a Greek abridgment (ed. M.A. Giacomelli, Rome 1772 = PG 40, 27-154) and a Latin version (ed. A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Turin 1979; cf. P.F. Foggini, Rome 1750). *Nilus of Ancyra gives the reflection an ascetic-moral tone for the life of monks, addressing the theme of the relation between the contemplative life and the active life (PG 87, 1545-1754). *Theodoret of Cyrrhus rejects the *Antiochene literalistic interpretation, lashing out—without naming *Theodore of Mopsuestia—at those who interpret the Song of Songs "carnally"; he follows Origen in considering the Song a "spiritual book," but he never accepts the literal interpretation with which the Alexandrian preceded the allegorical and seeks to avoid theological expressions which threatened the results of the *Chalcedonian controversy (PG 81,27-214; cf. M. Simonetti, Teodoreto e Origene, 919-930).

In the Latin world, Jerome mentions commentaries of *Victorinus of Petovium and *Reticius of Autun, both lost (Vir. ill. 74 and 82). Five homilies inspired by Origen are attributed to *Gregory of Elvira; rich in Hippolytan resonances, they accentuate the sacramental dimension of the wedding theme (Ct. 1,1–3,4: ed. J. Fraipont, CCL 69). Aponius's Commentary is a gold mine for scholars for the originality of its language (ed. H. Bottino - J. Martini, Rome 1843 = PLS 1, 799-1031), while that of Justus of Urgell is a compendium of modest worth (PL 67, 963-994). *Ambrose strews flowers picked from the Song of Songs throughout his works, without writing a continuous commentary. He drank at the springs of spousal spirituality and conveys his thirst to believers, esp. to virgins, presenting the Song as a beacon that illumines all of the books of Scripture. The mystical message for the way of the soul has an ecclesial tinge: Christ, perfect bridegroom of humanity in the gift of the cross, renders the bride capable of being a mother (P. Meloni, L'influsso del Commento al Cantico, 865-890).

The figure of Mary appears in the Song of Songs (G. Bardy, Marie et le Cantique chez les Pères, Bibl. V. Chr 7 [1954] 32-41). Among writers who loved the Song without commenting on it as a whole were *Cyprian, *Methodius, Jerome, *Augustine and *Cyril of Alexandria; also, many pearls of the book were set in the *liturgy to mark the rhythms of the Christian life (J. Daniélou, Bible et liturgie, Paris 1951, 259-280). *Gregory the Great, with the Expositio in Canticum, closes the tradition of the Fathers and introduces the great flourishing of medieval *monastic commentaries (ed. P. Verbraken, CCL 144). The spiritalis intelligentia of the mysteria litterae is a light on the path toward perfection, which the person must travel, wisely basing his ascesis on the Song's poetic symmetries. The Christian's life is a journey toward the sublimitas contemplationis, which guides the person's heart and the whole church to live in union with God. The Song of Songs is the history of the encounter between God and humanity, from the moment of the "creation" to the "embrace of presence" that will take place in the nuptial suite of eternity. In the mystical atmosphere of the Song of Songs, Christians felt the divine bridegroom penetrate the human flesh of the bride, to infuse in her the lymph of his divinity.

For the fundamental bibliography up until 1975, see P. Meloni, Il profumo dell'immortalità. L'interpretazione patristica di Cantico 1,3, Rome 1975. Also: F. Cavallera, Cantique des Cantiques. Historie de l'interprétation spirituelle: DSp 2, 93-101; A.M. La Bonnardière, Le Cantique des Cantiques dans l'œuvre de saint Augustin: REAug 1 (1955) 225-237; V. Recchia, L'esegesi di Gregorio Magno al Cantico dei Cantici, Turin 1967; G. Nolli, Cantico dei Cantici, Turin-Rome 1968; H. Crouzel, Origines patristiques d'un thème mystique: le trait et la blessure d'amour chez Origène: Kyriakon I, Münster 1970, 309-319; M. Harl, Cadeaux de fiançailles et contrat de mariage pour l'épouse du "Cantique des cantiques" selon quelques commentateurs grecs, Mélanges H.Ch. Puech, Paris 1974, 243-261; G. Chappuzeau, Die Auslegung des Hohenliedes durch Hippolyt von Rom: JbAC 19 (1976) 45-81; M. Simonetti, Origene. Commento al Cantico dei Cantici, Rome 1976; H. Crouzel, Le thème du mariage mystique chez Origène: StMiss 26 (1977) 37-57; P. Meloni, Ippolito e il Cantico dei Cantici, in Ricerche su Ippolito, Rome 1977, 97-120; R. Palla, Temi del commento origeniano al Cantico dei Cantici nel De Isaac di Ambrogio: ASNP 9 (1979) 563-572; A. Ceresa Gastaldo, La dimensione dell'amore nell'interpretazione origeniana del "Cantico dei Cantici," in Paradoxos Politeia, Milan 1979, 187-194; Id., L'esegesi origeniana del "Cantico dei Cantici," Origeniana secunda, Bari-Rome 1980, 245-252; P. Meloni, L'influsso del Commento al Cantico di Ippolito sull'Expositio Psalmi CXVIII di Ambrogio, in Letterature comparate. Problemi e metodo. Studi in onore di Ettore Paratore, Bologna 1981, 865-890; M. Simonetti, Teodoreto e Origene sul Cantico dei cantici: ibid., 919-930; G.I. Gargano, La teoria di Gregorio di Nissa sul Cantico dei Cantici, Rome 1981; S. Lucà, Il Commentario al Cantico dei Cantici di Nilo di Ancira: Studi bizantini and neogreci 174 (1983) 111-126; H. Crouzel, La christologie d'Origène selon le Commentaire sur le Cantique des Cantiques, Praesentia Christi. Festschrift Johannes Betz, Düsseldorf 1984, 421-433; G. Ravasi, Il Cantico dei Cantici, Bologna 1992; Gregory of Nyssa, Omelie sul Cantico dei Cantici, ed. V. Bonato, Bologna 1995; E. Cattaneo, Il "Cantico dei Cantici" nelle catechesi mistagogiche di sant'Ambrogio di Milano: La Civiltà Cattolica (1998) III, 29-41; P. Meloni, Risurrezione di Cristo e vita del cristiano nell'esegesi di Ambrogio al Cantico dei Cantici, in Nec timeo mori. Atti del Congresso internazionale di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della morte di sant'Ambrogio, Milan 1998, 639-648; A. Cortesi, Le Omelie sul Cantico dei Cantici di Gregorio di Nissa, Rome 2000 (with ample bibl.); A. Genovese, S. Agostino e il Cantico dei Cantici: tra esegesi e teologia, Rome 2002.; J.R. Wright, ed., Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, ACCS OT 9, Downers Grove, IL, 2005.

P. Meloni

SONNATIUS of Reims. Bishop of Reims (ca. 600–631) and saint venerated on 20 October. In the Historia Remensis ecclesiae written by Flodoard (II,5), it is said that he succeeded Romulphus, for whom he served as an archdeacon (II,4). According to the same source he was the one qui sinodum celebrasse reperitur cum aliis quadraginta vel eo amplius Galliarum episcopis (II,5: MGH, Scriptores, XIII,451). There follows a list of bishops present (41) and the text of the conciliar canons. The statements made by Flodoard lack any information on the site and the date, but the "local" character of his Historia and the role of Sonnatius have led some to hypothesize that the council in question took place at Reims (Gousset). The text and the order of the canons of this supposed Synod of Reims, however, are almost identical with those of the Council of Clichy (Clippiacum) of the year 626 or 627. Sonnatius was among the bishops who signed the final document, 37 of which figure among the 41 listed by Flodoard in the alleged Council of Reims. Following the guidance of an unpublished letter of Duchesne (summarized in CRAI 1889, 94), de Clercq maintained that the only council that really took place was that of Clichy. Because the bishops spread conciliar canons under the form of synodal statutes in their respective dioceses, it would have been very easy for Flodoard to report the redaction of the decrees that were subsequently circulated among the clergy and churches of the diocese of Reims.

Similarly, in the Historia Remensis Ecclesiae, Bishop Sonnatius's testamentary regulations, which primarily benefited the basilica of St. Remigius, where he wanted to be buried, were carefully listed. Nevertheless, there were not lacking conspicuous devices for other ecclesiastical institutions that Flodoard faithfully reported. There was a valuable document of the civil and religious history of Reims (Brouette).

Certainly before the 9th c. were the Statuta attributed to Sonnatius (PL 80,443-446). In them, among others, were recorded modifications to the *liturgical calendar with the development of the festal cycle. Thirteen were solemn feast days to be celebrated, along with the Sundays, absque omni opere forensi (col. 446). The feast of the Monday of *Easter (Resurrectio Domini cum die sequenti) appears here for the first time, although lacking is the Feast of the *Purification. Finally, the Marian feasts have special emphasis: Annuntiatio beatae Mariae, Assumptio beatae Maria, eiusdem Nativitatis; the last two mentioned seem to have been celebrated for the first time.

Concilia Galliae. A. 511–A. 695, ed. C. de Clercq, CCL 148 A (1974) 298; Les canons des conciles mérovingiens (VI[e]-VII[e] siècles), tr. J. Gaudemet - B. Basdevant, SC 354 (1989), II, 527; Statuta: PL 80, 441-446; Statuta synodalia apud Flodoard. Hist. Rem. II, 5 (CPL 1312): PL 135, 102-106; MGH, Scriptores, XIII, Hannoverae 1881 (J. Heller - G. Waitz), 451-455. See also Flodoard von Reims, Die Geschichte der Reimser Kirche, ed. M. Stratmann, Hannover 1998 (MGH, Scriptores [in-4°], 36); Flodoard, Histoire de l'église de Reims, tr. di F. Guizot, 2 vols., repr. Clermont-Ferrand 2004. T. Gousset, Les actes de la province ecclésiastique de Reims ou Canons et décrets des conciles, constitutions, statuts et lettres des évêques des différents diocèses qui dépendent ou qui dépendaient autrefois de la métropole de Reims, 4 vols., 1842-1844; C.A.H. Kellner, L'anno ecclesiastico e le feste dei santi nel loro svolgimento storico (heortology), It. tr. of the 2nd Ger. ed., Rome 1906, 18-19; C. de Clercq, La législation religieuse franque de Clovis à Charlemagne. Étude sur les actes de Conciles et les capitulaires, les statuts diocésains et les règles monastiques (507–814), Louvain 1936, 65-66; BS 11, coll. 1313-1314 (É. Brouette); N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle. La province romaine de Première Belgique entre Antiquité et Moyen Âge (III[e]-VIII[e] siècles), Paris 1980, 348-349; O. Pontal, Histoire des conciles mérovingiens, Paris 1989, 215-216; Patrologia IV, 351 (Y. Hen).

B. Clausi

SOPHRONIUS (Jerome's friend) (d. after 392). According to *Jerome (Vir. ill. 134), Sophronius composed in Greek, during his youth, some works that have now been lost (Laudes Bethlehem, a book on the destruction of the temple of *Serapis at *Alexandria) and translated into elegant *Greek several of Jerome's writings: his Latin translations of the *Psalms and the *Prophets, Ep. 22 to *Eustochium, the *Life of Hilarion and perhaps the Life of Malchus. The Greek translation of Jerome's De viris illustribus, however, was not his work (TU 14/1b) but that of a later translator by the same name.

CPG II, 3630-3636; Bardenhewer I, 3ff.; III, 283; CCL 72, XIV, XLVIII (bibl.); LTK³ 9, 736.

A. Pollastri

SOPHRONIUS of Jerusalem (ca. 550–638). Born in *Damascus around 550, he died at *Jerusalem on 11 March 638 (the year after the conquest of the city by the Caliph Omar). He probably was first a teacher of *rhetoric, hence the title "Sophist" (for a discussion on the identity of Sophronius the Sophist and Sophronius Patriarch, see S. Vailhé, Sophrone le Sophiste et Sophrone le Patriarche: ROC 7 [1902] 360-85; 8 [1903] 32-69, 356-387; G. Zuretti, Sofronio patriarca di Gerusalemme (634–638): Didaskal. n.s. 4 [1926] 19-68). He became a monk in the monastery of St. *Theodosius at Jerusalem. In the company of his teacher *John Moschus, he went to *Egypt, where the two monks dedicated themselves to the conversion of the *monothelites. After subsequent pilgrimages, including one in *Sinai, where he remained for 10 years, they set sail in 615 to *Italy, when Jerusalem had fallen into the hands of the Persians in 614. Along the way, they stopped at various ports (Cyprus, Samos, perhaps North Africa). John Moschus died at *Rome in 619 (or perhaps in 634): Sophronius brought back his remains to the monastery of St. Theodosius. In 633, Sophronius was engaged in a fight against the monothelites in Egypt and *Africa, and shortly thereafter at *Constantinople against the patriarch *Sergius. After his election to the patriarchal see of Jerusalem (634), he immediately published a synodal letter, addressed to Sergius of Constantinople and *Honorius of Rome, in which, without using the formula of the two energies or operations, he sought to advocate this teaching (Mansi 11,461-510; PG 87,3,3125-3146; Epitome of the Synodal Letter: Nea Sion 77 [1922] 178-186). Among his other works (PG 87,3,3147-4014) there remain *hagiographical writings, among which, presented with a great perfection of form, a *panegyric to the martyrs Cyrus and John (at *Alexandria, under the emperor *Diocletian: PG 87,3,3379-3676, see BHG² 475/479). Sophronius, moreover, has left many homilies, 23 Anacreontic odes, which were composed for religious feasts (ed. M. Gigante, Rome 1957, text and It. tr.). The Commentarius liturgicus was not the work of Sophronius, nor was the Vita Mariae Aegyptiacae; although the Homily on Palm Sunday, which was transmitted under the name of *Eulogius patriarch of Alexandria (PG 86,2,2913-2938), most likely was his. One of his writings against monothelitism has been lost.

CPG 7635-7681; DTC 14, 2779-2783; EC 11, 906-907; BS 11, 1283-1285; LTK³ 8, 736-737; G. Cosmas, De oeconomia incarnationis secundum s. S. Hierosolymitanum, Rome 1940; P. Parente, Uso e significato del termine Qeokànhtoj nella controversia monotelitica: REB 11 (1953) 241-251; Chr. von Schönborn, Sophrone de Jérusalem. Vie monastique et confession dogmatique, Paris 1972; M. Albert - C. von Schönborn, Lettre de Sophrone de Jérusalem à Arcadius de Chypre. Version syriaque inédite du texte grec perdu . . ., PO 39, 2 (Turnhout 1978); J. Duffy, Observations on Sophronius' Miracles of Cyrus and John': JTS n.s. 35 (1984) 71-90; DSp 14 (1990) 1066-1073; Sofronio di Gerusalemme, Le omelie, intr., tr. and note, ed. A. Gallico, Rome 1991; Sophrone de Jérusalem, Fêtes chrétiennes à Jérusalem, intr. and tr., ed. J. de la Ferrière, Paris 1999; Marienlexikon 6, 212-214; Patrologia V, 229-303 (see index).

T. Špidlík

SOPHRONIUS of Pompeiopolis (4th c.). He was among the chief proponents of the *homoiousians at the Council of *Seleucia (359). For this reason he was condemned and opposed in the Council of *Constantinople (360). Upon the death of the emperor *Constantius (262), along with other homoiousians, he contested the decisions of the Councils of *Rimini and Constantinople and condemned its supporters. After this event, we do not have any more information about him.

DCB 4,717; Simonetti, see the index; H.C. Brennecke, Studien zur Geschichte der Homöer: der Osten bis zum Ende der homöischen Reichskirche, Tübingen 1988, 193; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 764.

M. Simonetti

SORTES SANCTORUM. Human beings are always anxious to know about their own future through various means of divination or other instruments. The *pagan and Jewish world made use of complex systems of practices and prophetic beliefs; others were found in the Egyptian, Celtic and Germanic world. Even Christians used divination, although the Fathers condemned every form of oneiromancy

(i.e., divination by means of dreams), bibliomancy (divination by means of books) and other techniques that seemed too heavily tied to traditional paganism: "these thousands of foolish observances" (Aug., De doctr. chr. 2,20,31). Nevertheless, in practice the ancient church was tolerant, if the techniques were used within a context without pastoral or theological harm. One of these was to open a book of the Scriptures by chance (sortes biblicae or rather sortes evangelicae) and to read the first verse upon which one's eyes fell and to interpret it as prognostic of one's future. It was a Christian adaptation of the pagan practice of the sortes homericae, virgilianae, prenestinae, etc. *Augustine criticized the practice with benevolence: "With respect to those who read their own destiny into the pages of the gospel, although this is more preferable than running to consult the demons, I do not approve of this custom by those who wish to use the divine words offered for the future life to serve temporal affairs and the vanity of this life" (Ep. 55,37). He recognized, however, that by listening to a voice, even he by chance opened the apostle's book and read the famous phrase from Rom 13:13 that gave rise to his conversion (Conf. 8,12). In the East, the emperor *Heraclius, in the war against the Persians, after three days of *fasting turned to the Bible to learn where to stay for the winter. Because, before the invention of the printing press, the Bible in a single volume was very cumbersome, Christians consulted the books of the *Psalms, the *Prophets or the four gospels, making use of rites and ceremonies, at times after prayer and fasting. A Carolingian capitulary from the year 789 prescribed that "no one presume to read their destiny into the Psalter, the gospels or other objects." The practice continued throughout the Middle Ages and modern times. Something similar can also be found in the life of St. Francis of Assisi (Thomas of Celano, Vita Prima II, 92-93; Vita Secunda 15).

The Gelasian Decretum condemned the Liber qui appellatur Sortes apostolorum (TU 34/4,12), a book which could be the one that the medieval MSS called the Sortes sanctorum. Many medieval MSS of this text have been preserved. Therefore, the Sortes sanctorum did not make reference to the practice, mentioned above (i.e., sortes biblicae), but to a particular book, and were a collection of oral responses: the book that the councils condemn with this expression (can. 16 of the Council of *Vannes [462–468]; can. 42 of *Agde [506]; can. 30 of Orléans [511]). Klingshirn, against the common opinion, recently demonstrated that in reality the Sortes sanctorum were not the sortes biblicae, but a specific and concrete text starting from the 5th c.; in the 13th c., the name of this text was changed to the sortes apostolorum.

P. Courcelle, L'enfant et les "sorts bibliques": VChr 7 (1953) 194-220; DACL 15, 1590-1592; A. van Lantschoot, Une collection sahidique de "Sortes Sanctorum" (Papyrus Vatican copte 1): Muséon 69 (1956) 35-52; Ph.B. Katz, The Sortes Vergilianae: Fact and Fiction: Classical and Modern Literature 14 (1993-1994) 245-258; Sortes Astrampsychi, ed. R. Stewart, Munich [2]2001; W.E. Klingshirn, Defining the Sortes Sanctorum: Gibbon, Du Cange, and Early Christian Lot Divination: JECS 10 (2002) 77-130; E. Montero Cartelle - A. Alondo Guardo, Los "Libros de suertes" medievales: las Sortes sanctorum y los Pren Ostica Socratis Basilei; estudio, traducción y edición crítica, Madrid 2004.

A. Di Berardino

SORTES SANGALLENSES. Text of an anonymous author, it received this name because it was recovered from *palimpsest 908 of St. Gall (Lowe 953). Lowe affirmed that the MS came from N *Italy and must have had connections with Bobbio. The editors, however, place its original in *Gaul and maintain that it was from the 4th c. The text is a series of responses to an oracle to some questions that have a Christian tone. A certain number of questions have been lost; those that have been preserved focus on the various problems of daily, moral and social life: life and health, *love, *marriage, *family, *friends and enemies, fears and *hopes, concerns for the home, property, choice of a profession; this text also addresses various undertakings: *travel; return home; financial, economic and professional worries; and legal trials. This text contains some similarity to the Sortes Astrampsychi, a collection of oracles from 2nd- or 3rd-c. *Egypt.

CPL 536; E. Svenberg, Quelques remarques sur les "Sortes Sangallenses": Eranos 38 (1940) 68-78; A. Dold - R. Meister - K. Mras, Die Orakelsprüche: SAW 225, 4-5 (1948-51) 21-72; see A. Kurfess, Zu den S. S.: SAW 5 (1953) 143-146 (emendations); R. Weister - L. Krestan, Die Orakelsprüche: SAW 225, 5 (1951); A. Demandt, Die Sortes Sangallenses. Eine Quelle zur spätantiken Sozialgeschichte: Atti Accademia Roman. Cost. 8 (1990) 635-650; K. Strobel, Soziale Wirklichkeit und irrationales Weltverstehen in der Kaiserzeit, I: Sortes Astrampsychi und Sortes Sangallenses: Laverna 3 (1992) 129-141.

A. Hamman

SOTER, pope (ca. 166–ca. 175). According to the Liber pontificalis (1,135), he was born at Fundi (modern-day Fondi in Latina province of the Lazio region in Italy), the son of a certain Concordius. He wrote to the community of *Corinth; but his letter, which was very well received, has been lost. A passage from the epistolary response from Bishop *Dionysius, where the generosity and charity of Soter and the Roman community is praised, is mentioned by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 4,23,9-11). In this regard, Harnack supposed that Soter's letter could in reality be the *Second Letter of Clement, but this opinion is hardly likely. According to the treatise Praedestinatus* (I,26: PL 53,506), Soter wrote against the *Marcionites; in fact, during his pontificate this heresy began to spread, and one should not exclude the possibility that information of this fact came to his attention. Soter died a martyr during the reign of *Marcus Aurelius. The Liber pontificalis states that he was buried in the *Vatican. His *relics were subsequently transferred to the cemetery of *Callistus on the Via Appia. From the age of Pope Sergius II (844–847), Soter's remains were guarded in the Roman church of Sts. Sylvester and Martin.

AASS. Aprilis III, Venezia 1738, 5-7; P. Hinschius, Decretales pseudo-Isidorianae et Capitula Angilramni [. . .], Leipzig 1863, 122-125; LP I, 58-59, 135; DTC XIV, 2, 2422-2423; Chr. Mohrmann, Le conflict pascal au IIe siècle: VChr 16 (1962) 154-171; LTK² 9, 893-894; BS 11, 1327-1328 (A. Amore); EPapi 1, 224-226 (F. Scorza Barcellona); C. Macaro, Sotero vescovo di Roma, in Fondi tra antichità e Medioevo, ed. T. Piscitelli Carpino, Fondi 2002, 81-107.

M. Spinelli

SOTERIC of Caesarea (d. 537). He was the bishop of *Caesarea, Cappadocia, and was the exarch of the diocese of *Pontus in the first decades of the 6th c. until 537, when he succeeded Theodore Ascidas on the see of Caesarea. He was appointed as *metropolitan of Caesarea by *Macedonius II of *Constantinople (496–511), and although having declared his own faith acc. to the decision of the Council of *Chalcedon, he subsequently sided with the anti-Chalcedonians so much so that at the Synod of Sidon (511) he was recognized as one of the most prominent adversaries of Chalcedon. According to *Cyril of Scythopolis, Soteric was condemned by John III, the patriarch of Jerusalem (516-524), Sts. *Sabas, *Theodosius and *Hypatius of Ephesus along with *Nestorius, *Eutyches, Severus and all the anti-Chalcedonians in 516/517. For this reason, he went to Constantinople to the patriarch *John II the Cappadocian (518–520) to declare his position, in fact accepting the Council of Chalcedon along with *Cyrus bishop of Tyana and accepting disappointment from *Severus of Antioch. That notwithstanding, Pope *Hormisdas wanted to deport him, but the emperor *Justin I defended him, and thus he remained bishop of Caesarea until his death, which occurred in 537. *Heraclian of Chalcedon sent him a christological work titled Ad Soterichum, the fragments of which have been preserved in the treatise Doctrina Patrum.

Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Sabae 56; Severus of Antioch, Epistula ad Proclum et Eusebium, The Sixth Book of the Select Letters of Severus V, 13: ed. Brooks, London 1904, II, 344; G. Garitte, Fragments coptes d'une lettre de Sévère d'Antioche à Soterichos de Césarée: Muséon 65 (1952) 185-198; E. Honigmann, Heraclianus of Chalcedon (537 A.D.?), Soterichus of Cesarea in Cappadocia and Achillius (Studi e Testi 173), Vatican City 1953, 205-216; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, 2/2, Brescia 1999, 325-326.

C. Dell'Osso

SOTERIOLOGY. Belief in salvation in Jesus Christ constitutes one of the fundamental facts of the preaching and theology of the church fathers. Although Christians in the first centuries were content with confessing in the baptismal creed that the Lord Jesus died and rose for us, they did not fail to express, in their way of living and praying, what was preached to them concerning the sole savior of the world. When theologians defined their ideas about salvation, their theological reflection was essentially none other than a response to the question of knowing why Christ became human. Although refraining from taking a position on the salvific work of Christ, the bishops and synods always included it in all their concerns with respect to orthodoxy. When they defended *orthodoxy either in the resurrection of the body, or in the divinity of the Son and the *Holy Spirit, or in the one Lord Jesus Christ, God and man, i.e., in the necessity of actual *grace, they always began from the premise that Jesus Christ became human for us and that God glorified him for us, through his death and resurrection, in the power of the Holy Spirit.

Precisely because the doctrine of salvation was never dogmatically defined by a council of the church, but everywhere presupposed, it is not easy to describe it briefly. Indeed, it is all the more difficult that inasmuch as until now not only the history of *dogma and theology but also an entire series of other disciplines have been interested in clarifying the concepts of salvation and redemption: the history of Christian *spirituality, *liturgy and early Christian *archaeology, as well as the history of world religions and ancient cultures, and even the history of postclassical languages. Only those familiar with all these fields of research will be able to gather the results that are often dispersed in various scientific disciplines into a somewhat complete synthesis. With this objective, it is fitting to present the following premises: first of all, patristic soteriology does not restrict itself only to setting forth biblical soteriology. Conditioned by their culture, personal dispositions and their pastoral concerns, the fathers of the church reinterpreted Jesus Christ's message, choosing significant aspects and placing them within the context of their time. This fact esp. appears in early Christian art which represents Christ in various ways: as the Good *Shepherd, the teacher, the ruler of the world or the crucified and Risen One. Moreover, it is certainly permissible to understand the soteriology of the Fathers, which is very complex, acc. to themes and models: *illumination, victory, *divinization and *sacrifice of reconciliation. In this regard, however, two things should be kept in mind: on the one hand, a thematic consideration of patristic soteriology should never ignore the historical development; it is necessary, i.e., to keep in mind how different ideas found a varying interest in individual eras of the patristic age. On the other hand, a theological evaluation is also necessary; in other words, one must identify in which perspectives the fathers of the church spoke of the necessity of a theophany of God for *faith, the revenge of the new *Adam over the devil, the mediation of the God-man between God and the world, the education imparted by the divine-human teacher for the vicarious sacrifice on the cross.

Keeping in mind the aforementioned premises, we will emphasize in the history of patristic soteriology the following aspects. In the postapostolic time (until 150), preaching on salvation moved still almost completely in the path of the apostolic tradition. Nevertheless, it was different through a certain deepening inasmuch as it developed the biblical reflection for a broader use of the so-called testimonia, it described salvation by having recourse to rather Hellenistic categories and, clearly and most esp. in the writings of *Ignatius of Antioch, it related salvation to the true incarnation of the true God. Around the middle of the 2nd c., soteriology could be titled "the triumph of the heavenly Savior." It presents Christ as a heavenly being who comes down to the earth to complete his work of salvation (the illumination of all peoples, victory over the demons), and then goes back to his Father along with all of redeemed humanity.

Around the end of the 2nd c., the controversy over the *resurrection of the body led such antignostics as *Irenaeus and *Tertullian to place the *incarnation at the center of history (oikonomia), in which human beings in their entirety reach likeness with the immortal God. More open to the authentic aspirations of the Hellenistic world, *Clement and *Origen of Alexandria elaborated a soteriology in which salvation is conceived as the true *gnosticism. According to these authors, the eternal Word, the mediator between God and the world leads all of indistinct humanity through the history of universal pedagogy to the knowledge of the transcendent God. In a time of crisis for the Roman Empire, *Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) presented Christ as a teacher and example of the vera salus, although placing himself within the perspective of the actual presence of Christ in his church, without forgetting the historical fact of the already accomplished redemption and awaiting the return of the supreme judge. Another Latin author, *Lactantius (after 300), was the author of an even more Roman doctrine. For him, Christ must be at the same time God and man, because only as God is he able to teach us the true righteousness, and only as man can he give us the example of a virtue that perseveres until death. With the turn presented by the Council of *Nicaea (325), the first ecumenical Council and the symbol of the tempora christiana, a new conception of Christ is proclaimed: *Eusebius of Caesarea, the theologian of *Constantine the Great, glorifies Christ as the true emperor, and both the liturgy and the art of the church now echoed the imperial. Defending the Nicene faith in the true divinity of Christ, *Athanasius (d. 373) and *Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367) understood the redemption of Christ primarily as the incarnation of the eternal Son of God, who divinizes, i.e., glorifies all humanity. Under the influence of *Neoplatonism, which by that time was the sole philosophy in the Roman Empire, *Gregory of Nyssa (d. 394) conceived of the death and resurrection of Christ as the decisive turn in the history of evil as well as the beginning of a never perfected but always progressing divinization of the human being. The defense of the faith of Nicaea also lead, during the 4th c., to Christocentricism that not only characterized the liturgy, esp. *baptism which by that point was understood as a participation in the death of Jesus Christ, but also Christian spirituality, as it appears in the teaching of *Evagrius of Pontus (d. 399) on equality with Christ (isochristisms) and that of the Christus omnia of *Ambrose of Milan (d. 397).

Patristic soteriology of the first centuries certainly arrives at its culminating point with *Augustine (d. 430). For Augustine, the salvific work of Christ consists primarily in the revelation of the love of the humble God. Jesus Christ, the only mediator between God and humanity, has revealed, with his entire existence, but esp. with his teaching and example, how human beings, fallen with Adam in the misery of sin, can find their God. Likewise, with the death and resurrection, he completed in the name of all human beings the first step on the way to divine justice in such a way that, under his guidance, the city of God can also come to completion in his church. Although the development of patristic soteriology also included from the beginning the question of the person of the Savior, this issue was not posed with clarity except toward the end of the 4th c. At that moment, however, Christian thinkers also more clearly understood that human salvation could only be established by the one Christ, true God and true man. The faith of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), declaring that the two natures of Jesus Christ exist in one person, perhaps did not make explicit all the soteriological implications of this dogma. The preaching and theology of those who prepared it, however, left no doubts.

According to *Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428), the most eminent representative of the *Antiochene tradition, in fact, God has united all of creation in Christ precisely because the divinity of the Word and the humanity of Jesus were always united in him. This union in the assumptus homo will reach, however, its perfection only in the final resurrection.

Nevertheless, the paschal mystery of Christ has already anticipated the Christian's passage to the state of immortality and freedom, because in this glorious event, Christ became the model of hope in the eternal salvation as well as the promise of the consummation of all things. Completing the *Alexandrian tradition, which had insisted greatly on the divine-human origin of the redemption, *Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) gave it the most coherent expression. As his teaching on the priesthood of Christ shows in a special way, Cyril was primarily interested in the ontological unity of the eternal Word with assumed humanity only to anchor more deeply the historical action of Jesus in God himself.

As a faithful heir of the Latin tradition, *Leo the Great (d. 461), for his part, established his soteriology on the dogma of the double consubstantiality. Although emphasizing the distinction of the two natures, he did not overlook the fact that Jesus' obedience and abandonment have their deepest roots in the personal unity of these two with the Son of God. The extent to which, in this doctrinal position, is configured the theme of human salvation becomes clear from the way in which Leo presented his doctrine on the God-man in the framework of the celebration of the liturgical mysteries, thanks to which, acc. to him, the Risen Lord does not cease to live in his church.

*Maximus the Confessor (d. 662), certainly the most profound thinker of the late patristic age, finally affirmed in a truly grandiose way the soteriological meaning of the faith of Chalcedon. According to Maximus, the Pasch of Christians was prefigured in the Pasch of Christ. Indeed, the entire universe was recapitulated in the glorious Christ. More than all the other Fathers, Maximus established the salvific union of all things on the divine-human freedom of Christ, thus overcoming, in a more radical way, every Hellenization of the good news.

Under the formal aspect, the entire soteriology of the Fathers constitutes an ever renewed interpretation of the chief affirmations of the Bible concerning salvation. Responding to the pastoral needs of each age, the Fathers of the church used the apostolic message, always trying to remain faithful to the whole of the biblical teaching. Many of their interpretations, however, were closely tied to their own situation. Ideas such as the sacrifice of reconciliation, victory over the devil, and the return to *paradise were therefore to be considered as metaphors proposed for their time to illustrate a fundamental affirmation that was always valid.

With respect to its content, patristic soteriology understood the phrase Christus pro nobis primarily as the actual presence of the Savior in his church: Christ is saving "today" all those who believe in his name, and this actualization of salvation will not be complete, however, except in the final moment when Christ will return to subject all things, and finally himself, to God, his Father. This "ubiquitous" understanding of Christ's work, however, must not be isolated from the preceding history of Israel and even less from the historical events of the life of Jesus. According to the fathers of the church, Christ is working now (nunc) only inasmuch he came at that time (tunc) for our salvation.

The same connection between now and then was understood in two ways: on the one hand, Christian authors affirmed that Christ was enthroned through the Paschal mystery as the Savior. For this reason he can now save in the church all those who believe in him; on the other hand, in his journey to the Father, Christ anticipated our journey. These two chief modes of explanation, which, however, are not mutually exclusive, certainly show the effects of the ancient ideas and categories with which they were circumscribed. For this reason, we today would likely not share with the people of that time the mode of speaking about the heavenly existence of the Savior or the inclusion of all members in Christ, the suffering and risen head; nevertheless, we know well that behind those perhaps antiquated presentations of the redemption stands the sensus fidelium: Christ lives and saves human beings and is still doing so because he truly died and rose for us. This ever valid meaning of the faith also includes the fact that Christ was able to save us only because he was at the same time God and man. In the final analysis, this means that Christ must be a free human being to be able to orient himself with full freedom in our place toward God, and that likewise that free choice of God could not be established except on the freedom of God himself. Along with the fathers of the church, the Christian must believe that God himself was the only one righteous on the earth and that, in his righteousness to the point of death, our salvation, i.e., our abandonment to God and human beings, has already begun for all time.

C. Andresen, Erlösung: RAC 6, 54-219; B. Studer, Soteriologie in der Schrift und Patristik: HDG III/2a, Freiburg 1978 (extensive bibl.); R. Schwager, Der wundersame Tausch, Munich 1986; B. Sesboüé, Jésus Christ, l'unique médiateur, I, Paris 1988, and II, Paris 1991; H. Wagner, Erlösung III: LTK³ 3, 805-808.

B. Studer

SOTERIS (Sotheris), martyr. *Ambrose (De virg. 3,7,37-38; Exh. virg. 12,82) mentions Soteris as a noble, a virgin, martyr (under *Diocletian) and member of his own family. For this reason, Ambrose set her forth as an example for his sister *Marcellina. An inscription from 401 (ICUR I,495) refers to her dies natalis (see *birthday) as 11 Feb. The same date is found in the Mart. hier., along with some others which are mistaken repetitions (6 and 10 February; 12 May). The Sacramentarium gelasianum, historical martyrologies and the Mart. roman. commemorate her on 10 Feb. The 7th-c. itineraries place her tomb on the Via Appia, in the cemetery of *Callistus (CCL 175,289. 308. 317. 327. 331. 332. 341), but to this day the ecclesia s. Soteris has not been identified. The Greek encomium by a certain Pamphilus was likely written in Rome in the 1st half of the 7th. c. (CPG 6921). Pope Sergius II (844–847) transferred the relics of Soteris to S. Martino ai Monti in Rome.

BHG 1642; CPG 6921; BS 11, 1328-1329; RAC 9, 236-239; BBKL 10, 827-828; Ph. Pergola, Le catacombe romane, Rome ²1999, 209-210.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

SOUL (Human)
I. Contexts - II. Questions.

The human soul, about which, acc. to *Pamphilus, *Origen dared not write a treatise (Apologia 8: PG 17, 604), was a principal theme of classical and Christian antiquity, though as of yet there is still no comprehensive study on the theme. Here we will give the dialectical context and the questions developed during the first five centuries of Christianity.

I. Contexts. The cultural contexts which Christians faced were primarily *Stoicism and *Platonism. The Stoics considered the human soul to be a living principle, originating in matter and in the end dissolving with each periodic conflagration (ekpyrōsis); the Platonists thought of the soul as preexisting the person's birth and therefore not created simultaneously with the body, but fallen into it (Cic., Tusculanae 1, 10,20 and 11,22; Tertull., De anima 54,1-4). Stoicism thus posed to Christianity the problem of the nature and destiny of the soul; Platonism, that of the soul's relation with the body.

II. Questions. The background of the resulting questions included the problems of the concept of incorporeity linked to that of spirituality, a link that seemed contradictory, and of the communion of substance between soul and body, which was the greatest difficulty for a concept of the spirituality of the soul.

a. Nature of the soul. *Augustine (5th c.) synthesized the results of a centuries-long discussion as follows: Natura animae . . . res spiritualis est, res incorporea est, vicina est substantiae Dei (En. in ps. 145, 4,40). A *Neoplatonic conclusion (Plot., Enneads IV, a book dedicated entirely to the soul), it considered the soul to be a substance separate from the body and acting independent of it; spiritual and incorporeal by nature, and thus without the quantitas proper to bodies; rational, and therefore distinct from the irrational souls of animals; divine and eternal by nature (Plot., Enneads IV, 7, 10, l). Many Fathers added that the soul was immortal, esp. Augustine. On the divinity of the soul, however, the Fathers, while admitting its spirituality, specified its distance from the divine essence: it is only the "image of the image" (Greg. Nys., De anima). Given its possibility of error, it is far from the divine perfection (Cassiod., De anima: PL 70, 1287). The soul, specifies Augustine, as incorporeal is the substance nearest God (Civ. Dei 11, 26,1; Quant. an. 34,77; Gen. ad litt. 10,24), and as a creature is mutable and inferior to him (In Io. ev. 38, 10,19). *Aristotle and the Stoics thought that the substance of the soul had a corporeal nature, though of course different from that common to other bodies. The Platonic duality psychē-nous becomes a separation in Aristotle (De anima 2,2,413b), and the nous in particular, a point of departure of the intelligible world in Neoplatonism (Plot., Enneads IV, 3,1,4), was understood to be of divine constitution because it was made of the quinta essentia or natura (thesis of Eudemus) or ether (thesis of De Philosophia), a conception which through *Philo of Alexandria (Quis haeres 57) was taken up by many Christian authors (texts in Moraux, PWK 14/1,1171-1266). The entelecheia, i.e., the circular movement of the heavens, was applied to the soul. The soul would thus be astral by nature and therefore divine, necessarily implying immortality (Arist., De anima 1,3,407a), but endowed with corporality, corporales lineas (Tertull., De an. 9,1-3), though of a substance more subtle than the bodies known to us (Iren., Adv. haer. 2,34). The thesis of the corporeity of the soul originated in Christian authors for many reasons: the nonidentification of the soul with God (Maximus the Confessor, Ep. 6: PG 91, 428); opposition to Platonism's consideration of the person as being merely his soul (Iren., Adv. haer. 5,6); the possibility of resurrection, with the soul being capable of assimilating itself to the body and recognizing it (Iren., Adv. haer. 2,33-34); and finally to explain the passions, since what is incorporeal is impassible, acc. to the Stoic adage (Tertull., De an. 6,4); otherwise they would have had to follow the theory of those who held that the passions could only be ascribed to the body. The immortality of the soul in this context was understood as a gift of God and not as a quality of the soul (Iren., Adv. haer. 2,34,1-4). In the 5th c., following the reflection on original *sin and its transmission, questions again were raised concerning the origin of the soul (by creationism or traducianism) and its spirituality and immortality (Aug., Ep. 166 and 167 to Jerome; see also for the opinions on the origin of the soul [4 or 5] Ep. 143 and 165; De quantitate animae; De immortalitate animae; De anima et eius origine; Claudianus Mamertus, De statu animae).

b. Immortality of the soul. This took on a gradual development in ancient Christianity, thanks above all to Origen and Augustine. In the 5th c. some still taught that the soul was material and mortal, like every creature. In that century *Claudianus Mamertus wrote the most complete study we have on the spirituality of the soul, from which he then deduced a proof of its immortality that was vigorously contested by *Faustus of Riez. Some read the Pauline text Col 1:16 (in ipso condita sunt universa . . . visibilia et invisibilia) as favoring immortality, assimilating "invisible" to "incorporeal" (asōmatos) (Orig., Princ. 1,7,1; 4,3,15; Aug., Ep. 238,15); others distinguished between "invisible and incorporeal," with the soul being invisible but corporeal like every created being (thesis linked to Stoicism: SVF 11, 123,16; Tertull., De an. 7,3; De carne Chr. 11). Immortality was held to be proper to God, with the soul being only invisible but not immortal, though it could become so by God's gift (*Irenaeus's thesis and that of Christians in general, who believed in resurrection). *Tertullian's statement on the immortality of the soul ("Some truths are known to us even by nature, like the immortality of the soul": De resurr. 3,1-3) had influence from the 2nd c. on, recognizing as it did the Neoplatonic principle that the soul contains the body, something possible only for an immaterial principle (Nemesius of Emesa, De natura hominis: PG 40, 540; Proclus, In Timaeum 90A: Diehl 1,293,22). Thus the soul assures its continuance in being vis-à-vis the body because it is by nature imperishable, i.e., immortal. The *Alexandrian school, developing Philo's idea that immortality and incorruptibility are divine qualities that mutually refer to one another (De opif. hom. 135), proposed the relation between apatheia (the impassibility acquired through moral effort, and which is a divine attribute) and aphtharsia (the incorruptibility that implies a link to immortality: Clem. Alex., Protr. 120,3; Strom. 8,3; Greg. Nys., passim). Origen places the soul at the third degree of rational creatures, among those that are incorporeal, attributing humanity's corporeity to its diversity and not to the nature of the soul which is thus in itself immortal (Princ. 1, 4,1; 1, 8,3; 2, 1,4 and 8,3). *Athanasius deduces the "reasonable and immortal" nature of the soul from its activity: it thinks reasonably and "moves itself" independent of the body (Contra Gentes 33, something already argued by Tertullian: De an. 43,1-2; 49,1-3; De test. an. 1,5; 4,1; 5,1-2). Augustine derived the immortality of the soul from the eternity of the truth it receives (Solil. 2, 19,33: "Thus the soul is immortal"; Trin. 14,4: "In the human soul, rational and intelligent, one must find the image of the Creator, immortally etched into its immortality"; see also Ep. 163; 166 and 202/A on the immortality of the soul, its possible creationist or *traducianist origin, and its birth in original sin; see Ep. 118 for the happiness of the soul with the body at the end of time). In the soul are distinguished, for Augustine, memory, intelligence and will (Ep. 169, 1,2), and it is transported by the weight of love (Ep. 157, 2,9). The soul, therefore, is not the highest good, as the Stoics and Platonists held (Ep. 118, 3,15-16), but it tends to God, he who is the highest good (Ep. 118, 3,13). Fallen into sin by its own will and not because of a previous existence, it does not undergo reincarnation (Ep. 166, 2,6 and 9,27).

Tertullian, De anima (CCL 2,779-869); De testimonio animae (CCL 1,173-183); De censu animae (lost); Origen, La disputa con Eraclide (SC 67, Paris 1960); Gregory of Nyssa, De anima et resurrectione (PG 46, 11-160; ed. H. Polack, Gregorii Nyss. Opera omnia 2, Leiden 1966; Ambrose, De Isaac et anima (CSEL 32/1, 641-700); Augustine, De quantitate animae (PL 32, 1035-1080); De immortalitate animae (PL 32, 1021-1034); De anima et eius origine (CSEL 60,423-470); Faustus of Riez, Ep. 3 (CSEL 11,3-17); Claudianus Mamertus, De statu animae (CSEL 11,18-197); Cassiodorus, De anima (PL 70, 1279-1308); Trattati sull'anima dal V al IX secolo, Milan 1979; E. Rhode, Psyche. Seelenkult und Unsterblichkeitsglaube der Griechen, Freiburg i.B. 1890-1894 (It. tr. Bari 1914-1916; Fr. tr. Paris 1952); E. Bréhier, La théorie des incorporels dans l'ancien stoïcisme, Paris [2]1928; H. Gomperz, AsŌmatos: Hermes 67 (1932) 155-167; J. Goldbrunner, Das Leib-Seele Problem bei Augustinus, Munich 1934; Ch. Josserand, L'âme-Dieu. À propos d'un passage du "Songe de Scipion": AC 4 (1935) 141-153; A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismègiste III. Les doctrines de l'âme, Paris 1953; J. Coman, L'immortalité de l'âme dans le "Phédon" et la résurrection des morts dans la littérature chrétienne des deux premiers siècles: Helikon 3 (1963) 17-40; E.L. Fortin, Christianisme et culture philosophique au V[e] siècle. La querelle de l'âme humaine en Occident, Paris 1959; P. Moraux, Quinta essentia: PWK 24 (1963) 1171-1266; A.H. Chroust, The Doctrine of the Soul in Aristotle's Last Dialogue "on Philosophy": The New Scholasticism 42 (1968) 364-373; G. Movia, Anima e intelletto, Padua 1968; C.G. Steel, The Changing Self: A Study on the Soul in Later Neoplatonism: Iamblicus, Damascius and Priscianus, Brussels 1978; C. Scanzillo, L'anima nei Padri dei primi secoli, in var. aus., Problemi di attualità, Naples 21979, 33-164; M. Di Marco, La polemica sull'anima tra Fausto di Riez e Claudiano Mamerto (SEA 51), Rome 1995.

V. Grossi

SOZOMEN (5th c.). Author of a Historia Ecclesiastica. Contemporary of *Socrates of Constantinople, the little information we have about him is drawn from his own work. The year of his birth and death are unknown, which occurred around 448. He was probably born in the village of Bethelia near *Gaza in *Palestine; he belonged to a family of committed Christians to whom was owed the institution of parishes and convents. He spoke of his grandfather who lived at the time of the emperor *Julian. His grandfather was well respected for his learning and, after his conversion, for his explanation of Holy *Scripture. Sozomen belonged to a school of monks and was always in contact with monastic circles, gathering pieces of information for his work. He studied law, perhaps at Berytus (Beirut), where instruction was offered in Latin. After a trip to *Italy, he settled definitively at *Constantinople, where he exercised the profession of scholasticos: this must have taken place no earlier than the death of Atticus (425), because he affirmed that he did not know this bishop; in 443 he was still working as a lawyer (HE II,3,10). His complete name was, as attested to by Photius (Bibl., cod. 30), Salamon Hermias Sozomen, but the oldest MSS also contain the variant Hermias Sozomen Salaminius.

From Sozomen we know that he had written an earlier historical work in two books, now lost, which treat the period from the ascension of Christ to the removal of *Licinius (323) and which depended on Clement (that is the *ps.-Clementine Homilies), from *Hegesippus, *Julius Africanus and *Eusebius of Caesarea. The nine books are a continuation (whose actual division into chapters is not to be attributed to the author) of the HE dedicated to *Theodosius II (d. 450) and written between 439 and 448. As Sozomen claimed, the work had to treat the period between 324 (the third consulate of Crispus and Constantine) and 439 (17th consulate of Theodosius II). It ends, however, at the year 421 (the death of the emperor *Honorius), although a few later events are barely mentioned. It has been supposed that this defect was owed to the intervention of an imperial censor, but this hypothesis is hardly likely: the MS tradition, moreover, does not allow us to establish whether the first readers had at their disposal a more complete text than the one we possess today. Redacted at the same time as the work of Socrates, the HE pertains to the same arc of time and depends on it in the details, even if it fails to mention this work. Jeep and Schoo in their study have also identified other sources for Sozomen's work: *Rufinus (who is not, however, cited), the Historia Ecclesiastica and the Vita Constantini by Eusebius of Caesarea, a few of *Athanasius's writings (however, not all cited), *Palladius and numerous documents, synodal acts, letters of emperors and bishops, spread around in state and ecclesiastical archives and private libraries. Occasionally in the HE, reference is made to the orations of *Gregory of Nazianzus as well as to *Libanius and *Apollinaris of Laodicea, although the reminiscences of the works of *John Chrysostom and *Jerome are uncertain. Sozomen probably knew the writings of *Ephrem the Syrian and *Eustathius of Antioch, *Eunomius and *Eutropius; in the ninth book he makes extensive use of the writings of *Olympiodorus of Thebes. The collection of letters indicated in the HE as γραφαί is perhaps to be identified with the συναγωγή written by *Sabinus of Heraclea (Batiffol). Also present are the *Syriac and several other unknown writings unknown to Socrates, as shown by the passages pertaining to the history of the monks and the Persian martyrs under the reign of *Shapur II. Buck demonstrated that Sozomen did not use the work of the pagan Eunapius and therefore cannot be used to reconstruct his fragmentary work. He knew and used the Codex Theodosianus to reconstruct the religious legislation of the emperors. The problem of the investigation of the sources was of utmost importance to Sozomen, as appears from the proemium of the HE. He used all his energy to bring to light all the documentation that was possible for him to obtain. In contradistinction to Socrates, he extended his investigation to the biographies of famous monks and used numerous sources that pertained to the events of the West.

Facing the problem of the systemization of the excessive material that he was able to find, he gave primacy to his literary demands that were connected with the canons of classical historiography and the objective of addressing with his work upper-class, but not excessively competent, readers. This explains why, when compared to the more plain and simple style of Socrates's text (Photius, Bibl., cod. 30), Sozomen's work is hardly commendable for its fusion and synthesis of sources and documents, which is almost always accomplished in the HE, as well as the reluctance for theological questions and the tendency for anecdotal narration that is rich with ascetic legends and miraculous events. In the historical vision of Sozomen, one finds the continual intervention of divine providence that directs world events toward the progress of Christianity: the emperors became the guardians of orthodoxy, and the history of the church assumes apologetic tones. The following scholars have made editions of the HE: R. Estienne (Paris 1544), H. Valois (Paris 1668), R. Hussey (Oxford 1860) and recently Bidez - Hansen. We have a portion of a Latin version completed in the 6th c. by the monk *Epiphanius under the direction of *Cassiodorus, although Eastern translations are lacking.

Editions: CPG 6030; PG 67, 843-1630; J. Bidez - G.C. Hansen, GCS 50, Berlin 1960 (updated ed. , 1995, 526-548; text and Ger. tr. by G.C. Hansen, Turnhout 2004); the ed. is represented in the SC with a Fr. tr.: SC 306, 418 and 495, Paris 1983-2005; W. Jacob - R. Hanslik, Cassiodori Epiphanii Historia Ecclesiastica tripartita, CSEL 71, Vienna 1952.

Studies: L. Jeep, Quellenuntersuchungen zu den griechischen Kirchenhistorikern, Leipzig 1884; P. Batiffol, Sozomène et Sabinos: ByzZ 7 (1898) 265-284; G. Schoo, Die Quellen des Kirchenhistorikers Sozomenos, Berlin 1911; PWK 22/1, 1240-1248; DTC 14, 2469-2471; G. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica, I, Berlin 1958, 510-512; G. Downey, The Perspective of the Early Church Historians: GRBS 6 (1965) 63-66; Quasten II, 539-541; A. Primmer, Sozomenus, Kirchengeschichte. Hrsg. von J. Bidez: Gnomon 39 (1967) 350-358; F. Winkelmann, Die Kirchengeschichtswerke im ostrom. Reich: Byzantinoslavica 37 (1976) 175-177; G.F. Chesnut, The First Christian Historians: Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret and Evagrius, Paris 1977; M. Mazza, Sulla teoria della storiografia cristiana: osservazione sui proemi degli storici ecclesiastici, in La storiografia ecclesiastica della tarda antichità, Messina 1980, 335-389; G. Zecchini, Aezio. L'ultima difesa dell'Occidente romano, Rome 1983; J. Harries, Sozomen and Eusebius: The Lawyer as Church Historian in the Fifth Century, in C. Holdsworth - T.P. Wiseman, The Inheritance of Historiography 350–900, Exeter 1986, 45-52; C. Roueché, Theodosius II, the Cities, and the Date of the Church History of Sozomen: JTS 37 (1986) 130-132; B. Fitzgerald, Pagan Activities During the Reigns of Valens and Theodosius I According to the Church Historians Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret, Diss. Princeton Theol. Seminary 1995; H. Leppin, Von Constantin dem Grossen zu Theodosius II.: das christliche Kaisertum bei den Kirchenhistorikern Socrates, Sozomenus und Theodoret, Göttingen 1996; T. Urbainczyk, Observations on the Differences Between the Church Histories of Socrates and Sozomen: Historia 46 (1997) 355-373; T. Urbainczyk, Vice and Advice in Socrates and Sozomen, in The Propaganda of Power: The Role of Panegyric in Late Antiquity, ed. by M. Whitby, Leiden 1998, 299-319; D.F. Buck, Did Sozomen use Eunapius' "Histories"?: MH 55 (1999) 15-25; LACL 648-649; G. Sabbah, D'Eusèbe à Sozomène: empereurs, évêques et moines, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Leanza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 599-618; P. Van Nuffelen, Un héritage de paix et de piété: étude sur les histoires ecclésiastiques de Socrate et de Sozomène, Leuven 2004.

A. Labate

SPAIN and PORTUGAL. The conquest of Hispania by Rome, which began in the year 218 BC, was concluded only in 19 BC with a full pacification of the peninsula. Nevertheless, its Romanization came slowly and reached the various provinces at different levels, but more swiftly and intensely than all others, it affected *Baetica. Already in 197 BC, Hispania was divided into two provinces: Citerior (NE) and Ulterior (SW). The emperor Augustus subdivided Ulterior into two provinces: Baetica (capital Cordoba), and *Lusitania (capital *Mérida); the emperor *Diocletian continued the subdivision of Citerior into three parts: *Tarragona (capital Tarragona), *Carthaginensis (capital Cartagena) and *Gallaecia (capital *Braga). The five provinces, along with *Mauritania Tingitana, made up the diocese of Hispania, and, since the time of the emperor *Constantine, constituted part of the prefecture of *Gaul.

We do not know if the apostle *Paul's desire to go to Spain (Rom 15:24) materialized; nevertheless, it remains only a hypothesis despite the abundance of testimonies from the Fathers, some of which are very ancient, such as those of *Irenaeus and *Tertullian, who espoused it. It is certain that, even if he did come, he did not leave any traces in the peninsula. Likewise, one cannot support *James's arrival in Spain; and there are not lacking those who still defend the presence of the so-called Seven Apostolic Men in Spain, despite the silence of the primary sources (literary, *archaeological, *epigraphic and *liturgical). Keeping in mind the respective and, at times, late proofs of quite a few scholars, for the most part Spanish, who lean toward the African origin of peninsular Christianity, one should conclude that Christianity arrived in Spain through the normal channels of the phenomenon of Romanization: army, commerce and missionaries sent by other Christian communities, and esp. by *Rome.

The first testimonies to Christianity in Spain come from Irenaeus (Adv. haer. I, 3) and Tertullian

(Adv. Iud. 7,4); in fact, these are not trustworthy because they are too generic and also perhaps rhetorical. From the first clearly valid document, i.e., Letter 67 by *Cyprian of Carthage (254), we come to know of the existence of bishops at Mérida and at Astorga-León, as in other nearby cities, in addition to *Saragossa; we know of the existence of a persecution, during which the Christians gave an example to their pastors, and of relations with Rome (and only because of *Carthage). Through the authentic, but not the proconsular, Acts of the martyrdoms of St. *Fructuosus, we know of the presence of Christianity in Tarragona and some of its customs until 259. The martyrs of the Diocletian persecution bore witness to their faith in Saragossa, Calahorra, *Gerona, Cordoba, Mérida and Alcalá de Henares. But the best document for knowing the extent, the characteristics and the problems of Spanish Christianity are the Acts of the Council of *Elvira (beginning of the 4th c.). From these Acts one can conclude that there was a significant penetration of the Christian religion in Baetica and the border areas, and that Christianity there was not entirely free from *paganism, and in other respects the religion was rather rigid and traditional. During the 4th c., the Spanish church remained in a certain sense outside the major crises of Christianity. Its relationship with the *Donatism of nearby *Africa was very limited but real and can be observed in the presence of at least eight bishops at the Council of *Arles (314), as well as in the likely influence of *Hosius of Cordoba in Constantine's decisions. Hosius himself was the representative of the participation of the Spanish church in the *Arian crisis, as the emperor's ecclesiastical counselor and the leader of the anti-Arian Western party. Eight other peninsular bishops were present in the conflict, although in a different way and with a different impact: *Potamius of Lisbon, a signatory of the Arian Formula of *Sirmium (357), and *Gregory of Elvira, a committed anti-Arian to the end. The peace of the Spanish church was tested, however, at the end of the 4th c. by the *Priscillianist movement, with extensive repercussions inside and outside the Peninsula in the civil and ecclesiastical context. Priscillianism stimulated a certain literary production, which reached the extent of the production achieved by Potamius and Gregory, mentioned above, to those of the poets *Juvencus and *Prudentius, to that of *Bachiarius, *Eutropius and the writings of St. *Pacian, who all inform us about several themes of great importance in the Spanish church of that time: *penance, *marriage–*virginity, *asceticism, *clergy, *martyr cults etc. Moreover, conciliar activity began, which reached its height during the *Visigothic period.

Before the Visigoths occupied *Tarraconensis in 414, the Suevi had crossed the Pyrenees and occupied Gallaecia, along with the Asding *Vandals; the Alans had settled in Lusitania and the Silings in Baetica. Pressured by the Roman troops, the last two peoples passed immediately into *Africa (429). After the fall of the last Roman emperor of the West (476), the Visigoths invaded all of Spain, with the exception of the Basque and Suevian territories, which were then definitively incorporated into the Visigothic kingdom under *Leovigild (574 and 585 respectively). Only in 621 was the territorial unit established, after the *Byzantines were expelled, under Suintila, who, called by Athanagild from Africa in 554, had occupied the coastal zone of the province of Carthaginensis, part of Tarraconensis and much of the province of Baetica. From the religious point of view, the Suevians were initially pagans, and afterward they converted to Catholicism (448); later they went over to Arianism (465) and, at the time of St. Martin of *Dumium, back to Catholicism. The remaining groups remained Arian. The Hispanic-Roman Catholic community had to coexist with them and was at times persecuted, but Catholics generally lived in peace. In various episcopal sees two bishops coexisted, one Catholic the other Arian. During this period an intense relationship with the Roman see was maintained: the Spanish bishops had recourse to the pope, and they appointed some of his vicars for the various provinces; but already in the 4th c. these relations dissipated in the same period in which the conciliar activity intensified in such cities as Tarragona, *Toledo, *Barcelona, *Lérida and Valencia, in addition to Braga and Mérida. The civil metropolises also became ecclesiastical metropolises. The historiographers *Paulus Orosius and *Idatius belong to this first period. *Severus of Minorca, *Apringius of Beja, *Justinian of Valencia,*Licinianus of Cartegana, *Justus of Urgel and St. Martin of Dumium were also quite famous during this era. Worthy of note, then, was also the nascent *monasticism.

After having reached almost full territorial unity, stimulated more by political than religious reasons, King *Leovigild (568–586) also wanted to forge a religious unity under the Arian faith professed by the Visigothic people, not sparing for this reason pressures of various types, but his objective was unsuccessful. Religious unity, from which the Jews desired to exclude themselves, was achieved with his son and successor, *Recared, who, incited by political and religious reasons, converted to the Catholic faith in 587, as a result of a theological debate between Arian and Catholic bishops. Although there were not lacking points of resistance, as in Mérida, the majority of the Visigothic people followed him in this conversion, and it was publicly proclaimed in the III Council of Toledo (589). Starting from that point onward, the Spanish church began a century of glory under a sign of unity. The Visigothic church, which was heavily national, recognized itself as having matured, and it worked with a considerable level of autonomy (in fact, relations with Rome were reduced to a minimum and tensions were not lacking); to govern itself through national or provincial councils, among which those of Toledo distinguished themselves through their legislative, ecclesiastical and civil activity, the prestige of the episcopal sees was generally tied to famous pastors who governed them: *Seville with St. *Leander and St. *Isidore; Saragossa with St. *Braulio and *Taio; *Mérida with *Massona; Palencia (Pallantia) with Conantius; and Toledo with St. *Eugenius, St. *Ildefonsus and St. *Julian; Braga with St. Fructuosus and Bierzo with *Valerius. Harmony between church and monarch resulted in unity of worship, which was confirmed in the III Council of Toledo (589). The Hispanic *liturgy, another legacy of this historical era, continued to build upon and fulfill its own character. The culture flourished, although it was reflected more recapitulation and transmission than creativity: this was true of secular culture but esp. of religious culture. There was no lack of authors who treated the Holy Scriptures (Isidore, Ildefonsus, Taio and Julian). The theology was apologetic and anti-Arian (Leander, Isidore) and, esp., anti-Jewish (Isidore, Ildefonsus and Julian), because in the kingdom that was civilly and religiously united the presence of Judaism was at the same time both a religious and political problem. But neither was there a lack of writings on *dogmatic theology (Isidore and Taio) and esp. *eschatology (Julian).

In legal matters, the Hispania collection remained famous, which was probably the work of Isidore, and in the field of civil law, one should mention the Liber Iudiciorum by Recceswinth, elaborated by Braulio. Secular history had its scholars in John of Biclaro, Isidore and Julian, and for ecclesiastical history, one should recall the treatise De viris illustribus by Isidore and Ildefonsus. Within this literary production the abundant *hagiographical literature and, in a special way, the legendary Acts of the martyrs found its own space. One should also note the work of the preservation of classical culture through the work of Isidore. Centers of this culture were the episcopal schools, among which emerged that of Seville and that of the parishes and monasteries, under the lead of the councils. In fact, it was in Spain and concretely at Toledo (Council of 527) that one perceives the institution in an official way of clerical schools for education. Monasticism flourished, after its beginnings in the earlier period, assuming various forms, some of which more than once concerned the conciliar fathers; at the same time, the monastic rules multiplied (of Leander, Isidore, Valerius of Bierzo, Fructuosus, the Common Rule etc.). Famous monks were Martin of Dumium, Isidore, Valerius of Bierzo and Fructuosus of Braga. With the Muslim invasion of 711, there began a new era in the history of Spain, which was very different from the previous one.

Many councils were celebrated by the Spanish churches. The number of those known from the Roman and then the Visigothic era number over 40; to these should be added some other uncertain councils and one Arian council. Through tradition, they are divided into Hispano-Roman and Hispano-Gothic, and each group is divided into general and provincial. By convention the councils called "Roman" were those that were celebrated before the conversion of the Visigoths to Catholicism (589), although some of these were celebrated during the Visigothic and Suevian rule. The provincial councils are those at which the bishops of a single province participated and where the problems that only pertained to that province were treated. The general ones, however, are those in which problems of faith were treated or that pertained to the entire peninsular church, at which all the bishops of the kingdom participated, either personally or through representatives. Despite the importance of some Hispano-Roman councils (e.g., that of Elvira) the most famous remain those of Toledo from the Visigothic era, an expression of the singular symbiosis between church and state.

DACL 5, 407-523; EC 11, 1042-1052; DHGE 15, 892-915; CE 13, 494-496; DHEE 2, 983-985; ES, Madrid 1747; Mansilla, Geografía I; A. González, Epistolae, Decretales ac Rescripta Romanorum Pontificum, Madrid 1808; P.B. Gams, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, Regensburg 1882-83; H. Leclercq, L'Espagne chrétienne, Paris 1906; Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España I-III, Madrid 1935-40; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, En torno a los orígenes del cristianismo en España: Las raíces de España, Madrid 1967, 423-443; J. Vives, Concilios; M. Blázquez, Posible origen africano del cristianismo español: AEA (1967) 30-50; XVII Semana española de teología, La patrología hispano-visigoda, Madrid 1970; U. Domínguez del Val, Cultura y teología en la España visigoda: Salmanticensis 17 (1970) 581-612; E.A. Thompson, The Goths in Spain, London 1969 (Sp. tr., Madrid 1971); R. Puertas Tricas, Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; J. Orlandís, Concilios; Id., La Iglesia en la España visigoda y medieval, Pamplona 1976; M. Sotomayor, La Iglesia en la España romana y visigoda, Madrid 1979; R. García Villoslada (ed.), Historia de la Iglesia en España 1, Madrid 1979; A. Ferreiro, The Visigoths in Gaul and Spain A.D. 418–711. A Bibliography, Leiden 1988; L.A. García Moreno, Los monjes y monasterios en las ciudades de las Españas tardoromanas y visigodas: Habis 24 (1993) 179-192; J. Vilella, La correspondencia entre los obispos hispanos y el papado durante el siglo V: SEA 46 (1994) 457-481; L.A. García Moreno, Estudios de historia eclesiástica visigoda, Pamplona 1998; J. Pereira Lamelas, Os primeiros passos do cristianismo no território português: Itinerarium 46 (2000) 51-70; G. Ramis Miquel, La iniciación cristiana en la liturgia hispánica, Bilbao 2001; R. Teja (ed.), La Hispania del siglo IV: administración, economía, sociedad, cristianización, Bari 2002; C. Martin, La géographie du pouvoir dans l'Espagne visigothique, Villeneuve d'Ascq 2003; P. Ubric Rabaneda, La iglesia en la Hispania del siglo V, Granada 2004; M.F. Kulikowski, Late Roman Spain and Its Cities, Baltimore 2004; Id., Hispania in Late Antiquity: Current Perspectives, ed. and tr. by K. Bowes - M. Kulikowski, Leiden 2005; L. Montecchio, I visigoti e la rinascita culturale del secolo VII, Roncate 2005.

P. de Luis

SPES (4th–5th c). Bishop of Spoleto (Spoletium)—at the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th, normally placed before *Achilleus—and the author of a poem of 12 verses in honor of the *martyr Vitalis, whose body he had found in the vicinity of the city and whose cult he established with a celebration for 14 Feb. The author commends himself and the virgin Calventia, who was almost certainly his daughter, to this saint's intercession. Spes died after 32 years of service in the episcopate (his epitaph has been preserved) on 23 Nov. Some of his *relics were carried by Charlemagne to Aquiasgranae to decorate his chapel.

Diehl I, 364, n. 1851; CIL 11, 4966; DACL 15, 1639-1640; A.P. Frutaz, Spes e Achilleo vescovi di Spoleto, in Atti del II Convegno di Studi Umbri, Perugia 1964, 362-365; Patrologia III, 300; R. Grégoire, L'agiografia spoletana antica: tra storia e tipologia, in Il Ducato di Spoleto, Spoleto 1983, 335-366; C. D'Angelo, Il vescovo Spes e la basilica spoletina dei SS. Apostoli. Nota preliminare, op. cit., 851-858; PCBE 2, 2103-2104.

A. Di Berardino

SPIRITUAL COMBAT. Spiritual tradition, following the path opened by Scripture (see 1 Cor 9:24-27) and adding the Stoic ideal, frequently compared *ascesis to a battle, a combat against the enemies of the soul. There are many texts on the topic. For *Clement of Alexandria, the true "gnostic" must ask God to put him to the test (Strom. IV,7,55,1: GCS 2,273). The tested man par excellence is the monk: δόκιμος μόναχος (Pall., Hist. Laus. 18, ed. C. Butler, Cambridge 1904, 52). The battle comes upon us anyway, perfect or not, observes *Origen (Hom. in Iesu Nave: PG 12,885). If in the apatheia of the *Messalians there is a tendency to quietism (cf. Ps. Macarius, Hom. 26,14: PG 34,684), at the other extreme *Evagrius of Pontus believes temptations increase as one progresses in the spiritual life (Prakt. 59: SC 171,679). Scripture unmasks the enemies who wage this war: Satan, the world, the flesh (see Rom 7–8). Monastic writings distinguish between the "visible battle" and the "invisible battle." In Evagrius's explanation, the "visible battle" concerns πράγματα: objects, contact with which gives birth to the passions. In this case the remedy for resisting and defeating the demon is abstention, the renunciation of the objects themselves. "But with monks (the demons fight) mostly through the thoughts" (λογισμοί) (Prakt. 48: SC 171,609). The mechanism of temptation, whose various moments are linked to one another, was analyzed in depth by the Eastern spiritual writers, esp. by those of the "Sinaitic" spirituality (*Nilus, *John Climacus, Psychius, *Philotheus). The elimination of evil thoughts (ἀπόθεσις νοημάτων), custody of the heart, discernment of spirits, antirrēsis and opposing evil thoughts with scriptural texts are frequent themes in the writings of the *hesychasts. *Augustine gives much importance to the spiritual, interior battle. A dimension of the Christian life is a battle against the passions, to attain peace with God and personal peace. He also writes a work for the general public, with the significant title De agone christiano. It begins: "The crown of victory is only promised to those who fight. In the divine Scriptures, moreover, we find frequently that we are promised the crown, if we win. . . . We must therefore know who this adversary is whom if we defeat we will be crowned. It is the same one that our Lord defeated first; we will too, if we persevere in him" (1,1).

DSp 2, 1135-1142; 10,30; 11,348; O. Chadwick, John Cassian, Cambridge 1950, 95 ff.; I. Malone, The Monk and the Martyr, Washington, DC 1950, 91ff.; H. Crouzel, L'anthropologie d'Origène dans la perspective du combat spirituel: RAM 31 (1955) 364-385; G.M. Colombás, Paradis et vie spirituelle, Paris 1961, 118ff.; A. de Vogüé, Règle du Maître, I, Paris 1964, 89ff.; A. Guillaumont, Évagre le Pont.: Traité pratique, introd., SC 170, Paris 1971, 95; T. Špidlík, Spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel syst.: OCA 206, Rome 1978, 225ff.; NBA 7/2, 53-72 (intr. to the theme), 78-125 (text and tr.).

T. Špidlík

SPIRITUALITY

I. The first two c. - II. The 3rd c. - III. From Nicaea to Chalcedon.

The notion of spirituality is modern and is not found in these terms in the writings of ancient authors. They preferred to speak of spiritual theology, *asceticism and *mysticism or, simply, the Christian and evangelical life. In this entry, we will offer a treatment on the ascetic and spiritual life.

I. The first two c. From the Jewish-Christian communities we possess a certain number of writings such as the Didache, the Odes of Solomon*, the *Letter of Barnabas and the Shepherd of *Hermas which reflect the spiritual life led by these communities. The Didache describes the practices of the Christian life within the framework of the Jewish and evangelical tradition: *fasting, *prayer and *works. The Odes of Solomon reflect a mystical inspiration, a surprising spiritual fervor for that era. The Letter of Barnabas developed a spirituality of *baptism and picked up a *typological reading of Holy *Scripture, in which the author portrays Christian perfection as the new temple indwelt by the *Holy Spirit (ch. 16). The author of this text provided this piece of advice: the Christian does not work for salvation in sadness but is a son of joy (4, 11). The Shepherd of Hermas rejected the image of an idealized church. The author was aware of the demands of baptism but also of the moral failures that can occur unexpectedly. A realist, the author combated the rigorists and did not want to lead sinners to despair, who are also called to the construction of the tower (= church), provided that they do *penance (Sim. VI,3,4,6). The author asked that they observe the indispensable virtues before the evangelical precepts (Sim. V,1,4-5) and insisted on the importance of joy and trust (Prec. X,1,2) and on the discernment of the spirits (Prec. VI,2,3-5). All these Jewish-Christian writings, esp. the Didache, placed emphasis on *eschatology, which polarizes the entire spiritual life: the communities were inclined toward the return of Christ, which they considered imminent.

With *Ignatius of Antioch spirituality took two complementary directions: one ecclesial, the other personal. The bishop is above all a man of the church. The spiritual life is carried out within the church, in the *assembly, the privileged place of prayer, in the *Eucharist, in obedience and *communion with the bishop. The soul of the entire spiritual life is Christ, our life, our eternal life and our inseparable life (Eph. 3,2; Magn. 1,2; Smyrn. 4,1). Christ fills all his letters. The spiritual life consists in putting on Christ, his passion, his death, in order to share with him in the resurrection. The Eucharist is at the same time this mystery in this *hope. *Martyrdom appears at the same time to be a *liturgy and the shortest way to reach Christ and the Father. In the writings of Ignatius and *Polycarp, we see the formation of a spiritual theology of martyrdom, as a confession of faith, the presence of Christ, a prolongation of the passion and the Eucharist, an ecclesial testimony, an affirmation of the future resurrection attested to by the acts and the passions of the martyrs.

The *apologists were more concerned with presenting Christianity to the *pagans than in explaining the spiritual life. *Justin, however, bore witness to the sacramental and community life of the faithful. Christians, illuminated by Christ, know the truth and possess grace to lead a virtuous life (2 Apol. 10,3). The life of Christ is a testimony to this to the point of martyrdom. The *Letter to Diognetus not only illustrates the Christian life but also shows its action in the world: Christians are the soul of the world (Diogn. 6), provided that they show forth God's love for humankind, which is the raison d'être for creation: "If we love God, we will imitate his tender affection" (10,4-5).

*Irenaeus in all his work described the progress of the ascent toward the knowledge of God and the Christian's assimilation to the Risen Christ. God slowly prepares the human being to receive the Word. Human beings are born as babies and imperfect: "It is necessary first of all to be created, grow and acquire strength, then that we multiply, and finally that we obtain full development for reaching glory and seeing the Lord" (Adv. haer. IV,38,3). This is a slow ascent, which is the purification and transformation of the entire human being for receiving incorruptibility (Demonst. 7).

*Apocryphal literature, in turn, although at times tendentious and at times manipulated by heterodox movements, reveals an exceptional spiritual fervor. Therein we find some incontestable religious values: the incursion of the *redemption into the world through Christ, the universal recovery of the cosmos through the resurrection, indestructible trust in Christ and his power, loving devotion in Jesus wherever he is present, faith in a coming eschatology and the exaltation of the woman-virgin. We have here some essential elements of Christian faith and life.

Since the 2nd c. the church was obliged to defend, against the excesses of the *Encratites and the sects, the legitimacy of *marriage and the invitation to the perfect life directed to all people.

II. The 3rd c. Two primary centers stand out in the 3rd c.: *Alexandria and *Carthage. Despite increasingly violent *persecution, the church grew, preserving its spirit of vigilance and preparation for martyrdom. The love lived within the community was manifested in concrete forms and initiatives. *Tertullian was a controversialist and a moralist more than a teacher of spirituality; nevertheless, it would be wrong to devalue his ascetical work, which developed the following spiritual themes: baptism, prayer, martyrdom, patience and chastity, pushing these ideals that were dear to him to the point of heroism and martyrdom.

*Cyprian's literary work, just as his action, was primarily pastoral and spiritual. His preferred themes were as follows: the one church, prayer, martyrdom and vigilance. "The kingdom of God begins to be very close to us. The recompense of life, the joy of eternal salvation, perpetual delight, possession of *paradise once lost: all of this comes close to us until the world passes away." Cyprian's writings would then be among the most read during the entire history of the church.

*Clement of Alexandria's entire work, despite his metaphysical concerns, lead the "*gnostic"—i.e., the enlightened believer—toward perfection. The perfect model to imitate is Christ (Paed. I,2,4). The Christian people are a people of children, who must inaugurate a transparent faith. "An unceasing exercise is necessary so that gnosis becomes a habit and, once perfection has been reached through the mystical habit, it remains stable thanks to charity" (Strom. VI,9,78).

*Origen's entire work was oriented toward the spiritual life. His chief point of reference was the divine indwelling, which makes the righteous person the temple of God and the Holy Spirit. We find here the threefold presence, dear to Origen, of God and Christ in Scripture, the church, and the Christian. More than presence, it was a union which at the same time was the impulse and the terminus of the spiritual ascent. A union that has its final result in ecstasy. Moving from biblical images that were particularly dear to him, Origen described the purifications that prepared the encounter, beyond the exile and sin, to find interior unity (De or. 21,2) and to reach God. This asceticism is essentially eschatological, inasmuch as it prepares for the eternal day in which God will be all in all things (Hamman, La Prière, II). This was a spiritual teaching that, through *Gregory of Nyssa, *Evagrius of Pontus, ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor, would exert its influence in the East and West. "There is no one who is so omnipresent like Origen," said Hans Urs von Balthasar.

III. From Nicaea to Chalcedon. For the Fathers of the golden age, one must simply trace the large lines of the spiritual movements on the basis of the subject matter. Baptismal catechesis along with doctrinal, ascetic and liturgical teaching had a considerable role. It was the invitation to conversion and faith through the evangelical life (Cyril Jer., Cat. 1). The large number of baptismal sermons that have come down to us demonstrates the commitment of the Fathers in the preparation for the firm faith and a faith made comprehensible (see Aug., De catechizandis rudibus).

Lent is a time for retreat for the entire church: preparation for catechumens, reconciliation for sinners, mobilization and deepening of the faith for all. *Basil of Caesarea's Sermons and Hexameron* show us the people fully involved. The preaching of the Fathers reveals the importance recognized by them for the perfection of the *laity: "To the married as well as to the monks, Jesus preached the *beatitudes" (John Chrys., In Mt. hom. 7,7; Aug., De sermone in monte).

Preaching in the East and West offered elements of spiritual teaching for Christian people. Nourished by *Scripture and the liturgy, the Fathers' preaching strove to explain the sanctification of all states of life, esp. marriage and the family. The home "is a little church," said *John Chrysostom. Archaeological testimony, such as modest potsherds with fragments extracted from the *Bible and the liturgy and inscriptions with verses from the *Psalms allow one to trace the diffusion of this catechesis. Liturgical reminiscences on the ostraka and on the papyri, just as the acclamations, the doxologies, the trisagion, the maranatha and the Kyrie eleison exhibit the influence exercised by the liturgy on the piety of the faithful.

Letters of spiritual direction intensified, in their own way, this work of information, primarily among influential laypeople, men and women, written by Basil of Caesarea, John Chrysostom, *Augustine and *Paulinus of Nola. One must also add the writings for the *virgins and the *widows (Viller - Rahner, 41-42). The fervor of the martyrs esp. continued among the virgins and the monks, who multiplied and spread about, esp. after the Constantinian peace, assuming the most varied and radical forms. The writings inspired by these individuals (the Vita S. Antonii, the Apophthegmata*) exerted a noteworthy influence both in the East and the West. *John Cassian established their spiritual teaching and adapted their type of life for the West. The Vita Martini written by *Sulpicius Severus performed an analogous function. The Constantinian age gave recourse to the cult of the martyrs, then to the saints, who by that point occupied an important place in the spiritual life of the communities. It was a cult that would in turn give life to a literature in which legend invaded history. *Hagiography would provide nourishment for generations of Christians.

A great pilgrimage movement began in the 4th c.

and increasingly grew: in this respect, *Egeria could be considered its patron and model.

In the East and West there developed the spiritual theology inherited from Origen. *Gregory of Nyssa was rightly called "the father of *mysticism." His influence was esp. felt on the spiritual teaching of *Diadochus of Photice and *Maximus the Confessor. Ps.-*Dionysius, immediately and often translated into Latin, introduced this mystical theology in the West, where he would dominate in the writings of the Victorines and St. Bonaventure.

Augustine, the teacher of interiority, with his theology of grace, his Rule for religious, his itinerary toward God, exerted a long-lasting influence on the Middle Ages. One of Augustine's disciples, *Gregory the Great, would supply in his Moralia on the Book of Job, Homilies and Regula Pastoralis manna for generations of Christians.

Entries in the DSp; P. Pourrat, La spiritualité chrétienne, I, Paris 1926; M. Viller, La spiritualité des premiers siècles chrétiens, Paris 1930; M. Viller - K. Rahner, Aszese und Mystik, Freiburg 1939 (trans. of the preceding work with extensive bibl.); J. de Ghellinck, Lectures spirituelles dans les écrits des Pères, Paris 1935; M.J. Rouët de Journel - J. Dutilleul, Enchiridion Asceticum, Freiburg ²1958; L. Bouyer, La spiritualité du NT et des Pères, Paris 1960; A. Hamman, La prière, II: Les trois premiers siècles, Paris 1963 (It. tr. Rome 1967); Les chemins vers Dieu, Paris 1967 (texts chosen by A. Hamman and F. Quéré); G. Bardy - A. Hamman, La vie spirituelle des trois premiers siècles, Paris 1968; D. Ramos-Lissón, Espiritualidad de los primeros Cristianos, Madrid 1979; T. Špidlík - I. Gargano, La spiritualità dei Padri greci e orientali (Storia della spiritualità 3/A), Rome 1983; L. Bouyer - L. Dattrino, La spiritualità dei Padri (II-V secolo): martirio - verginità - gnosi cristiana (Storia della spiritualità 3/A), Bologna 1984; L. Bouyer - L. Dattrino, La spiritualità dei Padri (III-VI secolo): monachesimo antico e Padri (Storia della spiritualità 3/B), Bologna 1986; C. Burini - E. Cavalcanti (Storia della spiritualità 3/C), La spiritualità della vita quotidiana negli scritti dei Padri, Bologna 1988; T. Špidlík, Manuale fondamentale di spiritualità, Casale Monf. 1993; R. Darricau - B. Peyrous, Histoire de la spiritualité, Paris ²1994; T. Špidlík, La spiritualità dell'Oriente cristiano: manuale sistematico, Cinisello Balsamo 1995; G. Mursell (ed.), The Story of Christian Spirituality: 2000 Years, from East to West, Minneapolis 2001; V. Grossi, La spiritualità dei Padri latini (Storia della spiritualità 3/B), Rome 2002; S.A. Panimolle (ed.), Dizionario di spiritualità biblico-patristica: i grandi temi della S. Scrittura per la "Lectio divina," Rome 1992-2003 (underway: 36 vols. published by 2003); M. Downey (ed.), Nuovo dizionario di spiritualità (ed. it. ed. L. Borriello), Vatican City 2003.

A. Verwilghen, Christologie et spiritualité selon Saint Augustin: l'hymne aux Philippiens, Paris 1985; S. Felici (ed.), Spiritualità del lavoro nella catechesi dei Padri del III-IV secolo, Rome 1986; C. Noce, Il martirio: testimonianza e spiritualità nei primi secoli, Rome 1987; V. Grossi - P. Siniscalco, La vita cristiana nei primi secoli, Rome 1988; L. Orabona, Spiritualità e socialità nelle fonti cristiane dei primi secoli, Aversa 1989; C.A. Bernard (ed.), L'antropologia dei maestri spirituali, Cinisello Balsamo 1991; M. Canévet (ed.), Les sens spirituels: sens spirituel, goût spirituel, toucher, touches, gourmandise spirituelle, luxure spirituelle, Paris 1993; K. Rahner, Spiritualität und Theologie der Kirchenväter (ed. A.R. Batlogg - E. Farrugia - K.H. Neufeld), Zürich-Düsseldorf 1999; P. Allen - R. Canning - L. Cross - B.J. Caiger (eds.), Prayer and Spirituality in the Early Church, Everton Park (Australia) 2000; B. Fischer, Frömmigkeit der Kirche: Gesammelte Studien zur christlichen Spiritualität, ed. A. Gerhards - A. Heinz, Bonn 2000; L.F. Pizzolato - M. Rizzi (ed.), Origene maestro di vita spirituale, Milan 2001; W. Vogl, Aktion und Kontemplation in der Spiritualität des antiken Judentums und Frühen Christentums: mit einem hinführenden Teil zur Theorie- Praxis-Problematik in der Antike Exzerpt zur akademischen Diskussion, Rome 2001; S.S Andrawes, La spiritualità monastica nell'epistolario di Isidoro di Pelusio: contributo per la ricostruzione d'una spiritualità egiziana del IV-V secolo, Rome 2002; T. Špidlík, La preghiera secondo la tradizione dell'Oriente cristiano, Rome 2002.

A. Hamman - A. Grappone

SPONSA CHRISTI. Following Hosea, the prophets presented the union of Yahweh and Israel as a marriage, and the *Song of Songs was interpreted in this sense. In the NT, this theme is transposed to the union of Christ with the church, which, alongside the Song of Songs, was also developed in other OT writings such as Ps 45 (44 LXX). This interpretation of a collective sense was found, e.g., in *Hippolytus's Commentary on the Song of Songs, or could assist in the construction of an *ecclesiology, as in *Cyprian or *Firmilian of Caesarea, who applied the fundamental theme to the oneness of the church against *heretics, or as in *Augustine, who, through the image, described the bishop as the friend of the spouse (Jn 3:29) in the context of the controversy against the *Donatists and their notion of Christian "ministers."

The Fathers also found another way of interpreting the union: it was the individual meaning in which the spouse represented the Christian soul; this was suggested in 1 Cor 6:15-17 and 7:32-34. (The same is enriched with the parallel between Christ–church and husband–wife, applied by *Paul in Eph 5:21-33.) This individual sense is found for the first time in the writings of *Tertullian with respect to the widows and virgins (Uxor. I, 4,4; Resur. 61,6; Virg. Vel. 16,4), but it was esp. *Origen, in the Com. Ct., Hom. and in other works, who heavily orchestrated this double meaning of the spouse, church and soul, thus creating the theme of the mystical marriage: the Christian soul is the spouse because it makes up part of the church-spouse: the church progresses in its quality as a spouse through the progress of souls in the church. Sin, therefore, becomes adultery with the diabolical lover, the soul's idolatry or the idolatry of the synagogue. This type of *exegesis found great success among the followers of the *Alexandrian school in their exhortational writings addressed to *virgins and *widows (*Methodius of Olympus and *Ambrose).

J. Chênevert, L'Église dans le Commentaire d'Origène sur le Cantique des Cantiques, Brussels 1969; D. Faul, Ecclesia, sponsa Christi. Orígenes y Agustin ante la exégesis de Eph. 5,27: Augustinus 15 (1970) 263-280; L. Robitaille, L'Église, épouse du Christ, dans l'interprétation patristique du psaume 45,I-III: Laval Théologique et Philosophique 26 (1970) 167-179, 279-306; 27 (1971) 41-65; H. Crouzel, Le thème du mariage mystique chez Origène et ses sources: Studia Missionalia 26 (1977) 37-57; R.A. Horsley, Spiritual Marriage with Sophia: VChr 33 (1979) 30-54; J. Doignon, Points de vue comparés de Cyprien et de Firmilien de Césarée sur l'"unique épouse" des versets 4,12; 6,8 du Cantique des cantiques. Topique d'origine politique et thèmes d'inspiration origénienne: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 179-185; F.E. Consolino, Veni huc a Libano. La sponsa del Cantico dei Cantici come modello per le vergini negli scritti esortatori di Ambrogio: Athenaeum 62 (1984) 399-415; A.-G. Hamman, Ascèse et virginité à Carthage au III[e] siècle, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes: miscellanea in onore di V. Saxer, Vatican City, 1992 (Studi di antichità cristiana; 48) 503-514; M. Sherwin, "The Friend of the Bridegroom Stands and Listens": An Analysis of the Term "Amicus Sponsi" in Augustine's Account of Divine Friendship and the Ministry of Bishops: Augustinianum 38,1 (1998) 197-214; R.J. DeSimone, The Bride and the Bridegroom of the Fathers: An Anthology of Patristic Interpretations of the Song of Songs, Rome 2000; D.G. Hunter, The Virgin, the Bride, and the Church: Reading Psalm 45 in Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine: Church History 69,2 (2000) 281-303.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

SPYRIDON (3rd–4th c.). Bishop of Trimethus (*Cyprus). He took part in the Council *Nicaea (325). He was among the signatories of the Council of *Serdica in 343 (Athanasius, Apol. secunda 50,2). According to *Rufinus (HE X,35), *Socrates (HE I,12) and *Sozomen (HE I,11), even as a bishop he continued the office of pastor of the flock and performed numerous *miracles. Soon his historical person was swallowed up in legend. The first *hagiographical Vita was entirely legendary, an iambic poem falsely attributed to Triphillius, which was lost in its original, and two paraphrases of which have been preserved in prose, one anonymous found in the Codex Laurentianus XI,9, although the second is a part of the Life of Spyridon written by the monk *Theodore of Paphos (2nd half of the 7th c.), both of which were edited by Van den Ven. The Life written by *Theodore of Paphos is the most important, even if it has no historical reliability: it served as the basis for the Anonymous Metaphrase (11th c.), a Short Life (11th c.), published by Van den Ven, and for the Life written by Simeon Metaphrastes (BHG, 1648).

P. van den Ven, La légende de S. Spyridon évêque de Trimithonte, Louvain 1953; Id., L'édition des Vies de saint Spiridon: RHE 50 (1955) 125-140; BS 11, 1334-1336; Cath. 15, 420.

E. Prinzivalli

STATUTA ECCLESIAE ANTIQUA. Among the documents that inform us about the life of the Gallo-Roman church in the 5th c., the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua occupy a special place. For a long time, they appeared in the canonical collections and in the editions of the councils, under the erroneous title of a Fourth Council of *Carthage; but such scholars as Ballerini (1757), Maassen (1870), Malnory (1888), G. Morin (1913) and B. Botte (1939) were led to gradually specify the place of origin, tendencies and even the author: the author may have been *Gennadius of Marseille, around 476/485. The Statuta ecclesiae antiqua begin with an enumeration of the qualities required of a bishop and a profession of faith; 89 disciplinary canons follow on various topics; a brief ritual for *ordination finishes the work. Each one of these three parts follows the outline of the preceding work: the profession of faith in the prologue depends directly on Gennadius of Marseille's work titled De ecclesiasticis dogmatibus; many of the propositions were taken textually from this document. With respect to the disciplinary canons, it seems that the author follows as a model the ps.-apostolic Eastern compilations (Didascalia*, Apostolic Constitutions*). Last, with respect to that ritual for ordination, one can clearly see the influence of the Apostolic Tradition* attributed to *Hippolytus; the same series of orders is also found in the solemn prayers of Holy Friday.

A complex work, where the author draws on widely differing sources, the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, nevertheless, offers a coherent whole, due to the tendencies that inspired them. The author, first and foremost, seeks to limit the powers of the monarchical episcopate, submitting it to the twofold control of the provincial synod and the "diocesan" council, the presbyterium, whose intervention he regards as indispensable for the most important matters: ordinations (can. 10), the judicial trials within the church (can. 14) and the administration of ecclesiastical *property (cans. 15, 50). The work is attentive to the rights of the presbyters (cans. 2, 12, 56), whose dignity he emphasizes with respect to the bishops and the deacons (cans. 57-61); he gives to the entirety of his work a clearly *ascetical stamp. From the prologue onward, he accurately enumerates the qualities for each man who is to be ordained: prudence, moderation, decorum of life and a good reputation. Nourished by the Holy *Scriptures, sound in doctrine and capable of transmitting it to his people with the appropriate language, the bishop must dedicate himself completely to prayer, meditation on the holy books and the preaching of the Word of God (can. 3), avoiding the possibility of wasting his time in the reading of secular or *heretical literature (can. 5).

Without being sophisticated in his dress and in the tenor of his life (can. 4), he must show himself to be gentle with his clerics (can. 2) and full of goodness toward people of lowly status, humilibus affabilis (prologue). The bishop must know how to find help with the numerous obligations that assail him (cans. 6-10); in his governance, he will not follow his own impulses or his own thinking but will remain faithful to the sound *traditions of the church, patrum definitionibus (prologue). The rules relating to the conduct of clerics are stringent. They must live simply (cans. 25, 26), with dignity (cans. 27, 28, 34, 68), assiduous in the liturgical offices (can. 35); the bishops must faithfully observe the prescribed fasts (cans. 76, 77), protect themselves from the dangers of too solicitous a ministry, from overly joyous banquets, from familiarity with young *widows and consecrated *virgins (cans. 27, 68, 75). The bishops are asked to be modest and serious (cans. 73, 74, 26) and to not allow themselves to fall into blasphemy, superstitious practices, or to make vulgar or obscene jokes. To escape the temptations of laziness, aimless meandering and suspect friendships (cans. 28, 34), they must commit themselves to making sure that they support themselves with the work of their hands: artificiolo vel agricultura (cans. 29, 45), and to enriching their free time with study (cans. 45, 79).

The author of the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua dedicates some 15 canons to recommend harmony, union, good understanding and charity toward all the members of the church, from bishops to the simple faithful. He invites the clerics to abstain from every form of backbiting, envy, false praise and gossiping (cans. 42-44). He requests excommunication for those who unjustly accuse their brethren, and he desires that the testimonies of troublemakers be accepted only with extreme caution (cans. 17, 46). In the same way, he rebukes the usurers, the supporters of discord and those who were unrelenting in vindicating the real or supposed mistakes of others, of which they themselves were victims (can. 55). He set forth very severe punishments against all those who violate the divine law of charity (cans. 17, 43, 44, 47-49); and finally, he denounced the neglect of Christian people, who were negligent in their duties and taken up by the desire for pleasure and monetary gain (cans. 69, 86), love for secular *entertainments (33), religious indifference and a lack of spiritual zeal (cans. 31, 80, 82, 20-24).

Many passages in the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua suppose that a heretical authority is present among the people, which has its own judges, liturgical assemblies and ministers (cans. 30, 80-82). Catholics were exposed to persecutions and thefts, as a result of hatred of others for their faith (can. 70). It does not seem, however, that the churches had to undergo systematic confiscations because crowds of poor people continued to receive assistance (cans. 7, 64, 70, 86).

The evidence of the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua characterizes well the era of transition that existed at the end of the 5th c., between the golden patristic age and the Early Middle Ages. The theological and mystical tendency no longer animates Christian people, who, it seems, are taken up by earthly concerns and are involved in duties of every kind; the clergy rarely performs its duties. Culture itself already seems to escape to the monasteries that are preparing the bishops of tomorrow.

To awaken the dormant faith of the Christian people, to win the barbarians to the truth, to put the church's relatively still intact riches at the service of addressing all the adversities: these were, in its main lines, the directives offered by the Statuta ecclesiae antiqua to the provincial episcopate. Since the early years of the 6th c., the councils presided over by *Caesarius of Arles made every effort to enact them among the people and the clergy.

CCL 148, 162-188; CCL 149, 343-354 (recensio hispanica); Ch. Munier, Les Statuta ecclesiae antiqua, Paris 1960; Hfl-Lecl 2, 102-121; CE 13, 682; LACL 656.

Ch. Munier

STENOGRAPHY. The ancients were familiar with a swift and abbreviated method for writing called tachygraphy, the practice of which spread during the Roman era. Tiro, Cicero's freedman and secretary, developed a system of abbreviated writing called Notae tironianae. Knowledge about Greek stenography comes from the papyri, the wax tablets found in *Egypt and also by the manuals that have been preserved. Tachygraphy was very much in use during the 3rd and 4th c. both in the East and West. Public services and courts used stenographers called notarii. The Christian communities and the Fathers in turn often used some clerics as stenographers to collect public speeches and debates. When these authors wrote, it was often dictated to a stenographer. Jerome acknowledged: "I do not dictate with the same elegance with which I write. In the latter, I often take over the stylus to compose what deserves to be read; in the former, I dictate whatever comes to mind (Ep. 74,6,2; see Ambr., Ep. 47,1-2).

The stenographer committed his text to a chartula (paper used for a rough draft) or a small wax tablet, which was at times made of wood or boxwood. A stylus with a metallic point was used to trace some lines on the wax. The tablets could be used indefinitely. The text was transcribed in full and was then revised by the author first to establish its definitive form. This was an exhausting revision, as *Jerome himself confesses (In Is. comm. 13, praef.; In Zach. comm. 2 and 3, praef.). *Augustine rebuked himself for not always verifying his citations and revising his own writings with the necessary attention (Retr. II,41,2).

See esp. the Archiv für Stenographie; E. Chatelain, Introduction à la lecture des notes tironiennes, Paris 1900; Ch. Johnen, Geschichte der Stenographie, Berlin 1911; A. Mentz, Antike Stenographie, Munich 1927; E.G. Turner, Greek Papyri: An Introduction, Oxford 1969; H.H. Boge, Griechische Tachygraphie und Tironische Noten, Berlin-Hildesheim 1974 (bibl.); H. Hagendhal, Die Bedeutung der Stenographie: JbAC 14 (1971) 24-38 (bibl.); N. Chionides - S. Lilla, La brachigrafia italo-bizantina, Vatican City 1981; D. Norberg, Qui a composé les lettres de saint Grégoire le Grand?: Studi Medievali 21 (1980) 1-17; H.C. Teitler, Notarii and Exceptores: An Inquiry into the Role and Significance of Shorthand Writers in the Imperial and Ecclesiastical Bureaucracy of the Roman Empire (from the Early Principate to c. 450 A.D.), Amsterdam 1985; Tironische Noten, ed. P. Ganz, Wiesbaden 1990; Oxford Classical Dictionary, Oxford 1996, 1468-1469.

A. Hamman

STEPHEN (Eddius Stephanus). The Vita Wilfridi (CPL 2151; BHL 8889), the first biography on *Wilfrid of York (ca. 633–709), is attributed to a certain Stephanus presbyter both in the praefatio related by the Oxford MS (Bodleian Library, Fell III.34) and by William of Malmesbury (d. 1142), who in his Gesta pontificum Anglorum declares that he made a summary quae Stephanus presbyter de Wilfrido magno verborum agmine egit (III, praef.). The reference to *Bede's Historia ecclesiastica has led scholars to identify Stephen with the cantandi magister: "Eddius surnamed Stephen, who was called from Kent by the most reverend Wilfrid" (IV,2). So much the more that in ch. 14 of the Vita, one reads that Wilfrid returned from Kent in Northumbria, carrying with him the singers Eddius and Aeona. Eddius surnamed Stephen would therefore be Stephanus presbyter, the author of the Vita, the most ancient "commemorative biography" (Farmer) of Anglo-Saxon England. The identification, however, is not entirely certain (Levison; Kirby 1983), which is why it is perhaps fitting to still speak of Stephen rather than Eddius Stephanus.

A few pieces of information on the author of the Vita can be garnered from the Vita itself, but certainly only with caution. It is certainly true, e.g., that in 703 the author was present at the Synod of Austerfield (Raine), where Wilfrid, opposing all the Anglo-Saxon bishops, was deprived of his episcopal offices and all his possessions and thereby confined to the monastery of Ripon, which he himself had established (chs. 14-15; 24; 34; 45; 47); to the contrary, however, the use of the first person in his description of the last trip to Rome leads one to believe that Stephen was with Wilfrid on that occasion (chs. 52-53), even if he was not among those who embarked for the Continent along with him (ch. 50). Other passages lead one to think of Stephen's affinity to the monastery of Ripon and its traditions (chs. 17; 45; 52-68), but the complex impression is that the redactor did not belong to the circle of the deceased bishop's closest collaborators.

The composition of the Vita was completed shortly before the death of the teacher, which occurred in 709 (Colgrave) or around 715 (according to others; Kirby, however, believes that it was certainly reedited between 731 and 734). One reason for its redaction was probably owed to the spread of the anonymous Life of Cuthbert (Colgrave; Moonen). The community of Ripon, upon whose promptings our author went to work, in some respect had to consider Cuthbert as a potential rival to its own founder. Therefore Bishop Acca and the abbot Tatberht, Wilfrid's successors respectively for the episcopal see of Hexham and for the leadership of the monastery of Ripon, commissioned the biography, as we read in the praefatio.

Although the author of the Vita was Eddius Stephanus, the contact that he had with Wilfrid for nearly 40 years and his proximity to Tatberht and Acca, both connected to the deceased bishop (chs. 65-66), could have supplied him sufficient material. In any case, sources of information are not lacking, and there were, moreover, the memories of the monks who lived in that community as well as those who knew Wilfrid. Stephen seems to have received the tradition of Ripon, which was more interested in the issues and the political events of Wilfrid's biography; less inclined, however, to receive and leave space for the traditions of Hexham, which were inclined toward the miraculous and the visionary (Kirby 1983). In any case it is beyond question that the Vita has a marked "political" abridgment; this is the "die politischste unter den frühen Biographien Englands" (Berschin). Its controversial character is also evident, a reflection of the framework of discord experienced by the church and the court of Northumbria between the 20s and the 30s of the 8th c.

One thus understands the attitude assumed by the author toward the protagonist of this document, who is presented with an enthusiasm and a loyalty that are not only personal and affective; but one also understands the very diverse character of the numerous pages, which are substantially respectful but very detached, which Bede dedicated to the same Wilfrid in his Historia ecclesiastica. For this reason, it would be inappropriate to speak of a scarce sympathy of the Anglo-Saxon authors for the bishop. Stephen's Wilfrid is entirely one with the fights, ideal and real, that he undertakes and with the situation that he faces: a person gifted with a strong personality, capable of protecting his own prerogatives against the royal power, a defender of Roman orthodoxy in Northumbria (Isenberg), a convinced supporter of the teaching and liturgy of the church of *Rome. This piece of "Romanness" is a point on which the biographer insists in his reconstruction, seeing in it as a whole an aspect of Wilfred's sanctity and the cause of many of his woes and severe trials (Pezzini). His Vita was filled with Petrine allusions, and the exaltation of the primacy of *Peter becomes one of the structural motifs of the biographic instruction, alongside the celebrative and commemorative objective. It is significant, in this sense, that the miracles attributed to the bishop (chs. 1; 18; 23; 24; 34; 36; 37, etc.) resume the scriptural typology present in the Vita of *Benedict contained in the second book of *Gregory the Great's Dialogues (Lazzari). The double relationship with the Petrine primacy and Gregory the Great, however, is not an exclusive features of the Vita and shows through even from what Bede writes, who, however, considerably diminishes the elements of conflict within the bishop's career.

The more hagiographical elements (presence and role of the miraculous, models of sanctity, hagiographic sources, etc.) of the Vita has been the object of independent studies (Berschin; Foley; Prinz 1992 and 2002), while the biblical material present in the document has been collected and analyzed (Foley), a rereading of which has been proposed in light of the instruments and categories of the then contemporary biblical *exegesis, ideas of *allegory and esp. typology (Laynesmith).

Editions: CPL 2151; BHL 8889; J. Raine, The Historians of the Church of York, I, London 1879, 1-103; Vita Wilfridi I episcopi Eboracensis, MGH, Scriptores Rerum Merovingicarum, VI, Hannoverae 1913, 163-263, ed. W. Levison; The Life of Bishop Wilfrid by Eddius Stephanus, ed. and trans. B. Colgrave, Cambridge 1927 (repr. 1985); Eddius Stephanus, Het Leven van Sint Wilfrid, ed. and trans. C.H. Moonen (P. Honorius O.E.S.A.), 's-Hertogenbosch 1946; Lives of the Saints: The Voyage of St Brendan; Bede: Life of Cuthbert; Eddius Stephanus: Life of Wilfrid, trans. J.F. Webb, Harmondsworth, MD 1965, 131-206 (= The Age of Beda, Harmondsworth, MD 1983, 105-182); Anglo-Saxon Saints and Heroes, trans. C. Albertson, New York 1967, 89-162.

Studies: R.L. Poole, Eddius' Life of Wilfrith: English Historical Review 33 (1919) 1-24; R.L. Poole, Saint Wilfrid and the See of Ripon: Studies in Chronology and History, Oxford 1934, 56-81; H. Mayr-Harting, The Coming of Christianity to Anglo-Saxon England, London 1972 ([3]1991) 129-147; Saint Wilfrid at Hexham, ed. D.P. Kirby, Newcastle upon Tyne 1974; A. Thacker, The Social and Continental Background to Early Anglo-Saxon Hagiography, Phil. Diss. University of Oxford 1976; G. Isenberg, Die Würdigung Wilfrieds von York in der "Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum" Bedas un der "Vita Wilfridi " des Eddius. Ein Vergleich der verschiedenen literarischen Intentionen und der unterschiedlichen historischen Voraussetzungen, Münster 1978; D.P. Kirby, Bede, Eddius Stephanus and the "Life of Wilfrid": English Historical Review 98 (1983) 101-114; W. Berschin, Biographie und Epochenstil im lateinischen Mittelalter. II, Merowingische Biographie Italien, Spanien und die Inseln im frühen Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1988, 296-300; G.R.J. Jones, "Broninis": Bulletin of the Board of Celtic Studies 37 (1990) 125-132; I.N. Wood, Ripon, Francia and the Franks Casket: Northern History 26 (1990) 1-19; M. Richter, The English Link in Hiberno-Frankish Relations in the Seventh Century, in Ireland and Northern France. AD 600–800, ed. by J.-M. Picard, Dublin 1991, 95-118; A. Williams - A.P. Smyth - D.P. Kirby (eds.), A Biographical Dictionary of Dark Age Britain: England, Scotland and Wales, c. 500–c. 1050, London 1991, 123; S. Hollis, Anglo-Saxon Women and the Church: Sharing a Common Fate, Woodbridge 1992; S. Kuttner, "Auctor noster beatus Petrus Apostolus": Pope Agatho on the Papal Office, in Studia in Honorem Eminentissimi Cardinalis Alphonsi M. Stickler, ed. R.S. Castillo Lara, Rome 1992, 215-224; F. Prinz, Kirchen und Klöster als literarische Auftraggeber, in Committenti e produzione artistico-letteraria nell'alto medioevo occidentale, Spoleto 1992, II, 759-788; A. Scharer, Gesellschaftliche Zustände im Spiegel des Heiligenlebens: einige Folgerungen aus den Lebensbeschreibung des heiligen Cuthberth: Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung 100 (1992) 103-116; W.T. Foley, Images of Sanctity in Eddius Stephanus' "Life of Bishop Wilfrid": An Early English Saint's Life, Lewiston, NY 1992; Patrologia IV, 413 and 426-427 (G.R. Evans); R. Sharpe, A Handlist of the Latin Writers of Great Britain and Ireland before 1540, Turnhout 1997, 106 and 633; D. Pezzini, Vilfredo di York, in Il grande libro dei santi, 3, Cinisello Balsamo 1998, 1929-1931; M.D. Laynesmith, Stephen of Ripon and the Bible: Allegorical and Typological Interpretations of the "Life of St Wilfrid": Early Medieval Europe 9 (2000) 163-182; L. Lazzari, Il primato di Pietro nella "Vita Wilfridi," in La figura di San Pietro nelle fonti del Medioevo. Atti del Convegno tenutosi in occasione dello Studiorum universitatum docentium congressus (Viterbo e Rome 5-8 settembre 2000), ed. L. Lazzari - A.M. Valente Bacci, Louvain-la-Neuve 2001, 81-111; F. Prinz, Hagiographie und Welthaltigkeit. Überlegungen zur Vielfalt des Hagiographischen Genus in Frühmittelalter: Hagiographica 9 (2002) 1-17 (= in Scripturus vitam. Lateinische Biographie von der Antike bis in die Gegenwart: Festgabe für Walter Berschin zum 65. Geburtstag, Heidelberg 2002, 49-58).

B. Clausi

STEPHEN, the first martyr. The *martyrdom of Stephen constitutes the first NT account that has a *hagiographical character (Acts 6–7). Stephen was stoned to death outside *Jerusalem at a time in which the Roman prefecture was vacant, perhaps AD 31 or 32. The stoning was in conformity to Jewish customs, but it was outside the norms established by Roman judicial procedure.

The saint's *relics were found in 415 by the priest *Lucian, who was appointed to the parish at Kefar Gamala and who wrote a report in this regard (BHL 7850-7856). The relics were then transferred to Jerusalem on 26 December 415, in the church of St. Zion. The Mart. syr. had earlier assigned the feast of St. Stephen to 26 December. Bishop *Juvenal constructed a basilica on what was believed to be the place of the stoning and had *Cyril of Alexandria inaugurate it in 439 (PG 85,469). The empress *Eudoxia enlarged it, but the Persians destroyed it. Another basilica was built by *Melania (SC 90,255-258).

Already before *Gregory of Nyssa (PG 56,701-736), *Asterius of Amasea (PG 40,337-352) and *Basil of Seleucia (PG 85,461-473) had written the saint's *panegyric. From the Mart. syr., the feast passed into the Mart. hier. and the Calendarium Carth. But the discovery of the relics in 415 and their subsequent spread gave new life to the diffusion of Stephen's cult. With respect to this evolution, *Augustine's attitude remained significant for *Africa and determinative for Western Europe. In fact, from the 5th c. onward, the saint's relics were found everywhere: in the *Baleari, *Africa, at *Constantinople, at *Rome where the church of S. Stephano Rotondo dates back to ca. 450, at Bourges, etc. Numerous episcopal churches bore his name. The letter of his feast (Acts 6:8-11; 7:54–8:1) was translated into Romance languages, and these translations, along with the Latin text, continued to be sung until the 19th c.

Vies des SS. 12, 687-702; Cath 4, 571-574; LTK 9, 1050-1052; BS 11, 1376-1392; V. Saxer, L'épître farcie de la Saint Étienne "Sesta Lesson": Provence historique 23 (1973) 318-326; 24 (1974) 423-467; Id., Morts, martyrs, reliques en Afrique chrétienne aux premiers siècles, Paris 1980, 245-278; T. Baumeister, Das Stephanus patrozinium der Kirche im ehemaligen Isis-Tempel von Philä: RQA 81 (1986) 187-194.

V. Saxer

STEPHEN, the first martyr (apocryphal). Stephen the deacon, known from the Acts of the Apostles (6:8–8:3) was very popular in the Christian world: there exist homilies by *Gregory of Nyssa, *Asterius of Amasea, *Basil of Seleucia, *Hesychius of Jerusalem, *Augustine and other writers, esp. after the discovery of his tomb by *Lucian of Caphar Gamala in 415. His relics were transferred to *Africa (Evodius, PL 41,833-854; Augustine, De civitate Dei 22,8,10-19.21), Minorca (Severus, PL 20,731-746), *Constantinople (Anastasius, PL 41,817-822), *Rome (AB 49 [1931] 112-116) and in other various episcopal sees of the West.

Lucian's work was originally written in Greek and was translated into Latin by *Avitus of Braga (PL 41,805-816). Nevertheless, doubt remains whether this translation, known as the Revelatio S. Stefani, is not in reality the reworking of the *apocryphal text titled The Apocalypse of Stephen, which was condemned by the Decretum* (ps.-)Gelasianum 5,5,3. Unfortunately we do not have the written testimony of the original, but accounts of the Passion of St. Stephen exist in Greek, which are connected to the Revelatio S. Stephani written by Lucian. These two texts also exist in an Aramaic version (fragments), as well as *Syriac, *Armenian, *Georgian, *Ethiopian and Slavic versions. In these Stephen's preaching, stoning, burial and the subsequent discovery of the tomb, after several centuries, are recounted in several versions; mention is also made of the stoning, alongside Stephen, of Gamaliel, his son Habib and his cousin Nicodemus. According to the account offered by Lucian, their relics were also found in Stephen's tomb. The aforementioned document by Evodius's *De miraculis S. Stephani, in two books, provides an interesting description of St. Stephen's miracles and an important testimony to the cult of his relics.

CANT 300-303; BHG 1648-1665; BHL 7848-7895; BHO 1086-1097; F.M. Abel, DBS 2, 1933, 1132-1146; LCIK 8, 395-403; H. Leclercq, DACL 5, 624-671; BS 11, 1968, 1376-1394. N. Marr, PO 19, 1926, 629-671 (Georgian version, Fr. tr.); M. van Esbroeck, AB 102 (1984) 101-105 (Georgian tr.); Franko 3, 1902, 28-33, 256-259 (Slavic version); B.C. Mercier, ROC 30 (1946) 341-369 (Armenian version, Fr. tr.); J.P. Lang, Anecdota Syriaca, 3, Leiden 1870, 77-84 (Syriac text, intro. in Ger. by V. Ryssel, ZKG 15 [1895] 233-240); A. Strus, Salesianum 58 (1996) 21-54 (Greek version, It. tr.); Id., Salesianum 60 (1998) 81-96 (Greek version, It. tr.); S. Vanderinden, Revelatio S. Stephani (BHL 7850-6), REB 4 (1946) 178-217 (Lat. version, Fr. tr.). I. Franko, Revelatio S. Stephani: ZNW 7 (1906) 151-171; F.M. Abel, La légende apocryphe de St. Étienne. À propos de quelques textes géorgiens, Jerusalem 1939; J. Martin, Die Revelatio S. Stephani und Verwandtes: Historisches Jahrbuch 77 (1958) 419-433; M. van Esbroeck, Jean II et les cultes de St. Étienne, de la Sainte-Sion et de la Croix: AB 102 (1984) 98-134; A. Strus, L'Origine de l'apocryphe grec de la passion de S. Étienne: EphLit 112 (1998) 18-57; Id., Bet Gemal, Pathway of the Tradition of Saints Stephen and Gamaliel, Rome 2000; Id., Bet Gemal and the Byzantine Tradition Regarding St. Stephan, in Ecce ascendimus Jerosolymam (Lc 18,31), ed. F. Mosetto, Rome 2003, 399-418.

M. Starowieyski

STEPHEN I, pope (254–257). The brief pontificate of Pope Stephen is known from *Cyprian's collection of letters (Ep. 67-75) and from a few pieces of information provided by *Eusebius of Caesarea's History (HE 7,2-9). Living between the *Decian and *Valerian persecutions, his pontificate was troubled by the controversies pertaining to *penance and *baptism. The fact that during the first controversy a Spanish bishop appealed to him (Ep. 67,5) and that in the case of *Marcian the bishop of *Arles, Cyprian asked him to intervene (Ep. 68), displays the authority that the Roman church had obtained during that time. Pope Stephen, however, acc. to the testimony of Cyprian himself and *Firmilian, rejected any repetition of baptism and supported his position on the basis of an unchangeable *tradition (Ep. 74,1-2) and appealed to his Petrine succession (Ep. 75,17). He thereby clashed with the resistance of the African and Cappadocian churches. The two positions had different understandings of baptism. Cyprian viewed baptism as an incorporation into the church, while Stephen perceived it to be an act of Christ. The conflict, moreover, displayed more clearly to what extent the Roman church had become aware of its position of primacy in the universal church. Stephen died at the beginning of the new persecution, but not as a martyr. His death also brought an end to the controversy with the African church.

Cyprian, Ep. CSEL 3/2; CCL 3A. - AASS Aug. I, 112-146; K. Baus, HKG I (Freiburg [3]1965) 379-380, 401-407; U. Wickert, Paulus, der erste Klemens und Stephan von Rom: ZKG 79 (1968) 145-158; S.G. Hall, Stephen of Rome and the One Baptism: SP 17, Oxford 1982, 796-798; LTK[3] 9, 967; LACL (2000) 657; TRE 32 (2001) 153-157; EPapi 1, 281-285 (with bibl.).

B. Studer

STEPHEN II of Hierapolis-Mabbug (end of the 6th c.). Author around 592–594 of a passion of St. Golindukh. On the original lost *Syriac text depend a Greek reorganization, redacted by *Eustratius of *Constantinople, and a *Georgian translation. It is uncertain whether the same author also composed a fragmentary Greek treatise against the *monophysite sect of the *Agnoetae, transmitted under his name.

CPG III, 7005-7006; DSp 4, 1493-1494; DHGE 15, 1234-1235; F. Diekamp, Analecta patristica (OCA 117), Rome 1938, 154-160; G. Garitte, La passion géorgienne de sainte Golindouch: AB 74 (1956) 405-440.

S.J. Voicu

STEPHEN BAR SUDHAILE (5th–6th c.). We have information on Stephen bar Sudhaile thanks to two of his opponents, both anti-*Chalcedonians, as well as major authors of Syriac literature, namely *Jacob of Sarug (d. 521) and *Philoxenus of Mabbug (d. 523), who allow for a chronological dating between the 2nd half of the 5th and the 1st quarter of the 6th c. Although Jacob of Sarug, in a letter he sent with respect, rebuked Stephen for a theory on the termination of hell and the absence of a final judgment, which threw into crisis the concept of divine retribution, Philoxenus of Mabbug's letter, which he wrote around 510 to two presbyters of *Edessa, Abraham and Orestes, at a time in which Stephen had emigrated to *Jerusalem and devoted himself to an anonymous correspondence with monks and nuns, also sending them his works, is very circumscribed. According to the bishop, Stephen was trying (1) to assimilate the whole creation to God, inasmuch as everything will have to become like him; (2) to exaggerate divine mercy toward sin, to the point that there will be no last judgment, thereby annulling the meaning of *baptism, *Eucharist and asceticism; and (3) to theorize that everything possesses God's nature. Moreover, the bishop provided information on the mystical exegesis of Lk 13:32 ("Behold, I cast out demons and perform cures today and tomorrow, and the third day I finish my course"), where the three days are understood in a cosmological and mystical sense: Friday, the sixth day of the week, is a day in which the world was established and is a place of evil (crucifixion); Saturday is the day of rest (descensus ad inferos), in which Christ is all and is in every human being, although the first day of the week (Sunday) is the time of the consummation, when God will become all in all things (1 Cor 15:28), one nature, one substance and one divinity. At that time there will be no distinction between creature and Creator and neither between *Father, Son and *Holy Spirit, inasmuch as all things will be mixed together. Moreover, Philoxenus makes known that on the wall of Stephen's cell the following was written: "Every nature [kull kyān] is consubstantial [bar kyānā] with the essence [ītūtā]," and that the monk visited for a certain period a heretic named *John the Egyptian. All of these accusations, which only rarely seem to report Stephen's actual words and that often take the monk's positions to an extreme, give us a glimpse, however, into a world of ideas taken from the *Origenian matrix filtered through the writings of *Evagrius of Pontus and taken to extreme consequences.

The primary critical problem pertaining to Stephen bar Sudhaile is posed by the existence in *Syriac of a text entitled *The Book of St. Hierotheus behind the pseudonym that the medieval Syriac tradition identified with Stephen bar Sudhaile spoken of by Jacob of Sarug and Philoxenus of Mabbug: this attribution dates back to the Syrian-orthodox patriarch Cyriacus (793–817) and is maintained by the commentary on the Book of Hierotheus written by the patriarch Theodosius (887–896) and then by that text written by Gregory bar Hebraeus (13th c.).

Before facing the question of the relationship between Stephen and the Syriac work, it is necessary to briefly present the problem of the pseudonym. A Hierotheus, identified by modern scholarship as a possible pseudonym for the philosopher *Proclus or a *Neoplatonist Christian teacher, is cited in the writings of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite: he also appears there as a teacher of Dionysius, who in turn was a disciple of *Paul of Tarsus (Acts 17:34). The ps.-Dionysian corpus dates back to around the year AD 500, inasmuch as *Severus of Antioch cites them in 518/520 and again in 528, and they also seem to presuppose the speculations of the Neoplatonist philosopher Proclus, who died in 485. From this fact one can conclude that the Syriac work makes the claim to having been written by the teacher of ps.-Dionysius, presenting himself in a certain way as the secret and original source of the ps.-Dionysian literature.

The book, which has come down to us thanks to the Syro-Western MS tradition and is rather large, is divided into five parts (mēmrê): the first speaks of the ordering of the cosmos; the second, the third and fourth treat the rise of the νοῦς; the fifth treats the question of *eschatology.

There have been various suggestions for interpreting the Book of Hierotheus both with respect to its unity and its relation to Stephen bar Sudhaile, which is described by Philoxenus of Mabbug. In its major features, the book displays the clear influence of Evagrius of Pontus, but there are also primary lexical and conceptual contacts with the writings of ps.-Dionysius and other traditions of Egyptian and Palestinian *monasticism. This fact, like numerous incongruencies of structure and vocabulary, has opened a literary debate that is not easy to resolve, which has witnessed the dominance of two primary theses: (1) the work is written by one person, but its author was unable to unite all the sources at his disposal; (2) the work exhibits traces not only of interpolations but also of real editorial interventions, and therefore it is not at all unified work but was composed at two separate stages by different authors. However, the problem of the relationship between the content of the work and what Philoxenus of Mabbug affirmed with respect to Stephen's theology remains an unsettled debate: there are certainly many points of contact, but there are also some missing points in the Book of Hierotheus that make it difficult to hypothesize that the bishop reacted to the work as we know it today. Today, the thesis that the Book of Hierotheus presupposes the existence of the ps.-Dionysian corpus, placing itself in a dialectical relationship with it, has won a certain following: by now it is certain that this work was written after the appearance of this body of literature.

The framework recently proposed by Pinggéra appears to be a clever attempt to resolve the perplexing difficulties of research on Stephen. He sets forth the distinction between two redactional strata: the first is saturated with Evagrian thought; the second, which is likewise Evagrian in orientation, is also in dialectic with the formal aspects and the language of the ps.-Dionysian corpus, which he knew well, and the anti-Evagrian potential of which he was fully aware. To the second redactional phase one must trace (1) the idea of creating a pseudonym for the author of the book, that Hierotheus the teacher of Dionysius was at the origin of the latter's theology; (2) the presence of ps.-Dionysian material, although an Evagrian orientation remains; (3) the reaction against the letter of Philoxenus of Mabbug, to whose criticisms the second redactor would be responding.

Duval 356-358; Baumstark 167, 350; Chabot 66-67; Ortiz de Urbina 103-104; DSp 4, 1481-1488; Patrologia V, 468-469. Edition of Jacob of Sarug and Philoxenus of Mabbug 's Letters: A.L. Frothimgham, Stephen Bar Sudhaili the Syrian Mystic (c. 500 A.D.) and the Book of Hierotheos on the Hidden Treasures of the Divinity, Leiden 1886. Ed. of the text: F.S. Marsh, The Book of the Holy Hierotheos Ascribed to Stephen bar Sudhaile, London-Oxford 1927. On the book, its contents and critical problems, in addition to the introduction by Marsh, see: I. Hausherr, L'influence du "Livre de saint Hiérothée," in De doctrina spirituali christianorum orientalium quaestiones et scripta I, in Orientalia Christiana 30, Rome 1933, 176-211; A. Guillaumont, Les "Képhalaia gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et les Syriens, Paris 1962; K. Pinggéra, All-Erlösung und All-Einheit. Studien zum Buch des heiligen Hierotheos und seiner Rezeption in der syrisch-orthodoxen Theologie (Sprachen und Kulturen des christlichen Orients, 10), Wiesbaden 2002.

A. Camplani

STEPHEN GOBAR (6th c.). *Monophysite, follower of the so-called *tritheism of *John Philoponus, who—it seems—lived in the 6th c. *Photius (Bibl., cod. 232) describes one of his works which treated 52 questions of various topics (*theology, *cosmology, *anthropology and *eschatology), providing for each question passages from authors who represented the official teaching of the church and passages of authors who supported erroneous teachings.

CPG III, 7300; PG 103, 1092-1105 (fragments); R. Henry, Photius, Bibliothèque, Paris 1967, V, 67ff.; G. Bardy, Le florilège d'Étienne Gobar: REB 5 (1947) 5-30; 7 (1949) 51-52; BBKL X, 1371-1374; Patrologia V, 388-389.

M. Simonetti

STEPHEN of Bostra (7th–8th c.). One cannot prove that he was the bishop of the city (in the province of Arabia). He lived between the 7th and 8th c., certainly before *John of Damascus, who reports from his work Against the Jews (Λόγος κατὰ τῶν Ἰουδαίων), who were evidently favorable to the iconoclasts, two passages in defense of the cult to the sacred images (De imag. III, testimonia: PG 94,1376). The work was also mentioned and cited by other writers. All the fragments were collected by A. Mai (Opere minori, ST 76, Rome 1937, 202-207).

CPG III, 7790; Bardenhewer 5, 47; Beck 447 and 831 (index); DHGE 15, 1211; Patrologia V, 297-298.

A. De Nicola

STEPHEN of Ephesus (5th c). First a presbyter (ca. 400) and then the bishop of *Ephesus (448), at an advanced age he went to recover with force *Bassianus's episcopal see, who in turn from 444, although being appointed by Bishop *Memnon to another episcopal see, was placed by the people at the head of the church of Ephesus. Stephen sought to depose Bassianus through the pope, but the emperor *Theodosius II deferred a decision on this matter to the Council of *Chalcedon (451), which in its 11th and 12th sessions deprived both bishops of their ecclesiastical office, judging them unworthy of governing the church (Mansi VII,271-300). Stephen aligned himself against *Flavian of Constantinople to increase the prestige of his episcopal see. According to Honigmann, Stephen redacted the original Greek version of the legend of the *Seven Sleepers of Ephesus to increase the political and ecclesiastical weight of the see of Ephesus.

CPG 8964, 9014, 9016; ACO II, I, 3, 42-56; DHGE VI, 1274-1275; DCB IV, 738-739; E. Honigmann, Stephen of Ephesus (April 15, 448 - Oct. 29, 451) and the Legend of the Seven Sleepers, ST 173, Vatican City 1953, 125-168; S. Acerbi, Conflitti politico-ecclesiastici in Oriente nella tarda antichità. Il II Concilio di Efeso (449), Madrid 2001 (passim).

P. Marone

STEPHEN of Larissa (6th c.). Bishop of Larissa at the time of the emperor *Justinian (527–565). He is known from the acts of the Roman council that was held in consistorio B(eati) Andreae on 7 and 9 December 531 and presided over by Pope *Boniface II (530–532). Stephen, although a layman and a soldier, was called by the clergy and the people of Larissa to succeed Bishop Proclus, who had died shortly before. The presbyter Anthony and two suffragan bishops, Demetrius and Probian, who also had approved election, turned to *Epiphanius patriarch of Constantinople (520–535) against this ordination, claiming that it was performed against the canonical norms. Epiphanius immediately deposed Stephen without providing any reasons and brought him by force to *Constantinople, where he held him prisoner. Stephen, who from the beginning had made an appeal to *Rome, because since ancient times *Thessaly had belonged to the jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome, was able to send from Constantinople two letters to the pope, which, in addition to affirming the pope's primacy over the entire church, attested to Rome's jurisdiction over Illyricum. The second letter narrates the trial to which Stephen was subjected by the patriarch at Constantinople. The patriarch did not at all take into account Stephen's appeal to the pope; in fact the appeal had irritated him even more, so that as a result Stephen was accused of attacking the rights of the patriarchal church. Epiphanius did everything in his power to prevent the appeal from arriving to Rome, but he was unsuccessful. Theodosius, the suffragan bishop of Larissa, came to Rome and delivered Stephen's letters and some of the other suffragan bishops of Larissa, letters which were accompanied by 26 documents (letters), almost all of popes and emperors, which confirmed Rome's jurisdiction over Illyricum. During the council the letters of appeal were read and the authenticity of the attached documents was verified with the originals that were preserved in the archives of the Church of Rome.

The judgment the council delivered has not survived, because the Acts are missing from the end of the document. The events surrounding Stephen should be framed within Constantinople's attempts to remove Illyricum from Rome's jurisdiction.

Mansi 8, 739-784; critical ed. C. Silva-Tarouca, Epistolae Roman. Pontif. ad vicarios per Illyr . . . Collectio Thessalonic.: Textus et documenta. Series Theologica 23, Rome 1937; Hfl-Lecl 2,2, 1117-1119; DCB 4, 740, n. 22; Fliche-Martin IV, n. 809, 676.

A. De Nicola

STEPHEN of Thebes. The multifaceted monastic literature that developed following the great *christological controversies included some writings of the monk Stephen of Thebes. To his name were ascribed the Logos askētikos, the Diataxis and the Entolai, these last two conjointly published on the basis of a single testimony, along with a prayer to Christ, perhaps by the same author. Edited in Greek, Arabic and Georgian versions, the Logos askētikos collects the teachings for the noncenobitic monastic life, i.e., it treats the renunciation of the world, asceticism, the practice of remaining in one's cell and how to ward off evil thoughts. In a different way, the Diataxis and the Entolai pertain to instructions for the already-advanced monk's outward behavior, with advice for trips outside the monastery, meals, psalmody, going to sleep, visits and the reception of guests.

Until today, the historical identity of Stephen of Thebes remains uncertain. Although scholars entertain reservations concerning the identification of the Thebain monk of the Diataxis, inasmuch as he partially overlaps the Logoi 3 and 4 of the monk Isaiah of Sceti (E. Lucchesi), one must discard the hypothesis that the MS tradition errs with regard to the name. In fact, the first editor thought that the monk could have been identified with Stephen the Sabaite, an 8th-c. monk and a nephew of *John of Damascus, but textual criticism rejects this identification (J. Darrouzès).

J. Darrouzès, v. Étienne le Thébain: DSp IV (1961) 1525-1526; J.-M. Sauget, Une version arabe du "Sermon ascétique" d'Étienne le Thébain: Muséon 77 (1964) 367-406; É. Des Places, Le "Discours ascétique" d'Étienne de Thèbes. Texte grec inédite et traduction: Muséon 82 (1969) 35-59; G. Garitte, Le "Discours ascétique" d'Étienne le Thébain en géorgien: Muséon 83 (1970) 73-93; E. Lucchesi, Une version copte du Sermo asceticus d'Étienne le Thébain: AB 115 (1997) 252; P. Bruns, v. Stefano Tebaita, in Dizionario di letteratura cristiana antica, Rome 2006, 793.

V. Lombino

STILICHO, Flavius (ca. 360–408). General of the *Vandals, born around 360, he made a name for himself during the war against the *Visigoths (391–392), reaching the rank of magister militum. Even though he married Serena, niece of the emperor *Theodosius I, he had to battle against the resistance of the Roman aristocracy. Despite repeated military successes, he quickly had to abandon the E part of the empire, exercising in the West the guardianship of the emperor *Honorius. He fought victoriously in *Africa against *Gildo (398); he then defeated *Alaric, the first time during the invasion of 401 and subsequently in the battle of Pollentium. In 406, he was again victorious against Radagaisus. Stilicho's successes in war were insufficient in preventing the loss of the Western emperor's sympathy. In 408, a rebellion broke out against which he would not and could not defend himself and, delivered ino the hands of the rebels, he was executed along with his wife Serena and his son Eucherius.

An ungrateful judgment weighed on Stilicho's attempt to govern the state in a traditional way, the state by that point at the crossroads between propensities toward special interests and the new demands of the barbarians. *Augustine's cautious silence is contrasted with the open accusations of *Jerome and *Orosius. An opposing voice based on objective data was that of Rutilius Namatianus.

S. Mazzarino, S. La crisi imperiale dopo Teodosio, Rome 1942 = Milan 1990, with extensive introduction by A. Giardina; E. Nischer-Falkenhof, Stilicho, Vienna 1947; L. Cracco Ruggini, "De morte persecutorum" e polemica antibarbarica nella storiografia pagana e cristiana. A proposito della disgrazia di Stilicho: RSLR 4 (1968) 433-447; L. Vàrady, Stilicho proditor arcani imperii: Acta Antiqua Hung. 16 (1968) 413-432; A.D.E. Cameron, Theodosius the Great and the Regency of Stilicho: Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 73 (1969) 247-280; M.R. Alföldi, Zum Datum der Aufgabe der Residenz Treviri unter Stilicho: Jahrbuch f. Numismatik und Geldgeschichte 20 (1970) 241-248; M. Miller, Stilicho's Pictish War: Britannia 6 (1975) 141-145; S. Cristo, The Relationship of Symmachus to Stilicho and Claudian: Atene e Rome 21 (1976) 53-59; J.L. Sebesta, On Stilicho's Consulship: Variations on a Theme by Claudian: The Classical Bulletin 54 (1977-78) 72-75; C. Castello, L'umanesimo cristiano di Stilicho, in Atti del IV Convegno int. dell'Accademia romaistica Costantiniana, Perugia 1981, 65-96; A. Marcone, Simmaco e Stilicho: F. Paschoud (ed.), Colloque genèvois sur Symmaque, Paris 1986, 145-162; Id., Stilicho "parens publicus": ZPE 70 (1987) 222-224; R. Scharf, Die Kanzleireform des Stilichs und das römische Britannien: Historia 39 (1990) 461-474; B. Isaac, The Limits of Empire: The Roman Army in the East, Oxford [2]1992; P. MacGeorge, Late Roman Warlords, Oxford 2002.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

STOBI. Ancient city of Macedonia (former Yugoslavia) at the intersection of the Crna (Erigon) and Vardar (Axios) Rivers, nearly 160 km (99.4 mi) N of Thessalonica, the episcopal see of *Macedonia Salutaris and subsequently of Macedonia Secunda. The city existed as a part of Paeonia from the end of the 4th c. and at the beginning of the 3rd c. BC; it became a municipium in the first years of the Roman Empire and was likewise making its own coins at least from AD 69 to 222. John Stobaeus (5th c.) was a native of Stobi. The city was abandoned, then destroyed, perhaps by an earthquake, before the end of the 6th c., although the bishops continued to bear the name of the see at least until the end of the 7th c.

Excavations carried out by American and Yugoslavian scholars during the 1970s and 1980s have considerably increased our understanding of the culture and art of Stobi, esp. with respect to Late Antiquity. Earlier Yugoslavian excavations (1924–1940) had already brought to light part of the urban center. The excavations were particularly important not only for understanding the evolution of the urban structure during the first six c. AD, but also for the well-preserved architecture and the monumental decorative arts, esp. the mosaics and the frescoes. The 4th c. was represented by the imperial palaces—which continued in the 5th c.—such as the palace of *Theodosius and the adjacent house of Parthenius, and the house of Peristeria: all buildings with a rich variety of floor mosaics. The palace of Theodosius even had some wall mosaics in a room and an open courtyard paved in marble opus sectile or wallpaper templates. To the S of the synagogue, near the theater, was the most ancient and well-preserved church of the Balkan Peninsula: the basilica with three aisles constructed in the 4th c. with floor mosaics containing geometric designs in the central aisle and in the presbyterium—combined here with opus sectile—a red limestone floor in the aisles and frescoes on the walls and the ceiling.

Both the synagogue and the early church were reconstructed in the 5th c. with larger Christian basilicas (respectively the central and the episcopal basilica); moreover, another four basilicas are known for this period: there is one to the N with a small cross-shaped baptistery, the cemeterial basilica just beyond that door that opened onto the street to Heraclea Lyncestis, the Palikura basilica nearly 2 km (1.2 mi) to the S and last the basilica beyond the Erigon River. The episcopal basilica is of special interest because of the quantity of mosaics preserved in the S aisle, the narthex in a room to the S and in the central aisle, and for the frescoes and mosaics in the baptistery, which has been very well preserved, a tetraconch contained in a squared structure. In it, the mosaic that circles the broad baptismal pool has four primary scenes, two of deer and two of peacocks alongside an overflowing kantharos. The life-size paintings on the baptistery's walls include scenes perhaps from the life of Christ and images of the saints addressing an audience. The architectural embellishments of the baptistery and the episcopal basilica, with decorations of the capitals, later increased the importance of this ancient city for the study of Late Antique art and architecture.

E. Kitzinger, A Survey of the Early Christian Town of Stobi: DOP 3 (1946) 81-161; R.E. Hoddinot, Early Byzantine Churches in Macedonia and Southern Serbia, London 1962; J.R. Wiseman, Stobi in Yugoslavian Macedonia: Excavations and Research: Journal of Field Archaeology 5 (1978) 391-491 (with bibl.); Studies in the Antiquities of Stobi, I-II, ed. J.R. Wiseman, Beograd 1973-75; III, ed. B. Aleksova - J. Wiseman, Titov Veles 1981; J.R. Wiseman, The City in Macedonia Secunda, in Villes et peuplement dans l'Illyricum protobyzantin, Collection de l'École Française de Rome, Rome 1984, 289-314; J. Wiseman, Archaeology and History at Stobi, Macedonia, in Rome and Provinces, ed. B. McClendon, New Haven, CT 1986, 37-83; B. Aleksova, The Old Episcopal Basilica at Stobi, Thessaloniki 1991; B. Aleksova, Early Christian and Slav Religious Centres in Macedonia, in Acta XIII Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae, Split-Poreč 25 settembre - 1 ottobre 1994, Vatican City 1998, 7-28.

N. Cambi

STOICISM and the FATHERS. Early Christian preaching and exposition had a primarily Semitic structure, even though the koinē language of certain books of the OT had already given signs of contact with *Hellenistic culture. Initially, Christianity spread quickly in *Syria, *Asia Minor and *Egypt. Subsequently, through the same routes and in the same period in which other Eastern religions worked out their great achievements, Christianity had recourse to the koinē, also spreading in Hellenistic-Roman cultural areas, and it gradually undertook a process of creating a special language that, on the one hand, assumed concepts and terms typical of Western thought and, on the other, requalified them semantically by properly biblical conceptions. Some expressive models of the Greco-Roman context, esp. the various forms of *Middle Platonism and *Platonism, in the eyes of various Christian thinkers seemed esp. suitable with respect to the demands of preaching and the first formal elaboration of the truth announced and believed. But at least until *Clement of Alexandria, around 230, when the Platonic influence prevailed, Christianity was seen primarily in comparison with Stoicism.

The Academy, in fact, in its various reformulations, presented itself as a bitter rival of the Stoa, but always in a dialectical relation of distinction-assimilation, emphasized esp. by Antiochus of Ascalona, who came to the point of maintaining that Zeno the Stoic was a Platonist reformer, definitively proposing instead of Platonism an eclectic Stoicism of the type that was already introduced in the Academy by Panaetius and Posidonius. In the last two centuries before Christ, becoming less rigid and opening toward a certain eclecticism common to all contemporary philosophical positions, Stoicism came close to the Platonism of the Academy, the philosophical institution that at that time was ready to receive in large measure Stoic teaching, esp. the theory—accepted even by the Platonists and *Aristotelians—of the eternity of the cosmos. At the same time, Panaetius of Rhodes, who arrived at Rome in 143 BC with Scipio Africanus, spread among the Roman aristocracy a type of modified Stoicism, which not only abandoned the traditional theory of the cosmic conflagration but also divination (a theme connected to the concepts of divinity and providence), attributing value, at least relative, to exterior goods and pleasure. To Posidonius and the milieu of Stoicized Platonism, or Platonizing Stoicism, belong the Platonic ideas identifiable, at least acc. to Antiochus of Ascalon, with inherent wisdom in the mind produced from the divine and provident fiery-reason; as well as the ideas of astral immortality (the souls of good human beings return to the ethereal regions of their provenance); ideas of the contemplation of the movement of celestial bodies as a precursor of the functioning of the divine reason; and ideas of the eternal cosmos conceived as a single organism governed by a divine power, that has a place and is manifested in the luminous regions, in the visible gods (the sun and other celestial bodies), and to which is also akin the highest part of the human being.

The Stoicism contemporary to Christianity is presented on the one hand as a speculative "vision of the world" and, on the other hand, as a sincere concern and a participant in the needs of the age even if "one will have to attribute to the Stoa the notions that Middle Platonism transmitted to the Fathers, when they bear the specific stamp of the Stoic school" (Spanneut IV,154). Also to be regarded as akin to Stoicism is any idea present in the Holy *Scriptures but which was developed with special insistence by Stoicism (*Philo of Alexandria, the Jew, was able to find, in a certain way "hidden" in the folds of the biblical books, the ethics of the Cynics, the physical and psychological theology of the ancient Stoics and a good dose of mixed Platonism, as well as the mysticism of neo-Pythagorean numbers), although in the extant texts of the ancient and middle Stoa traces of *Judaism did not emerge (Spanneut II,130). The foundational concepts of Zeno's Stoicism of cosmopolitanism, humanitarianism and universal brotherhood; the reconciliation of humanity; and the idea of the existence of the divine natural law turned out to be mediated and purified by the middle Stoa, Cicero and Seneca (P. Wendland, La cultura ellenistico-romana nei suoi rapporti con giudaismo e cristianesimo, Brescia [4]1986, 66-67).

During the first two centuries, Christians used the great Stoics, whose works we possess: (1) Seneca, *Nero's teacher, who can be considered a true eclectic inasmuch as he was a Stoic and at the same time an admirer of Epicurus; (2) Musonius Rufus, a puritan, a preacher of chastity, the family established on marriage, and rural life as an existence typical of the philosopher; (3) Epictetus, a former slave, a traditionalist preacher of morality and religion (understood as a joyous resignation to divine providence, which is assimilable to a transcendent personal God); and (4) Marcus Aurelius, who was close to the thought of Plato, whose belief in immortality, however, he did not share because of his peculiar pessimism in view of the vanity of earthly things.

The influence of Stoicism on Christianity pertained both to the terminology, often assumed by certain Christian thinkers, and the concepts that could be shared and readapted, or rather received and inserted into the living framework of the Christian doctrinal formulation. At other times, reference to the Stoa consisted only in a general tone, which seems to echo the spiritual orientation and Stoic optimism.

We will restrict this investigation to noting some specific convergences and the chief points of contact between Stoicism and Christian writers.

1. Against the radical dualism of some currents within Academic Platonism that reduced the body to a prison of the soul, Stoicism maintained the unitary conception of the body as an animal rationale (Seneca, Ep. 41,8): the soul, likewise material, grows and develops with the body and follows its destiny (compati corpori: Tertullian, De an. 5,5 = SVF I,518; cf. SVF III,96). Already acc. to Aristotle, the soul communicates with the body through a material vehicle called the pneuma, a generative heat which grants life, the active material principle that, under the influence of the movement of the desire in the soul, produces bodily movement: an element taken from Pythagorean philosophy and one that had great influence on the Stoics.

The 2nd-c. Fathers followed this approach. Thus, for Irenaeus the body is a part of the human being, just as the soul: the perfect human being turns out to be flesh, soul and Spirit (Adv. haer. 5,6,1). Even in the writings of Tertullian, the human being has a unitary structure: soul and body form a solid whole, a textura (De res. 34,10), a collegium (De res. 15,3) and a societas (De res. 15,1-6). As in the Stoa (SVF II,604; Seneca, De provid. 6,9), death is the separation of the soul from the body (De res. 19,3; De an. 51,1). This anthropological conception allowed Irenaeus and Tertullian to defend, against the *gnostics, esp. the *Valentinians, who were evidently the most Platonizing, the resurrection and the recomposition of the soul and the body in view of the last judgment (De res. 34,8).

2. For the Stoics, every reality is corporeal, and what does not have a corpus is not real: the body (sōma) is the essence of the ousia, or rather, that through which a being exists (SVF II,359). Thus *Tertullian: nihil si non corpus (De an. 7,3); nihil est incorporale nisi quod non est (De carne Chr. 11,4). Even the soul, therefore, is corporeal (corporalis) and is born from the breath (flatus) of God (De an. 22,2), which is something else with respect to the spirit (Adv. Marc. II,9,1). Tertullian seems to agree with the Stoic position that the arts were corporeal, and from the moment that the soul was nourished by the arts, it too had to be corporeal (De an. 6). "Corporeal" does not equal "material" (De an. 3,4) but expresses the idea of "existent" as the antithesis of nonexistent. He certainly would have acknowledged that corporeal and incorporeal constitute a logical antithesis (Adv. Herm. 35), but he would have also added that the thing that is not corporeal is also to be considered nonexistent (De carne Chr. 2; De res. 2, 53; De an. 7). The soul (flatus) is an idea of the Stoics, who presented it under the physical aspect as ether and pneuma (SVF I,135) and under the spiritual aspect, as the soul of the world, the primordial divine force that pervades the cosmos and holds together the individual entities, but it is likewise a biblical idea. In any case, the Tertullian-as-Stoic thesis is not to be understood as antispiritualistic. Instead, it realistically seeks to assert the already-here-outside-now of the communicative animal consciousness. In one of Irenaeus's writings, we read: "Souls are incorporeal if compared to mortal bodies" (Adv. Haer. 5,7,1), where one seems to find the affirmation of, in a Stoicizing context, a certain corporeality of the soul, even if perhaps only to affirm its creatureliness with respect to the divine incorporeality (A. Orbe, Antropología de San Ireneo, Madrid 1969, 440). This thesis would pass into the anthropology of *John Cassian: souls are not to be considered incorporeal; God alone is incorporeal (Conl. 7,13).

3. According to the Stoicism of Cicero and Seneca, the soul possesses by nature an ontological and moral good that lasts even though at times it is enveloped and suffocated by prejudices and errors (Tusc. III,1,2; De fin. V,15,43 and 21,59-60; Seneca, Ep. 22,15; 94,31.54.55.56; 108,8). In Tertullian's writings, we see an analogous bonum naturae (De an. 41): this is at the basis of the Christian soul's testimonium by nature, established on the soul's sanitas (Apol. 17,4-6). Even for *Clement of Alexandria, the good life, which can only be reached in Christ, is portrayed not without the influence of the Stoicism of Musonius Rufus. The initiative of the good, made possible by the bonum of nature, returns in the 4th c. in the writings of *Basil of Caesarea in a Stoicizing context (Regul. fusius tract.: PG 31,908.909.912, etc.); *John Chrysostom (In epist. II ad Cor.: PG 61,397; In epist. ad Heb: PG 43,99); *Optatus of Milevis (Tract. 2,20); *Jerome (Dial. adv. Pelag. III,1). The bonum naturae is a leitmotif in the writings of *Pelagius (Ep. to Demetrias 2.3.4.7.8.9). Hence the norm for living acc. to nature (SVF III,65; Seneca, Ep. 41,8; M. Aurelius, Meditations II,17), which would find much diffusion in the Roman and Christian ethical and legal milieu. Human beings use interior energies that allow them to achieve the ethical ideal; the same law of physical nature assumes a moral value, inasmuch as human beings are an integral part of the cosmos. Even for Tertullian, nature is the first teacher; the natural law binds because God is its author (De virg. vel. 11,6; De cor. 5,1); what does not come from nature comes from the devil (De c. fem. I,8,2; see Spanneut IV,164).

4. The bonum naturae is also reflected in the concept—Stoic in origin—of "seeds of virtue" (semina virtutum), known to Cicero (De fin. V,15,43; V,7-18) and Seneca (Ep. 73,16; 94,29; 108,8; 120,4). Such seeds are innate and come from nature acc. to the thought of *John Cassian (Conl. 13,12; 23,11) and *Faustus of Riez (De gratia I,12).

5. In Stoicism, the immanent God is revealed through the order (kosmos) of the world (see Chrysippus in SVF II,1099; who developed the thought of Cleanthes, in Nat. Deor. II,5,13-15). Tertullian, not without the biblical influences of the OT (the theme of the recognition of the Creator starting from creatures), believed that God was knowable ex operibus (Apol. 17,4). The world was created so that God, through it, might be known (Adv. Marc. I,10,1). Similar ideas can be found in the writings of *Aristides (Apol. 1,1).

Stoicism sang of the world's beauty. The cosmos—the diakosmēsis of Aristotle (Peri philosophias 12b)—is found in the writings of Marcus Aurelius (Meditations 9,1; 12,5). *Aristides (Apol. 1,1) and *Basil of Caesarea (Exaem. hom. 1,1.5.6) used the term in the same sense, although *Athenagoras used the verb diakosmeō four times in a cosmological sense (Legat. 7,1; 10,1; 22,12; 24,3). The term enjoyed exceptional favor in the writings of the Fathers (Spanneut I,364). The optimistic Stoic teaching that perceived the cosmos to be permeated by the divinity (Virgil, Aen. 6,726-727) was antithetical to the cosmic pessimism of certain *gnostic movements (Tertullian, Adv. Marc. I,13,5; 14,3-5).

6. In the letter Ad Diognetum (beginning of the 3rd c.), Christians perform in the world the same function that Stoicism had assigned to the soul of the world: they are the principle of cohesion (6,7). The action is expressed by the verb synechein ("to keep together from within"), which was proper to Stoic cosmology (SVF II,439): Wis 1:7 drew on the Stoic tradition, where the term refers to the cosmic action of the spirit, and in this sense, through Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. V, 2,3) and Athenagoras (Legat. 6,2), it then passed into the letter Ad Diognetum.

7. Stoicism knew of God's providence (pronoia), which with the logos and the eimarmenē characterizes Stoic language to render the concept of the cosmic soul which manifests the primordial divine power (SVF II,1106-1126; Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 9,1). The pronoia is to be identified with the world itself, inasmuch as the divinity rules the individual things (SVF II, 528). God is immanent in the world (Cicero, De nat. Deor. II, 22,58; Seneca, De providentia 5; Nat. Quaest., praef.). Aristides attributed to God's pronoia his coming into the world: the Stoic concept is thus assumed and charged with *christological resonances (Apol. 1,1; see also Athenagoras, Legat. 8,4; 19,3; 24,3; 25,2).

8. The Stoic distinction between logos endiathetos and prophorikos (SVF II,135) designates in Christianity the external logos, immanent within the bosom of the Father or manifested externally (Theophilus of Antioch, Ad Autol. II,10; II,22).

9. The Stoic divine-human cosmopolitanism expounded by Cicero (mundus quasi communis deorum atque hominum domus: De nat. Deor. II,62; SVF II,1131) and by Seneca (respublica magna et vere publica, qua dii atque homines continentur: De otio 4,1), and whose borders are marked by the sun (see also Marc. Aurel., Meditations 6,44), finds a deliberate echo in the thought of Tertullian: unum omnium rem publicam agnoscimus, mundum (Apol. 38,3), even if limited to the consortium of "all" and not "the gods and human beings," as well as in the writings of *Minucius Felix (hanc communem omnium mundi civitatem: Oct. 17,2). It is necessary, moreover, to note that Stoic cosmopolitanism, anchored in a substantial intellectualism, remained, nonetheless, tied to the aristocratic attitude of ancient philosophy, while Christianity sought to establish its own universalism on other bases that were not exclusively intellectual.

10. The doctrine of cosmic anthropocentrism was Stoic, which places the world at the service of human beings (SVF II,1152-1167). A broad development of this teaching can be found in Cicero's writings: omnia quae sint in hoc mundo, quibus utantur homines, hominum causa facta esse et parata (De nat. Deor. II, 61,154). God has created the things of the world for the benefit (not in view of) of human beings: in this respect, see the writings of *Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 10,2; 2 Apol. 4,2; 5,2); *Theophilus of Antioch (Ad Autol. I,6; II,18); the letter *Ad Diognetum (4,2; 10,2); Tertullian (De an. 33,9; De pat. 4,3; De spect. 2,4: universitatem tam bonam quam homini mancipatam); *Ambrose (De off. I,132). Even if there appear strong resemblances with the biblical accounts of *creation (Gen 1:26, 28-30) and with certain Psalms, the theme in the writings of Christian authors seems to derive from Stoicism, which would be in agreement with the Holy Scriptures, even though not depending on them (Waszink, Tertulliani De Anima, Amsterdam 1947, 296).

11. A text of Seneca (Benef. IV,7; SVF II,1024) identifies nature with God and the divine reason that pervades the cosmos, in line with the Stoic sensibility that emphasizes the idea that the world, in all its components, is full of divine Powers which manifest their own effects within it. We find an echo of this in the writings of Minucius Felix: quid aliud Deus quam mens et ratio et spiritus (Oct. 19,2). Even Tertullian equated "natural" with "rational" (De an. 43,7); for this reason he regarded creation as the work of the verbum, the ratio, the spiritus (Apol. 17,1). Tertullian wrote the following: Dei ratio quia Deus omnium conditor nihil non ratione providit disposuit ordinavit (De paenit. 1,2): God and the world are connected, even though to the exclusion of Stoic monism. *Clement of Alexandria sang of the natural order of the world in a way that recalls the Stoa (Strom. VI,155,3).

12. The Stoic sources, esp. the more recent ones, assigned to marriage the sole objective of procreation: gamos and paidopoiia are inseparable. For this reason, pleasure isolated from procreation is excluded. See the writings of Epictetus (Diss. III,7,2; III,12,7); Lucan (Bell. Civ. II,387-391); Seneca (Consol. ad Elv. 13,3; SVF III,686). The teaching of the following Christian authors is identical: Justin Martyr (1 Apol. 29,1), Athenagoras (Legat. 33,1), Minucius Felix (Oct. 31,5), Tertullian (Ad ux. I, 2,1) and Clement of Alexandria (Paed. II,10,92,2; 10,95,3). This type of rigorism in conjugal relations goes back more to Stoicism than to the Bible, since, acc. to the Stoics, pleasure is the irrational exaltation of the soul (SVF III,406) and, as such, is reprehensible: the logos alone must triumph (SVF III,404); the passions, inasmuch as they are deviations from reason, must be eradicated (Cicero, Tusc. IV,19,43).

13. One should emphasize the influence of Stoicism, esp. the Stoicism of Epictetus, on *monasticism: the perfect monk would be described with traits of the Stoic sage. And in the writings of *John Chrysostom one also finds noteworthy Stoic elements (Pohlenz, Stoa, II,334-338); in the treatise Comparatio regis et monachi (PG 47,387-392), a parallel between the monk and the king returns, which corresponds to a common refrain in Stoicism, as a Christian equivalent of the parallel between the philosopher and the tyrant in the ninth book of Plato's Republic.

14. The popularity of Stoicism in the writings of the Fathers was established on its analogies, which were at times only exterior or linguistic, with Christianity, but its influence is undeniable in the theological, anthropological, cosmological and ethical spheres. Seneca saepe noster (De an. 20,1) was the expression Tertullian used to express all the confidence he had in the face of Stoicism, and Jerome would say: Stoici nostro dogmati in plerisque concordant (In Esaiam IV,11). Terms and categories of thought, as well as doctrinal Stoic elements, which compete with the scientific formulation of Christianity, even when they come together in the heritage of philosophical koinē, attest to the special modality of the "enculturation" that was followed by the theorists of Christian teaching as well as the vitality of the movement from which they came.

Sources: H. von Arnim, Stoicorum Veterum Fragmenta (= SVF) I-IV, Stuttgart 1905, repr. 1964; Stoici antichi, ed. M. Isnardi Parente, Turin 1989. General treatments: J. Stelzenberger, Die Beziehungen der frühchristlichen Sittenlehre zur Ethik der Stoa, Munich 1933; M. Pohlenz, La Stoa. Storia di un movimento spirituale, It. tr. Florence 1967, 2 vols. (for our theme: II, 261-400); M. Spanneut, Le Stoïcisme des Pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris [2]1969 (= Spanneut, I); Id., Permanence du Stoïcisme de Zénon à Malraux, Gembloux 1973 (= Spanneut, II); D. Tsekourakis, Studies in the Terminology of Early Stoic Ethics, Wiesbaden 1974; F.-H. Sandbach, The Stoics, New York 1975; D.E. Hahm, The Origins of Stoic Cosmology, Columbus 1977; P. Wendland, La cultura ellenistico-romana nei suoi rapporti con giudaismo e cristianesimo, Brescia 1986.

Studies: J.-H. Waszink, Tertulliani De anima, Amsterdam 1947; Tertullian, De Testimonio animae, intr. text and comm. by C. Tibiletti, Turin 1959; S. Otto, Natura und Dispositio. Untersuchung zum Naturbegriff und zur Denkform Tertullians, Munich 1960; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Ann. Fac. Lettere Univ. di Macerata II (1969) 1-217: Rome [2]1983; R. Joly, Christianisme et Philosophie, Brussels 1973; M. Spanneut, Le Stoïcisme et Saint Augustin, in Forma Futuri, Studi M. Pellegrino, Turin 1975, 896-914 (= Spanneut, III); C. Tibiletti, Stoicismo nell'Ad martyras di Tertulliano: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 309-323; G. Jossa, Epitteto e i cristiani, in Id., Giudei, pagani e cristiani, Naples 1977, 81-108; C. Moreschini, Tertulliano tra Stoicismo e Platonismo, in Kerygma und Logos, Festschrift C. Andresen, Göttingen 1979, 367-379; M. Spanneut, Les normes morales du Stoïcisme chez les Pères de l'Église: Studia Moralia 19 (1981) 153-175 (= Spanneut, IV); M. Colish, The Stoic Tradition from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, Leiden 1985; J. Daniélou, Lo stoicismo di Tertulliano, in Id., Le origini del cristianesimo latino, Bologna 1993, 206-222; M. Spanneut, Apatheia: ANRW II, 36 (1994) 4641-4717.

C. Tibiletti - L. Longobardo

STRATEGIUS (Strategus). 7th-c. monk from the laura of Mar Saba, the author of De Persica captivitate, which includes (1) the narration on the siege and fall of *Jerusalem brought about by the Persians in 614 (or 615 acc. to A. Butler, The Arab Conquest of Egypt, Oxford 1902, 61), (2) the account of a certain Thomas, a Christian of Jerusalem, who, after the departure of the enemies, buried the dead and compiled a list of their names, and, as an epilogue, (3) an account of the return of the holy cross decreed by the emperor *Heraclius. Only three fragments of the work remain in Greek: (1) Epistula Zachariae Hierosolymitani, (2) De Persica captivitate opusculum and (3) Narratio in apophthegmatibus (BHG[a] 1448 s.; Marr, Antioh Stratig., 42-44). We have, however, an Arabic version and a *Georgian version, the text of which, with a translation, Garitte published in the CSCO. The name Sṭraṭiki (Στρατηγός or Στρατήγιος) figures in the the title of the Georgian version, although in the cod. Vatic. Arab. 697 discovered by Peeters, the author of the work is listed as an unspecified E(u)stratios: but the difference between the two names could be paleographic (Peeters, La prise de Jérusalem, 84-85). Marr holds that Strategius is to be identified with *Antiochus (CPG 7842-7844), the abbot and not a monk of Mar Saba and the author of the treatise titled Exomologesis (PG 89, 1849-1856). His argument—which appears in the title of his study and which was adopted by I. Phokylides: Ekkesiastikos Pharos 22 (1923) 188-205)—nevertheless appears untenable since the Exomologesis, although drawing on the same events, has a different character from the De Persica captivitate. Given our current state of knowledge, it is also impossible, despite the chronological coincidence, to identify Strategius of Mar Saba with Strategius abbot of the monastery of St. Theodosius cited by *John Moschus (PG 87, 2961).

CPG 7846; PG 86, 3227-3268 and 89, 1849-1856; N. Marr, Antioh Stratig. Plĕnenie Ierusalima Persami V 614 g., St. Petersburg 1909, 42-44; G. Garitte, La prise de Jérusalem par les Perses en 614, CSCO 202/203, Louvain 1960; G. Garitte, Expugnationis Hierosolymae a.d. 614 recensiones arabicae, I: A et B, CSCO 340/341, Louvain 1973; II: C et V, CSCO 347-348, Louvain 1974; P. Peeters, La prise de Jérusalem par les Perses: Mél. de l'Univ. Saint-Joseph 9 (1923-24) 3-42 (= Rech. d'hist. et de philol. orient., I, Brussels 1951, 78-116); Beck 449-450; B. Flusin, Saint Athanase le Perse et l'histoire de la Palestine au début du VII[e] siècle, II. Commentaire, Paris 1992, 129-172 passim; Patrologia V,303-304; B. Pirone, La presa di Gerusalemme nel sermone del monaco Strategio: Studia Orientalia Christiana Collect. 28 (1995) 67-236 (It. tr. of the Arabic text published by Garitte); EPapi 1, 598-603 (Martino papa); LACL 658.

A. Labate

STYLITE – STYLITISM. For the ascetic exercise of stasis ("standing"), various examples can be found in the 4th c. (Peregrinatio Aetheriae 20,6: CSEL 39,65); in the sense of standing on a pillar, non-Christian parallels have been sought (Lucian, De Syria Dea 28-29, Hieropolis, 2nd c. BC). *Simeon Stylites the Elder began this type of life among Christians (d. ca. 459: BS 11,1116-1118), at Telanissos or Telnešin (today Der Sim'an) and then at Qalat Seman, NE of *Antioch and W of Aleppo, where in 413 or 415 he was yearning "to fly toward heaven" and desired to withdraw from the crowd. Simeon set himself up on a series of columns (Gk. stylos), each out in the open, each one higher (the last column would be 16 m [52.49 ft] high). Someone at the bottom of the column was at his service, even for controlling the influx of the pilgrims. From the apology of Simeon, which was outlined by *Theodoret (Hist. Religiosa 26,12), one could argue that this unusual form of asceticism was criticized in religious circles. But this religious practice found numerous imitators in *Syria, *Egypt, *Palestine, *Asia Minor and Greece: *Daniel of Constantinople (d. 493) (BS 4,470-471), *Simeon Stylites the Younger (d. 592) (BS 11,1141-1157), Alypius, near Adrianople in Paphlagonia (7th c.) (BS 1,867-870), Luke the Stylite (d. 979) (BS 8,225-226) and others. There also existed, but rarely, some female stylites (AB 27 [1908] 391-392). The columns varied by height and had a platform on top with a hut for shelter from bad weather and from the heat of the desert. At the bottom of the columns, an admirer or an assistant supplied food to the *ascetic. The stylites dedicated themselves to prayer and the instruction of pilgrims. Many columns that now lie on the ground in Syria still preserve the memory of that form of asceticism. Eustathius of Thessalonica (d. between 1193 and 1198) wrote a tribute to the stylites (Ad stylitam quemdam Thessalonicensem: PG 136, 217-264).

DSp 14, 1267-1275; DIP 9, 245-246; LTK³ 8, 1065; EC 11, 1337-1338; DACL 15, 1697-1718; H. Delehaye, Les saints stylites, Brussels 1923; B. Kötting, Peregrinatio religiosa, Münster 1950, 113-118; P. Peeters, Le tréfonds oriental de l'hagiographie byzantine, Brussels 1950, 93-136; T. Špidlík, CE 13, 750-751; I. Peña - P. Castellana - R. Fernández, Les stylites syriens, Jerusalem-Milan 1975; I. Peña, La straordinaria vita dei monaci siri: secoli IV-VI, Cinisello Balsamo 1990.

T. Špidlík

SUB TUUM PRAESIDIUM. The troparion, known from the *Coptic, *Ambrosian and Roman liturgies, is one of the most ancient prayers addressed to the Virgin *Mary, as confirmed by the Rylands Papyrus 470, discovered in Egypt in 1917, and, based on paleographic examination, dating from the 3rd c. The text transmitted by the papyrus allows the following literal recomposition: "Under your mercy, we take refuge, O Bearer of God; do not reject our entreaties in times of need, but deliver us from danger, you who alone are chaste, you who alone are blessed" (G. Giamberardini, Il "Sub tuum praesidium": Marianum 31 [1969] 330). The troparion has a twofold value: on the historical-liturgical level, it is the most ancient document known thus far with respect to the veneration of the Mother of God during the period before the Council of Ephesus; on the theological level, it records the technical term Theotokos, which pertains to the divine motherhood; the two titles "you who alone are chaste" and "you who alone are blessed" refer to Mary's sanctity, eminence and moral integrity as well as faith in her mediation, which is connected to the statements "under your mercy, we take refuge . . . deliver us from danger." Present in the chief liturgies that go around the coast of the Mediterranean, only the *Byzantine rite has preserved the simplest inflection and is closest to the prayer on the papyrus. Despite its placement in the liturgy (it changes from rite to rite) one can discern a common denominator that consists, in modern rites, in considering it as part of the Marian liturgy, and in the ancient rites, in conveying it with more specific indications for a Marian feast as the antiphon after the office of the gospel. It was probably part of the troparia for the office of the feast of *Epiphany, celebrated in *Egypt since the 3rd c. with Marian emphasis. Regarding the 3rd-c. dating of the prayer, some scholars have posed certain difficulties because of the presence of the term Theotokos, which became common after the Council of Ephesus, but it could have been adopted in the liturgy either before or while theologians were discussing its meaning and the extent of its acceptability.

C.H. Roberts, Catalogue of the Greek and Latin Papyri in the John Rylands Library, III, in Theological and Literary Texts, Manchester 1938, 46-47; F. Mercenier, L'Antienne mariale grecque la plus ancienne: Muséon 52 (1939) 229-233; V. Buffon, L'antica preghiera mariana "Sub tuum praesidium": Mater Ecclesiae 2 (1966) 142-145; P.I. Cecchetti, Il fidente ricordo al materno cuore di Maria. Il "Sub tuum praesidium," primo cenno al culto di Maria: Lateranum 33 (1967) 281-293; G. Giamberardini, Il "Sub tuum praesidium" e il titolo "Theotokos" nella tradizione egiziana: Marianum 31 (1969) 324-362; A. Malo, La plus ancienne prière à Notre Dâme, in De Primordiis cultus mariani, II, Rome 1970, 475-485; H. Quecke, Das "Sub tuum praesidium" in koptischen Horologion: Enchoria 1 (1971) 9-17; Marienlexikon 6, 327-328; H. Förster, Zur ältesten Überlieferung der marianischen Antiphon Sub tuum praesidium: Biblos 44 (1995) 183-192; Sub tuum praesidium, in Fontes. Documenti fondamentali di storia della Chiesa, ed. L. Martínez - P. Guidacci, Cinisello Balsamo 2005, 67-69.

E. Peretto

SUBDEACON. *Cyprian of Carthage normally used the term hypodiaconus (Ep. 9,1; 29,2; 34,4; 36,1; 45,4; 47,2; 69,1). If the term specifies the office, then subdeacons had to be at the service of the deacons (see *diakonia - diaconate) and help in their *liturgical functions; this function could trigger some subdeacons to claim the prerogatives of the deacons. This invasion of their field was fought by the so-called Council of Laodicea. According to the Liber pontificalis, Pope *Fabian (d. 250) divided the city of Rome into seven regions for the seven deacons et fecit VII subdiaconos (1,148 ed. Duchesne). Cyprian often appointed subdeacons with several different functions, among which were bearers of the readings (Ep. 9,1; 20; 36; 45; 7;7; 79); in 251, Pope *Cornelius (d. 253), writing to *Fabius of Antioch, said that in the Roman church there were seven deacons and seven subdeacons (Eus., HE 6,43,11), which was also true in the Eastern Churches (Athan., Ep. 2). It was a minor order at the service of the deacons. In the churches, like the Roman one, who followed the tradition of the seven deacons, in relation to the Seven of the Acts of the Apostles (6:1-6), the office of the subdiaconate was the most important among the minor orders. The so-called Apostolic Tradition* prescribed that subdeacons were not to receive the *laying on of hands (ordination), but were only appointed because "they follow the deacon"—so too the Canons of Hippolytus—while the Apostolic Constitutions required the laying on of hands (8,21,1-4) as opposed to what *Theodore of Mopsuestia said (In Ep. Pauli Com., ed. Swete 1982, II,123-124). According to the prayer of the Constitutions, it seems that their office was to guard the sacred vessels and bring water for the lavabo and washing (8,11). The Council of *Antioch in 341 admitted that subdeacon could be ordained by a *chorbishop (can. 10). The difference in the liturgical rite should be interpreted in the context of the time, but it does not mean that the subdeacons were ordained like the deacons. The Council of *Neocaesarea (314-319) stated that a deacon who had committed a carnal sin before ordination should be relegated to the rank of subdeacon (can. 10); the so-called Council of Laodicea stated that subdeacons should honor the deacons (can. 20) and "must not occupy the place designated for deacons [diaconicon] and touch the sacred vessels" (can. 21) and should not "put on the diaconal stole" and must remain at the doors (can. 22), that "they must not leave even for a short time and devote themselves to prayer" (can. 43); they "cannot distribute the consecrated bread or the cup of blessing" (can. 25). This prohibition sought to prevent any abuse. In *Visigothic *Spain there were subdeacons who could carry the sacred vessels of the altar (Council of *Braga in 561: can. 10; in 572: can. 41). According to that council the subdeacons were to control the doors (can. 43); acc. to the Apostolic Constitutions, however, the subdeacons control the doors where men enter, while the deaconesses control those of the women (2,25,26). From this it seems that the office corresponded to *doorkeeper in the Latin Church.

The decretals of some of the popes record that the subdeacons belonged to the lower clergy (Siricius, Ep. 1,11: PL 13,1144; Sylvester, Ep. 15: PL 8,848; Ep. 7: PL8,835; Innocence, Ep. 37,5: PL 20,604; Zosimus, Ep. 11,1: PL 20,642; Boniface, Ep. 1,2: PL20,751; Leo, Ep. 1,5: PL 54,596s; Pelagius I, Ep. 72 [Gassó Batle 184]; Conc. Cart. a. 410, c. 28 [ed. Munier, CL 148, p. 143]). Pellergini notes that "with *Gregory the Great one witnesses a progressive change in the functions and role of the subdeacon, also from a liturgical point of view. The Council of *Rome in 595 forbade the Roman deacons, honored by the ministerium sacri ordinis, to sing at liturgical ceremonies and entrusted this task to the subdeacons and minores ordines" (p. 81). Meanwhile, *celibacy was also imposed upon the subdeacons. As early as 419 in *Carthage, it was established that even married subdeacons, like other members of the higher clergy, had ab uxoribus continere (Munier, Concilia Africae, CCL 149, pp. 108; 126; 142). The Council of *Toledo (397-400) did not allow subdeacon widowers to remarry (can. 4). The Council of *Gerona (517) prohibited cohabitation "with her who was his wife and who now has become his sister" (can. 6). The Council of *Vannes (461-491) spoke of those who cannot marry (can. 11). The Council of Orleans (538) prohibited taking a wife (can. 2). The Council of *Tours in 567 noted that "the deacons and subdeacons, certainly not all but many, are suspected by the people of living with their wives" (can. 20); it also added: "In truth . . . if a subdeacon is found with his subdeaconess [= his wife], he should be excommunicated for an entire year and be deposed from every clerical office; however, he should be informed that he can participate in worship together with the laity, and, with permission, take his place among the readers in the choir of singers" (can. 20; cf. Council of Auxerre of 561-605, cans. 20-21). The Council of Toledo in 527 allowed the ordination, at the age of twenty-one, of a subdeacon who promised to be chaste. The Constitum Silvestri, anonymously written about the year 550, required celibacy of subdeacons (ch. 8: PL 8,835; cf. PL 8,836). Popes *Pelagius and Gregory the Great (d. 604) required the imposition of celibacy, or continent marriage ad similitudinem apostolicae sedis, upon subdeacons in Sicily and Calabria. The prohibition of the Roman practice was indirectly confirmed by the Council *in Trullo in 692 (can. 13), which permitted married deacons and subdeacons living together in married life.

The emperor *Constantine also exempted subdeacons from munera curialia (CTh 16,27 del 330); they could keep their income if there was the consent of the municipalis curia for their entry into the clergy (CTh 12,1,49 of 361), but if they had entered illegally, then they were forced to take the munera with which they entered (CTh 12,163 of 399). This last law was issued at Constantinople and concerned, for the moment, Eastern clergy. Sometimes even after decades they could be obliged to return to being members of the curia municipale. In 535 *Justinian ruled that in the church of Hagia Sophia in *Constantinople the number of subdeacons should not exceed ninety (Novella 1,1). *Isidore of Seville summarized the ministry of subdeacons thus: they receive offerings from the people, bring the sacred vessels to the deacons at the altar; they must be casti et continentes; they do not receive the laying on of hands at ordination, but only the paten and the chalice from the hands of the bishop and from the archdeacon, the water jug, tray and manutergio (De off. 2,10: PL 83,790s). The Gallican Liturgy contains the rite and blessing of the subdeacon with the bestowal of the empty chalice and paten (PL 72,319).

The ministry of the subdiaconate continues in the Eastern Churches; and the subdeacon serves the bishop. In the Latin Catholic Church, it was abolished in 1972 by Pope Paul VI after Vatican II (Ministeria quaedam: Enchiridion Vaticanum 4,1749-1770).

DTC 14,2459-2466; DACL 15,1619-1626; J. Roberkof, Le sous-diaconat est-il un sacrement?: Revue augustinienne 15 (1909) 86-105; M. Andrieu, Les ordres mineurs dans l'ancien rituel romain: RevSR 5 (1925) 232-274; J.G. Davies, Deacons, Deaconesses and Minor Orders in the Patristic Period: JEH 14 (1963) 1-15; J. Lécuyer, Les ordres mineurs en question: Maison-Dieu 102 (1970) 97-107; R. Gryson, Les origines des célibat ecclésiastique du premier au septième siècle, Gembloux 1970, 194-196; R. E. Reynolds, The Ordinals of Christ from Their Origins to the Twelfth Century, Berlin-New York 1978; R. Seagraves, Pascentes cum disciplina. A Lexical Study of the Clergy in the Cyprianic Correspondence, Fribourg 1993, 133-141; T. Citrini, La questione teologia dei ministeri, in I laici nella Chiesa, Turin 1986, 57-72; R.E. Reynolds. The Subdiaconate as a Sacred and Superior Order, in Clerics in the Early Middle Ages. Hierarchy and Image, Aldershot 1999, ch. 4; R. E. Reynolds, Clerical Orders in the Early Middle Ages: Duties and Ordination Ashgate 1999; T. Sardella, Alcune considerazioni in margine al matrimonio dei suddiaconi in Calabria e Sicilia (Greg., epist. 1,42), in La Sicilia nella tarda antichità e nell'alto medioevo. Religione e società, ed. R. Barcellona and S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 1999,73-85; S. Heid, Celibacy in the Early Church: The Beginnings of a Discipline of Obligatory Continence for Clerics in East and West, San Francisco 2000; P. Pellergini, Militia clericatus, monachici ordines. Istituzioni ecclesiastiche e società in Gregorio Magno, Catania 2008.

A. Di Berardino

ŠUBḤALMARAN. Polemical and monastic author of the Eastern church who wrote at the end of 6th and the beginning of the 7th c. He was the metropolitan of Karkā d-Bēt Slōk at the time of the catholicos Gregory I (first decade of the 7th c.), but after Gregory's death he was sent into exile by *Chosroes II (590–627). The medieval author ʿAbdīšō bar Brīkā (d. 1318) attributes to him some treatises against Gabriel of Šingar, the influential doctor of the court and a proponent of miaphysite theology, a collection of ascetic sentences that follows the example of the Evagrian Centuries, and a Book of Gifts, a critical edition of which D.J. Lane has prepared for CSCO.

Baumstark, 133; Patrologia V, 482-483; G. Troupeau, Une page retrouvée du "Livre des Parties" de Šubḥalmaran, évêque de Beit Seluk: OCA 205 (1978) 57-61; D.J. Lane, Mar Šubḥalmaran's Book of Gifts: An Example of a Syriac Literary Genre, in IV Symposium Syriacum (OCA 229), Rome 1987, 411-417; Id., A Nestorian Creed: The Creed of Šubḥalmaran, in V Symposium Syriacum (OCA 236), Rome 1990, 155-162; Id., Admonition and Analogy: 13 Chapter from Šubḥalmaran: ARAM 5 (1993) 277-284; Šubḥalmaran, The Book of Gifts, ed. D.J. Lane, CSCO 612-613, Scriptores Syri 236-237, Louvain 2004.

K. den Biesen

SUBORDINATIONISM. This term refers to the strong movement in the theology of the 2nd and 3rd c. that regarded Christ, inasmuch as he was the Son of God, as inferior to the Father. At the basis of this tendency were passages from the gospels in which Christ himself declared his inferiority (e.g., Mk 10:18; 13:32; Jn 14:28), and this was developed primarily by the Logoschristologie. This theology, in fact, likewise under the influence of *Middle Platonism, regarded Christ, the logos and the divine wisdom through a connection and mediation between the transcendent divinity of the Father and the world, and therefore in a subordinate position with respect to it. When early Christian theologians began to include the *Holy Spirit in their understanding of the *Trinity, as in the case of *Origen, the Spirit was in turn regarded as inferior to the Son. Subordinationist tendencies are evident esp. in the writings of such theologians as *Justin Martyr, *Tertullian, Origen and *Novatian; but also in the writings of *Irenaeus of Lyons, which are void of speculations on the nature of the Trinity. When treating Jn 14:28, e.g., Irenaeus had no difficulty in regarding Christ as inferior to the Father.

In the controversy with the *monarchians, subordinationism tended to become radicalized because the inferiority of the Son was emphasized in order to better highlight the distinction of the Son from the Father, which they denied. This was the case with *Dionysius of Alexandria and esp. *Arius: although the moderate subordinationism of his predecessors did not call into question the idea that Christ was the true Son of God and a participant in his divine nature, Arius believed that the Son was created, more than generated, and foreign to the Father's nature and was, therefore, of a second order of the divine nature. In order to respond to this radical subordinationism, the anti-Arian theologians, esp. *Athanasius and then the Cappadocians, eliminated every trace of subordinationism between the three divine persons and considered them equal by nature and dignity.

W. Marcus, Der Subordinationimus als historisches Phänomen, Munich 1963; LTK³ 9, 1075-1076; A. Grillmeier, Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne. De l'âge apostolique au concile de Chalcédonie, Paris ²2003.

M. Simonetti

SUCCENSUS (d. ca. 440). The bishop of Diocaesarea (Ouzoundja-Bourdj) in Isauria (R. Devreesse, Le patriarcat d'Antioche, Paris 1945, 147). His death dates back to 440. After the acceptance of the "symbol of union" (433), which was a compromise with respect to the 12 anathemas issued by *Cyril of Alexandria, among the Cyrillians there arose difficulties that Cyril himself sought to dissipate with some epistolary interventions (A. Rehrmann, Die Christologie des hl. Cyrillus von Alexandrien, Hildesheim 1901, 131-132: Fliche-Martin IV,247ff.). Among his correspondents during this occasion was Succensus, from whose letters have remained some fragments preserved among the writings of Cyril and two extracts in *Syriac that Van Roey discovered in a MS from the British Museum (Add. 17197). The bishop reveals the dissatisfaction of those who are around him, but he does not disclose his personal opinion. In the *catenae for the book of *Genesis, three fragments have come down under Succensus's name: they pertain to 4:7b (Cain and the Lord), 22:5b-6 and 22:7-9 (the sacrifice of Isaac).

CPG 6488-6489; ACO I, I,6, 158^{8-10}, 155^{9-10}, 160^{14-17}, 161^{19-25}; ACO I,4, 119^{23-33}, $237^{8-9/37-39}$, 238^{20-30}, 239^{9-14}; ACO I,5, 299^{37}, $300^{2/30-32}$, 301, 302^{10-12}; A. van Roey, Deux fragments inédits des lettres de Succensus, évêque de Diocésarée à Saint Cyrille d'Alexandrie: Museón 55 (1942) 87-92; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois, ST 201, Vatican City 1959, 180; Catenae Graecae in Genesim et in Exodum, ed. F. Petit, CCG 2, Turnhout-Leuven 1977, 162; Patrologia V, 189; F. Petit, La chaine sur la Genèse, 4 vols., Leuven 1992-96, II, 15ff.; III, 421 (index).

A. Labate

SUCCESSION, APOSTOLIC. In their role as receivers of a unique salvific historical revelation, the apostles could not choose their successors directly, although succession in the "apostolic office" had to take into consideration the responsibility to proclaim and preserve the gospel and to implement it in community life. The appeal to continuity and succession in the proclamation and the explanation of the normative gospel, attested to through an apostle or the apostles, is implicit in 1 Pet and is explicitly affirmed by *Paul in the Acts of the Apostles and practiced by the author of the epistle to the Ephesians. The notion of apostolic succession is an element of the system developed in the ancient church in order to ensure fidelity to the origins, the gospel and to Jesus Christ; this is the meaning of the adjective apostolic. In this system the notion of diadochē completes and strengthens the notion of ministry and ensures apostolic authority. One thus explains why ecclesiastical preaching, transmitted by the apostles through the succession, also subsists in the present within the churches (Orig., Princ. praef. 2). This succession, which seems to be essentially doctrinal, assumes an institutional aspect because it pertains not only to guaranteeing the truth of doctrine but also of ensuring the safe path found in the ecclesiastical institution.

Josephus used for the succession of Jewish high priests the same terminology that was later used by Christians to refer to the succession of the apostles; but these were common Greek terms for these types of relations. The verb diadechomai and the noun diadochē were used in the same way for the succession of high priests, the teachers in the Hellenistic philosophical schools and in places of state administration. 1 Clement (42,1-4; 44,1-3) speaks of the succession of presbyters to their predecessors in the office in the local church. The weight of his argument is based on the principle of the hierarchy established by divine law. This idea of succession was barely mentioned in the writings of *Ignatius of Antioch, although he regarded the divine mission as the foundation of every episcopal authority. For Ignatius, the authority of the apostles finds its background beyond the Christian structure of his time. In the interval between the death of *Paul and the writing of the book of Revelation and, later, to the age of Ignatius and *Polycarp, the passage was achieved from the missionary apostolate to the local bishop. Each community has a college of local administrators and, as a result, it is particularly the *eucharistic celebration that renders it, among other reasons, monarchical. Although the office of the apostles, as immediate witnesses of the *incarnation and the first doers of Christ's will, was unique, the commission to the apostles contained a mission that went beyond the time of their earthly existence.

With that, the idea of apostolic succession remained objectively established. The Catholic Church was distinguished from the majority of the early *heresies precisely because it did not abandon the doctrinal and illuminative tradition into the hands of self-appointed spiritual guides, teachers or prophets, but possessed a group of leaders. The succession of teachers in the literature of the Hellenistic philosophical schools coincided with the idea of Christian succession at the moment in which the transmission of doctrine was emphasized.

In the 2nd c., the concepts of tradition and succession assumed new theological weight and acquired their technical meaning. One cannot prove that the idea of doctrinal transmission appeared first in the context of *gnosticism and its free magisterium (Ptolemy, in Epiph., Haer. 33,7,9); nevertheless, it acquired the typically Catholic form when it was connected to the succession of monarchical bishops. *Hegesippus seems to have been a disseminator of this model. He provided a list of names, as did the gnostics (*Basilides, in Hipp., Philosoph. 7,20,1; *Valentinus, in Clem., Strom. 7,106,4), but he did so in a succession in the form of a definite chain from the monarchical episcopal office. In so doing, he seems to have conceived of the history of the heresies as a pseudo-apostolic succession (Eus., HE 4,22,5-6). In defense of the faith of the church, he specifically used the principle of succession (Eus., HE 4,22,3), and, having arrived at *Rome, he composed a list of bishops of this see until *Anicetus (Epiph., Haer. 27,6), although not qualifying the episcopal successions as "apostolic" (Eusebius did so, however, indirectly, HE 4,8,2). Irenaeus fought on the same anti-gnostic front and could have taken the idea of succession from Hegesippus. Against the gnostic doctrine of the esoteric tradition, he forwarded the argument that if the apostles had known the hidden mysteries in order to teach them to those who were perfect, they certainly would have transmitted them to those upon whom the church established its missionary program. Moreover, he did not separate the pastoral function of governing from doctrinal responsibility (HE 3,3,1). For this reason, it is necessary to listen to the word of the church's presbyters, because they are successors of the apostles, and with the episcopal succession they have received the charism of the truth. This rule of faith was maintained in the church under the action of the *Holy Spirit. Irenaeus's most original contribution concerned the role of the Holy Spirit, who, as the source of the truth and the life that has emanated from Christ, flows only in the catholic and hierarchical church. In Adv. haer. III,3,1, he affirmed that the truth can be known by all people in all the churches through the succession of bishops, the guardians of the apostolic tradition. Because it would be too long to enumerate the successions of all the churches, he chose the church of *Rome (III,3,2-3). It is necessary to remain united to those who have not separated from the original succession (IV,26,5; 33,8). For this reason, the continuity of the true faith and the apostolic succession are inseparable. Likewise for *Hippolytus, who from the doctrinal point of view was a disciple of Irenaeus, the creator of the ecclesiastical life is properly speaking the Spirit with his gifts; but he equally emphasized that the bishops were those who, as successors of the apostles, have received the Spirit.

In the Trad. Apost. 3, the bishop is seen in continuity with the apostolic ministry. For *Tertullian (Praescr. 32,1; Adv. Marc. IV,5,3; IV,29), the uninterrupted succession of bishops is the convincing sign of the apostolic character of the churches. On the whole, he perceived it to be more a succession of apostolic churches than apostolic bishops (Praescr. 20,5-6). After having become a *Montanist, he abandoned this idea (De Pudic. 21,7). After Tertullian, the appeal to apostolic succession lost its force in Christian apologetics. In the writings of *Cyprian, the theme of apostolic succession became a commonplace: Ep. 66,4; 75,16 (*Firmilian); Sent. Ep. 79 (Clarus of Mascula). Cyprian emphasizes the order of the bishops as successors (Ep. 45,3) and its relationship to the church in its totality (Ep. 33,1). *Clement of Alexandria used the concept of succession starting from the apostles, but he applied it to the teachers who teach the apostolic doctrine (Strom. VI, 61,3), because he was interested in the true gnostic, the perfect Christian (Strom. VI,106,2; VII,77,4). Facing the challenge of the heretics, however, he also emphasized the priority of the ecclesiastical tradition (Strom. VII, 104,1). In the writings of *Origen, the vocabulary with respect to succession seems to be limited (Princ. praef. 2; IV,22; In Mt. comm., ser. 46); among the apostles and the then-contemporary preaching, he inserted the succession in the church. His perspective is the expression of a parity between presbyters and teachers whose function, however, he distinguishes (Hom. in Lev. VI,6). Apostolic succession was a theme dear to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE I,1,1; III,3,3; 4,11; VII,32,32; VIII, praef.). It is the guarantee of tradition (V,6,5; VI,9,1). He mentioned the succession established by Hegesippus that went until Anicetus (IV,22,3), and the one established by *Irenaeus of Lyons that went until *Eleutherus (V,5,9–VI, 5). He applied the common term of succession also to the teachers of the *school of Alexandria

(V,10,1; 11,2; VI,6; 29,4) and to the same Greek philosophical schools (VII,32,6). His interest is more historical than doctrinal; but what remains chiefly interesting for him is the succession of bishops starting from the apostles. Very often he mentions the succession of the bishops in the four chief sees, on which he established the majority of Christian information for his Chronicle. Neither in the writings of Irenaeus nor Eusebius were the apostles inserted into the list of bishops. But the identification of the episcopate with the apostolate, which is found in the writings of Cyprian (Ep. 3,3; 67,4), continued to appear sporadically in the East (Socr., HE VI,8); in the West there was a common respect for the Roman see. *Leo the Great (Serm. 4,2-3; 3,3-4; Ep. 45,2; Serm. 5.4) expressed the crucial meaning of the Petrine succession in the Roman see: *Peter as the chief of the apostles and the primate of the universal church. *Gregory the Great (Ep. 2,48; 3,30; 7,40; 9,59) collected all this teaching in the principle of papal authority, although he did not have Leo's proper legal language.

G. Dix, The Ministry in the Early Church, in K.E. Kirk, The Apostolic Ministry, London 1946, 183-303 (Fr. tr. of Dix's text, Neuchâtel 1955); H. von Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliches Vollmacht in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Tübingen 1953 (Eng. tr. London 1969); E. Molland, Irenaeus of Lugdunum and the Apostolic Succession: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 1 (1950) 12-28; Id., Le développement de l'idée de succession apostolique: RHPhR 34 (1954) 1-29; A. Ehrhard, The Apostolic Succession in the First Two Centuries of the Church, London 1953; B. Botte, À propos de l'Adversus Haereses III,3,2 de Saint Irénée: Irénikon 30 (1957) 156-163; R.P.C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church, London 1962; A.M. Javierre, El tema literario de la suceśión, Zürich 1963; G.G. Blum, Tradition und Sukzession, Berlin-Hamburg 1963; O. Perler, L'évêque, représentant du Christ, selon les documents des premiers siècles, in Y. Congar - B.D. Dupuy, L'épiscopat et l'Église universelle, Paris 1964 (It. tr. Rome 1965) 31-66; H. Küng, Structures of the Church, Eng. tr., New York [2]1982; J. Cobson, Ministre de J.C. ou le sacerdoce de l'Évangile, Paris 1966; A. Lemaire, Les ministères aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1971; R.F. Evans, One and Holy: The Church in Latin Patristic Thought, London 1972; Mysterium Salutis, Brescia 1972, VII, 639-713; J. Finkenzeller, Zur Diskussion über das Verständnis der apostolischen Sukzession: Theol. Prakt. Quart. 123 (1975) 321-340; M.M. Garijo, La suceśión apostólica en los tres primeros siglos: Diálogo ecúmenico 2 (1976) 179-231; TRE 4, 430-466; A. Vögtle, Exegetische Reflexionen zur Apostolizität des Amtes und zur Amtssukzession, in Offenbarungsgeschehen und Wirkungsgeschichte. Neutestamentliche Beiträge, Freiburg i.Br. 1985, 221-279; R. Trevijano, Ministerio y Regla de fe: Teología del Sacerdocio 21 (Burgos 1990) 81-126; A. Benoit, Ministère et succession apostolique aux trois premiers siècles: TS 21 (1990) 127-148; A. Brent, Diogenes Laertius and the Apostolic Succession: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 44 (1993) 367-389; J. Ysebaert, Die Amtsterminologie im Neuen Testament und in der Alten Kirche, Breda 1994.

R. Trevijano

SUETONIUS (70–ca. 140). Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus was a learned Roman historian. His treatise De vita Caesarum, a work dated around the year 121, in which he collected the biographies of the first twelve Roman emperors, from Julius Caesar to *Domitian, contains some references to Christians. The first is found in the Life of Claudius 25: Suetonius reports that the emperor decreed the expulsion of the Jews from Rome because they were continually in an uproar over a certain Chrestus, understood as a proper name. The Roman emperors incorrectly perceived this title to be a proper name. Suetonius, therefore, misunderstood the facts: the disagreements that arose within the Jewish community of *Rome, between the Jews who were faithful to the tradition and those who had passed over to the new faith in Christ, were understood by him as confrontations incited by the unruly activity of Chrestus. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome is also attested by Acts 18:2. The year this took place, however, is uncertain; Cassius Dio believed that this event was to be dated to the year 41 (Historiae Romanae 60,6); *Orosius, in 49 (Historiae adversum paganos 7,6,15). Another indication, this time directed toward the Christians, is found in the Life of Nero 16: here the historian reports that the emperor condemned the Christians to death, a people given to a new and reprehensible superstition. The information is preserved and integrated by Tacitus, Annales 15,44, who, in a more circumscribed way, narrates that *Nero, to avert from himself the suspicion of having burned Rome, accused a group already disliked by the population, namely the Christians, the followers of Chrestus. Probable references to some Christians can be found in the Life of Domitian: at ch. 10, the condemnation of *Acilius Glabrio to exile, who was guilty of not having thought up better novelties; at ch. 15, Suetonius narrates the sentencing to death of *Flavius Clemens, a relative of *Domitian, on the basis of an insubstantial charge that Suetonius, however, does not explain. Cassius Dio associates the charge of atheism with a similar charge of drifting toward Jewish customs, charges that can lead one to think that he possibly converted to Christianity (Hist. Rom. 67,13-14). According to the testimony of Cassius Dio, the wife of Flavius Clemens, Flavia Domitilla, was condemned to forced confinement at Pandataria, modern-day Ventotene. *Eusebius of Caesarea mentions Flavia *Domitilla, niece of Flavius Clemens, who was exiled to Ponza for being a Christian (HE 3,18,4).

G. Howard, The Beginning of Christianity in Rome: A Note on Suetonius, Life of Cladius 25.4: Restoration Quarterly 24 (1981) 175-177; P. Carrara, I pagani di fronte ai cristianesimo: Testimo- nianze dei secoli I e II, Florence 1984, 69-73; J. Gascou, Suétone historien, Rome 1984; BBKL 20 (2001) 503-519; R.E. van Voorst, Jesus Outside the New Testament: An Introduction to the Ancient Evidence, Grand Rapids, MI 2000; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan 2004.

G. Caruso

SUICIDE. In Greek and Latin a specific term does not exist for referring to the modern concept of suicide. The Greek term autoktonia ("to yield to death") is only found in the ps.-*Clementine literature (Hom. 12,14). The Latin term suicidium, from which derives the Italian word suicidio (Span. suicidio, Fr. suicide; Eng. suicide) is late medieval (in Latin it only signifies the killing of a pig). The Latin expression was mors voluntaria (and thus the Greek equivalent), but there exists such terms as homicidium, parricidium. The moralists used the terminology "direct suicide," "indirect active suicide," "indirect passive suicide" (a death sentence inflicted by others and accepted for the sake of values and that is impossible to avoid). The *pagan world discussed the legitimacy and value of suicide. Some did not recognize it: Plato (Phaedo 61d; 67 and 80) allowed for it only in cases of an incurable sickness (Laws 11,873), as did the *Platonists *Plotinus and *Porphyry. Aristotle condemned the practice (Ethics Nic. 3,11, p. 1116, 10-16), although it was permitted by the Cynics; the *Stoics, although condemning it in general, accepted it if it was justified. Death in battle became glorious for one's own homeland and granted nobility to the person, acc. to a statement from Horace: dulce et decorum est pro patria mori (Odes III,2,13). The reasons for suicide were primarily reasons of honor and shame (defeat in battle to avoid a worse death; for women whose chastity had been violated). For a person sentenced to death, suicide was preferable. In the Roman tradition there existed the devotio, a ritual and religious death to earn the favor of the gods for their army. The zealots of Masada, in order not to wind up as prisoners, committed mass suicide. In the 1st c., for some people suicide was a superior way to die; people even sought advice from their friends on how to commit suicide. At times, people sought to dissuade the person who was contemplating suicide. Certain authors lauded suicide (Lucan, Pharsalia 4.478-480; 4.517-520; Epictetus, 1,24-25). Famous suicides, as a sign of freedom, included Cato, Brutus, Cassius and Seneca (Seneca, De ira 3,15.4). Suicide, however, was not approved by all people, as Seneca himself acknowledged (Ep. 70,14; cf., Pliny, Ep. 1,12; Martial 2,80). The jurist Marcian considered suicide to be a wicked act (Digest 43,21,3,6). The Romans, moreover, had a divided and complex attitude toward suicide. In any case, it had to be rational: the reasons were determinative for choosing to carry it out such as sickness, suffering, the death sentence, shame, loyalty etc. (see Cicero, Tusc. Disp. 1,74; Pliny, Ep. 1,12; 6,24; Seneca, Ep. 30,2; Tacitus, Histories 2,49; Tacitus, Ann. 13,30). The taedium vitae was a good reason, and one's inheritance was preserved (Digest 3,2,11,3; 28,3,6,7; 29,5,1,23; 48,21,3). Psychological motivations were not taken into consideration.

Christians were opposed to suicide from the beginning. Certain Christian movements were radical and considered the testimony of martyrdom essential. The *Montanists sought *martyrdom as a true form of Christian life because Christ was glorified in it (Tertull., De fuga 9,4). Even the *Marcionite *gnostics, although professing a different theology, desired martyrdom as an expression of disregard for the body and the Demiurge (Eus., HE 5,16,21). We know of the sect of the *Patriciani, which, acc. to *Filaster, were instructed by their founder, the Roman *Patricius, that the human body was not created by God but the devil; they therefore disregarded it, even to the point of suicide (De haer. 62: CSEL 38, 32; see Aug., De haer. 61; Aug., Contra adv. legis 11,12,40). The Praedestinatus (61: PL 53,608) adds that they, at times, asked others to kill them and that the sect was widespread in *Mauretania and *Numidia, subsequently followed by the *Donatists (see also Ambrosiaster, In I Ep. Tim. 4: PL 17, 499). Certain Donatists sought death in various ways and were then venerated by their coreligionists (Ep. 185,14: CSEL 57, 13; C. Gaud. 1,26,29; 27,31; C. Petil. 2,183).

Connected with suicide was voluntary martyrdom, which could take on various forms acc. to the various moments and historical contexts: rejection of flight, provocation, offering oneself voluntarily, collaborating without offering any gesture of resistance, procuring one's death. It was not always easy to distinguish clearly between martyrdom and suicide. Jesus taught that the giving of one's life for one's friends was the greatest sign of love (Jn 15:13); the gospel of *John insisted on affirming that Christ's death was voluntary (Jn 10:17-18). The act of Christians seeking death from their persecutors was strongly discouraged, because it put one at risk of denying the faith. *Clement of Alexandria expressed the common belief of the church when he said: "We also criticize those who run around seeking after death: in fact, there are some people—though not belonging to us, but sharing only with us a common name—who hasten to hand themselves over, unhappy and desirous of death for hatred of the Creator of the world. We call them 'suicides,' and maintain that their death, although they are executed by order of the authorities, is not a martyrdom" (Stromata IV,17,1-2; see also IV,4,16; IV,10,76; VII,11,66; see *Cyprian of Carthage, Ep. 11,7,3; 13,4,3; 14,2; 19,1; 81,4). Martyrdom required spiritual preparation, and not everyone possessed it, another reason for discouraging one from offering oneself voluntarily or from provoking the authorities. In any case, martyrs drew admiration because the *pagans, who were present at the trials, were shocked by the resolve of Christians when undergoing death, and at times they converted to Christianity (*Justin Martyr, Dial. 110; 2 Apol. 12; Passio Perp. 17,3; *Hippolytus, Comm. on Daniele 2,38). Pagans knew of the search or at least the great openness of Christians toward martyrdom. They criticized it as an irrational and foolish choice because, as *Celsus wrote: "You have been overcome by an unhealthy foolishness, and you allow yourselves to be crucified" (Origen, Against Celsus 7,40; see 2,45; 8,65); "you abandon [the body] to torture as if it were something without value" (ibid., 8,49; see Marcus Aurelius, Meditations 9,3,2; see G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 54, 106, 116, 190).

There were cases of voluntary death, sought or rather procured, in specific circumstances. *Eusebius of Caesarea mentions various incidents of this sort: during the *Decian persecution, *Apollinia, threatened with being burned alive, threw herself into the fire (HE 6,41,7); and an Antiochene mother counseled her daughters to commit voluntary death by throwing themselves into the Orontes River rather than being disgraced by the soldiers (HE 8,12): Domnina, their mother, and her two daughters Bernice and Prosdoke. Eusebius adds that many preferred death to the cruelty of the ungodly (HE 8,12,2); he alludes to *Pelagia, without mentioning her. The case of these women became well known because even St. Thomas Aquinas mentioned it as an objection to martyrdom. *Prudentius spoke of the martyr Massa Candida (*Africa), who threw herself into a boiling pot of lime to avoid sacrificing to the idols (Peristephanon 13,76-87).

The cult of these voluntary martyrs was accepted by the Christian community and celebrated by preachers (H. Delehaye, Les origines, 230ff.), such as *Eusebius of Emesa (E.M. Buytaert, Eusèbe d'Emèse. Discours conservés en latin, 1, Louvain 1953, 151-174); *John Chrysostom (PG 50, 579-585) and *Ambrose on two occasions (De virg. 3,7,33-34: PL 16, 229; Ep. 37: PL 16,1093). *Jerome, while condemning suicide, affirmed that "it is not permissible to commit suicide under persecution, except in cases where the loss of chastity is threatened" (In Ion. com. 1,12: PL 25,1129; SC 3,72). For *Augustine, martyrdom is a gift from God; therefore, every trace of suicide should be rejected (De patientia 13,10). Handing oneself over to death is not permissible for fear of martyrdom or to wash away shame, because sin only exists in the soul (Civ. Dei 1,19 and 28), nor is it permissible for fear of sin (Civ. Dei 1,25 and 27) or for the fear of not achieving salvation. If suicide is also prohibited even after having undergone violence, so much more is it not permissible for fear of a possible uncertain sexual violation (Civ. Dei 1,18; De morib. ecc. 17,55). Augustine admired the courage and the resolve of these persons, even though he refrained from giving his judgment on specific cases: "Those who have killed themselves, if perhaps they are to be admired for their magnanimity, are not to be praised for the soundness of their judgment" (Civ. Dei 1,22,1). Augustine regarded every suicide, even the one that could possibly be considered a voluntary martyrdom, a homicide and therefore always to be condemned. "But this we affirm, this we maintain, this we every way pronounce to be right, that we ought not to commit suicide, for this is to escape suffering in time by plunging into that of eternity; that we ought not to do so because of another's sins, for this is to escape a guilt which could not defile us, by incurring a great guilt of our own; that we ought not to do so on because of own past sins, for we have all the more need of this life that these sins may be redeemed by repentance; that none of us should put an end to this life to obtain that better life we look for after death, for those who die by their own hand have no better life after death" (Civ. Dei 1,26). The idea that a violation of chastity was a sin was so widespread that Augustine fought against it, setting forth the idea that sin exists only in the consent of the will and not in the physicality of the act. Purity is a virtue of the soul, but not a physical good like beauty and health: "If it is then a good of the soul, it is not lost even if the body undergoes sexual violence. Even if the good of a holy continence does not consent to the contamination of fleshly desires, the body is also made holy" (Civ. Dei 1,18). Augustine also had in mind the case of virgins and the women violated and raped at the time of the sack of *Rome by *Alaric in 410. As a way to prove their own innocence, some of them wanted to commit suicide for the dishonor and shame they underwent. For Augustine, virtue is a spiritual good and not bodily impurity independent of the will, because personal consent is necessary for each sin (Civ. Dei 1,19). With respect to the authors cited, Augustine had a more spiritual understanding of chastity, because the fault is in the will which allows one to commit evil.

In subsequent times, suicide was considered a crimen, therefore the person who had attempted suicide but was unsuccessful was still punished with death. This idea is very ancient because it was already formulated for the first time by the Roman jurist Herrenius Modestinus for the case of an attempted suicide that was not done because of a serious problem. The reason given was that if someone sine causa sibi manus intulit, puniendus est: qui enim sibi non pepercit, multo minus alii parcet (Digest 48.21.3.6).

E. Renan, Marc-Aurèle, Paris 1891, 57-67; H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels 1912; B. Kötting, Martyrium und Provokation, in Kerygma und Logos. Festschrift für C. Andresen zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. M. Ritter, Göttingen 1979, 329-336; Y. Grisé, Le suicide dans la Rome antique, Paris 1982; C. Nardi, Il martirio volontario nelle omelie di Giovanni Crisostomo sulle martiri antiochene: Ho Theologos 1 (1983) 207-278; P. Veyne (ed.), Histoire de la vie privée, 1, De l'Empire romaine à l'an mil, Paris 1985, 172; M. Griffin, Philosophy, Cato and Roman Suicide: Greece & Rome 33 (1986) 64-77, 330-337 (dedicated esp. to the Stoic school); Enciclopedia Virgiliana IV, 1065-1066; J.L. Voisin, L'éducation de la mort volontaire à Rome, in Id. (ed.), Sociabilité, pouvoirs et société, Rouen 1987, 91-97; P. Baudet, L'opinion de saint Augustin sur le suicide, in P. Ranson, Saint Augustin, dossier conçu et dirigé, Lausanne-Paris 1988, 125-152; A.J.L. van Hoof, From Autothanasia to Suicide: Self-Killing in Classical Antiquity, London 1990 (CPh 1993, 173-176); A Noble Death, Suicide and Martyrdom Among Christians and Jews in Antiquity, ed. A.J. Droge - J.D. Tabor, San Francisco 1992; G. Minois, Histoire du suicide. La société occidentale face à la mort volontaire, Paris 1995; P. Plass, The Game of Death in Ancient Rome: Arena Sport and Political Suicide, Madison, WI 1995; P. Buc, Martyre et ritualité dans l'Antiquité tardive. Horizons de l'écriture médiévale des rituels: Annales - Histoire, Sciences sociales 52 (1997) 63-92; T. Hill, Ambitiosa Mors: Suicide and the Self in Ancient Rome, New York 2004.

A. Di Berardino

SUIDAS (Sudas). Anonymous lexicographical Byzantine compilation from the end of the 10th c.; Sudas, however, does not indicate the name of the author, who is unknown, but the title of the monumental lexicon. Moreover, this title is written as "Suidas" or "Sudas," acc. to historical or etymological preference. The compilation includes nearly 30,000 entries; for this reason it has the character of an encyclopedia more than a lexicon. Under numerous entries, it addresses questions of secular and sacred history; it provides information on writers of classical and Christian antiquity. The historical information is important and abundant for authors and deeds either unknown or barely mentioned by other sources; the numerous citations allow scholars to reconstruct or fill in literary works that have been lost or are fragmentary. In order to complete this heavily compilatory work, the author used, for the grammatical and etymological part, the lexicons of his time, one of which was probably owed to *Photius, which contained scholia on the writings of Homer, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Herodotus, Thucydides and *Gregory of Nazianzus; for the historical part, the author used the *Byzantine chronicles, esp. from the collection of Constantine Porphyrogenitus; for the biographical part, the author used various biographies, the Epitome of *Hesychius of Miletus, the lives of Diogenes Laertius etc; for the philosophical part, he used commentaries on the writings of Aristotle, Plato etc. He took much from the authors extant at this time. The work's value is not uniform: it is not very important for the lexical and scientific part, but it is in the historical-literary portion. The author has methodological flaws and uncritically places the information in a rather confused order.

Suidas, PG 117, 1193-1424; A. Adler, Lexicographi graeci, 5 vols., Leipzig 1928-38; P. Maas, Der Titel des Suidas: ByzZ 32 (1932) 1; F. Dölger, Der Titel des sogenannten Suidaslexikons: Sit. Bayer. Ak. Wiss. 6 (1936) 1-37; Id., Zur Σοῦδα-Frage: ByzZ 3 (1938) 36-58; KLP 5, 407-408; S.G. Mercati, Intorno ai titoli dei lessici Suida-Suda e di Papia: MAL Ser. 8, X, 1, Rome 1960 (now also in Id., Collectanea Byzantina, I, Bari 1970, 641-708); N. Walter, Suda. Ein Literaturbericht zum Titel des sogenannten Suidas Lexikon: Altertum 8 (1962) 169-175; C. Theodoridis, Quellenkritische Bemerkungen zum Lexikon des Suidas: Hermes 116 (1988) 468-475; A. Steiner, Byzantinisches im Wortschatz der Suda, in Studien zur bizantinisches Lexikographie, ed. E. Trapp, Vienna 1988, 149-181; A. Ruiz de Elvira, Suidas, y no "la Suda": Myrtia 12 (1997) 5-8; B. Hemmerdinger, Suidas, et non la "Souda": Bollettino dei classici Ser. 3a 19 (1998) 31-32; ODB 3, 1930; B. Baldwin, Aspects of the Suda: Byzantion 76 (2006) 11-31.

E. Peretto

SULPICIUS SEVERUS (ca. 360–ca. 420). A lawyer of *Bordeaux, "distinguished by his birth and literary works" (Genn., De vir. ill. 19), who was converted by his mother-in-law Bassula (from a rich consular family: Paul. Nola, Ep. 5,5) to Martinian asceticism; this Aquitainian, born around 360, became a zealous and gifted propagandist of this form of religious life: at times with personal action (he organized a "Martinian" community on the property of Primuliacum, probably situated around "the Lauraguais Road," not far from the road from *Toulouse to *Narbonne) and, esp., with his sharp and subtle pen. He was a friend and correspondent with *Paulinus of Nola (Paul. Nola, Ep. 1, 5, 11, 17, 22-24, 27-32), who sent him his lengthy Ep. 22, which was full of epigraphical poems intended for religious buildings (baptistery and churches) built by Sulpicius Severus at Primuliacum. He was a typical representative of the Gallo-Roman aristocracy, who, at the schools of Bordeaux, was a disciple of the professores described in a series of epigrams by *Ausonius (book 5 of his poems). But he belonged, more specifically, to that active minority that had converted to the radical and demanding evangelism of the monastic asceticism that objected, to the point of anticlericalism, to the "worldly" bishops of the Gallo-Roman church "established" within the empire.

The success of *Martin's works contributed much to the literary and, as a result, religious popularity of St. Martin, whom the ascetics of *Gaul and *Italy, starting from the end of the 4th c., made their model and, in some sense, standard-bearer. Sulpicius ended his life serving as a priest, and, after having been tainted by the heresy of *Pelagianism, he lived in old age silently consecrated to *penance (if we are to believe Genn., De vir. ill. 19).

The essential part of Sulpicius's work consisted in a triptych consecrated to St. Martin, copied and spread extensively during the Middle Ages under the (new) name of Martinellus ("the little Martin"); it includes the Vita Martini, which was probably finished in 397 before Martin's death, three letters likewise dedicated to Martin; last, the two (or three) books of Dialogues, a dossier connected to the Vita, in a dialogical form, acc. to the schema of this ancient literary genre. Sulpicius was also the author of a Chronicle in two books that encompassed sacred history from the creation of the world to his own time: the universal background, then the Gallo-Roman, leading to his exaltation of Martinian asceticism (the Chronicle came to an end at the consulate of *Stilicho in 400.)

A "masterpiece" in the double sense of chronology and literary quality, of ascetic and episcopal biography in the Latin West, the Vita Martini is a brilliant manifesto of the most ancient Latin *monasticism, through the deeds and acts of a bishop-monk, thaumaturge and evangelist, spiritual teacher and confessor of the faith. The Vita Martini for many centuries established the outlines of a cumulative model of Christian sanctity integrated with ancient models (apostolic, martyrological, episcopal and ascetic), just as they had already been presented, esp. in the NT, the Acts and the Passions, the Life of Cyprian, and the Latin translations of the *Life of Anthony written in Greek by *Athanasius. The richness of Sulpicius's early Christian literary culture was best adapted to the ideal of life which was, historically, that of Martin: an imperial guard who became a soldier of Christ, the apostle of the countryside, a witness to the orthodox faith and the demands of the gospel, a man who at various times was persecuted by the *Arians and worldly bishops, a shepherd trained by *Hilary for the responsibilities of *evangelization; finally, he was the mediator of monastic asceticism he had known at *Poitiers and *Milan.

Although criticized in radical and positivistic terms at the beginning of the 20th c., the historicity of the deeds recorded by Sulpicius's works concerning Martin requires a prudent literary analysis that follows the steps of the perception of the facts: Martin's own interpretation of his experience; the establishment of the oral traditions in which Gallo-Roman imagination (Celtic and Latin, popular and literary) played a key role, which today is difficult to decipher; finally, the individual virtuosity of a biographer who writes for a certain literary audience that was aristocratic, a bit elitist, and perhaps even a clique.

A fervent admirer of *Sallustius, Sulpicius Severus imitated him well even to the point of his stylistic mannerisms. His vivid imagination, disciplined by a rigorous work of form, offered an apparently objective narrative of miraculous, or sometimes frankly fantastic, events. The new Alexandrianism of the 4th c., represented so well in the poetry of Ausonius of Bordeaux, led Sulpicius to develop subtle and dramatic effects in which are reflected the Hellenistic values of pathos and grace. Hence, the indisputable literary eloquence of these accounts and, as a result, their effectiveness. Sulpicius's Martinian dossier was exceptionally popular in the religious and literary culture of the Middle Ages and not only in the already vast field of *hagiography: the text was put to Latin verse by *Paulinus of Périgueux in the middle of the 5th c. and by *Venantius Fortunatus of Ravenna (who at that time was "of Poitiers") over the course of the 6th c.

But the Sallustianism of Sulpicius is so precise that it does not remain formal. The Roman historian's grumbling, bitter and dramatic moralism tainted his vision of sacred history—and even more so of his own era, in the Chronicle—with black and white. The second book is almost entirely devoted to the *Arian controversy in *Gaul, the *Priscillianist heresy and, even more, through this gloomy event, to the scandal provoked by the worldly bishops that had worsened the struggle against this *heresy to the point of the shedding of blood at *Trier. Sulpicius rewrites the events like a new Conspiracy of Cataline; the victims and butchers are confused in the same violent and merciless invective. And more than in the Martinian dossier, Sulpicius shows himself to be a passionate, enthusiastic and vindictive man, without whose strange personality, in the face of the "negative" image of Priscillian, the figure of Martin would have perhaps appeared less radiant.

Editions: CPL 474-476; PL 20, 95-240; CSEL 1; Vita Martini: ed. J. Fontaine, SC 133-135, Paris 1967-1969 (includes the three letters; critical text, intro. and extensive comm.); ed. J.W. Smit (critical texts and notes in It.) and L. Canali (It. tr.), Coll. Vita dei Santi 4, Milan s.d. (1975), IX-XXX (intr. by Chr. Mohrmann), 1-67 (text and tr.), 245-290 (notes and bibl.); Vita di Martino, ed. F. Ruggiero, Bologna 2003; Dialogi: trans. by P. Monceaux, Paris 1926 (with the collection of the Martinian dossier); repr. of J. Fontaine's trans. of the Vita and some of the letters, and P. Monceaux's trans. of the Dialogi, with an intr. by L. Pietri, Ligugé 1978; Chronica: ed. A. Lavertujon, with annotations (questionable), Paris 1895-99; ed. G. de Senneville-Grave, SC 441, Paris 1999.

Studies: Intr. by J. Fontaine and Chr. Mohrmann for the editions mentioned above. On the Vita, the studies of J. Fontaine, Sulpice Sévère a-t-il travesti S. Martin de Tours en martyr militaire?: AB 81 (1963) 35-58; Id., Une clé littéraire de la Vita Martini de Sulpice Sévère, la typologie prophétique, in Mélanges Chr. Mohrmann, Utrecht-Anvers 1963, 84-95; Id., Alle fonti della agiografia europea. Storia e leggenda nella vita di S. Martino di Tours: RSLR 2 (1966) 187-206; on the Chronica: J. Fontaine, L'affaire Priscillien ou l'ère des nouveaux Catilina. Observations sur le sallustianisme de Sulpice Sévère, in Classica et Iberica. A Festschrift in Honor of the Reverned Joseph M.-F. Marique, ed. P.T. Brannan,Worcester, MA 1975, 355-391; K. van Andel, The Christian Concept of History in the "Chronicle" of Sulpicius Severus, Amsterdam 1976; F. Murru, La concezione della storia nel Chronica di Sulpicio Severo, alcune idee di studio: Latomus 38 (1979) 961-981; F. Ghizzoni, Sulpicio Severo, Rome 1983; Cl. Stancliffe, St. Martin and His Hagiographer, History and Miracle in Sulpicius Severus, Oxford 1983; for the role of Sulpicius Severus in the development of the cult of Saint Martin, see: L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IV^e^ siècle: naissance d'une cité chrétienne, Rome 1983; S. Weber, Die Chronik des Sulpicius Severus: Charakteristika und Intentionen, Trier 1997; M. Kránitz, Il monachesimo occidentale e la "militia Christi" nella "Vita Martini" di Sulpicio Severo, in Il monachesimo occidentale dalle origini alla Regula Magistri. XXVI Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 8-10 maggio 1997, SEA 66, Rome 1998, 163-167; J. Fontaine, Sulpice Sévère et l'esthétique de la prose théodosienne: REL 83 (2005) 179-193.

J. Fontaine

SUN, CULT of the. The existence of solar deities is a fact known to be widespread in various religious contexts, esp. in those that were polytheistic, characterized by divine personalities connected to functions and cosmic "departments." Think only of the Babylonian Shamash, the Egyptian Amon-Ra—the god of Thebes—and Aton of Heliopolis, likewise a solar divinity, who at the time of Amenophis IV (Akhenaton) (1375–1358 BC) was at the center of a well-known "henotheistic" religious reform. Although in the Greek world the importance of the god Helios was very limited during the classical and Hellenistic period, in the context of the Roman Empire, the cults of solar deities of Eastern origin, esp. Syriac, had spread widely. The ascent of the Syriac gods proceeded parallel to the affirmation of the dynasties of Eastern origin on the imperial throne. Thus, at the time of *Caracalla, we see the establishment of the cult of the solar god of *Emesa, the homeland of the emperor's mother, Julia Domna, who was of the priestly line and who performed a fundamental role in the religious politics of the time. With the ascent of Elagabalus, this cult reached its apex, seeing that he was the priest of Helios of Emesa, which he intended to make the chief god of the empire. *Rome then housed, in the temple built for this purpose, the rock fallen from heaven, the locus and manifestation of the god, whose cult was celebrated in typical Eastern forms. The fall of Elagabalus caused the sacred rock to be sent back to Emesa and brought the cessation of the cult in the Roman temple. Nevertheless, interest in the solar Eastern deities, or deities qualified by important luminous and celestial associations, did not diminish. Among these, one simply has to think of the Iranian Mithra, a subject of the mystery cult, who was also characterized in a solar sense to the point of being invoked as "Mithra the unconquered Sun," although Mithraism includes, as a distinct figure, Sol with whom Mithra himself has relationships represented in various ways.

The Egyptian Serapis also assumed definite solar characteristics, a god with a complex personality, connected to the underworld and fertility. Interest in the sun god, which was also expressed at the level of philosophical and theological speculations in the writings of such Neoplatonist authors as *Porphyry, the emperor *Julian and, later, *Macrobius, found its most vivid expression in the solar cult introduced by the emperor *Aurelian (270–775). This emperor, after having entered Emesa victorious, recognized in the solar god of the city the protector of the empire; he transferred the cult of this god into a temple erected through state funds and established an official cult. A sacerdotal college was commissioned to oversee the cult, and a quadrennial contest was instituted on 25 December, the dies natalis of the Sol invictus.

F. Cumont, Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris [4]1929; F. Altheim, Der unbesiegte Gott, Hamburg 1957 (It. tr. Milan 1960); G. Sfameni Gasparro, Le religioni orientali nel mondo ellenistico-romano, in G. Castellani (ed.), Storia delle religioni, III, Turin 1971, 423-564; G.H. Halsberghe, The Cult of Sol Invictus, EPRO 23, Leiden 1972; G.H. Halsberghe, Le cult de Deus Sol Invictus à Rome au III^e^ siècle après J.C., in ANRW, II, 17, 4, Berlin-New York 1984, 2181-2201; W. Fauth, Helios Megistos. Zur synkretistischen Theologie der Spätantike, Religions in the Graeco-Roman World 125, Leiden 1995; St.E. Hijmans, The Sun Which Did Not Rise in the East: The Cult of the Sol Invictus in the Light of Non-Literary Evidence: Babesch 71 (1996) 115-150; M. Wallraff, Christus verus Sol. Sonnenverehrung und Christentum in der Spätantike, JAC Ergänzungsband 32, Münster West. 2001.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

SUNDAY

I. Origin - II. The oldest form of the Sunday celebration - III. Significance - IV. The letter concerning Sunday.

I. Origin. It has on a number of occasions been claimed that the Christian Sunday depends on a pre-existing non-Christian institution.

1. A day dedicated to the sun, from which it took its name, is found in Greco-Roman antiquity from the 1st c. AD; it is the second day of the planetary *week. There is no mention, however, of a Sunday celebration in non-Christian antiquity; nor in the cult of Mithras did this day assume particular importance at such an early date. It is thus a weak hypothesis to suppose an originary influence of sun worship on the Christian Sunday (contra S. Bacchiocchi); a secondary influence is nonetheless detectable (see below).

2. Recently a Jewish precursor to the Christian Sunday was claimed to have been found: after the discoveries at *Qumran, a solar calendar used by this sect was reconstructed; in this calendar the feasts occurred each year on the same day of the week: on Wednesday, Friday or Sunday (A. Jaubert). Thus far, however, there has been no proof that at Qumran the weekly Sunday had particular importance. It is therefore hasty to speak of an influence of Qumran on the Christian Sunday (contra E. Higert), esp. if one simultaneously supposes a genuinely Christian origin of the Sunday celebration (contra C.S. Mosna).

3. The Sunday celebration thus appears to be a creation of the Christian church (first mention: 1 Cor 16:2). How did this come about? Generally the response is that the resurrection of Christ on Easter morning led to this prominence given to Sunday. This answer is only partially correct, however. In fact, on the one hand the first Christian Sunday celebrations took place not in the morning but in the evening (Acts 20:7); on the other hand, until the 2nd c. the resurrection of Jesus on Easter morning is mentioned only in passing as a reason for the Sunday celebration (Barn. 15.9; Just., Apol. I, 67,7). Scholars thus offer two theses that, though different, are more precise.

4. Initially the Christians are assumed to have met on Saturday (H. Riesenfeld; R. Staats). For practical reasons, it was most natural to come together to "break the bread" in accordance with the Jewish *sabbath (which the first Christians still celebrated). Only in the 2nd c. was the celebration moved to Sunday morning, in memory of Christ's resurrection.

5. Since the thesis of a "moving" of the celebration creates difficulties, it seems better founded to suppose that the first Christians met for the Eucharist on Sunday evening (Acts 20:7; Pliny the Younger, Ep. X,96,7), in continuity with Christ's appearances on the evening of Easter (Jn 20:19) and the Sunday after (Jn 20:26), and also in continuity with his taking a meal with his disciples (Lk 24:30, 41-43; Acts 1:3f.). Thus, e.g., C. Callewaert, O. Cullmann, H. Dumaine, W. Rordorf.

6. The adventist thesis (now newly represented by S. Bacchiocchi) acc. to which the Sunday celebration was introduced in the late 2nd c. through the church of Rome, as an anti-Jewish reaction and in dependency on the pagan cult of the sun, is weakly based (cf. ZKG 91 [1980] 112-116).

II. The oldest form of the Sunday celebration. This can be deduced from the descriptions contained in the Didache*, in the Letter of Pliny, in Justin and in the Apostolic Tradition*.

1. At the beginning the *Eucharist was celebrated in the evening, in the context of a full meal (1 Cor 11:25; Did. 10,1; Pliny the Younger, Ep. X,96,7: second meeting). This celebration had an *eschatological character, not exclusively in the sense of expecting the end of the world but in the fact that it was conscious of the presence of the glorified Lord and therefore concerned the community's holiness.

For this reason people underwent a serious examination of conscience before Communion, and pardoned one another's faults (1 Cor 11:28ff.; Did. 10,6; 14,1-2 [in reference to Mt 5:23f.]; Tertull., Apol. 39). The evening communal meal was continued for a long time with the agapes.

2. Besides this, perhaps quite early, there was a Christian celebration in the morning before dawn, the first evidence of which is in Pliny (Ep. X,96,7); it was certainly related to the conferral of *baptism. After the evening celebration was abolished during the same period (Pliny's letter gives a reason: the prohibition of hetairai), Christians celebrated the liturgy only early on Sunday morning.

3. This is exactly what we find in Justin, who in 1 Apol. 65 describes the celebration of baptism. Since it, like the Sunday morning celebration described in 1 Apol. 67, concluded with the Eucharist, we can suppose that the celebration of baptism at Justin's time was still linked to the Sunday morning liturgy. After the baptism, which took place in running water (Acts 8:38; Did. 7,1), the newly baptized were led among the gathered community. The liturgy of the word then began, consisting, acc. to the synagogue model, in readings followed by an explanation by the presider. Then all prayed, standing (recalling the resurrection: Tertull., Cor. 3; Basil., Spir. sanct. 27,67). Deacons brought *Communion to those who were absent, and a collection was taken up for the needy.

4. Preserved for the first time in the Apostolic Tradition* (4), in the context of an episcopal ordination (which also took place on Sunday: Apost. Trad. 3), is a complete eucharistic *liturgy which not only godfathered, in antiquity, the eucharistic liturgies of both East and West, but which has recently played a major role in the attempts at liturgical reform in all the churches.

III. Significance. This will be described by examining the various names for Sunday in the Christian tradition, acc. to the theological importance of each title.

1. The Lord's Day (kyriakē hēmera). The new Christian name for this day, which has been preserved in various languages (esp. in the Slavic and Romance languages). It is first attested in Rev 1:10, then in Did. 14,1; Ev. Petr. 35.50; Dionysius of Corinth (= Eus., HE IV,23,11), etc. "The Lord's Day" is a form analogous to "the Lord's Supper" of 1 Cor 11:20: Sunday is the day that remembers the Lord (Christ), perhaps esp. because on it the "Lord's Supper" is celebrated. The central significance of the Eucharist stands out in the texts cited in section 2 above. All Christians took part (Just., 1 Apol. 67,3.5), even at the risk of their life (Tertull., Fuga 14,1; Acta Saturnini, Dativi et al. 9.11). The rediscovery of the Sunday Communion of the whole community is one of the most welcome characteristics of our ecumenical age, whose greatest strength is drawn from a deeper reliance on the tradition.

2. The eighth day. This name (Barn. 15,8-9, Just., Dial. 41,4; 138,1; Cypr., Ep. 64,4; Didascalia VI,18,11-16; Ambrosiaster, Liber quaest. 95,2; Basil., Spir. sanct. 27,64) expressed, on the one hand, that the reality of Sunday "transcends" the week, and as such represents an open window on eternity. On the other hand, in Jewish and Greek antiquity the *Ogdoad was a symbol of perfection, which Christians related to the effusion of the *Holy Spirit in baptism (on Sunday) (1 Pet 3:18-21; 2 Pet 2:5; Ambr., Ep. 41 [44], 6 [4]. 17 [15]; cf. octagonal baptisteries), and which in heretical (Iren., Adv. haer. I,5,3; Clem. Alex., Exc. ex Theod. 63,1) and ecclesiastical speculation (Clem. Alex., Strom. V,106, 2; VI, 108, 1; Orig., Comm. in Ps. 118,4; Aug., Ep. 55,23) became a symbol of drawing near to God.

3. The first day. The name for Sunday in Jewish tradition and in the gospels (Mk 16:2 and par.; Jn 20:19). The Christian week thus begins with Sunday; it would be good to remember this in our age of the absolute predominance of an economic perspective. The festive day opens a medley of working days (K. Barth, Kirchl. Dogm. III,4,51-79). In the biblical tradition, this is the day of the creation of light (Gen 1:3; cf. Just., 1 Apol. 67,7; Eus., Comm. in Ps. 91 [92]), a fact which made it possible for Christians to readily adopt the pagan name day of the sun (first in Just., 1 Apol. 67,3), which is affirmed in Germanic and Anglo-Saxon languages (Sunday); moreover, Christ was also compared to the sun (Ign. Antioch, Magn. 9,1; Just., Dial. 100,4; Mel. Sardis, Bapt. 4; Orig., In Lev. hom. 9,10; Athan., De sabbato et circumc. 5; Jer., In die dom. Paschae hom.). This obviously also ran the risk of syncretism (Tertull., Nat. 1,13,1-5; Apol. 16,9-11; Eus., Vita Const. IV. 19-20; cf. the fixing of Christmas on 25 December).

4. The most serious confusion, however, was misunderstanding Sunday as though it were a Christian *Sabbath. This false step was taken by the church after Constantine the Great, in 321, proclaimed Sunday a public day of rest in the Roman Empire (CI III,12,2; CTh II,8,1). To give a sense to the obligatory Sunday rest (Christians, however, at first continued to work: Jer., Ep. 108,20,3; Pall., Hist. Laus. 59,2; Benedict of Nursia, Reg. 48,22f.), the unfortunate idea was advanced of explaining the Sunday rest using the commandment concerning the sabbath (Eus., Comm. in Ps. 91 [92]; Ephr. Syr., Sermo ad noct. dom. resurrectionis 4; John Chrys., Bapt. Christi hom. 1; Id., In Gen. hom. 10,7; Eus. Alex., Sermo 16); in the 6th c. the equation of Sunday with the sabbath was completely established (Caes. Arles, Sermo 10,3,5; Counc. of Orléans, can. 31,28; Mart. Braga, De correctione rust. 18; Ishoyahb, Ep. can. ad Iacobum 4; II Counc. of Mâcon, can. 1; Counc. of Narbonne, can. 4). Such a change would not have been possible in the church before Constantine, both because Sunday rest was unknown and, esp., because the church had reached the conclusion that the sabbath commandment was no longer obligatory in the New Covenant and thus had nothing to do with the Christian Sunday (sabbath). It would be better today to stress the original definition of Sunday as the day on which the eucharistic liturgy is celebrated. Sunday rest, whose ethical-social significance should in no way be diminished (here the OT sabbath legislation got many things right), has been associated with Sunday not by the will of God but by the grace of the emperor; it is not necessary that the two remain forever linked.

H. Dumaine, Dimanche: DACL 4,858-954; C. Callewaert, La synaxe eucharistique à Jérusalem, berceau du dimanche: EThL 15 (1938) 34-73; var. aus., Der christliche Sonntag. Probleme und Aufgaben, Vienna 1956; J. Gaillard, Dimanche: DSp III, 948-982; A. Jaubert, La date de la Cène, Paris 1957; var. aus., Der Tag des Herrn, Die Heiligung des Sonntags im Wandel der Zeit, Vienna 1958; var. aus., Verlorener Sonntag?, Kirche im Volk 22, Stuttgart 1959; H. Riesenfeld, Sabbat et jour du Seigneur, in New Testament Essays. Studies in Memory of T.W. Manson, ed. AJ.B. Higgins, Manchester 1959, 210-218 (= The Sabbath and the Lord's Day, The Gospel Tradition, Oxford 1970, 111-137); F.A. Reagan, Dies dominica and dies solis: The Beginnings of the Lord's Day in Christian Antiquity (Diss.), Washington, DC 1961; O. Cullmann, Urchristentum und Gottesdienst: Abh. z. Theol. des AT. u. NT. 3 ([4]1962) 14ff.; W. Rordorf, Der Sonntag. Geschichte des Ruhe- und Gottesdiensttages im ältesten Christentum: Abh. z. Theol. des A.T. u. N.T. 43, Zürich 1962 (Eng.: London-New York 1968; Sp.: Barcelona 1972); E. Hilgert, Jubilees and the Origin of Sunday: Andrews University Sem. Studies 3 (1963) 44-51; var. aus., Le dimanche: La MaisonD. 83 (1965); var. aus., Le dimanche: Lex Orandi 39, Paris 1965; C.S. Mosna, Storia della domenica dalle origini fino agli inizi del V secolo. Problema delle origini e sviluppo. Culto e riposo, Aspetti pastorali e liturgici: Analecta Gregoriana 170, Rome 1969; P.K. Jewett, The Lord's Day: A Theological Guide to the Christian Day of Worship, Grand Rapids, MI 1971; W. Rordorf, Sabbat und Sonntag in den Alten Kirche: Traditio Christiana 2, Zürich 1972 (Fr.: Neuchâtel-Paris 1972; It.: Turin 1979); R. Staats, Ogdoas als Symbol für die Auferstehung: VChr 26 (1972) 29-52; G. Troxler, Das Kirchengebot der Sonntagsmesspflicht als moral theologisches Problem in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Arbeiten zur prakt. Theol. 2, Fribourg 1971; S. Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday: A Historical Investigation of the Rise of Sunday Observance in Early Christianity, Rome 1977; R. Staats, Die Sonntagnachtgottesdienste der christlichen Frühzeit: ZNTW 66 (1975) 242-263; R.T. Beckwith - W. Stott, This Is the Day: The Biblical Doctrine of the Christian Sunday, London 1978; Th. Bergholz, Sonntag: TRE 31 (2000) 449-472 (bibl.); A. Di Berardino, La cristianizzazione del tempo nei secoli IV-V: la domenica: Augustinianum 41 (2002) 97-125.

W. Rordorf

IV. The Letter concerning Sunday (apocryphal). Ancient tradition (*Lucian of Samosata, Epistolai Chronikai) includes a tradition of letters falling from heaven, as does (esp.) the Christian tradition: besides the Odes of Solomon and the Song of the Pearl we have a large number of texts, in various languages, of letters fallen from heaven. Common elements regarding these letters include: (1) a letter falls on an altar (Rome, Constantinople, Jerusalem, Bethlehem etc.); (2) in it Christ asks that Sunday be respected, promising terrible punishments to all those who do not; other prescriptions are later added. Some versions also mention the date on which the letter fell. The first mention of such a letter comes from the letter of Licinianus of Cartagena of 584, but it was probably known to Caesarius of Arles (d. 543). According to M. van Esbroeck, the letter originated in Jerusalem between 451 and 453; we find some letters concerning Sunday in the Carolingian period, in India, during the French Revolution and in the modern period; the presence of such letters in various popular cultures is attested by ethnographers.

CANT 311; BHG 812i-r; M. Bittner, Der von Himmel gefallene Brief Christi in seinen morgenländischen Versionen und Rezensionen, Denkschriften d. k. Akad. d. Wiss. in Vienna, Philos.-hist. Klasse 51, 1905, 1-232 (12 Greek texts, 7 Syriac, 5 Karshuni, 7 Arabic, 3 Ethiopic). Translations: It. - Erbetta 3, 113-118; Polish - Starowieyski 3,96-106 (M. Zowczak, ibid. 106-111, bibl., ibid. 358-360); Sp. - Santos Otero 664-676. Fr. - R. Renoir: DACL 3 (1913) 1534-1546; H. Delehaye, in Mélanges d'hagiographie grecque et latine, Brussels 1966, 150-178; M. van Esbroeck: AB 107 (1989) 267-284; Eng. - R. Faerber: Apocrypha 12 (2001) 173-209.

M. Starowieyski

SUPERSTITION. The term superstition generally indicates every form of human relationship with the sphere of the divine that does not enter the "official" religious tradition; and in the classical understanding of the term, it characterizes superfluous religion, vitiated by superstitious practices, vain observance and an excess of religious scrupulosity. The *pagans saw in Christianity a superstitio nova et malefica (Suetonius, Ner. 16,3), prava et immodica (Pliny the Younger, Ep. X,96): they meant by this term a foreign religion. In the Vulgate, the term superstitio translated two different Greek expressions: δεισιδαιμονία (Acts 17:22; 25:19), with the meaning of divinities and suspicious practices; and ἐθελοθρησκία (Col 2:23), a showy and feigned religiosity.

In the writings of the Greek fathers, the two terms have the meanings of idolatry (Clem. Alex., Protr. 2; Strom. II,8; VII,4; *Orig., C. Cels. 6,17; *Greg. Nyss., Or. cat. 18) and superstition or vain cult, or applied to Judaism, heresy or paganism. For the Latin fathers, superstition was a falsification of the true religion; it is the religion of the false gods: Veri (Dei) cultus est, superstitio falsi (Lactantius, Div. Inst. IV,28,11; see also Aug., Ep. 102, III, 18; De vera rel. 111); ancient, vain practices and false, irrational beliefs (see Aug., Civ. Dei IV,30). *Constantine and subsequent Roman emperors would gradually suppress, as a superstition, pagan cults and aberrant Christian movements. The term would then be extended to the vestiges of paganism, divination, formulas and magical practices, religions and sects contrary to the catholic faith and the heresies (see, e.g., Cod. Theod. XII,1,158; XVI,5,10.34.39; XVI,7,6; XVI,8,28; XVI,10,20).

J.P. Migne, Dictionnaire des sciences occultes, I-II, Paris 1846; DTC 14b (1941) 2763-2766; DACL 15 (1953) 1730-1736; EC 11 (1953) 1574-1576; S. Calderone, Superstitio, in ANRW I, 2 (1972) 377-396; L.F. Janssen, Die Bedeutungentwicklung von Superstitio-

Superstes: Mnemosyne 26 (1975) 135-188; Id., Superstitio and the Persecution of the Christians: VChr 33 (1979) 131-159; D. Harmening, Superstitio, Berlin 1979; M. Sachot, Religio/superstitio: histoire d'une subversion et d'un retournement: RHR 208 (1991) 355-394; D.M. Moser (ed.), Glaube im Abseits. Beiträge zur Erforschung des Aberglaubens, Darmstadt 1992; LTK³ 1, 40-46; D.B. Martin, Inventing Superstition: From the Hippocratics to the Christians, Cambridge, MA-London 2004; X. Levieils, Crises dans l'empire romain et lutte contre la superstition chrètienne (Ier-IVe siècles): RSLR 41 (2005) 1-38.

M. Maritano

SUSANNA

I. In the writings of the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the writings of the Fathers. The story of Susanna (Dan 13:1-65) is found in the LXX, *Theodotion's version and the Vulgate as a deuterocanonical part of the book of *Daniel. In the LXX, the account is set as the first supplementary chapter, although in Theodotion's version it constitutes the first chapter of the book of Daniel. The Fathers used this latter translation, which presents a more dramatic and elaborate story. In Christian literature, *Tertullian, though not citing the text, was the first to speak about the story of Susanna (De corona 4,3) with respect to the use of the veil as an indication of modesty, mentioning her inasmuch as she was an example for Christian women. In the writings of *Cyprian (Ep. 43,4), who like Tertullian does not cite the text, the chaste Susanna accused by the elders is used *allegorically as a symbol of the church of Carthage, whose decency and evangelical truth appear to be threatened by *Felicissimus and his five presbyters. The first commentator on this OT account was *Hippolytus (Comm. in Dan. 1,12,33ff.). Using Theodotion's version, he commented on the story in an allegorical-typological sense: Susanna symbolizes the church; her husband Joakim, Christ; the two seductive elders represent the Jews and pagans; the garden is the community of the elect; Babylon, the world. Susanna's bath symbolizes baptism: faith and charity serve her; the perfumes represent the commandments of the Word, although the oil represents the power of the *Holy Spirit. In a letter sent to *Origen (ca. 240), *Julius Africanus called into question the authenticity and canonicity of the story of Susanna. Origen's response was peremptory, declaring in favor of the complete authenticity of the text (Epist. ad Afric. 9). The story of Susanna was written about by *Jerome, who provided philological commentary on it, and the great 4th-c. Fathers, who saw in Susanna a model of charity (Greg. Naz., Poem. mor. 2,195; ps.-Aug., Serm. 112,2), a sign of conjugal modesty (Aug., Serm. 343,1-8), and of silent innocence (Aug., Serm. 318,2), because Susanna is similar to Christ in his trial (Ambr., Exp. in Lc. 10,97). In the most ancient liturgical texts, Susanna is mentioned as an example of a person saved by God from an unjust judgment.

J.R. Busto Saiz, El texto Teodociónico de Daniel y la tradición de Símaco: Sefarad 40 (1980) 41-55; J. Schüpphaus, Das Verhältnis von LXX- und Theodotion-Text in den apokryphen Zusätzen zum Danielbuch: ZAW 83 (1971) 49-72; H. Engel, Die Susanna-Erzählung. Einleitung, Übersetzung und Kommentar (OBO 61) Freiburg-Göttingen 1985.

S. Samulowitz

II. Iconography. A model of salvation and prefiguration of Christ, who as an innocent victim that was to be sacrificed, the figure of Susanna appears in the iconography of the Christian community relatively late (3rd–4th c.) with respect to the other themes. Often represented only between two trees, praying (London, British Museum, glass cup from St. Severinus, Cologne; Oxford, Pusey House, glass plate) or between the two elders—represented, however, always with youthful appearance—(*Rome, Cemetery of Sts. Peter and Marcellinus: 2nd half of the 4th c., Cemetery of Domitilla: 1st half of the 4th c.; greater cemetery: 2nd half of the 4th c.; Leningrad, Museum of the Hermitage, glass club from Prodgoritza: 5th c.), Susanna is also found together with *Daniel in the scene of the judgment (Rome, Cemetery of *Callistus: 2nd half of 3rd c.); and once the representation assumes the aspect of an antiheretical allegory (Rome, the Cemetery of *Praetextatus, the so-called arcosolium of Celerina, threatened by two wolves: 2nd half of the 4th c.).

Especially from the 4th c. the episodes that characterized the story of Susanna—Susanna's temptation, accusation by the elders, their sentence, Susanna's vindication, the execution of one or both of the elders, Daniel with a companion—are subdivided into three scenes (Rome, Cemetery of Priscilla, Greek Chapel; Rome, Museum delle Terme, *sarcophagus: 1st third of the 4th c.; Brescia, Museo Cristiano, reliquary: 4th c.; Rome, Mausoleum of Constanza, lost decoration of the dome: 4th c.), in four scenes (Rome, Museo Pio Cristiano Vaticano, sarcophagus: 2nd third of the 4th c.), and in five scenes (Girona, church of St. Felix, sarcophagus: the first decades of the 4th c.). On a sarcophagus from *Arles, and on one lost from Cahors, Daniel, a judge in the scene of the judgment of Susanna, is matched on the opposite side with Pilate, in a clear allusion to Susanna's function as a parallel to Christ, the predestined victim. Finally, to note a unique representation, there is the one on the glass cup of Homblières (Paris, the Louvre Museum: 4th c.) where Susanna appears naked between the two elders.

P. Testini: EC 11, 1589ff.; H. Schlosser: LCI 4, 228-231; Wp 334ff.; Ws II, 251ff.; L. de Bruyne, L'imposition des mains dans l'art chrétien ancien. Contribution iconologique à l'histoire du geste: RivAC 20 (1943) 248-252 (the judgment of Susanna); H. Schlosser, Die Daniel-Susanna Erzählung in Bild und Literatur der christlichen Frühzeit: ROE Suppl. 30 (1965) 243-249; MC. Dagens, Autour du pape Libère. L'iconographie de Suzanne et des martyrs romains sur l'arcosolium de Celerina: MEFR Ant. 78 (1966) 327-381; M.M. Cecchelli Trinci, Studio su Susanna nella interpretazione patristica e nell'antica iconografia cristiana: Miscellanea G.L. Messina, Rome n.d.; TIP 282-284.

G. Santagata

SUSANNA, martyr – CHURCH of SAINT SUSANNA. The presence at the Roman synod of 595 (MGH, Epist., I,367) of presbyters representing a titulus Sanctae Susannae introduces the complex historical and archaeological question centered on this person, whose story is narrated by a Passio that can be dated to the 6th c. (AASS., Aug., II,632ff.): acc. to this *hagiographical account at the time of the emperor *Diocletian, Susanna underwent *martyrdom in the house of her father, the presbyter Gabinius, a place near the Porta Salaria, and there Pope *Caius, her Father's brother, instituted a statio. The legend adds that the same pope lived in the house nearby, which was esp. significant because it connected with the place designation ad duas domos, which evidently recalls the memory of the two contiguous inhabitations and which the Mart. hier. (in the Bernese version: AASS., Nov., II.1, 104; II.2, 434-436) cites to situate there the veneration of the saints on 11 Aug. Moreover, the topographical details inserted both in the Passio and in the martyrology, in which the author specifies that the site is found near the baths of Diocletian, lead with clarity to locating the place where the church was built, today facing the modern Via XX Settembre.

The gap present until the first mention of the basilica at the tail end of the 6th c. could be filled by the presence, at the preceding synod of 499 (MGH, AA XII, 413), of representatives of a titulus Gai, which by name mentions the pontiff-uncle of Susanna and which early on must have disappeared only to be replaced by the title dedicated to her.

With respect to the church building, nothing, or almost nothing, is preserved of the early Christian construction, which was the object of important donations by Pope *Sergius I (687–701: LP I,375) and a restoration commissioned by *Hadrian I (772–795: LP I,507): the building was entirely reconstructed at the beginning of the 9th c. by order of Pope *Leo III (795–816: LP II,3), who moreover furnished the apsidal basin with an interesting depiction, unfortunately now lost, in which at the end of the row of saints standing next to Christ and the Virgin *Mary, there appeared the pontiff on one side and the lay emperor Charlemagne on the other.

Of this three-aisled Carolingian basilica there remains, under the superfluous additions that occurred over the centuries, only the central aisle, the result of the reduction ordered by Pope Sixtus IV in the 2nd half of the 15th c. Digs conducted in the area in 1830 and 1938 brought to light remains belonging to structural residences from the imperial age that were suggestively considered an allusion to the place designation ad duas domos; although a subsequent investigation during the 1990s allowed scholars to identify a small early medieval graveyard of considerable interest, situated in the area corresponding to the left aisle of the Leonine basilica, which had obliterated it. Between the burials, which were certainly done in relation to the most ancient worship building, then subsequently lost, a reused sarcophagus stands out in bold relief inside of which, in addition to the skeleton of a deceased person, were found fragments of a fresco decoration, detached and interred here so that it might be preserved as a sort of *relic. The restoration of such fragments has allowed scholars to reconstruct three decorative nuclei: the representation of the Madonna with Child on the throne between two saints, some heads of saints and esp. a gabled-form fresco at the top, the representation of the Agnus Dei identified by St. *John the Baptist and St. *John the Evangelist. The most probable hypothesis leads one to recognize these fragments as part of the decoration of the early Christian titulus of St. Susanna that was destroyed and replaced by the new basilica completed by Leo III. A similar discovery turned out to be of extreme interest for the means of extraction and preservation of fragments because it was a work of detachment, completed with great care during the occasion of the reconstruction of the church with the goal of preserving the pictorial testimonies not so that they might be reused or serve some other function, but to be enclosed within the sarcophagus that was destined to be covered by the foundation of the new basilica, the circumstance that makes evident the enormous value that had to be attributed to them. The dating of the frescoes still remains unsettled: the attribution to the intervention by Hadrian I, proposed by M. Andaloro, could however find a more stimulating explanation advanced by M. Cechelli if connected with the activity of Sergius I, whose determined position in relation to the representation of the lamb had even led him, as is well known, to oppose the Eastern emperor. A similar origin could justify the special treatment that was reserved for these paintings during the 9th c.

B.M. Apollonj Ghetti, Santa Susanna (Le chiese di Rome illustrate, 85), Rome 1965; R. Krautheimer et al., Corpus Basilicarum Christianarum Romae, IV, Vatican City 1976, 243-266; A. Bonanni, Scavi e ricerche in S. Susanna a Roma. Le fasi paleocristiane e altomedievali, in Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Cassino 1993), I, Cassino 2003, 359-373; M. Andaloro, I dipinti murali depositati nel sarcofago dell'area di Santa Susanna a Roma, ibid., 377-383; V. von Falkenhausen, Sergio I: EPapi 1, 633-636; M. Cecchelli - M. Andaloro, Santa Susanna. Le indagini archeologiche; Gli affreschi frammentati, in M.S. Arena et al. (ed.), Roma dall'antichità al medioevo. Archeologia e storia nel Museo Nazionale Romano Crypta Balbi, Milan 2001, 641-645; M. Cecchelli et al., Santa Susanna, in L. Paroli - L. Vendittelli, Roma dall'antichità al medioevo II. Contesti tardoantichi e altomedievali, Milan 2004, 328-341.

A. Milella

SYAGRIUS (mid-5th c.). Anti-Priscillianist, belonging to the conventus of Lugo (Gabizia). Along with *Pastor he was ordained bishop against the will of *Agrestius, the *metropolitan of Lugo and, as it seems, acc. to *Hydatius the pro-Roman (see Chron. 102), a sympathizer with *Priscillian. According to C. Torres, Agrestius's opposition could have been motivated by the fact that Pastor and Syagrius were partisans of Hermeric and faithful to the pro-Suevian party. During the confusing and tense situation in the ecclesiastical province of *Gallaecia after the invasions, acc. to the information provided by *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 65 [66]), Syagrius wrote a book on the *Trinity, toning down the original terms used by the *heretics. One of his writings has been preserved: Regulae definitionum contra haereticos prolatae. K. Künstle attributed also to him, among other writings, the treatise Ad neophytos de symbolo written by ps.-Ambrose, and the ps.-Augustinian sermons 237, 238 and 239. Scholars have cautiously and partially accepted Künstle's attributions. One must not confuse the Gallaecian Syagrius with the Syagrius mentioned by Consentius.

Reg. definitionum: CPL 560.702 - PL 13, 639-642; K. Künstle, Antipriscilliana, Freiburg 1902, 142-159; PLS 3, 132-140; Ad neophytos: CPL 178 - PLS 1, 606.1749, K. Künstle, op. cit.; Serm. 237, 238, 239: CPL 368 - PL 39, 1735-2354, K. Künstle, op. cit.; P.B. Gams, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, II/I, Regensburg 1864 (Graz 1956), 466-467; G. Morin, Pastor et Syagrius, deux écrivains perdus du cinquième siècle: RBen 10 (1893) 385-390; A.C. Vega, Un poema inédito titulado "De fide" de Agrestio obispo de Lugo, siglo V: Boletín R. Acad. Hist. 159 (1966) 167-209; C. Torres, Galicia sueva, La Coruña 1977, 76; Patrología III, Spanish ed. Madrid 1981, 685; H. Chadwick, Prisciliano de Avila, Madrid 1978, 285-287; Domínguez del Val, 63-64.

E. Romero Pose

SYAGRIUS of Autun (d. ca. 600). Not a single biography written about Syagrius's life has survived. To compensate for this, scholars have used strong testimonies about the prestige he enjoyed among well-noted individuals from this time, beginning with Pope *Gregory the Great (Jaffé: Ep. 1438, 1491, 1743, 1747-48). He was elected bishop of *Autun around 560. King Guntram ordered Syagrius to accompany him to the ceremony of *Chlothar II's baptism in 591. He had access to all the courts in *Gaul (Burdundy-Neustria-Austrasia-Aquitania), but esp. that of Childebert II, king of the *Franks, during the regency of his mother Brunhilde. Gregory the Great commended to him the missionaries sent to England and even wanted to appoint him as head over the bishops of the province of *Lyons. He participated at almost all the councils that were held in France during his time, and he was commissioned by the pontiff to organize and preside over a general council of the churches in Gaul, but it seems that his death (599–600?) did not permit him to accomplish this project.

For Gregory the Great's Letters sent to him, see also Registrum Epistolarum, ed. P.E. Wald - L.M. Hartmann, in MGH, Ep. I and II. See EC 11, 504; LTK³ 9, 1151; BS 11, 1016-1018; Catholicisme 14, 628; L. Pietri, Grégoire le Grand et la Gaule: le projet pour la réforme de l'Église gauloise, in Gregorio Magno e il suo tempo, Rome 1991, I, 109-128; BBKL 11, 312-313.

L. Dattrino

SYLVESTER I, pope (314–335). Very little is known for certain concerning the rather long pontificate of Pope Sylvester I. He did not participate, however, in the Council of *Arles. Nevertheless, he received from this gathering a rather courteous letter, in which he was invited to communicate the decisions of this council to the bishops (Mirbt n. 239). At the Council of *Nicaea (325) he was represented by two presbyters, without having a direct influence on the council's decisions. Nor does he seem to have been involved in the subsequent activities of *Constantine, either on the level of the universal church or on that of the Roman community (construction of churches etc.). Only from the 5th c. onward did legend connect him to the conversion and baptism of the emperor *Constantine, thus supplying the supposed historical foundation for the author of the so-called *Donation of Constantine.

CPL 244; 2235. E. Ewig, Das Bild Constantins des Grossen in den ersten Jahrhunderten des abendländischen Mittelalters: Historisches Jahrbuch 75 (1956) 1-46 (legend); R.J. Loenertz, "Actus Sylvestri." Genèse d'une legende: RHE 70 (1975) 426-439; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976, 168-187 (bibl.); W. Pohlkamp, Tradition und Topographie: Papst Silvester und der Drache vom Forum Romanum: Römische Quartalschrift 78 (1983) 1-100; Id., LMA 7, 1905-1908; LTK³ 9, 587; LACL (2000) 641; T. Canella, Gli Actus Silvestri. Genesi di una leggenda su Costantino imperatore, Spoleto 2006.

B. Studer

SYLVIA (d. before 594). The few pieces of information that we have about Sylvia come from the writings of Pope *Gregory the Great and from his biographies written by Paul the Deacon and John the Deacon. She was the wife of Gordianus, a regionary of Rome (i.e., a cleric or lay official attached to one of the ecclesiastical regions of Rome), with whom she had two children, Gregory, the future bishop of Rome, and Palatinus (Gregory, Ep. 11,4). Gordianus's home at the Clivus Scauri on the Caelian Hill was transformed by Gregory into a monastery dedicated to St. Andrew probably upon the death of his father (John the Deacon, Vita Gregorii I,9). Sylvia then led an almost monastic solitary life in the monastery of Cella Nova near the church of St. *Sabas on the Aventine Hill. The fact that Gregory in a sermon spoke of Sylvia as present at the death of her paternal aunt Trasilla (Hom. in Ev. II,38,15), which occurred in 592, and then did not mention her in the Dialogues (IV,6) when mentioning this event, leads one to suspect that Sylvia had died between 592 and 594, the date of the composition of Gregory's Dialogues. Gregory the Great desired that an image of his mother be placed alongside that of Gordianus in the church of St. Andrew on the Caelian Hill (John the Deacon, Vita Gregorii IV,83). John the Deacon (Vita Gregorii I,9) spoke of an oratory dedicated to Sylvia near the church of St. Sabas. In the Roman Martyrology the feast day for this saint is recorded for 3 November.

AASS Nov. III, 658-662; BS 11, 1082-1083; LCI 8, 359-360; BBKL 10 (1995), 348-349; LTK 9, 590; PCBE II, Italie, 2, 2072.

G. Pilara

SYMBOLS – SYMBOLISM

I. In literary tradition - II. In art.

I. In literary tradition. In general the symbols used by the iconographic Christian tradition are also attested and discussed by the written sources. They are placed alongside these numerous symbols that are attested exclusively at the literary level and are often hidden by use of two of the most widespread exegetical techniques in the ancient church: *allegory and *typology. The chief sources of these symbols were obviously the Scriptures of the OT and the NT, which were very soon joined by themes taken from the surrounding *pagan culture. Occasionally one can perceive the presence of extrabiblical Jewish traditions and *apocryphal texts.

Here we briefly mention some special categories of symbols, because there still does not exist a systematic treatment of symbols in general.

Numbers.* Among the most widespread literary conventions in the OT there is that which attributes specific meanings to the use of specific "perfect" numbers (3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 12, 40 . . .). In the NT, only *John's book of Revelation made abundant use of this type of symbol (7 churches, 7 seals, 666: number of the beast, 12 ×12 × 1000 elect; the dimensions of the heavenly city); elsewhere such numbers are rather rare (though note the "70 × 7" from Mt 18:22 and the "third heaven" of 2 Cor 12:2), even if the typological intention is evident which causes the number of *apostles to coincide with that of the twelve tribes of Israel (and establishes that of the disciples in 72, a multiple of the preceding figure). In the subsequent Christian tradition this type of symbolism, which borders allegory, became relatively rare, perhaps because of its very frequent use in*gnosticism (see the 30 *aeons of the *Valentinians, which became 10 for *Mark the Gnostic and 3 among the *Simonians, etc.). Notable exceptions are the *ogdoad, which represents the resurrection and eternity (with its architectonic facets) and some passages from the writings of *Irenaeus (the correspondence between the gospels and the four corners of the earth and the four winds: Adv. haer. 3,11,8; the seven heavens and the seven gifts of the Spirit: Epid. 9). The letters of the Greek alphabet also have a numeric value. This property at times was used for arithmological speculations, analogous to rabbinic Kabbalah; thus *Barnabas (Ep. 9,8) saw in the 318 servants of *Abraham (see Gen 17:23 and 14:14) an image of the cross of Christ because the iota (10) and the tau (8) are the initials of Jesus' name and the letter tau (300) recalls with the same design the cross of Christ. The letters of the Greek alphabet, however, which are found on the garments of male figures, have a christological meaning (see *gammadia). Other uses of the same type also found in the writings of the gnostics, who also used other techniques such as that of adding the numeric values of the letters of one word: see the case of περιστερά ("dove") which for the Marcosians is a symbol of the heavenly Christ, inasmuch as it is the sum of his letters (801) and is equal to that of the alpha (1) and the omega (800). The symbolism of the *alpha and the omega also goes back to the book of Revelation ("I am the Alpha and the Omega, says the Lord God, the one who is, was and is to come," 1:8; 21:6; 22:13) to express that Christ is the beginning and the end of all things, the creator and judge beyond time and space (Origen, Commentary on John 1, 34-35): these letters are very common in Christian epigraphy.

With respect to the symbolic value of names (which were widespread in the OT and generally in the Semitic world), there are a few examples in the NT, the most famous of which was the change of the name Simon ("dove") into Cephas-Peter ("rock"), and the very name of Jesus ("God saves").

There are rare acrostics and abbreviated forms: alongside the well-known ἰχθύς ("fish"), we should also mention the one that makes of *Adam a symbol of the entire world, inasmuch as it is formed by the initial four cardinal points (Adam [anatolē, dysis, arktos, mesēmbria]; ps.-*Cyprian, De montibus Sina et Sion 4). Two common abbreviations, esp. in the epigraphic field, are Dom = Deo Optimo Maximo (an adaptation of the pagan DM = Diis Manibus?) and the monogram of Christ formed by overlapping the chi (or a cross) and the letter of rho: ☧. The etymological and symbolic interpretations of the names are collected in the onomastic lexicons. Among the most famous apparent etymologies is the heavily polemical etymology that connects *Mani to mania, "fierce madness."

The path to the symbolic interpretation of animals, plants and natural phenomena was already opened by the Scriptures (see the numerous parables in the gospels which have as their theme seeds and fruits; or also Mt 10:16: "Be wise as serpents and innocent as doves"; Jn 1:29: Jesus "the Lamb of God," etc.), and would be explored with enthusiasm by the various ancient exegetical schools.

The most interesting among the repertories of this type of symbol is the Physiologus (4th c.?), which proposes more than forty of them among the animals, plants and minerals, either christological or ascetic, taking up scriptural themes but also some from pagan sources.

Materials deriving from the pagan world very soon entered the Christian tradition; already *Clement of Rome (end of the 1st c.) mentioned the theme of the phoenix to explain the resurrection of Christ (1 Cor 26,1). The use of other pagan themes are more well known: Orpheus, the orans, the *peacock, the good *shepherd etc.

Probably in the wake of the positive perception of the world, in which the logos spermatikos dwells, proposed by *Justin Martyr, the opportunity or the need to employ themes from the pagan tradition was explicitly given a theoretical rationale by *Clement of Alexandria (see Protr. 12,119,1 and passim); Clement was probably the first to introduce into the Christian world the terminology of the pagan banquets and mysteries to refer to the *Eucharist.

An important characteristic of some Christian symbols is their polyvalence: the lion can represent an Evangelist (*John in the East, *Mark in the West), the incarnation and the resurrection of Christ (Physiologus 1); the *devil (see 1 Pet 5:8), royal power (in the writings of the Antiochene authors). *Noah as the antitype of Adam (*Athanasius, Orat. C. ar. 2,51), as the saved person, as a figure of Christ inasmuch as he saves the righteous in the flood; his ark is a symbol of the church composed of righteous and sinners; Noah and the dove with the small olive branch prefiguring Christ and his baptism; Noah in the ark is a figure of Christ who has been buried, etc.

Many biblical persons, whether in literary texts or those represented in the figurative arts, have a symbolic and typological meaning: e.g., *Daniel in the lions' den, the prototype of the just person persecuted and saved by God through his faith (Clem. Rome, 1 Clem. 45,6-8); *Elijah, to whom *Ambrose of *Milan dedicated one of his treatises, a model for ascetics; *Job, a prototype of the patient person, the righteous one, the martyr, the athlete of faith, acceptance of the divine will; *Jonah, the prefiguration of Christ, who remains buried for three days, and of the universality of the church; *Joshua, who is also a prefiguration of Christ; *Moses with his staff, a prototype of Christ the Savior; Noah, a symbol of the saved person, and the righteous Noah, a type of Christ, etc.

Now, as an example, let us give the interpretation of some of the most noteworthy Christian symbols: the eagle (Mark in the West, John in the East; baptism, subsequently penance in the Physiologus); the anchor (as an instrument of salvation during the time of shipwreck or in a storm of life: Aug., Serm. 117,8; John Chrys. Hom. in Ps. 9,5); plow (creation, cross and the two natures of Christ); ax (aside from being a symbol of a trade or something else, its meaning should be seen in individual contexts such as the symbols of eternity or the cross [Justin Mart., Dial. 86,6; Iren., Adv. Haer. 4,34,4]); the Good Shepherd (a symbol of the Savior); cathedra, as a symbol of teaching and therefore the bishop; donkey (pagan peoples: see Mt 21:5-7 esp.); boat, ship (symbol of the church; see Noah's ark and Peter's boat; the mast of the ship represents the cross); ox (Luke the Evangelist); crow (Jesus Christ who kills the *serpent or dragon, symbols of the devil, apparent etymology); dove (*Holy Spirit; virginity, the soul of the deceased person or rather the afterlife); the crown (the symbol of victory and reward, often associated with the *palm, as an attribute of the martyr); dextrarum iunctio (the main gesture of the wedding ceremony); he-toimasia* (to express the invisible presence of God); phoenix (the resurrection of the flesh); crow (chastity in the Physiologus; uncleanness in the writings of the Antiochenes: see PG 59,513); panther (the crucifixion of Christ, baptism and Eucharist, which originated from the water and blood that emerged from the side of Christ); rock, stone (Jesus Christ the cornerstone, the rock from which the water flowed in the desert); tower (church); the lighthouse symbolizes the final destination of the navigatio animae (Clem. Alex., Protrepticus 8,84; Cypr., De mort. 26).

TIP; LexM 8, 353-358; TRE 32, 479-496; F. Wutz, Onomastica sacra. Untersuchungen zum Liber interpretationis nominum Hebraicorum des hl. Hieronymus, TU 41, 1-2, Leipzig 1914-1915; H. Rahner, Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung, Zürich 1945 (It. tr. Miti greci nell'interpretazione cristiana, Bologna 1971); J. Daniélou, Les symboles chrétiens primitifs, Paris 1961 (It. tr. I simboli cristiani primitivi, Rome 1990); E. Testa, Il simbolismo dei Giudeo-Cristiani, Jerusalem 1962; H. Rahner, Symbole der Kirche. Die Ekklesiologie der Väter, Salzburg 1964 (It. tr. L'ecclesiologia dei Padri: simboli della Chiesa, Rome 1971, repr. Cinisello Balsamo 1994); S. Sterckx - G. de Champeaux, Introduction au monde des symboles, La-Pierre-qui-vire 1966; A. Quacquarelli, L'ogdoade patristica e i suoi riflessi nella liturgia e nei monumenti, Bari 1973; R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition, Cambridge 1975; A. Quacquarelli, Il leone e il drago nella simbolica dell'età patristica, Bari 1975; M. Schmitt (ed.), Typus, Symbol, Allegorie bei den östlichen Vätern und ihren Parallelen im Mittelalter, Regensburg 1982; M. Bonino, Barche, navi e simboli navali nel cimitero di Priscilla: RivAC 59 (1983) 277-311; Lexikon der mittelalterlichen Zahlendbedeutungen, ed. H. Mayer - R. Suntry, Munich 1987; W. Bies, Bibliographie zur Symbolik, Ikonographie und Mythologie, Baden-Baden 1988; G. Spitzing, Lexikon byzantinisch-christlicher Symbole, Munich 1989; G. Biamonte, Dal segno pagano al simbolo cristiano: SMSR 16 (1992) 93-123; G.B. Ladner, Handbuch der frühchristlichen Symbolik, Gott Kosmos Mensch, Stuttgart-Zürich 1992 (Eng. tr.: God, Cosmos, and Humankind. The World of the Early Christian Symbolism, Berkeley, CA 1995); N. Gourdier, Le vêtement et l'alphabet mystique chez les coptes, in M. Rassart-Debergh - J. Ries (eds.), Actes du IVe congrès copte, Louvain-la-Neuve 1992, 135-140; Ch. Ratkowitsch, Die Edelsteinsymbolik in der lateinischen Dichtung des 11. und 12. Jahrhunderts: WS 105 (1992) 195-232; M. Dulaey, "Des forêts de symboles": l'initiation chrétienne et la Bible (Ier-VIe siècle), Paris 2001 (It. tr. I simboli cristiani. Catechesi e Bibbia (I-VI secolo), Cinisello Balsamo 2004); M.P. Ciccarese, Animali simbolici: alle origini del bestiario cristiano, Bologna 2002; I. Bodrozic, La numerologia in Sant'Agostino, Zagrabiae [s.n.] 2002; A. Di Pilla, La rondine nella letteratura cristiana greca e latina di epoca patristica, in Curiositas. Studi di cultura classica e medievale in onore di Ubaldo Pizzani, ed. A. Isola et al., Naples 2002, 423-459; S.J. Voicu, Adamo, acrostico del mondo: Apocrypha 2007.

S.J. Voicu

II. In art. Analogous to the literary production and the liturgical practice, the figurative documentation of the early Christian communities shows that they had left considerable room for the use of symbolic figuration. Its primary function was that of visibly synthesizing some of the fundamental principles of Christian teaching through a process of transposition, which allowed a coherent and immediate connection of the images. This process, which already in its first manifestations was configured surprisingly maturely, demanded the formation of a repertory acc. to a code of interpretation clearly illustrated in oral teaching (catechesis and homilies). Figures and scenes develop that, although evolving and becoming rich with meaning, still remain ideologically intact in substance and never lose the necessary capacity of transmitting the message. Symbolic language enjoyed a mature development over the course of the 3rd c., when a sort of discipline of the *arcane, which was natural and almost the necessary consequence of the general situation that opposed the spread of Christianity, could constitute and in fact did constitute a formidable element of cohesion for the early communities.

From the formal point of view, the figurative subjects used as symbols were obviously taken from the heritage of the Roman world in which—it is good to emphasize—esp. in the period of Late Antiquity a general tendency toward visual communication in symbolic language was widespread, esp. in funerary iconography. When necessary recourse was made to the same mythology of elaborate ideograms capable of expressing concepts of the faith of Christians: one thinks of the myths of Cupid, Psyche and *Orpheus frescoed in the catacombs of *Domitilla (Wp pl. 53) and St. *Callistus (Wp pl. 37), that is to say, into community cemeteries (which signifies that they were administrated directly by the ecclesiastical hierarchy); the Four Seasons; the Cupids; and the series of animals in which, through universal convention, were seen as reflections of the positive and negative human qualities. Evidently, it was held that specific mythological themes, at least as an instrument of communication, where not irreconcilable with Christian teaching.

Some of the most ancient and widespread symbols—those that appear primarily in the constitutive nuclei of the Roman cemeteries that are datable between the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd c.—refer to the person of Christ; and it is primarily in reference to Christ that Christian artists used such images as the fish, anchor and the lamb.

The fish, considered in relation to the Greek homologue ΙΧΘΥΣ, an acrostic of the series of words

Ἰ(ησοῦς) Χ(ριστός) Θ(εοῦ) Υ(ἱὸς) Σ(ωτήρ), seems to have been used since the beginning, esp. in the paintings and funerary slabs, and tends to disappear as eaerly as the advent of the Constantinian age. The famous and most ancient funerary poems of *Abercius of Hierapolis (Guarducci IV, n. 1, p. 377) and *Pektorious of Autun (Guarducci IV, n. 1, p. 487) explicitly mention the fish. At the beginning of the 3rd c., alongside a basket of bread and a chalice of wine—therefore in the context that evokes the salvific food of the *Eucharist—the fish was frescoed in a cubicle in the region of Cornelius from the cemetery of St. Callistus (Wp pl. 28). In certain scenes of the fish, as, e.g., on those of the frescoes in the cubicle "of the sacraments" in the cemetery of St. Callistus (Wp pl. 27,2-3), the fish can represent the faithful person who has been saved by Christ, the baptized person; this meaning found immediate influence in the famous passage from *Tertullian's De baptismo (I,3: CCL 1, p. 277), in which Christians are referred to as pisciculi ("little fish") and Christ as ἰχθύς. The anchor, likewise a very ancient image and often connected to the fish, was considered a symbol of hope and eternal life, and because of its form, an allusion to the cross of Christ. The combination anchor–fish, highly meaningful in content, occurs between the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd c. in a group of Greek and Latin inscriptions in the sandstone structure under the basilica Apostulorum on the Via Appia at *Rome (ICUR V, 12891, 12892, 12900). The hypothesis that the anchor represented on Christian monuments lacked any symbolic meaning (Stumpf, s.v. Anker: RAC I, 441) truly seems to be in clear contrast to the extant figurative documentation.

In the context of christological symbols the so-called stellar Christogram reentered, when it was not used as a compendium scripturae of Christ's name. Consisting of crossed Greek initials of the name Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, it appears very rarely in the West, although it enjoyed extensive use esp. in Asia Minor. Within the Christian world, its use was probably also favored by the fact that it, already during classical antiquity, was accepted as a generic symbol of divinity and light. At the beginning of the 4th c., this original type of Christogram replaced the so-called Constantinian (or deccusate) monogram, which came about as a result of the mixture, in one sign, of the first two letters of the name Χριστός. Heavily used primarily at Rome and esp. in funerary epigraphy, over the course of the 4th c. it progressively enriched in its symbolic meaning, with the use, on its sides, of the apocalyptic letters alpha and omega. Alongside the decussate forms, starting from the 4th c., another Christogram called the "monogrammatic cross" spread.

Some symbols allude directly to the faithful person seen in relation to earthly existence or, more properly, to the afterlife. Thus the sheep, esp. inserted in the context of the afterlife, is depicted as the image of the soul; in the same way the figuration of the *peacock should be interpreted, in which the concept of immortality is also to be understood. The two appear significantly together in a funerary description dedicated to a deceased person by the name of Aurelia Proba (ICUR III, 8787). Among the images alluding to the attainment of eternal salvation are the ship and the lighthouse, represented primarily on the funerary slabs, in which they often appear together.

To the allegorical images of life such as the race, to which St. Paul also makes frequent reference, are connected the figurations of the crown, the palm and the horse. Sitting on the palm or standing by itself, the mythical phoenix was depicted to symbolize the resurrection; it appears in frescoes (the so-called Greek chapel in the catacombs of St. Priscilla, which is perhaps the most ancient Christian figuration) and mosaics, likewise on the apses of basilicas (see, e.g., the basilica of Sts. *Cosmas and Damian at Rome). The palm and the crown enjoyed widespread diffusion; the latter esp., starting from the Constantinian age, was also configured as a symbol of *martyrdom, to become almost a constant theme in the *iconography of the martyrs on the walls of the hypogea and in the basilicas (e.g., the famous "procession" of male and female saints in the nave of the basilica of St. Apollinare a *Ravenna).

The vine—a polyvalent symbol because it is a natural part of human existence and allusive to blood, the vehicle of life and the ultimate price of sacrifice— not only generally refers to the heavenly refrigerium* but also acquires an *ecclesiological and *christological value in connection to Jn 15:1 and 15:5: Ego sum vitis vera, Ego sum vitis vos palmites; analogously the cluster of grapes can represent the vine under the form of an imago brevis, likewise alluding either to the fullness of Paradise's goods or in reference to the episode of the spies of *Israel in the land of Canaan (Num 13:1-26) to evoke the image of the promised land.

In addition to the goat and the lamb, the figurations most heavily used to symbolize the soul were the orans* and the dove. A figure, whether male or female, but always in a posture of prayer with hands extended (expansis manibus), the so-called orans found its formal antecedent in Roman pietas, but it did not intend to signify a request for help, but rather, as noted by de Bruyne (Les lois . . . , 12ff.) the state of the salvation that had been achieved. This explains how this act could be common to all the images, whether of the OT or the NT (*Noah, *Daniel, *Mary, a deceased person etc.). One should also consider the dove along the same lines, which is the image of the soul that has already entered heavenly rest, often displayed in isolation, in other cases resting on a tree or rather holding a palm or an olive branch in its beak, or also in the act of preparing itself for approaching a cantharus to quench its thirst or to nibble on a cluster of grapes. The surrounding elements that are associated with the image of the dove (trees, olives, palm branches, cantharus and grapes) acquire the function of characterizing the afterlife as the new view of paradise and, therefore, as a garden. Inserted into other contexts, the dove, however, could assume enhanced meanings: thus in scenes of the *baptism of Christ (see, e.g., Wp pls. 29,1; 27,3; 240,1), it represents the *Holy Spirit; in scenes of Noah and the ark in baptistery contexts, it is the bearer of peace; in scenes with the number twelve, it symbolizes the apostolic college (WMM, pl. 88, baptistery of Albenga); and finally, with the nimbus cloud, it signifies Christ among his apostles (the hypogeum of Leo in the catacomb of Commodilla at Rome: RivAC 34 [1958], 9 = J.G. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malerein, nr.5).

F.J. Dölger, ΙΧΘΥΣ, IV-V, Münster i.W. 1927-43; M. Guarducci, I graffiti sotto la confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, I-III, Vatican City 1958; J. Daniélou, Les symboles chrétiens primitifs, Paris 1961; E. Testa, Il simbolismo dei Giudeo-Cristiani, Jerusalem 1962; P. Bruun, Symboles signes monogrammes, in Sylloge Inscriptionum Christianarum Veterum Musei Vaticani, 2, Helsinki-Helsingfors 1963, 73-166; D. Mazzoleni, Origine e cronologia dei monogrammi: riflessi nelle iscrizioni dei Musei Vaticani, in I. Di Stefano Manzella (ed.), Le iscrizioni dei cristiani in Vaticano. Materiali e contributi scientifici per una mostra epigrafica (Inscriptiones Sanctae Sedis 2), Vatican City 1997, 165-168; C. Carletti, ΙΧΘΥΣ ΖΩΝΤΩΝ Chiose a ICVR, II 4246, in ΕΠΙΓΡΑΦΑΙ Miscellanea epigrafica in onore di Lidio Gasperini, ed. G. Paci, Rome 2000, 189-204; as well as the individual entries in the DACL, the LCI, the RivAC and in F. Bisconti (ed.), Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000. For the specific aforementioned themes, see L. de Bruyne, Les "lois" de l'art paléochrétien comme instrument herméneutique: RivAC 39 (1963) 7-92; P. Testini, Le catacombe e gli antichi cimiteri cristiani in Roma, Bologna 1966, 255-340, 359-366; H.W. Bartsch, Das alttestamentliche Bilderverbot und die frühchristliche Verwendung des Bildes im Wort und in den Anfängen christlicher Kunst: Symbolon 6 (1968) 150-178; P. Testini, Il sarcofago del Tuscolo: RivAC 52 (1976) esp. 72ff.; M. Guarducci, Epigrafia greca, IV, Rome 1978 (see also epigraphy*).

C. Carletti

SYMBOLUM NICAENUM, Commentarius in. Turner published in 1913, from a 9th-c. Vatican MS (Reg. Lat. 1997), an extensive commentary on the individual affirmations from the Council of *Nicaea's profession of faith (325) on the Father and the Son. The *Holy Spirit was only mentioned by name; the final part of the creed is not commented on because the anonymous author was only interested in refuting *Arian *Christology. The incipit of the commentary reads as follows: Fides quae a patribus nostris exposita est. The author weaves his entire discussion with biblical citations. He naturally appeals to the traditional texts: Pr 8:22-23, the prologue of the gospel of *John and Col 1:15. According to Turner, the Arian opponent could be Urbanus the bishop of Piacenza (who died after 381), which is suggested by the terms urbanitas (16,16) and urbanus (17,5). In any case, the composition of the work is situated within N *Italy to the 2nd half of the 4th c. on account of the biblical text used.

CPL 1745; PLS 1, 220-240. EOMIA I, 2, 1, 329-354; Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, ed. R. Herzog, Turnhout-Paris 1993, V, 553-554; PCBE 2, 2344-2345.

A. Di Berardino

SYMBOLUM NICAENUM, Enarratio in. This ancient commentary on the Nicene Creed, transmitted in a MS from the Biblioteca Capitolare di Verona, is attributed to *Athanasius. The text was attributed to *Vigilius of Thapsus by its first editor, Bianchini. But it seems that it was written in *Gaul. The incipit reads as follows: Una fides, sed non in omnibus una mensura est. Each affirmation from the creed is briefly explained; the last pertains to "holy mother church." The explanation of faith and the *Holy Spirit is interesting, the fullness of whose divinity is affirmed: the three persons of the unius Deitatis.

CPL 1744a; PLS 1, 786-790; Nouvelle histoire de la littérature latine, ed. R. Herzog, Turnhout-Paris 1993, V, 554.

A. Di Berardino

SYMMACHIAN FORGERIES. A group of falsifications composed early in the 6th c. in defense of Pope *Symmachus at the time of the *Laurentian schism. There are 11 documents, the most important of which are (1) Constitutum Silvestri (PL 8, 829-840; 8,822-824), (2) Gesta Liberii (PL 8,1388-1393), (3) Gesta de Xysti purgatione (PLS 3,1249-1252), (4) Gesta de Polichronii Jerosol. epicopi accusatione (PLS 3,1252-1255) and (5) Synodus Sinuessana or Gesta Marcellini (PL 6,11-20; Mansi 1,1249-1257). All of these documents are important for their ecclesiastical discipline and papal prerogatives, and greatly influenced canon law. Soon inserted in some canonical collections, they were widely circulated (in the Dionysio-Hadriana, but only at a later point, in the Collectio Sanblasiana); they also influenced the compiling of the Liber pontificalis.

The Constitutum Silvestri is a collection of 20 canons from a false Roman synod of 284 bishops, held at *Rome (at Trajan's baths) in the presence of the emperor *Constantine in 324, before the Council of *Nicaea; the supposed synod condemned a Bishop Victorius, who had published false Easter cycles. It also contains norms making it difficult to bring accusations against members of the clergy. All of the texts that followed are in some way a concrete application of these norms in four specific cases. There is a different redaction of a synod of 275 bishops (Synodus CCLXXV episcoporum), held after the Council of Nicaea on 25 September 325. This text has many similarities, though many differences as well, with respect to the other redaction. Gesta Liberii tell of events concerning Pope *Liberius (352–366) at the time of the emperor Constantius. The Gesta de Xysti purgatione relate a trial against Pope Sixtus (432–440), accused of immoral habits, in the basilica of St. Helen (Santa Croce), which took place in the presence of the pope himself and of the emperor *Valentinian; the pope was acquitted, and the accusers died—the point being to defend the thesis that the pope cannot be judged by anyone. The Gesta de Polichronii accusatione speaks of Pope Sixtus's interventions regarding Polychronius the bishop of *Jerusalem, who had been accused by another bishop, and his consequent acquittal. In the apocrypha of the Synodus Sinuessana the thesis is affirmed that prima sedes a nemine iudicatur: Pope *Marcellinus (296–304) sacrificed to the gods in a time of persecution, but is not condemned in an episcopal assembly but exhorted to condemn himself.

CPL 1679-1682; B. Mombrizio, Sanctuarium seu Vitae Sanctorum, Milan 1479, repr. New York 1978, II, 508-531; LP CXXXIV-CXXXV; P. De Leo, Ricerche sui falsi medievali, I, Il "Constitum Constantini": Compilazione agiografica del sec. VIII, Reggio Calabria 1975, 151-221; DTC 14,2986-2990; Le concile romain de 498, in Hefele-Leclercq II, 1349-1366; S. Kuttner, Notes of the Medieval Trasmission of the Constitutum Silvestri: Traditio 3 (1945) 203f.; R.-J. Laenertz, Actus Sylvestri. Genèse: RHE 70 (1975) 426-439; F. Parente, Qualche appunto sugli Actus Beati Silvestri: Rivista Storica Italiana 90 (1978) 878-897; G. Zecchini, I "gesta de Xysti purgation" e le fazioni aristocratiche a Roma alla metà del V secolo: RSCI 34 (1980) 60-74; W. Pohlkamp, Textfassungen, literarische Formen und geschichtliche Funktionen der römischen Silvester-Akten: France 19/1 (1992) 115-196; S. Vacca, Prima sedes a nemine iudicatur. Genesi e sviluppo storico dell'assioma fino al Decreto di Graziano, Rome 1993 (Symmachus, 33-78); E. Wirbelauer, Zwei Päpste in Rom, Munich 1993 (with ed. and Ger. tr. of the apocrypha, 238-342); P.V. Aimone, Le falsificazioni simmachiane: Apollinaris 68 (1995) 205-220; T. Sardella, Stato e chiesa nell'età teodericiana: papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; S. Vacca, Il principio "Prima sedes a nemine iudicatur." Genesi e sviluppo fino a Papa Simmaco (498-514), in Il papato di San Simmaco: 498–514, eds. G. Mele - N. Spaccapelo, Cagliari 2000, 153-190; A. Fadda, "Prima sedes a nemine iudicatur." Rilevanza e conseguenze di un principio ecclesiologico, in ibid., 337-349; P.V. Aimone, Gli autori delle falsificazioni simmachiane, in ibid., 53-72; EPapi, I, 328-332; V. Aiello, Cronaca di una eclisse. Osservazioni sulla vicenda di Silvestro I vescovo di Roma, in Tardoantico alle soglie del duemila. Diritto religione e società, Pisa 2002, 229-248.

A. Di Berardino

SYMMACHIANS. *Jewish-Christian sect mentioned only by Latin Christian writers. They took their origin from the Pharisees (*Ambrosiaster) or from *James (*Marius Victorinus). *Filaster's comment that the Symmachians were libertines is in opposition to their supposed Jewish background. There is no concrete information on this group aside from what is found in the writings of Marius Victorinus, who wrote that they said that Jesus was *Adam and the anima generalis (In epist. ad Gal. 1,15).

A.F.J. Klijn - G.J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence for Jewish Christian Sects, in Supplements to Novum Testamentum 36, Leiden 1973, 52-54; M. Tardieu, Les symmachiens de Marius Victorinus et ceux du manichéen Faustus, in Le judéo-christianisme dans tous ses états, ed. S.C. Mimouni, Paris 2001, 322-334.

A.F.J. Klijn

SYMMACHUS, Aurelius Anicius (ca. 380–ca. 430). Grandson of the famous orator Quintus Aurelius *Symmachus and related to the noble family of the Anicii; he was the proconsul Africae (415) and praefectus urbis (24 December 418–early 420). Anicius Symmachus played a role of primary importance during the troubled events pertaining to the election of the successor of Pope *Zosimus (d. 26 December 418). Disagreements and mutual accusations in fact determined the splitting of the Roman clergy in favor of the two candidates *Eulalius, the *archdeacon of the basilica of St. *Lawrence, and the priest *Boniface. Symmachus had the duty of informing the court at *Ravenna and esp. *Galla Placidia, who supported Boniface, on the uncertain course of the papal election. His letters have been preserved in the Collectio Avellana (Epistulae 14-34, from 28 December 418 to 8 April 419). Symmachus's intervention was therefore decisive at *Easter of 419: he brought about the liberation of the Lateran basilica, in which Eulalius and his supporters had shut themselves, and restored it to Bishop *Achilleus of Spoleto, who had come to Rome to preside over the Paschal celebrations. This event determined the defeat of Boniface's adversary, who no longer provided obstacles to the succession.

PWK 23/1, 1158-1159; Fliche-Martin IV, 549; PLRE II, 1043-1044; S.J.B. Barnish, Transformation and Survival in the Western Senatorial Aristocracy, c. AD 400-700: PBSR 56 (1988) 120-155; A. Cameron, Cassiodorus, Jordanes and the Anicii: 11th Byzantine Studies Conference, Toronto 1985; G.A. Cecconi, Governo imperiale ed élites dirigenti nell'Italia tardoantica: problemi di storia politicoamministrativa, 270-476 d.C., Como 1994; A. Marcone, Late Roman Social Relations: CAH² XIII, Cambridge 1998, 338-370; EPapi 1, 398-403.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

SYMMACHUS, exegete. Exegete of the 5th c. who is otherwise unknown, the presumed author of a Commentary on the Song of Songs, an extensive fragment of which remains in a *Syriac version. On the basis of a recurring abbreviation in the catena on the Proverbs from Codex Vaticanus Graecus 1802, some scholars have thought that Symmachus also commented on the book of Proverbs, but the hypothesis is subject to debate.

CPG 6547: C. van den Eynde, La version syriaque du Commentaire de Grégoire de Nysse sur le Cantique des Cantiques (Bibliothèque du Muséon 10), Louvain 1939, 77-89 (text), 104-116 (Fr. tr.); M. Faulhaber, Hohelied, Proverbien- und Prediger-Catenen, Vienna 1902, 90-94; G. Mercati, Pro Symmacho, in Nuove note di letteratura biblica e cristiana antica (ST 95), Rome 1941, 91-93; M. Richard, Les fragments du commentaire de S. Hippolyte sur les Proverbes de Salomon: Muséon 78 (1965) 286-287 and Muséon 80 (1967) 356, n. 41 (= Opera minora, Turnhout-Leuven 1976, n. 17); LMA 8, 368; Patrologia V, 265-635.

F. Scorza Barcellona

SYMMACHUS, pope (498–514). A native of *Sardinia, Symmachus was elected by the majority, which was dissatisfied with the pro-Byzantine politics of *Anastasius II, although the minority chose *Laurentius. Despite *Theodoric's interventions, the dissidents remained within the Roman community. The very synod (501), which acc. to the intention of the king of the *Goths had to make a decision, declared that Symmachus as the bishop of the first see did not have to be called before any human tribunal (MGH, Auct. ant. XII,416-437). The entire *schism reflected the differences between the clergy and the Senate, between *Rome and Byzantium, as well as the tendency to liberate the affairs the church from every foreign influence. For four years Symmachus's role was limited. Only when Theodoric abandoned Laurentius and his pro-Byzantine followers did Symmachus enter the full exercise of his prerogatives. He defended orthodoxy against the so-called Henoticon. He helped the Catholics who were persecuted by *Arian leaders. He established *Caesarius of Arles as the primate of *Gaul and *Spain. During his pontificate, *Sigismund of Burgundy came to Rome, and perhaps *Clovis I was baptized. Forgeries attributed to Pope Symmachus also date back to his time. The author of the *Symmachian forgeries attempted to demonstrate the adage: prima sedes a nemine iudicatur. Here is a list of these texts: Gesta de Xysti purgatione (PLS 3,1249-1255), Synodi Sinuessanae de Marcellino papa (PL 6,11-20), Gesta Liberii (PL 8,1388-1393) and Constitutum Sylvestri (PL 8,829-840). Under the reign of Pope Symmachus important councils were held at Rome.

CPL 1678-1682; Thiel I, 641-734; LP I, 44-46, 260-268; III, 87-88. A. Alessandrini, Teodorico e papa Simmaco durante lo scisma laurenziano: Archivio della Società romana di Storia patria 67 (1944) 152-207; G.B. Picotti, I sinodi romani nello scisma laurenziano, in Studi in onore di G. Volpe, II, Florence 1958, 741-786; G. Sigismondi, I sinodi simmachiani e la sede episcopale di Nocera Umbra: Boll. di Deput. di Storia Patria Umbra 59 (1962) 5-42; H. Fuhrmann, Die Fälschungen im Mittelalter: Historische Zeitschrift 197 (1963) 529-554; G. Zecchini, I "Gesta de Xysti purgatione" e le fazioni aristocratiche a Roma alla metà del V secolo: RSCI 34 (1980) 60-74; W. Wirbelauer, Zwei Päpste in Rom, Munich 1993; S. Vacca, Prima sedes a nemine iudicatur, Rome 1993, 33-78; J.D. Alchermes, Petrine Politics: Pope S. and the Rotunda of St. Andrew: CHR 81 (1995) 1-40; Patrologia IV, 132-134 (bibl.); T. Sardella, Società, chiesa e stato nell'età di Teoderico: papa Simmaco e lo scisma laurenziano, Soveria Mannelli 1996; EPapi 1, 464-473; LTK³ 9, 1166-1167; LACL (2002) 662-663; G. Pilara, Ancora un momento di riflessione sulla politica italiana di Teoderico re dei Goti: StudRom 53/3-4 (2005) 431-469.

B. Studer

SYMMACHUS, Quintus Aurelius (340–402). Symmachus played an important role in the public and religious life of the empire. A member of the council of the crown in 369 at tertii ordinis, he was nominated proconsul of *Africa in 373 under *Valentinian I, praefectus urbis around 384 under the emperor *Valentinian II, consul with *Theodosius in 391. Ambrose's De exc. fratris (I,32) and a letter written by Symmachus (Ep. I,63) allude to a possible familial relationship between the two. More certain is their friendship in youth from the Roman period and their unwavering mutual respect (see Ambrose, Ep. 17,6; 57,2) even during the controversy over the *Altar of Victory. After the second removal of this altar, decreed by the emperor *Gratian in 382, the Senate requested its restitution through Symmachus in vain. In 384 Symmachus (Relatio III) presented to Valentinian II the remonstrance of his companions who were of pagan belief, recalling the empire's religious heritage and calling for the abrogation of the chief antipagan measures decreed by Gratian in 382. Symmachus's protest had no hope for success because of Ambrose's intervention (Ep. 17 and 18) in the presence of Valentinian II. Toward the end of 389, Ambrose (Ep. 57,4) returned to the problem of the Altar of Victory following a new petition made by Symmachus. Symmachus's theses in Relatio III and the refutation of these offered by Ambrose would be taken up again by the poet *Prudentius in his two books Against Symmachus. At the origin of the controversy between Symmachus and Ambrose was the conflict between politics and religion: for the Roman tradition which in the 4th c. had in Symmachus its foremost proponent, such a relationship was of close alliance; for Christianity this relationship was one of distinction, even though with difficulties and contradictions which, in the practical sphere, such a distinction brought with it.

MGH, Auct. ant. VI, 1; F. Paschoud, Réflexions sur l'idéal religieux de Symmaque: Historia 14 (1965) 215-235; F. Canfora, Simmaco e Ambrogio o di un'antica controversia sulla tolleranza e sull'intolleranza, Bari 1970; R. Klein, Symmachus. Eine tragische Gestalt des ausgehenden Heidentums, Darmstadt 1971; Id., Der Streit um den Victoriaaltar. Die dritte Relatio des Symmachus und die Briefe 17, 18 und 57 des Mailänder Bischof Ambrosius, Darmstadt 1972; F. Zuddas Del Chicca, Rassegna di studi simmachiani: StudRom 20 (1972) 526-540; M. Forlin Patrucco - S. Roda, Le lettere di Simmaco ad Ambrogio. Vent'anni di rapporti amichevoli, in Ambrosius episcopus. Atti del Congr. int. di studi ambrosiani, II, Milan 1976, 284-297; P. Meloni, Il tempo e la storia in Simmaco e Ambrogio: SSR I (1977) 105-123; Id., Il rapporto fra impegno politico e fede religiosa in Simmaco e Ambrogio: Sandalion 1 (1978) 153-169; M. Sordi, L'impero romano cristiano. Problemi politici, religiosi, culturali, Rome 1991; PCBE II, 2143-2144.

M.G. Mara

SYMMACHUS, Quintus Aurelius Memmius (ca. 450–525). Historian and orator, great-grandson of the famous Quintus Aurelius Symmachus. Consul (485) and patricius, he was the most authoritative proponent of the Senate during the reign of *Theodoric, whose objective of weakening the Senate he tried to contain. After the death of his son-in-law *Boethius (524), he was suspected of treason and executed. *Ennodius mentions him among the most learned of his time. Symmachus was very culturally active. He revised Macrobius's commentary on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis—which bore the famous subtitle: Aurelius Memmius Symmachus v. c. emendabam vel distinguebam meum (sc. exemplar) Ravennae cum Macrobio Plotio Eudoxio v. c. He also compiled a History of Rome in seven books, which has not been preserved and which is clearly marked by a Christian spirit. He had cultural exchanges with Boethius (Cons. phil. 1,40,40 and 2,4,5), Ennodius, *Cassiodorus and the grammarian *Priscian.

PWK 23/1, 1160; KLP 5, 446; Schanz IV, 2, 83-84; PLRE II, 1044-1046; W. Ensslin, Des Symmachus Historia romana als Quelle für Iordanes, Munich 1949; A. Momigliano, Gli Anicii e la storiografia latina del VI sec. d.C.: RAL ser. 8ª 11 (1956) 279-297; G. Della Valle, Teodorico e Roma: Rendiconti Acc. Archeol. Lett. Belle Arti Naples 34 (1959) 119-176; A. Chastagnol, Le sénat romain sous le règne d'Odoacre: Recherches sur l'épigraphie du Colisée au Vᵉ siècle, Bonn 1966; B. Luiselli, Note sulla perduta Historia Romana di Quinto Aurelio Memmio Simmaco: Studi Urbinati 49 (1975) 529-535; L. Cracco Ruggini, Nobiltà romana e potere nell'età di Boezio, in Atti del Congr. Int. di studi boeziani, Rome 1981, 73-96; R.S. Bagnall et al. (eds.), Consuls of the Later Roman Empire, Atlanta 1987, s.v.; S.J.B. Barnish, Transformation and Survival in the Western Senatorial Aristocracy, c. AD 400–700: PBSR 56 (1988) 120-155; A. Marcone, Late Roman Social Relations: CAH² XIII, Cambridge 1998, 338-370; M. Humphries, Italy A.D. 425–605: CAH² XIV, Cambridge 2000, 525-551.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

SYMMACHUS, translator (late 2nd c.). The author of a Greek translation of the Hebrew text of the OT, which in Origen's Hexapla* occupies the column after the translation of *Aquila and before that of the Septuagint (LXX) and *Theodotion. *Eusebius of Caesarea, who considered Symmachus an *Ebionite, mentions him as the author of biblical commentaries that Origen received from a certain Juliana, who received them from Symmachus himself (HE VI,17; see also Dem. ev. VII,1. With respect to this Juliana, see the information provided by *Palladius in Hist. Laus. 64, ed. Bartelink, 272).

*Jerome also considered Symmachus an Ebionite and added that he wrote commentaries on the gospel of *Matthew, on the basis of which he attempted to confirm his doctrinal teachings (Vir. ill. 54). According to *Epiphanius, however, Symmachus was a *Samaritan who converted to *Judaism (Mens. 16).

H.J. Schoeps, Aus frühchristlicher Zeit. Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, Tübingen 1950, 82-119; N. Fernández Marcos, Bibbia dei Settanta, Brescia 2000.

S. Zincone

SYMPHOROSA. On 28 July the Mart. hier. mentions Symphorosa (= Helper) and her seven sons (Peter, Marcellinus, Gennaro, Dionysius, Symphonius, Clement, Germanus and also Irenaeus) (Mart. hier. 382) at *Rome on the Via Tiburtina. It also only mentions for 29 May the memorial of the seven brothers (Romae via Tiburtina) (Mart. hier. 382) at Rome on the Via Tiburtina, as well as for 27 June, but with different names (Mart. hier. 337: Crispus, Crispinianus, Felix etc.). A brief Passion narrates that the emperor *Hadrian (d. 138), during the occasion of the inauguration of his villa at Tivoli, upon the complaint of the members of the constitutional court, ordered that the widow Symphorosa sacrifice in the temple of Hercules. Upon refusing to worship the gods, the widow, whose husband Getulius was martyred along with Amantius, who were both tribunals of the emperor, was thrown with a rock on her neck into the Aniene River. Her brother Eugenius recovered the body. Her seven sons (Cresens, Julian, Nemesius, Primitivus, Justin, Stracteus and Eugenius) were then put to death for the Christian faith. The names of the sons mentioned in the passion are different from those in the Mart. hier., which drew on other sources, and are also reported by the Roman Martyrology for 18 July (p. 294). All the sources agree that the martyrdom occurred on the Via Tiburtina at the ninth mile (or the eighth mile). The passion adds that their bodies rest at the ninth mile of the Via Tiburtina. The 7th-c. text De locis sanctis martyrum vaguely places their tomb in the vicinities of the basilica of St. Lawrence at the Verano cemetery but without other specifications because the pilgrim had not visited it. Bosius discovered the remains of the basilica in a small town called "Seven Brothers" at the ninth mile of the Via Tiburtina, a discovery confirmed by other observers. Stephenson studied the remains of the basilica of Symphorosa at the ninth mile: the most ancient phase could date back to the 4th c. and was enlarged over the course of the 5th. According to an inscription discovered in 1640, the relics were taken to Rome at the time of a pope by the name of Stephen (perhaps Pope Stephen III [752–757]) in the church of St. Michael the Archangel (or St. Angel in Pescheria) in the portico of Octavia; acc. to another text (De laudibus Papiae) these are to be found at Pavia. It is not to be ruled out that only a few bones were taken to Pavia, although the others remained at Rome.

BHL 2971; AASS., Iulii IV, Venezia 1748, 350-359 (Sp. tr.: D. Ruiz Bueno, Actas de los mártires, Madrid 1951, 259-262); EC 9, 700-701; DACL 15, 1817-1822; BS 11, 1218-1229; LTK³ 9, 1167-1168; BBKL 11, 367-368; A. Bosio, Roma sotterranea, Rome 1650 (repr. 1998), 105-109; E. Stevenson, Scoperta della basilica di Santa Sinforosa e dei setti figli al nono miliario della Via Tiburtina, Rome 1878; H. Delehaye, Les origines du culte des martyrs, Brussels ²1933, 278; Id., Étude sur le légendier romain, Brussels 1936, 121-123; R. Valentini - G. Zucchetti, Codice topografico della città di Roma, II, Rome 1942 (repr. Turin 1982), 114.

A. Di Berardino

SYMPHOSIUS (Symposius). The Anthologia Salmasiana*, so called by the humanist Saumaise, who discovered it (cod. Parisinus 10318), contains 100 Aenigmata ("puzzles") in hexameters of a certain Symphosius, who lived between the 5th and 6th c., belonging to the Carthaginian milieu. One particular scholar maintains that the name indicates no specific person, but refers to the term "symposium." The collection also had an autonomous MS tradition, and at times the Aenigmata were used in other collections (see CCL 133,612-615 on the MS tradition). The author also alludes to Christian authors, and the text was much used during the Middle Ages. He expresses his concrete world of various topics by making use of the first person; he preferred the use of paradox. Every enigma is dedicated to a specific subject; many pertain to plants and animals.

CPL 1517; ed. F. Bücheler - A. Riese, Anthologia latina I, 1, Leipzig 1894, 221-246; F. Glorie, CCL 133A, 621-721; ed. R. Shackleton Bailey, Anthologia Latina, I: Carmina in codicibus scripta, Fasc. I: Libri Salmasiani aliorumque carmina, Stuttgart 1982; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Para la crítica de los Aenigmata de Sinfosio: Helmantica 28 (1977) 121-136; M. Spallone, Il Par. lat. 10138 (Salmasiano): dal manoscritto alto-medievale ad una raccolta enciclopedica tardo-antica: Italia Medievale e Umanistica 25 (1982) 1-71; M. Spallone, Symphosius o Symposius? Un problema di fonetica nell'Anthologia Latina: Quaderni dell'Ist. di Lingua e lett. latina 4 (1982) 41-48; Z. Pavlovskis, The Riddler's Microcosm. From Symphosius to St. Boniface: C&M 39 (1988) 219-251; M. Bergamin, Note a Simposio: Atti e Memorie dell'Acc. Virgiliana 62 (1994) 37-68; J. Pizarro Sánchez, Estructura y tipología de los "Aenigmata Symphosii": CFC(L) 16 (1999) 239-246.

A. Di Berardino

SYMPRONIANUS (4th c.). A learned Spanish *Novatian, only known through the three letters that *Pacian sent to him; these documents allow us to reconstruct his thought. Sympronianus, first and without having met him, wrote to Pacian asking him for explanations on the use of the title Catholic, on penitence and on repentance (Pacian, Ep. 1). Responding to Pacian, Sympronianus sent him a letter and a treatise, where he maintained that "repentance, after baptism, does not exist; the church cannot forgive mortal *sin; in fact the church self-destructs by readmitting sinners" (Pacian, Ep. 3,1: PL 13,1065). He demonstrated his theses by making recourse to the *Scriptures and adducing theological arguments.

CPL 784; PL 13, 1051-1082; L. Rubio Fernández, San Paciano. Obras, Barcelona 1958, 48-134; L. Wohleb, Bischof Pacianus von Barcelona und seiner Gegner Novatianer Sympronianus: Spanische Forschungen der Görresgesellschaft 2 (1930) 25-35; Schanz VI, 1, 369; Patrologia III, 124-126; Domínguez del Val 1, 390ff.

A. Di Berardino

SYNAGOGUE. The institution of the synagogue had a pivotal role in the development of Judaism both before and after the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem, which occurred in AD 70. The synagogue had numerous functions, which were not only religious: readings and study of the law, communal prayer, resolution of legal questions, civic administration, common meals and a hospice for foreigners.

The origin of the synagogue, both as an institution and as a building, is still unclear. The first references to an assembly are found in the Bible, which in many passages mentions a group of Jews who gathered to listen to the prophets (Ezek 11:16). Some authors from the 1st c. BC referred to the synagogue by comparing it to the Roman collegia. Around 45 BC the collegia were prohibited by Julius Caesar, with the exception of those of the Jews, because they were considered among the most ancient. In sources from the 1st c., there are reports of synagogues both in Palestine and in the Diaspora. *Philo tells us about the synagogue of *Alexandria (Ad Gaium 156 Vita Mosis 2,216; De Somniis 2,156), Flavius Josephus mentions the synagogue of Tiberius, in which gatherings were held after prayer (Vita 77). In the NT frequent mention is made of the synagogue. The term synagōgē occurs 56 times in the NT, a good 34 of which occur in the Lukan corpus (i.e., the gospel and the Acts of the Apostles). The term proseuchē is found therein with the most common meaning of "prayer"; only in two places could it refer to a place of gathering (Acts 16:13-16).

The birth of a building for gathering within Judaism is a debated topic among scholars. Some maintain that one must go back to the period before the Babylonian exile, even to *Moses, acc. to a common idea starting from the 1st c. AD. On the origin of the synagogue, various hypotheses have been formulated in modern times. Some date the institution before the exile, to the time of the prophet Jeremiah. Others push the date back to the period of the reform made at the time of King Josiah, around 621, who prohibited worship in the temples on the high places in favor of the temple of Jerusalem (2 Kgs 23; Ps 74:8). Others hold that the synagogue arose during the Babylonian exile. The destruction of the temple in 586 and the subsequent deportation brought about the birth of the religious assemblies, which were not tied to cultic sacrifice, thanks to the rise of charismatic figures like the prophet Ezekiel. The synagogue, which arose in Babylon, then developed in Palestine. Finally, one can conclude, on the basis of epigraphic and archaeological evidence, that the first synagogues were seen in Egypt and the rest of the Diaspora starting from the 3rd c. BC, although in *Palestine they can be detected only from the Hasmonean era. The synagogue definitively was born as part of a gradual process during the period of the second temple. Its remote origins are perhaps to be sought in the assemblies that were held near the city entrance, which during the entire biblical period was the place of many activities, similar to those that were then held in the synagogue. The transferral of these activities from one open place to an enclosed building gradually occurred during the Hellenistic era, probably in the late 2nd or early 1st c. BC. Therefore, one can come to some firm conclusions: starting from the 2nd c. BC, one can verify a definite bond between the sabbath and the communal reading of the law, starting from the account of the assembly that gathered to listen to the biblical reading made by Ezra the scribe (Neh 8–10), which became a model to imitate, in an assembly different from that of the temple, but not at all opposed to the latter; substantial transformations to the institution of the synagogue occurred over the course of the 2nd c. AD, when the synagogue assumed a specifically liturgical role in replacing the sacrificial cult of the temple of Jerusalem, which by that point had disappeared (Perrot, DBS 13,686). Starting from the 3rd c. BC, certain epigraphic testimonies attest to the existence of the proseuchai, buildings in which the Jews gathered in an assembly, in *Egypt as well as in *Rome, and even at Tiberias (Flavius Josephus, Vita 277). Only starting from the 1st c. AD was the term synagōgē imposed to refer to the building for the assemblies.

The birth of the proseuchai is to be framed within the Hellenistic cultural context. There existed, in fact, in the Hellenistic world associations, corporations, groups of various types with cultural, religious and social ends. The Jewish proseuchai, therefore, responded to a twofold demand: that of setting themselves up as a well-defined entity, from the legal point of view, like the pagan corporations, and that of gathering the Jewish community that was far from the temple of Jerusalem together for prayer. In Egypt, first Ptolemy III and then Ptolemy V undertook a political action of restoration of the temples and the various cults. This had an influence on the numerous Jewish communities in Egypt. Scholars are aware of more than one Jewish temple from this period in Egypt. The most famous is that of Yaho at Elephantine, but there is also information from temples in Cyrenaica, at Leontopolis, at Iraq el-Amir, at Lakish, and esp. from the Samaritan temple on Gerizim. It is likely that these temples were built at the behest of the Ptolemies, who intended to oppose the centrality of the temple of Jerusalem and to weaken the bond between the Jews of the Diaspora and their homeland. The synagogue of *Antioch mentioned by Flavius Josephus (Jewish War 7,44-145) was perhaps also built at the behest of the Seleucid Demetrius I Soter (162–150 BC) with the same purpose. At Rome there is evidence of Jewish "private altars" in 139 BC (Valerius Maximus, De Superstitionibus I,3,3). The proseuchai were tied to sabbath prayer, notes Josephus (Against Apion I,209); the historian Agatharchides of Cnidus (181–146 BC) says that the Jews were accustomed to rest on the sabbath and not to do anything except gather together in sacred places (hieroi) toward the evening to pray with hands lifted up (Philo, In Flaccum 48-49). The proseuchai were also the schools that were modeled after the style of the philosophical didaskaleia, in which people were taught to live acc. to the principles of the law (Vita Mosis 2,216). Well attested as well were the practices of the funerary college and commercial activities connected to the proseuchē.

The importance of the function that the proseuchai acquired within the Diaspora starting from the 3rd c. BC immediately had a certain amount of influence in Palestine. After the ethnic-religious reawakening during the Maccabean era, religious circles began to develop, esp. of the rabbinic-Pharisaic extraction, in which legal questions were discussed in light of the Mosaic law. The synagogues in Israel were therefore born with a well-distinguished cultural function reserved for the temple of Jerusalem: the hearing and the learning of the law on the sabbath (Flavius Josephus, Against Apion II,175). The first synagogues therefore responded to the demand, always increasingly felt in the Pharisaic milieu, of celebrating the sabbath (2 Macc 8:27; 12:38; Neh 9:14). Over the course of the 1st c. AD the bond became evident (Flavius Josephus, Against Apion II,175; Philo, Quod omnis probus 81), also thanks to the decree of Halicarnassus mentioned by Flavius Josephus (Antiquities 14,258). From this moment onward, the places in which the sabbath gatherings took place had their own well-established architectural tradition, so that already in the 1st c. BC Augustus's edict mentioned by Flavius Josephus (Antiquities 16,164) referred to the building, calling it the "house the sabbath" (sabbateion). The first synagogues, in contrast to the proseuchai at Egypt constructed and dedicated by the authorities, were simple spaces or buildings, which would acquire increasing importance with the passing of time, to the point of adopting some specific aspects even from the architectural point of view.

On the basis of what was said in the Jerusalem Talmud (*Meg.*73d), there were 480 (or 394) synagogues at Jerusalem. This exaggerated number could only be an indication of the existence of many of these buildings at Jerusalem during the 1st c. AD. In any case, the book of Acts attests to the existence of many synagogues at Jerusalem (Acts 6:9; 24:12). In this regard, the testimony given to us by the anonymous pilgrim of Bordeaux, who came to Jerusalem in 333, should be mentioned. This individual says that of the seven synagogues that were on Mount Zion, only one had remained (Baldi, Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum, 729).

While until AD 70 the buildings used for the reading and the study of the law of Moses did not have architectural characteristics that distinguished them from others, after the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem they began to acquire well-defined characteristics. The classical theory on the development of the synagogue, elaborated by Khol and Watzinger, well emphasizes the three chief types of synagogue building that can be found in Palestine from the 2nd c. until the 7th c. AD. The type called "Galilean" was made in a basilica-form layout, with three doors on the monumental façade which faces Jerusalem, with two aisles of columns on the sides and one on the back wall dividing the central space from those on the three sides, occupied in part by a flight of stairs that runs along the walls. The direction of prayer was probably toward the S, i.e., toward Jerusalem, although the place in which the scroll of the law was preserved and the place from which the reading was proclaimed are difficult to identify. The most beautiful example of this type of synagogue is that of Capernaum, along with that of Baram, Chorazim and Meron. The oblong rectangular layout type, also called "transitional" or "Jewish," oriented the prayer on one of the long sides, which also often contained a niche in which the scrolls of the law were placed. The following synagogues belong to this type of synagogue: Beth Shearim, Ein Ghedhi and Hammat Tiberias. The third type takes up the basilica layout, with two rows of columns and an apse in the back to preserve the scrolls and to indicate the direction of prayer. The following synagogues are of this type: Beth Alpha, Na'aran and Ma'oz.

Although from the typological point of view this tripartite model can still be accepted today, questions pertaining to the chronological development are very much debated. In particular one can no longer maintain, in light of the archaeological data, that the Galilean type was the most ancient, dating back to the 2nd–4th c., when it is certain that the synagogue of Capernaum ought to be dated at the end of the 4th or beginning of the 5th c. Therefore, many synagogues that were considered to be the most ancient are today dated to the 4th, 5th or 6th c. (Meroth, Capernaum and Nabratein). The synagogue of Khirbet Sheamaʿ, a clear example of the transition type, was constructed in the 3rd c.; thus it turns out to be contemporaneous to the synagogue of Meiron, a classic example of the Galilean type. The most ancient phase of the synagogue of Hammat Tiberias encloses all the elements characteristic of the three various types. Some synagogues from the Golan Heights, which in certain aspects recall the most ancient type and others the most recent, were constructed between the 5th and 7th c. It is therefore more likely that the first two types of buildings coexisted until the 5th or 6th c., the period that is said to mark the third type.

Another highly debated question is that of the synagogue building's orientation. To identify the direction of prayer in ancient synagogue buildings, archaeologists have used some rigorous criteria that can be broken down into the following points: the building's architectural elements, columns, apse and niche; the direction toward which the Jewish symbols were designed in the mosaic floors; the furnishings present in the synagogue hall, like a platform or screen; and the external form of the building, in particular the layout of the door. Looking at the archaeological data, it is possible to assume as valid the hypothesis that around the 4th c. the majority of synagogue buildings were facing Jerusalem, although examples that go against this convention are not lacking. However, it is also true that it has not yet been confirmed that there was just one type of building. Starting in the 5th c. some Jewish communities, those that lived near the urban centers of a certain importance and therefore in close contact with the Christian communities which by that point had been well-rooted, adapted the basilica layout, which had become a typical form of the churches, to meet the demands of their meetings and worship services. Therefore, a century after the basilica with an apse had become a standard element for buildings of Christian worship, some Jewish communities adopted the same model (Milson, Art and Architecture, 84-105).

The synagogue architecture has more than one precedent. The Roman basilica certainly had an essential role in the inspiration of the Galilean type, although for the second type the prototypes must be sought in the triclinium of the Hellenistic age, in some Nabataean temples and in the bouleuterion of many Hellenistic cities. Finally, for the third model, in the basilica form with an apse, the Christian basilica of the *Byzantine age certainly played a foundational role.

The most widespread terms to refer to the building for Jewish gatherings were proseuchē, a term used in the most ancient inscriptions found in Egypt and elsewhere starting from the 3rd c. BC, and synagōgē, a term used to refer to the worship building, only starting from the 1st c. AD, as shown by the inscription from Berenice dated to AD 56. At Jerusalem the term was used before AD 70 in the Theodotos inscription. In addition to these two terms, less widespread words were recorded, such as sabbateion or sambatheion ("house/place of the sabbath"—Flavius Josephus, Antiquities 16,164: CIG 752), proseuchtērion, eucheion ("place of prayer") didaskaleion ("school"—Philo, Vita Mosis 2,216), ho oikos ("the house"—Lifschitz, Donateurs, 13.20.33), ho hagios topos ("the holy place"—Lifschitz, Donateurs, 10; CIJ 694), ho topos ("the place"—Lifschitz, Donateurs, 31), to hieron ("the temple"—Flavius Josephus, Jewish War 4,408; 7,44-45).

Dedicatory inscriptions dating to the mid-3rd c. BC and to the 2nd c. BC and found in Egypt refer to the building for the common prayer of the Jews with the term proseuchē. In particular the dedicatory inscription of the proseuchē at Schedia (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 1), a place near the W branch of the Nile Delta, which was written on limestone, mentioned the Jews who made the proseuchē for King Ptolemy, Queen Berenice and their children. The mention of the two sovereigns leads scholars to date the inscription to the years between about 247 and 221 BC and is, along with an inscription of the Crocodilopolis, the most ancient attestation to the existence of Jewish buildings of worship in Egypt. Another dedication of a proseuchē was found at Athribis (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 10), local places on the S point of the Nile Delta. The inscription names King Ptolemy and Queen Cleopatra, thanks to whom Ptolemy the son of Epicurus and the Jews of Athribis made a proseuchē to the most high God. Given the uncertainty of this Ptolemy and that Cleopatra, the date can be between 186 or 172 or even 145 BC. A slab in alabaster coming from an imprecise location of lower Egypt (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 12), speaks of the replacement trophy with the dedicatory inscription with this which indicates how the proseuchē was declared by King Ptolemy Euergetes to be a place of asylum. The mention of Ptolemy is generic, and one can find various datings. Ptolemy II with a provision from the year 118 proclaims the Egyptian temples to be places of asylum; the occasion mentioned could be this one. Other scholars think that the king and queen mentioned in the text are instead Cleopatra VII and Caesarion and thus date the inscription to 42–30 BC. Two inscriptions (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 2-3), one dated to the years 250–175, the other to 150–50, mention the Israelites of Delo who sent tribute to the holy temple on Gerizim, and although they do not refer to a specific building they bear witness to the existence of a Samaritan community on the island of Delo. At Corinth (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 45) etched on a rock, perhaps the architrave of a door, one finds the words "synagogue of the Jews." The inscription is probably to be dated to the 2nd c. AD. Found at Berenice, modern-day Benghazi in Cyrenaica, an inscription reports the list of people who were involved in organizing the synagogue, the second year of the Emperor Nero, 2 December 56 (Lifschitz, Donateurs, 100). From the epigraphic point of view, information on a synagogue in Palestine and on the Golan Heights comes from the Theodotos inscription (Boffo, Iscrizioni, 31). It is a Greek inscription etched on a slab of calcium rock, found in a cistern during an excavation on the SE heel of Jerusalem (Ophel). The text refers to a certain Theodotos, priest and head of the synagogue, who restored the synagogue construction made by his ancestors and the hospice for foreigners with a hydraulic layout. The inscription should be dated to the 1st half of the 1st c. AD, therefore before AD 70, and attests to the existence of a building of Jewish worship even before the destruction of the temple, even at Jerusalem (Kloppenborg Verbin, Dating Theodotos). From these last two inscriptions it is clear how during the 1st half of the 1st c. AD the term proseuchē gave way to the term synagōgē to refer to the building of Jewish worship.

With respect to the archaeological data, in Palestine, four buildings from the 1st c. AD are to be considered synagogues: the one in Masada was a simple room, adapted by the Jews who were rebelling against Rome to accommodate a synagogue, with the construction of steps along the walls of the room and a small room set against a corner, which probably served as a genizah, i.e., a storeroom for the sacred scrolls. On the Herodium, a synagogue from the same era was identified in a triclinium of the Herodian edifice, which was readapted to the need of the community, close to which a small bath for ritual ablutions was also constructed. The discovery of the synagogue at Gamla on the Golan Heights has shed new light on the synagogue of the 1st c. AD, because it was not an adapted building, but a synagogue inserted within the urban layout, with typical characteristics of the synagogue hall: rectangular form, columns dividing the internal space and small steps along the wall for receiving the assembly. At Jericho the discovery of a synagogue dated to the Hasmonean period (75–50 BC) confirmed the evidence already discovered at Gamla. The building had three phases, and although only the second was clear, we can speak of a building that served as the hall for the synagogue meeting. From this point of view there are multiple similarities between the building at Gamla and that at Jericho. The adaptations at Masada and Herodium are explained by the desire to insert in the buildings some functional elements considered essential for a synagogue. These elements can briefly be summarized as follows: a rectangular hall with benches on the four sides, a series of columns or pillars to form lateral aisles around the central space, the lack of any element characterizing the function of the building on the external walls, the absence of a clear orientation of the building, the presence of a niche or small room in which the scrolls of the Sacred Scriptures were placed, a plumbing system in connection to the hall, in relation to the restrooms or the ritual ablutions. Other functional elements could be present, but they could also vary from building to building or in various ages or regions, and they did not therefore represent an element of specific identification for the synagogue (Netzer, The Synagogues, 282-284).

Recently two other buildings with the aforementioned characteristics have been discovered. Scholars think that they could be synagogues from the 1st c. BC such as that in Jericho: at Kiryat Sefer and Khirbet Um el-'Umdan, two villages that are not too far from Jerusalem (Milson, Art and Architecture, 3-9). At Magdala a building with small dimensions was discovered, which is considered to be a synagogue. Rectangular with small steps and sides, the building after AD 70 was transformed into a basin for the collection and the distribution of water (V.C. Corbo, Scavi archeologici a Magdala: Liber Annuus 24 [1974] 204-245).

Archaeological evidence for synagogues that can be dated to the time after the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem (AD 70) has been discovered in dozens of locations belonging to the Roman province of Palaestina. Few can be dated with certainty, and of these the most ancient date to the 4th c. At Horvat Ammudim in Upper Galilee the synagogue has a basilica form and a door on the S side. Two rows of seven columns, more than two in the back, divided the internal space. Traces of a mosaic flooring and geometric motifs and a fragmentary inscription in Aramaic were found. From the ceramics and the coins discovered during the excavation, the synagogue was dated to the first decades of the 4th c. The synagogue of Khirbet Shema was a rectangular oblong. The chief entrance was found on the N side, and a second entrance is found on the W side, occupied by an elevated gallery. The room has two rows of four columns placed on the stylobate. A lifted platform of a few centimeters came against the S wall to form a bema seat, upon which there must have been an aedicule to store the scrolls of the law. The date of the construction of the synagogue, for which two separate phases are supposed, is believed by some to go back to the late 4th or early 5th c. At Gush Halav the synagogue, which is rectangular with two rows of columns, is to be dated in its various phases to the 2nd half of the 5th c., although it remained in use probably until the beginning of the 8th c.

In addition to being mentioned in the NT, the synagogue of Capernaum is also known as the most beautiful and best preserved example of a Galilean synagogue. Basilica-shaped, it has in its internal portion two rows of columns in a N-S direction plus another row along its northern side. Three doors open to the N side, although on the E side a door puts the synagogue hall in contact with a three-porticoed courtyard in the form of an irregular trapezium. The digs starting from 1968 have allowed scholars to identify the chronology of the various phases of the building's construction, which took place over the course of the 5th c. and was completed in the last quarter of that c. The synagogue of Sepphoris is in the form of a very elongated rectangle with shorter sides placed to the SW and the NE. A single door leads to the room through the SW wall, near the S corner. A single row of five columns runs parallel to the long sides of the building, next to the NE wall. Near the NW corner of the room is an elevated masonry platform. The floor of the room turns out to have mosaics with a multicolored tapestry and seven sectors: in the first two, one finds representations of scenes pertaining to the visitation of the angels to Abraham and Sarah and the sacrifice of Isaac; in the third there is a representation, recurring on the mosaic flooring of the synagogues, namely the zodiac, with the sun at the center carried on a quadriga and on the four corners, the personification of the seasons. The fourth sector has three paintings that depict offerings at the temple: a basket with the firstfruits, the table with the showbread and in the third panel the sacrificial lamb, money offerings, a jar with oil, a flesh offering and two horns. In the fifth sector, which has been severely damaged, the daily offering and sacrifice before the tabernacle is represented; at the center, Aaron was probably represented. The sixth sector consists of three panels, the center one depicting the chest of the Scriptures with the curtains lifted up, with two seven-arm candelabra beside the horn, tongs, palm, cedar and myrtle. The final sector, the seventh, depicts at the center a medallion which contained an inscription in Greek which has only remained in fragments, with two lions facing each other at the sides. The upper part of the mosaic tapestry was probably covered or destroyed with the construction of the bema's platform. On the N side ran a bar of geometric themes interwoven and multicolored with some of the central squares containing inscriptions in Hebrew.

The basilica-shaped building of the synagogue of Gaza has five aisles and perhaps an apse to the E. It imitates the schema of Christian basilicas and is identified as a synagogue only thanks to the decorative motifs and the inscription on the mosaic flooring, which reports the names of those who offered it and the date of the construction, i.e., AD 508–509. There remains very little from the decorative flooring motif. From the panels of the canvas that decorated the central aisle, only a part remains, in which the classic motif of David with a lyre is depicted. Another abundant fragment is preserved in the S aisle, in which inside a series of spirals of vines, some animals are represented and in one of these architectural swirls a dedicatory inscription (A. Ovadiah, The Synagogue at Gaza, in Ancient Synagogues Revealed, 129-132). Also at Nabratein there is a basilica-shaped synagogue, with an entry on the S side, which is divided into three aisles by two rows of four columns; traces of benches were found in the shelter of the E and W walls. A lintel is carved with an inscription flanked by a menorah enclosed in a wreath. The inscription bears the date of the building's construction, AD 564. The synagogue of Beth Alpha is a basilica-shaped building with three aisles, with a narthex and an atrium to the N, and an apse on the S side. The mosaic flooring is composed of three panels, the first near the apse to the S represents the chest used to preserve the scrolls of the Torah, surrounded by lions and two seven-arm candelabra; on the central panel a zodiac with the chariot of the sun at the center is depicted; finally, on the N panel, Abraham and his son Isaac are depicted in the biblical event of the sacrifice. An inscription in Aramaic attests that the mosaic was made at the time of the emperor Justin (*Justin I, 518–527; *Justin II, 565–578), while a Greek inscription reports the names of the mosaicists Marianus and his son Hanina.

The synagogue of Bar'am is among the most beautiful examples of the Galilean type of synagogue. Through a porticoed colonnade and three entry doors located on the beautiful façade, one enters the basilica-shaped room colonnaded on three sides. The floor consists of slabs of rock. Several investigations recently completed have brought to light the existence of a more ancient building below what is now at the surface level, which is likely to be dated to the 1st half of the 5th c. A substantial redecorating of the building took place at the beginning of the 7th c. The entry doors on the S side were closed, while from the N side, the length of the room was reduced, thus erecting a new façade with three entry doors. The portico and the courtyard on the S side were converted into small rooms, used together with the synagogue until the 12th c.

The synagogue of Meroth is a basilica-shaped building with a portico and a courtyard in front of the S façade. The benches on the wall ran under the protection of the lateral walls. Three floor levels bear witness to various phases of the building. The most ancient floor was a simple floor of lime; at the intermediary level one finds a multicolored mosaic, which is datable to the 2nd half of the 5th c., while the upper floor in slabs of rock is dated to the end of the 5th or early 6th c.

At Nabratein the building imitates the Galilean basilica model and had various phases, the most ancient of which dates back to the 3rd c., the others to the 4th and 6th c. At Meiron the synagogue follows the Galilean model, rectangular, entry to the S, two rows of columns on the sides and one row toward the N wall; the façade of the N entry is preceded by a portico and a flight of stairs of four steps. The dating of the building is placed at the end of the 3rd or early 4th c.

At Chorazin, 4 km (2.5 mi) to the N of Capernaum, one finds the remains of a synagogue in the Galilean form. The building, in local basalt, seems to have been constructed before the 4th c. and remained in use until the beginning of the 7th c.

The synagogue of Arbel has a basilica layout, with three aisles divided by two rows of five columns and another two on the N side. The chief entrance is found to the E, and remains of benches along the walls are found under the protection of the E and W walls. Under the paved flooring are traces of a previous floor with a mosaic. The building had two or perhaps three phases, which, however, kept the building unchanged in its layout. The first phase is to be dated to the 4th c., the last to the 8th c.

At Hammath Tiberias the synagogue with a central room and some small adjacent rooms was constructed in the first half of the 3rd c. The building was reorganized at the beginning of the 4th c. with the closing of the rooms to the S and with the opening of the entry door to the N. Divided into four aisles, with the central aisle adjoined by a smaller aisle to the W and two to the E, the synagogue had mosaics on the floor, with the usual themes: two lions facing each other to a series of six square panels containing inscriptions in Greek, which mentioned the benefactors who took care of the building's accommodations; at the center a panel with the zodiac around the personification of the sun on the chariot, and at the corners the four seasons; close to the step to the bema was the representation of the chest containing the scrolls of the law, accompanied by two candelabra with seven arms and the usual Jewish symbols. A larger building was subsequently built over this synagogue in the form of a regular basilica, on the pattern typical of the Galilean synagogue. Three doors on the W side were connected to a courtyard, and an apsed bema occupied the S wall. This synagogue also had two different construction phases that are datable to the mid-7th c. The mosaic flooring had geometric themes typical of the mosaics from that era. The synagogue probably remained in use until the mid-8th c.

At Beth Yerach one finds a building enclosed by a wall with two towers on either side and three rooms on the N side. The synagogue has a basilica layout with three aisles and an apse, and two service rooms on the S side. A few fragments of a mosaic scattered along the aisles, containing vegetable, animal and geometric themes, are all that remains of the floor. Archaeologists have distinguished two phases of the building, both dating to the 4th and 5th c.

The synagogue of Beth She'arim is a basilica with three aisles separated by two rows of eight pillars; it has a narthex in front from which three doors gave access to the hall. A platform was found adjacent to the NW wall. Later touchups are to be attributed to the closing of the central door of the SE to create a sort of polygonal apse. The building, not well dated but going back to the mid-3rd. to early 4th c., was destroyed around the mid-4th c.

At Hammath Gader the layout of the synagogue is that of a basilica, with an apse on the S side, which was added in the last of the three phases, dating to the 6th c. The first phase is difficult to date, while the second phase is similar to the third, with the exception of the apse, and is dated to the end of the 3rd or early 4th c. The synagogue of Ma'oz Hayyim has three distinct phases of construction. The most ancient phase, which is dated to the end of the 3rd or early 4th c., included a rectangular building, with an entryway to the W. Upon the remains of the wall of this first structure was a building in the shape of a basilica with three aisles and an apse on the S side. Upon the fragments of the mosaic flooring a menorah and a shofar were represented. In a third phase of the building (1st half of the 6th c.) new mosaic flooring, some fragments of which remain in the N and E sector, and the masonry platform built at the S apse, overhanging on the central aisle, were added. The building was destroyed by a fire at the beginning of the 7th c. The synagogue building of Rehov has a basilica layout divided into three aisles by pillars and is dated, in its first phase, to the 4th c. At the end of the fourth or beginning of the 5th c., a stone platform was added to the S wall and a multicolored mosaic floor; the walls were decorated with stucco and the pillars carved with some Aramaic inscriptions. To the final phase, usually dated between the 6th and 7th c., belong the restorations of the mosaic flooring, the raising of the platform, the construction of some stone benches on the two sides and the addition of a narthex at the S entry, in which a long inscription containing some ritual requirements and prohibitions was found.

At Ein Gedi a rectangular hall with irregular dimensions constituted the synagogue. Archaeologists have been able to distinguish three construction phases datable from the late 2nd or early 3rd c. until the last decades of the 6th. The building in the first phase consisted of the rectangular hall with two entry doors on the E side and a white mosaic floor with a rectangular frame of black and white tiles containing three square panels decorated with very simple geometric motifs, the only quasi-complete panel is the S panel containing a swastika cross in black tiles. Subsequently the two entries to the E were blocked, the hall was expanded on the W side with the opening of three new entry doors. Third, a narthex was added to the W with a basin for ritual ablutions which was placed at the SW corner. The platform was constructed under the shelter of the W wall. The mosaic floor preserves at the center a geometric theme given by two crossed panels with some birds at the center and at the sides, facing each other two by two. On the small W aisle the mosaic tapestry contains a series of two inscriptions in Hebrew, which records the text of 1 Chr 1:1-4, the list of the zodiac, some months of the year and several patriarchs, while in three Aramaic inscriptions are recorded the names of the benefactors and a curse against those who reveal the city's secret.

The building found out Susya is composed of a rectangular hall with the major sides to the N and S, a narthex and a porticoed courtyard to the E. Two raised platforms were set against the N wall to indicate the place in which the scrolls were preserved and the place in which the synagogue reading was done. Three levels with mosaics have been found; the second contained a representation of Daniel in the lion's den, although the lowest one was made of white squares and the highest level with geometric colored motifs with a representation of the chest of the law, flanked by two seven-arm candelabra. Three inscriptions in Aramaic and one in Hebrew have been found in the mosaic floor of the hall and the E portico. The date proposed for the erection of this building is the 4th c. with remodeling and reordering over the course of the 5th c., when the narthex was built, and the 6th c.

Of the buildings taken into consideration, i.e., the most significant ones, only seven can be dated with a certain reliability from the 4th to 6th c. Three of these were first considered to be from the 2nd c., starting from the similarities of the architectural and stylistic type (Horvat ʿAmmudim, Caparnaum and Nabratein III). Now they are dated with some certainty respectively to the 4th, late 5th and the 6th c., thanks to the archaeological information coming from the archaeological digs and the metrological and dimensional analysis, which have seemed to converge (Milson, Art and Architecture, 83).

The birth of the synagogue within the Samaritan community from the historical perspective is tied to the figure of Baba Rabbah, the Samaritan leader mentioned by the Samaritan Chronicles, a medieval document. The Chronicles attest that Baba Rabbah over the course the 4th c. constructed eight synagogues in Samaria. To date three synagogues have been discovered outside Samaria (Beit-She'an, Sha'albim, perhaps at Tel Aviv) and five within Samaria. At Khirbet Samara, one synagogue is part of a broader complex. The synagogue hall is rectangular, with maps on the E side, benches on the N and S sides, a narthex and a semicircular atrium, a courtyard on the N side, and various rooms around. The synagogue was constructed on the masonry of a Roman building. Three floor levels have been discovered in the hall. The most ancient is that made of stone slabs belonging to the previous building. The floor mosaic, which can be dated to the 4th c., belongs to the original phase of this synagogue. The mosaic with small tiles had a black background, on which three different rectangular registers were developed, are severely damaged. Over the mosaic, a floor of stone slabs was laid out, evidence of a building period that can be dated perhaps after the Samaritan revolt of 529.

At al-Khirbe, near Sebaste, a synagogue in the form of a rectangle with benches for the assembly on the four sides, a paved courtyard to the S, and an exedra to the N has been found. The mosaic flooring has preserved six inscriptions in Greek and the typical theme of the seven-arm candelabra with other religious symbols around. The synagogue is to be dated to the 4th c., which was probably damaged at the time of the revolt of 529. It was restored shortly after and remained in use until the beginning of the 8th c.

To the NW of Shechem there is a local town, which, acc. to its Samaritan tradition, is to be identified with the field acquired by Jacob (Gen 33:18-20). The same tradition mentions the synagogue constructed in 362 and confiscated by the emperor *Zeno at the time of the revolt of 484. The present-day building is found alongside a mosque, in which the minaret is constructed on the most ancient remains of the building.

At Khirbet Majdal the archaeological digs have brought to light a *Byzantine monastery and another building identified with a Samaritan synagogue, which was made up of a rectangular hall with an apse, a narthex and an atrium. Fragments of the decorated mosaic and an inscription that recalls the benefactors were discovered in the hall.

At Kefar Fahma some architectural elements discovered on site, including an architrave inscribed with a menorah, suggest the existence of a synagogue building, but for which no other trace remains. The archaeological digs conducted on Mt. Gerizim have brought to light the remains of the octagonal church dedicated to Mary the Mother of God. The digs under the structures of the church have revealed the existence of a more ancient building, perhaps a synagogue or the Samaritan temple, which was constructed in the late Roman period and destroyed, as some literary sources report, by the emperor Zeno in order to construct the octagonal church. So say the Chronicon Paschale and the Samaritan Chronicles, while *Procopius of Caesarea in his treatise De Aedificiis simply says that permission was granted to the Samaritans to ascend the mountain to pray until such time as Zeno decided to build a church on the summit, without making any reference to a previous sacred building.

Even outside the Palestinian territory some synagogues have been found. The most famous is certainly that of *Dura Europos. The city on the Euphrates River was destroyed by the Persians in 256. Archaeological digs have brought to light a synagogue among other buildings, whose walls have preserved the frescoes intact. The dedicatory inscription reports the date of 244–245. Rectangular in shape, the building was preceded to the E by a porticoed atrium on the three sides, from which one approached through two doors to the synagogue hall. On the inside, benches ran along the sides of all four walls. On the W side a niche and a more prominent bench indicate the place in which the scrolls were placed and from which the reading was proclaimed. Of the frescoes on the walls, which are divided into five registers, the lower one depicts animals, masks and other things; the higher register has almost vanished, although of the three intermediary registers, 29 panels have been preserved, which depict scenes from the OT.

Of all the ancient synagogues, that of Sardis is certainly the most monumental. Contained within the large complex of the gymnasium and the baths near the chief hub of the city, the basilica hall runs nearly 60 m (196 ft) long and 20 m (65 ft) wide; it was preceded by a porticoed atrium of approximately 20 meters on the side, which during the first phase must have been a part of the synagogue hall, which was even broader. The building was remodeled over the course of the 4th c., adapting some rooms originally belonging to the apoditerium of the gymnasium, which was constructed over the course of the 2nd c. AD. The large room with its mosaic flooring and the walls covered with marble and panels in opus sectile, the two beautiful aedicules set against the E wall, the table supported by two pedestals in masonry with eagles sculpted and flanked by two sculptures depicting two seated lions, the synthronon on the apse, the porticoed atrium with a beautiful fountain at the center—all were completed in the 2nd half of the 4th c.

On the island of Delos a building was identified as a synagogue in use starting from the 1st half of the 1st c. BC and into the 2nd c. AD. It was a private building adapted for use as a synagogue. The building consisted of a courtyard to the E facing the sea, a series of small rooms to the S, connected to the antechamber from which access was gained through three doors to the assembly room, which was found in the NW area of the building.

At Ostia, which was the port for Rome, a building dating to the 4th c. was found; it was composed of a room for gatherings with three entry doors, which opened to a vestibule with a staircase and a propylaeum. In the SE corner of the room there was an aedicule with two columns, where Torah scolls were likely stored. Set against the SW wall there was a raised platform, which served to accommodate those who proclaimed the reading or the more noteworthy individuals of the community. Close to the S wall arose another room with some benches along its S wall, perhaps a room for study, and more to the E, a room considered to have been a hospice for strangers. Under the walls of this building were unearthed walls belonging perhaps to a more ancient synagogue. An inscription found during the excavation mentions Faustus, who constructed the synagogue and organized the aedicule for the law scrolls. Situated between the Roman villa and a necropolis, the synagogue of Bova Marina, which is dated to the 4th c., is composed of some rooms around a central room, with mosaic flooring, in which are represented, within the geometric motifs, some of the most common Jewish symbols, candelabrum, cedar, palm and horn. Over the course of the 6th c. the building underwent several adaptations: an atrium was created to the W of the synagogue hall, on the wall of which an apse was constructed with a raised bema and a parapet in front. The building and the entire site was abandoned at the beginning of the 7th c. A small synagogue, situated at the center of the complex, with an apse on the W wall, made up part of a villa discovered to the S of Tunis. The inscription discovered in the mosaic flooring of one of the villa's rooms mentions a Juliana, who ordered the construction of the synagogue. The dating of the building is doubtful and is placed in the 4th, 5th or 6th c.

Although traces of the ancient synagogues at Rome have not remained, information about them exists thanks to numerous pieces of epigraphic evidence. There are nearly 40 inscriptions that mention Roman synagogues, the number of which is estimated from 10 to 16 buildings, in use from the end of the 2nd to the entire 5th c. (Levine, Ancient Synagogue, 263-266).

The synagogue building, once it had been proclaimed as such, performed various functions: primarily serving the community assembly for the study of the law; as a tribunal for solving internal questions; for organizing the collection of the offerings to send to the temple of Jerusalem; as a hospice for welcoming of strangers; for helping the poor, widows and orphans; and organizing common meals. This synagogue became a place of community prayer probably first in the Diaspora and later in Palestine, where until AD 70 the "house" of prayer par excellence remained the temple (Neh 8:5-6; 9:3; 2 Macc 8:27; Mt 6:5-6; Mk 11:17). After the destruction of the temple, the situation changed; the cultic function of the synagogue broadened, becoming the chief function, and some customs of the temple were transferred to it, contributing to the birth of a true and proper synagogue liturgy, bringing it about that the building increasingly became the pivot around which all the activities of the Jewish community starting from the 1st c. AD onward revolved.

H. Kohl - C. Watzinger, Antike Synagogen in Galilea, Leipzig 1916; B. Lifschitz, Donateurs et fondateurs dans les synagogues juives. Répertoire des dédicaces grecques relatives à la construction et à la réfection des synagogues, Paris 1967; J. Gutmann, The Synagogue: Studies in Origins, Archaeology and Architecture, New York 1975; V.C. Corbo, Cafarnao. 1. Gli edifici della città, Jerusalem 1975; M. Avi-Yonah, Synagogues, in Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 4, Jerusalem 1978, 1129-1138; J.F. Strange, Archaeology and the Religion of Judaism in Palestine, in ANRW II. Principat 19.1. Religion (Judentum: Algemeines; Palästinisches Judentum), Berlin-New York 1979, 646-685; A.Th. Kraabel, The Diaspora Synagogue: Archaeological and Epigraphic Evidence Since Sukenik, in ANRW II. Principat 19.1. Religion (Judentum: Algemeines; Palästinisches Judentum), Berlin-New York 1979, 477-510; L. Levine (ed.), Ancient Synagogues Revealed, Jerusalem 1981; Id., The Synagogue in Late Antiquity, Philadelphia 1987; R. Hachlili (ed.), Ancient Synagogues in Israel, Oxford-Haifa 1989; H.C. Kee, The Transformation of the Synagogue After 70 C.E.: Its Import for Early Christianity: New Testament Studies 36 (1990) 1-24; S. Loffreda, Capernaum, in New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 1, Jerusalem 1993, 291-295; L.I. Levine, Synagogues, in New Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land 4, Jerusalem 1993, 1421-1424; I. Magen, Samaritan Synagogues, in ibid., 1424-1427; L. Boffo, Iscrizioni greche e latine per lo studio della Bibbia, Brescia 1994; D. Urman - P.V.M. Flesher (eds.), Ancient Synagogues: Historical Analysis and Archaeological Discovery, Leiden-New York-Cologne 1995; S.S. Miller, On the Number of Synagogues in the Cities of 'Ereẓ Israel: Journal of Jewish Studies 49 (1998) 51-66; L. Levine, The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years, New Haven-London 1999; J.S. Kloppenborg Verbin, Dating Theodotos (CIJ II 1404): Journal of Jewish Studies 51 (2000) 243-280; A. Runesson, The Origins of the Synagogue, Stockholm 2001; J. Magness, The Question of the Synagogue: The Problem of Typology, in Judaism in Late Antiquity. Part III, vol. IV. Where We Stand: Issues and Debates in Ancient Judaism: The Special Problem of the Synagogue, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2001, 1-48; J. Wilkinson, From Synagogue to Church: The Traditional Design, London-New York 2002; B. Olsson - M. Zetterholm (eds.), The Ancient Synagogue from Its Origins Until 200 C.E., Stockholm 2003; Ch. Perrot, Synagogue. I-VII, in Supplément au Dictionnaire de la Bible 13, Paris 2003, 653-751; E. Netzer, The Synagogues from the Second Temple Period According to Archaeological Finds and in Light of the Literary Sources, in One Land—Many Cultures: Archaeological Studies in Honour of Stanislao Loffreda, OFM, Jerusalem 2003, 277-285; D. Milson, Art and Architecture of the Synagogue in Late Antique Palestine: In the Shadow of the Church, Leiden-Boston 2006.

C. Pappalardo

SYNAXIS. A term almost unknown before the appearance of Christianity, which became a technical term in the *Byzantine *liturgy to refer both to the assembly of the faithful and the *Eucharist, more specifically *Communion. Synaxis and the synonym synagogue come from the same Greek root. To distinguish their assemblies from those of the Jews and subsequently from those of the heretics, the first Christians adopted a different ending (see Epiph., Panar. 30,18). *Cyril of Jerusalem clearly distinguished the assemblies which took place on Sunday and the day of the Lord's ascension, from which he established the order of the readings (Cat. XIV,24), from those during which his catechetical instructions were conducted. Although *John Chrysostom did not seem to maintain such a distinction (Hom. 29 in Act; Hom. 5 in Mt.), *Basil spoke of a visible synaxis and a spiritual synaxis of the faithful, who served God in spirit and in truth, and called it holy (Hom. I in Psalmum 28). The term also refers to the participation of the faithful at the celebration of the holy mysteries and their intimate union with Christ (ps.-Dionysius, Hier. cael. I,3) and also, yet distanced from its original meaning, the form of prayer or worship of monks and nuns (Apophthegmata Patrum: PG 65,220). In the Latin monastic context it appeared late with the meaning of collecta (see John Cass., Conlat. VIII,16; IX,36; Vitae Patrum Jurensium 52,9; 64,5; 130,2) and refers to both the liturgical celebration culminating in the Eucharist and the celebration composed of prayer and psalmody (Reg. S. Bened. XVII, 17).

DACL 15, 1835-1836; Lampe 1302-1303; Storia del cristianesimo I, [2003], 414-462; see Assembly.

E. Peretto

SYNCLETICA. Virgin and deaconess from the 5th c. praised by the poet *Sedulius who, in a letter to the presbyter Macedonius (CSEL 10,9), praises Syncletica's humility, despite the fact that she was from a noble family, and lauds her theological training.

DCB 4, 756.

S. Zincone

SYNCLETICA, nun. The historical existence of Syncletica, a nun in Egypt, is not documented except by the Greek Life attributed, it seems first by Nicephorus (HE VIII,40), to *Athanasius of Alexandria. According to this life, Syncletica, whose family was originally from Macedonia, was born at *Alexandria, *Egypt. Having consecrated herself to God, she spent her youth in prayer and penance and, upon the death of her parents, went into solitude. With her popularity having quickly spread, some women gathered around her and asked that she lead them as a spiritual director. She died in old age, after having nobly undergone painful and sharp illnesses. During this time, she consoled and comforted to the very end the individuals who assisted her.

BS 11, 1209-1210.

S. Zincone

SYNCRETISM. This term, deriving from the Greek σύγκρασις ("mixing"), refers to the union and fusion of elements and of different origin, which together form either a new religious belief or a new philosophical system. This process of synthesis, both on the religious and philosophical level, is primarily characteristic of the Hellenistic-Roman period and had one of its chief centers in *Alexandria, Egypt. Apart from the syncretistic religions of the Hellenistic-Roman era, it is fitting to briefly mention here the syncretistic character of both *pagan and Christian *gnosticism and that of Hellenistic and Late Antique thought, which the Fathers could not ignore. Pagan gnosticism, which found its greatest expression in that conglomerate of treatises known as the Corpus hermeticum, which came together in Egypt during the first centuries of the Common Era, was a combination of astrology, hidden sciences, Neo-Pythagoreanism, *Platonism, *Stoicism and, acc. to Reitzenstein, Iranian religious teachings as well; Christian gnosticism exhibited some close analogies to pagan gnosticism (one simply has to think of the theme of gnōsis—present both in the Corp. Herm. I and XIII and the *Valentinian system (see *Ogdoad)—as well as the Himmelreise or the gnostic soul's journey which, having crossed through the seven lower heavens, reaches the eighth heaven or the Ogdoas and encompasses within itself occultism; astrological, Neo-Pythagorean and Platonic teachings; more or less fanciful interpretations of the OT and the NT; and heterodox tendencies from late *Judaism, Zoroastrianism and myths of Eastern origin. (One has only to think of the theme of the fall of Sophia, which is presented again in various gnostic systems of thought.)

In Hellenistic thought, the most famous examples of the "syncretistic" tendency were represented by the Stoic Possidonius (2nd c. BC) and the academic Antiochus of Ascalona (1st c. BC). Possidonius dedicated a commentary to Plato's Timaeus, a commentary which remained famous in all of Late Antiquity and was used, in all likelihood, by such authors as *Philo of Alexandria, *Plotinus, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Basil the Great and *Nemesius of Emesa; clear "Platonic" themes in his thought were the image of the charioteer who drives two horses, deriving from the Phaedrus (246b), the ethics of simple moderation of the passions, present in the Republic (IV,423a 4-5, 431c 5-7; X,619a 5-6) and the doctrine of the tripartition of the human soul (even if Possidonius prefers to speak of the "functions" of the soul rather than "parts" of the soul; see S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 87 n. 1, 98 n. 4, 100 n. 3). The entire teaching of Antiochus of Ascalona aims to demonstrate the substantial agreement between the Academy and the Peripatetic school (see Cicero, Ac. post. I,37 and 38) and was deeply influenced by the "Middle Stoicism" of Panaetius and Possidonius: Antiochus could be called a "Stoicizing Platonist." The same syncretistic orientation can be observed in some proponents of the so-called *Middle Platonism of the first two centuries AD such as Plutarch and Alcinous, in whose writings the presence of Platonic, Aristotelian and Stoic elements (despite Plutarch's controversy against Stoicism) emerges with special emphasis. A syncretism very close to that of Middle Platonism, but enriched by various Neo-Pythagorean motifs, can be observed in the writings of *Philo of Alexandria (see *Hellenistic Judaism). The "syncretistic" orientation is one of the chief characteristics of all Neoplatonism, starting from *Ammonius Saccas until its late proponents. As Hierocles recalls in his treatise On Providence, Ammonius aimed to show the agreement between the teaching of Plato and Aristotle (Photius, Bibl., cod. 214) and had joined the teachings of the two great philosophers into one system, which he transmitted to Plotinus and *Origen the Neoplatonist (Photius, Bibl., cod. 251). In chapter 14 of his Life of Plotinus (Vita Plotini), *Porphyry (I, pp. 15-16 Bréhier) mentions that Plotinus, during his lectures, examined and commented on the works of numerous Greek philosophers (Stoics, Peripatetics, Platonists and Neo-Pythagoreans), accepting many of their teachings and following Ammonius's example (see p. 15, 15-16): this final affirmation proves that Ammonius, in addition to demonstrating the agreement between the teachings of Plato and Aristotle, also subjected the chief philosophical currents of thought to careful examination. In effect, as E.R. Dodds and W. Theiler noted (see biblio.), the entirety of Plotinus's thought denotes a vast synthesis of Neo-Pythagorean, Peripatetic and Stoic teachings in addition to Platonist and Middle Platonist doctrines. The same type of syncretism can also be observed in the writings of the subsequent proponents of Neoplatonism such as Porphyry, *Iamblicus, *Julian the Apostate, Proclus and the *Damascius, even if it, in each one of the writings of these authors, could acquire different nuances, being enriched along the way with new contributions such as the solar religion, that of the Chaldean Oracles, magic and theurgy (in this regard, see *Neoplatonism).

During the patristic era syncretism found its theoretical formulation (on the level of the theological interpretation of history) and its practical implementation (on the doctrinal level) in the writings of *Justin Martyr and esp. those of *Clement of Alexandria: tracing Greek philosophy back to the inspiring or "seminal" action of the *Logos, in addition to the use of *Moses's books by the Greeks (see *Hellenism and Christianity); they felt that they had the right to incorporate within their thought the teachings of various Greek philosophical schools and thus produced a sort of syncretism entirely analogous to that of Middle Platonism and of Philo of Alexandria. (The influence of Philo's syncretism on Clement of Alexandria is direct and well known, although it cannot be proved in the case of Justin Martyr, who probably did not know of Philo's writings but instead depended on the Middle Platonism of the 2nd c. AD; see H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 4.) According to the testimony of *Gregory Thaumaturgus (Thanksgiving to Origen XIII,150-153), *Origen the Christian had his students study the works of many Greek philosophers, except the atheists: in this way he followed the example of Plotinus and of his teacher Ammonius Saccas. Likewise in the thought of Origen—as moreover in that of Basil the Great, Gregory of Nyssa and *Gregory of Nazianzus—one can perceive a synthesis of Platonist, Stoic and Aristotelian-Peripatetic teachings (see *Aristotelianism, *Platonism, *Stoicism and the Fathers).

R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres, Leipzig 1904; Id., Die Göttin Psyche in der hellenistischen und frühchristlichen Literatur, Heidelberg 1917; Id., Studien zum antiken Synkretismus aus Iran und Griechenland, Leipzig 1926; Id., Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen, Darmstadt 1956 (repr. of the 1927 ed.); H. Strache, Der Eklektizismus des Antiochos von Askalon, Berlin 1921; E.R. Dodds, The Parmenides of Plato and the Origin of the Neoplatonic One: CQ 22 (1928) 129-142 (on Plotinus's dependence on Neo-Pythagoreanism in the interpretation of the Parmenides); Id., Tradition and Personal Achievement in the Philosophy of Plotinus: JRS 50 (1960) 2 (on the "syncretistic" character of Plotinian philosophy); F. Cumont, Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris [4]1929; W. Theiler, Plotin und die antike Philosophie: MH 1 (1944) 209-225 (on the syncretistic character of Plotinian philosophy); Id., Die Vorbereitung des Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1930 (on Possidonius's dependence on Plotinus); Id., Philo von Alexandreia und der Beginn des Kaiserzeitlichen Platonismus. Parusia, Festgabe J. Hirschberger, Frankfurt 1965, 199-218; H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition, Oxford 1966, 5-7; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971 (on the substantial agreement between the syncretism of Clement and Philo of Alexandria and that of Middle Platonism); A. Graeser, Plotinus and the Stoics, Leiden 1972; A. Böhlig, Gnosis und Synkretismus, Tübingen 1989; W. Fauth, Helios Megistos. Zur synkretistischen Theologie der Spätantike, Leiden 1995; Les Syncrétismes religieux dans le monde méditerranéen antique, ed. C. Bonnet - A. Motte, Brussels 1999.

S. Lilla

SYNESIUS of Cyrene (ca. 370–ca. 413). Synesius was born at Cyrene, in *Libya, between 370 and 375 to a noble *pagan family; he completed advanced studies at *Alexandria, where he was initiated into *Neoplatonism by the famous *Hypatia. A trip to Greece left him very disillusioned on account of the cultural decadence of *Athens (Ep. 136). In 399, he was chosen by his countrymen for permission to request from the emperor *Arcadius, at *Constantinople, a reduction of the taxes for the region of Pentapolis, which had been impoverished by the barbarian invasions, earthquakes and famines. His Discourse on Royalty, delivered at Constantinople in 400, is a courageous address to the emperor, in which he criticizes the court's luxury and lifestyle which has caused it to lose contact with reality. Even the treatise On Providence was begun at Constantinople and finished in *Egypt: in an *allegorical form this document narrates what the author saw at Constantinople within the hermeneutical key of the relationship—conflict between *virtue and vice.

In 402, Synesius returned to Cyrene after having obtained a reduction in taxes. Between this date and 405–406, Synesius contracted a Christian *marriage at Alexandria in the presence of the patriarch *Theophilus (Ep. 105) and defended the city from the invasions of the Macheti. Nothing is known about the period when he received *baptism. In 410, he was elected bishop of Cyrene and metropolitan of Ptolemais by the clergy and the people. Synesius hesitated for a long time to accept the episcopal ministry: Epistles 105 and 110 are a sincere explanation to *Theophilus of Alexandria for the reasons of his reservations: a feared conflict between the truth of the intellectual and the religion of the "common man"; several elements from Neoplatonic philosophy that he considered nonnegotiable; and a certain attachment to a noble life lived in the countryside. Synesius, who had already had three children, moreover asked to remain in a married state. Theophilus consecrated him bishop. These were difficult years for the entire populace because of the continuous and bloody barbarian invasions, as his two speeches (Catastasis) bear witness. No information or documents come from Synesius's pen beyond the year 413.

In addition to Synesius's writings that have survived (Discourse on Royalty, the treatise On Providence, Dion, In Praise of Baldness, the treatise On Dreams, The Gift, the Letters [156], the Hymns, two Speeches and two fragments of Homilies), scholars have supposed that as a young man Synesius wrote poetical works inspired by Anacreontics (see E. Cavalcanti, Studi Eunomiani, 106, n. 2). From the writings that have survived, the following texts come from his Christian period: a few of the 156 letters; the two Speeches; the two fragments of Homilies and nine of the Hymns, the 10th certainly being spurious; the first 5 (acc. to the enumeration of the modern editors) have a theological theme; the other 4 have the character of prayer or celebration.

Synesius's thought expressed in the Hymns—esp. of the first five—is extremely complex. In the past, scholars limited themselves to describing it as a "web of echoes," and at most it was studied for these reminiscences, taking for granted that the work had very little Christian character to it. Scholars in the past rejected the notion of Synesius as bishop. More recent studies have raised the issue of Synesius's thought in relation to the Neoplatonist sources that were common to him and *Marius Victorinus (P. Hadot, Porphyre et Victorinus, I,461-474). Other research has established a relationship between the events of ecclesial life that Synesius faced during his episcopate and—at the thought level—the more complex themes of the Hymns. Epistle 141, in particular, and 142 attest the presence of a late *Eunomian propaganda in Cyrenaica, tied to an intellectual current of thought in the imperial court and supported on the position of the prefect Andronicus, with whom Synesius experienced serious disagreements between the end of 411 and 412. The hermit *Isidore of Pelusium supported Synesius in the fight. The clergy was divided, and local interests were marked by tones of late *Arian opposition (see Ep. 141). The trinitarian theme contained in the hymns is not detached from the anti-Eunomian controversy; in particular, the first and the second hymns—which are parallel in structure—and the fifth allow for the emergence of an antitechnical and antinominalistic theological elaboration. Moreover, in Synesius's trinitarian elaboration, several elements are present from the Origenian-Alexandrian tradition, esp. with respect to aspects of the generation within the *Trinity and the theology of the *Holy Spirit, upon which he brings to bear his thought pertaining to the divine nature and the trinitarian relations (see Hymn III).

CPG III, 5630-5640 Suppl. pp. 364-366, biblio. where, for each work, the editions and chief studies are indicated. Nevertheless, for the web of difficulties and the studies that pertain to Synesius, the reader should consult the synthesis contained in E. Cavalcanti, Studi Eunomiani, OCA 202, Rome 1976, 106-128. The most recent editions should also be included: Synesii Cyrenensis, Epistolae, rec. A. Garzya, Rome 1979; Sinesio di Cirene, Opere: Epistole, Operette, Inni, ed. A. Garzya, Turin 1989. Synesius's writings are in PG 66, 1021-1756; Fr. tr.: H. Druon, Paris 1878; Eng. tr.: A. Fitzgerald, 3 vols., London 1926-1930; It. tr.: Sulla provvidenza, S. Nicolosi, Palermo 1959; Inni (ed. and tr.) A. Dell'Era, Rome 1968; Sul regno, A. Garzya, Naples 1973; I sogni, D. Susannetti, Bari 1992; Ger. tr.: Hymnen, J. Gruber - H. Strohm, Heidelberg 1991; Sp. tr.: Himnos; Tratados, F.A. García Romero, Madrid 1993.

Studies: G. Grützmacher, Synesios von Kyrene, ein Charakterbild aus dem Untergang des Hellenentums, Leipzig 1913; G. Bettini, L'attività pubblica di Sinesio di Cirene, Udine 1938; J.C. Pando, The Life and Times of Synesius of Cyrene as Revealed in His Work, Washington, DC 1940; C. Bizzochi, La tradizione storica della consacrazione episcopale di Sinesio di Cirene: Gregorianum 25 (1944) 130-170; Id., La irregolarità della consacrazione di Sinesio come congettura?: Gregorianum 27 (1946) 261-299; H.I. Marrou, La "conversion" de Synésius: REG 65 (1952) 474-484; Id., Synesius of Cyrene and Alexandrian Neoplatonism, in The Conflict Between Paganism and Christianity in the Fourth Century, ed. A. Momigliano, Oxford 1963, 126-150; P. Hadot, Porphyre et Victorinus, Paris 1968, 461-474 (It. tr. ed. G. Girgenti - G. Reale, Milan 1993); A.J. Bregman, Synesius of Cyrene: Early Life and Conversion to Philosophy: California Studies in Class. Antiquity 7 (1974) 55-88; A. Garzya, Storia e interpretazione di testi bizantini. Saggi e ricerche, London 1974 (repr. of nine previous articles on Synesius); G. Gellie, Repetitions on the Letters of Synesius: Antichthon 13 (1979) 70-102; A.J. Bregman, Synesius of Cyrene, Philosopher Bishop, Berkeley, CA 1982; D. Roques, Synésios, évêque et philosophe: Revue des études grecques 95 (1982) 537-539; S. Vollenweider, Synesios von Kyrene über das Bischofsamt: SP 18 (1985) 233-237; D. Roques, Synésios de Cyrène et la Cirénaïque du Bas-Empire: Études d'Antiquités africaines, Paris 1987; M. Ceccon, Intorno ad alcuni passi dell'Inno I di Sinesio: Civiltà classica e cristiana 11/3 (1990) 295-313; M. Di Pasquale Barbanti, Filosofia e cultura in Sinesio di Cirene, Florence 1994; H. Seng, Untersuchungen zum Vokabular und zur Metrik in den Hymnen des Synesios, Frankfurt 1994; D. Roques, Synésios à Constantinople: 399-402: Byzantion 65 (1995) 405-439; T. Schmitt, Die Bekehrung des Synesios von Kyrene: Politik und Philosophie, Hof und Provinz als Handlungsräume eines Aristokraten bis zu seiner Wahl zum Metropoliten von Ptolemaïs, Munich 2001, with extensive and updated bibliography on pp. 769-804.

E. Cavalcanti

SYNODITES. This name was used to refer to *Chalcedonians in the document titled De sectis, which was attributed to *Leontius Scholasticus (end of the 6th c.). In particular, they are mentioned for their use of the paradigm of the soul and the body in *Christology; in fact, they were rebuked for asserting three natures in Christ, or rather two of the humanity and one of the divinity. For this reason Leontius Scholasticus distanced himself from this paradigm, considering it to be outside the norm for understanding of the unity of the humanity and divinity in Jesus Christ.

De sectis VII; PG 86, 1248C; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa 2/2, Brescia 1999, 605-606; C. Dell'Osso, L'analogia antropologica. Riflessioni sui concetti di anima e corpo in alcuni testi patristici: Alpha Omega 6 (2003) 215-232.

C. Dell'Osso

SYNODOS ALEXANDRINA. Better known as the Canones ecclesiastici (5th c.), this collection of canonical texts of the *Alexandrian church was preserved in *Coptic (Sahidic and Bohairic), Arabic and Ethiopian, but its original was in Greek. The Ethiopian translation derived from the Arabic and is the most complete, even though it contains some interpolations. In the Arabic translation, it constitutes the first book of the collection, in two books, published by Lagarde, of the 127 Canons of the Apostles. The collection in Coptic is subdivided into 78 canons, 71 in Arabic. The Synodos Alexandrina (PO 8,573[23]-623[113]) includes (1) The Ecclesiastical Constitution of the Apostles (referred to by Botte as the Canons of the Apostles) (cans. 1-30; Arabic 1-20); (2) The Apostolic Tradition (also called The Constitution of the Egyptian Church) (cans. 31-62, Arabic 21-47), but it also has a definite relationship with the Testamentum Domini* and the Canons of Hippolytus; and (3) part of book 8 of the Apostolic Constitutions, with an addition of prayers (cans. 63-78, Arabic 48-71).

Editions: CPG 1732. Ethiopian: G.W. Horner, The Statutes of the Apostles or Canones Ecclessiastici, London 1904 (text and tr.), 1-87; H. Duensing, Der aethiopische Text der Kirchenordung des Hippolyt, Göttingen 1946. Sahidic: P.A. de Lagarde, Aegyptiaca, Göttingen 1883 (repr. Osnabrück 1972), 209-291; U. Bouriant, Les canons apostoliques de Clément de Rome: Recueil de travaux relatifs à la philologie et à l'archéologie égyptiennes 5 (1884) 192-216; 6 (1885) 97-115; J. Leipold, Saidische Auszüge aus dem 8. Buche der Apostolischen Konstitutionen, Leipzig 1904; W. Till - J. Leipold, Der Koptische Text der Kirchenordnung Hippolyts, Berlin 1954 (ed. of the central part). Boharic: H. Tattam, The Apostolic Constitutions or Canons of the Apostles in Coptic with an English Translation, London 1948. Arabic: G.W. Horner, The Statutes of the Apostles or Canones Ecclesiastici, London 1904 (text and tr.), 89-125; J. Périer - A. Périer, Les "127 canons des apôtres," Paris 1912 (repr. in PO 8,4 = 39, Turnhout 1971).

Studies: W. Riedel, Die kirchenrechtlichen Quellen Patriarchats Alexandrien, Leipzig 1900 (repr. Aalen 1968); J.-M. Hanssens, La liturgie d'Hippolyte. Ses documents. Son titulaire. Ses origines et son caractère, Rome 1959, [2]1965, 31-47 and 519-526; B. Botte, La Tradition Apostolique de Saint Hippolyte. Essai de reconstitution, Münster 1963, [5]1989, XII-XXVI; Vertex Traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 134-140; Coptic Encyclopedia 2, 453-456 (s.v. Ecclesiastical Canons).

A. Di Berardino

SYNOUSIASTS. From syn ("with, together") and ousia ("essence, substance"). The ancient Christian authors referred to the *Apollinarians with this title, inasmuch as the Apollinarians affirmed that in Christ the human and the divine substance were united such a way that they resulted in one substance (*Diodore: PG 33, 1560; Eust. M.: PG 86, 940A).

Lampe, s.v. 1337.

M. Simonetti

SYRACUSE
I. The city - II. Archaeology.

I. The city. In 734 BC a colony of Corinthians, led by Archias, founded Syracuse (Thucydides,VI, 3,2; Strabo, VI, 269). Having docked at Ortygia, they expelled the Sicels (Siculi) who lived along the coast and subjugated those peoples who lived inland, the ancestors of the future Cilliri mentioned by Herodotus (VII, 155), as servants of the nobles (Gamoroi). The etymology of the name Syracuse is uncertain: certain scholars consider it to be of Phoenician origin ("the rock of the Gabbiani); others hold that it derives from the term Syraco, a marshland to the S of the city. Syracuse's ascendancy began with Gelon (ca. 540–478 BC), from whom the Greeks sought help in vain against the Persians (Herodotus, VII, 145ff). He affirmed his supremacy over all of W Sicily and conquered the Carthaginians at Himera (480). The splendor of the city continued under Hiero (477–461 BC). In 466 a coup d'état began the democracy, which would last until 405. After having faced Athens in battle twice (427–424 and 415–413 BC), Syracuse reached the apex of its power with Dionysius the Elder (405–367 BC), Timoleon (333–337/336 BC), Agathocles (317–289 BC) and Hiero II (269–215 BC). It then passed under the dominion of *Rome (212 BC), becoming its colony under the emperor *Augustus (21 BC). The emperors did not give it much political significance, because they were worried by the situation on the borders. During the years of the barbarian invasions, Sicily was conquered by the *Vandals, then by *Odoacer and the *Goths. In AD 535 with Bellisarius, it passed under the dominion of *Byzantium, becoming the capital of Sicily. In AD 663, with *Constans II (d. AD 668), it rose to be the capital of the empire. In AD 878 it was conquered by the Arabs.

The origins of Christianity at Syracuse are not well known. Scholars only know with certainty that when *Paul was traveling toward Rome, he remained there for three days (Acts 28:12). During the pre-Constantinian period, there must have been a community of a certain importance, if it had to face the problem of lapsed Christians (lapsi—see Cyprian, 30,5: CSEL 3,2,553). During the *Diocletian persecution, acc. to tradition, Syracuse witnessed the *martyrdom of *Lucia, an attestation to whom can perhaps be found in the catacomb. In 384, Bishop Ursus of *Ravenna dedicated a church to her, and in the 6th c. a *monastery was dedicated in her honor (Gregory the Great, Ep. VIII,36: MGH Ep. I,1,484).

The first bishop seems to have been Marcian, a legendary figure whom the sources, much later, depicted as another Christ. More specific information, however, is provided for Chrestus, who was invited by the emperor *Constantine to the Council of *Arles (314) to discuss the question of the *Donatist controversy (Euseb., HE X,5,21-24, with the emperor's letter); he went there with his deacon Florus and was the first to sign the acts. Another authoritative figure was Bishop Eulalius, present at the Council of Rome (502) to refute the decree of Basil, Odoacer's prefect, which prevented the election of the successor of Pope *Simplicius without the king's approval (Mansi 8,266); he was also present at the council of 503 (Mansi 8,299). The Life of Saint Fulgentius 8 (PL 65,128-130) extends an elegy toward him, acc. to which *Fulgentius, after having left the city in order to embrace the ascetic life of the monks of the *Thebaid, and heading, for this reason, to Carthage, docked at Syracuse, where he met Eulalius, "a bishop of extraordinary sanctity, marvelous hospitality and perfect charity, who hid within his heart a treasure of spiritual wisdom," and who was a lover of the monastic life. Once he had come to know of Fulgentius's intention, Eulalius was able to dissuade him, telling him that the community of Thebaid had become heretical. Moreover, Eulalius seems to have been the recipient of a letter from Ennodius of Pavia (3,18: MGH, Auct. ant. 7,116).

The bishops Maximian (591–594) and John (595–609) reigned under Pope *Gregory the Great. The first, who was already the *abbot of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, was the pope's representative for ecclesiastical discipline in Sicily (Ep. V,54: MGH, Ep. I,1,358); the second had the same duty and was responsible for the ecclesiastical goods (Ep. VI,20: MGH, Ep. I,1,302).

PWK Suppl. 8 (1973) 815-836; EC 11, 718-726; EI 31, 869-878; EAA 7, 329-339; CE 13, 892-893; C. Barreca, I primordi del cristianesimo in Siracusa, Rome 1935; L. Giuliano, Storia di Siracusa antica, Milan 1936; A. Amore, S. Marciano di Siracusa, Vatican City 1958; A. Pincherle, Sulle origini del cristianesimo in Sicilia: Kokalos 10/11 (1964-1965) 547-564; F.P. Rizzo, Fulgenzio a Siracusa: Studi di filologia classica in onore di G. Monaco, IV, Palermo 1991, 1473-1482; M. Sgarlata, Il cristianesimo primitivo in Sicilia alla luce delle più recenti scoperte archeologiche: SMSR 22 (1998) 2, 275-310; G. Greco, Pagani e cristiani a Siracusa tra il III e IV secolo d.C., Rome 1999.

S. Borzì

II. Archaeology. Within the framework of the monumental testimonies to ancient Christianity in Sicily, Syracuse acquires a character and role of first importance for the richness and quality of the extant monuments, even if in the majority of cases they are funerary. These monuments can be subdivided into four large groups by their technical and iconographic characteristics and by their different topographical dislocation with respect to the ancient city.

The first group is constituted by the four great catacombs (S. *Lucia, S. Maria di Gesù, Vigna Cassia and S. Giovanni) which are distributed from E to W along the S slope of the middle and W Acradina. The building of St. Lucia, in its initial nucleus predating the religious peace (313), was developed around the martyr's sepulcher in four regions and on three levels, with characteristics that go from those that are typically archaic in region A, to the use of hydraulic systems in B, within the inclusion of classic rooms in C and D. The long period in which visitors came to the cemetery is attested by two *Byzantine orators and the presence of early medieval sculptural fragments.

More to the W, the catacomb of S. Maria di Gesù, less developed and connected through an arm of an ancient aqueduct with the adjacent Vigna Cassia, essentially consists of two right-angle axes, which distinguish two chronological phases, the most ancient of which (post-Constantinian) witnessed the use of arcosolia containing more than one body (see *Italy: Sicily).

The cemetery of Vigna Cassia, which developed around a rectangular room now exposed to the open sky and which is of debated date and purpose, displays a vast area, resulting from the multiplication of several nuclei that make use of hydraulic systems developed from the 3rd c. to the entire 4th. This sits opposite a sector, dating later than the peace of the church, characterized by large arcosolia containing more than twenty burials, in which the well-known tomb of Marcia stands out, which is decorated with paintings.

A substantially rectangular schema characterizes the excavation of the monumental catacomb of S. Giovanni, where the particular nature of the rock has allowed for the opening of a long and broad decumanus stretching from E to W, which divides the cemeterial web into two large halves that are more or less equivalent, upon which are inserted, primarily in the S sector, cardines intersected by a smaller decumanus. To the S, traces of shorter galleries gravitate toward circular or quadrangular rooms. Among these, to which are also added two in the N sector, a few are distinguished: those that bear the names of Adelphia from which comes the famous sarcophagus (from the Constantinian age) of the Seven Virgins, Antiochia, Eusebius and the Sacred Ampulla. The architectural structure of the cemetery, the remaining frescoes and the aforementioned sarcophagus of Adelphia suggests that its origin was in the first decades of the 4th c.; moreover, the chronology is confirmed by the most ancient inscription found dating to the year 349, while epigraphy bears witness to the use of the hall until at least 452.

A short distance from the structure of San Giovanni, in the Villa Landolia, is found the catacomb of Predio Maltese, which in the past was considered to be a part of the preceding and more recently has been recognized as autonomous. In the same area, the three-apsed crypt of S. Marciano, inserted within the complex of classical monuments, is connected to the figure of the martyr Marcian, the presumed first bishop of Syracuse, and reveals various instances of remodeling until the Norman era and beyond.

The second group of cemeterial systems is that of the hypogea found between Predio Adorno-Avolio, the Capuchin convent and the coast of Pietralonga in E Acradina. These (catacombs Führer, Attanasio, Branciamore, the Cappuchins, Belloni-Monteforte, Troia, Trigilia, Mauceri, Russo, Bonaiuto, Fortuna and Grotticelli), likewise pre-Constantinian in origin, are characterized by less crowding of the burials, although with the usual typological characteristics. These hypogea seem to be traced to small groups, perhaps also familial, which, as the discoveries show, esp. the pottery, are expressed with a noteworthy freedom outside the control of the community.

The third group, from a later era, includes sepulchers that reuse or are inserted into classical monuments. Along the path of the tombs and in the rocky part of the Colle Temenite surrounding the Greek theater open out numerous cubicles in a cross-form layout with arcosolia, including one that was installed in the Nymphaeum and which was later transformed into a room for Christian worship.

In connection with the city, we must consider a group of suburban hypogea, from those of Riuzzo and Manomozza at Priolo to the catacombs of Molinello, near the harbor of Augusta at the station of Megara Iblea. These are divided mostly in cubicles and in sepulchral rooms which gravitate toward large sepulchers with canopies and thus differentiating themselves, even if they are chronologically of the same era, from those of the city proper, from which such a typology is absent.

One could also trace the early cathedral back to the cemeterial context. In fact, over the aforementioned crypt of S. Marciano stand the remains of a very large basilica, now dedicated to St. John, but originally it was believed to have been dedicated to the bishop-martyr, containing three columned aisles, with a semicircular apse and a presbytery, which was perhaps elevated and whose covering was imagined to have been a roof. The construction was assigned to the 6th c., and scholars have ascribed to it the dignity of being an episcopal church until the 7th c., when this dignity was transferred within the city to Ortygia, in the new church dedicated to the Virgin and adapted from the temple of Athena. This church, with three aisles, which was created by reversing the building's orientation and opening arcades in the walls of the cella, shows, despite much remodeling, esp. in the N apsidiole, clear remains of the original building.

The reuse of preexisting buildings was frequent at Syracuse, as shown, e.g., by the church contained in the naos of the temple of Diana, also in Ortygia; or the two smaller places of worship, the one inserted in the context of the bathing area connected to the amphitheater and today called "Piscina di S. Nicolò" (after the church above it) and the other, a hypogeum, discovered under the city's train station. The architectural urban heritage is completed by the church of St. *Peter intra moenia, also in Ortygia—with a longitudinal layout with three aisles with pillars in a rectangular section, a semicircular apse and a covering with a barrel-vaulted roof—and that of St. Martin, likewise with three pillared aisles and a semicircular apse, and characterized by an emphasis of the longitudinal scheme.

In the suburbs, the church of S. Pietro ad Baias, with three pillared aisles and a Trichorate presbytery, datable to the 2nd half of the 5th c., sets forth again the characteristic iconography of the presbytery present in other churches on the island (see *Italy: Sicily), while in the Syracusan countryside, the church of S. Focà di Priolo presents, along with the aforementioned from St. Peter's, the peculiarity that the perimeter walls are traversed by corresponding arches to those of the aisles, interpreted in the past as continuous openings which were subsequently blocked up.

P. Testini, Archeologia cristiana, Bari [2]1980, 272ff., 292-293, and esp. 809-810; O. Garana, Le catacombe siciliane e i loro martiri, Palermo 1961; G. Agnello, Recenti scoperte di monumenti paleocristiani nel siracusano, in Akten des VII. Intern. Kongresses f. christliche Archäologie, Vatican City-Berlin 1969, 309-326; Id., Nuovi ritrovamenti nella catacomba di S. Maria a Siracusa: RivAC 49 (1973) 7-31; S.L. Agnello, Siracusa sotterranea: nuovi contributi, in Atti del III Congr. Naz. Archeol. Cristiana, Trieste 1974, 467-473; Id., Chiese siracusane del VI secolo: CCAB 27(1980) 13-26; P. Testini, La cultura artistica in Italia nella antichità, in La cultura in Italia fra Tardo Antico e Alto Medioevo, Rome 1981, 812-815 (see p. 810); P. Pelagatti, Siracusa. Le ultime ricerche in Ortigia: ASAA 54 (1982) 117-163; G. Vallet - G. Voza, Dal neolitico all'era industriale nel territorio da Augusta a Siracusa, Siracusa 1984; L. Polacco - M. Trojani - A.C. Scolari, Ricerche e scavi nell'area del teatro antico di Siracusa, 1970-1983: Kokalos 30-31 (1984-1985) 839-846; M. Griesheimer, Genèse et développement de la catacombe Saint-Jean à Syracuse: MEFRA 101 (1989) 751-782; Id., Nouvelles inscriptions funéraires de la catacombe Saint-Jean: RivAC 72 (1996) 1-2, 115-132; A. Ahlqvist, Pitture e mosaici nei cimiteri paleocristiani di Siracusa: corpus iconographicum, Venezia 1995.

L. Pani Ermini - R. Giordani - S. Borzì

SYRIA

I. The provinces and Christian origins - II. Archaeology.

I. The provinces and Christian origins. Conquering Syria during the years 65–62 BC, Pompey transformed it into a Roman province, although leaving various independent cities and numerous indigenous leaders who were in one way or another subjected to *Rome. Its borders were not well defined, and it went from the Taurus to Arabia and Egypt (Flavius Josephus, Ant. Iud. 12,317-321); the Euphrates River constituted the E border. Syria was geographically and ethnically diverse, including the flourishing coast (where Greek was spoken), the hinterland with valleys and highlands (of Aramaic language) and a desert area (Arabic-speaking Bedouins, but the languages were mixed everywhere; Latin was used in the army and the administration). Syria was a mosaic of different political situations, which extended even to the 1st c. AD, although a process of annexations and transformations of some territories into imperial properties continued to develop. Moreover, Syria's borders underwent radical changes over the course of time; at the end of the 1st c., they went from the Amanus mountain chain with Commagene, which was annexed in AD 72 with Samosata, along the Euphrates and W to beyond Mount Carmel and Hauran. Scholars do not know when *Palmyra was annexed. After the Jewish war of AD 70, it was separated from the province of Judea, which from the time of the emperor *Hadrian onward would have the official name of Syria Palaestina and only later Palaestina with the capital *Caesarea (see *Palestine). In 106, the emperor Trajan transformed the vassal kingdom of the Nabataeans into the Roman province of Arabia, with the capital *Bostra. Later, *Septimius Severus subdivided Syria into two provinces: Syria Coele (or Coelesyria) to the N, with Antioch as the capital, after a brief parenthesis with Laodicea and Syria Phoenice to the S with the capital Berytus (Beirut). Over the course of the 4th c. a new subdivision was instituted (the dates are not well known) with four provinces: Augusta Euphratensis (Commagene, Cyrrhestica, the cities along the Euphrates River until Circesium), Augusta Libanensis (the territory of Phoenicia beyond Lebanon and Hermon), Phoenice

(along the coast) and Syria Coele (the area of Antioch). All the provinces belonged to the diocese Oriens. Syria, which was Hellenized in the cities, preserved the local languages in the villages and in the countryside. It enjoyed a large commercial and cultural development during the Roman period; in its territory there were large cities such as *Antioch, *Seleucia, *Apamea, *Laodicea, *Damascus, Ptolemais, *Tyre, Sidon, Berytus, *Emesa (Homs), *Palmyra, Samosata, Gabala, Epiphania, etc. Around the mid-3rd c. it underwent invasions from the *Sassanids with *Shapur I, who also occupied Antioch, destroyed *Dura Europos and deported much of the population, including even Bishop Demetrian (see BS 4,550-551). Syria was occupied by the Sassanids from 609 to 628, and shortly thereafter it came under the rule of the Arabs.

NT writers often referred to Syria and understood it in the sense of the territory of the Roman province (Mt 4:24; Lk 2:2; Acts 15:23; 18:18; 20:3; Gal 1:21). Christianity spread there very early, already during the first Christian missions (e.g., Tyre, Acts 21:4-7; Ptolemais, Acts 21:7; Damascus, Acts 9:2-22; Sidon, Acts 27:3; Antioch, Acts 11:19ff, etc.). For certain locations a Christian presence is documented only starting from the 2nd or 3rd c. In any case, in the 3rd c. Syria was one of the most Christian regions of the Roman Empire.

Although geographically and politically, in antiquity, the Euphrates River constituted the E border of Syria, the same cannot be said from the ethnic, cultural and linguistic point of view; in this respect it went beyond natural borders. Culturally and linguistically, *Syriac literature embraces all those writers who expressed themselves in Syriac, even if coming from Persia, *Adiabene, Palestine or other regions. For this reason with the expression "Syriac fathers," we intend to refer, in the broad sense, not only to authors who came from Syria proper but to all those who, independent of the geographic area, wrote in Syriac, and in a special way the writers from the territory included between the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers, i.e., *Mesopotamia. A monastic spirituality dominates among the educated but esp. among the general population. The patriarchate of Antioch included several Roman provinces, in particular, Syria, Phoenicia, Arabia, *Osroene, Mesopotamia, Isauria and the island of *Cyprus. *Cappadocia depended on the patriarch of *Constantinople.

The emperor *Trajan was the first to extend Roman dominion beyond the Euphrates River, establishing the provinces of Mesopotamia and Assyria, which were nevertheless abandoned by his successor Hadrian. The emperors Lucius Verus and *Marcus Aurelius re-created the province of Mesopotamia, which in antiquity was always a theater for wars, first with the *Parthians and then with the Sassanids. The emperor Septimius Severus expanded his territory and created the provinces of Osroene, with the capital *Edessa, and Mesopotamia to the E, with the capital of *Nisibis, a city that passed over to the Sassanids in 363 after the defeat of *Julian. The last Roman outpost remained the city of Circesium, situated at the confluence of the Euphrates and Khabur Rivers. Syria was the territory of meeting between the Christianity of the Greek language and the Semitic traditions. Economic downfall in Syria, caused by numerous earthquakes (e.g., that of Antioch in 588), plagues and wars, is recorded starting from the mid-6th c. In the region there was a strong Roman military presence and then Byzantine presence through the numerous wars with the Persians first and then the Sassanids. Modern-day Syria corresponds, in the general lines, to the ancient one; nevertheless, a N portion today belongs to Turkey, and a S portion belongs to Lebanon, with a small extension into Mesopotamia.

The first spread of Christianity in Mesopotamia is a vigorously debated historical topic, inasmuch as the first sources and traditions, which maintained that this event dated back to the evangelization of Thaddaeus (*Addai) and his disciples Aggai and Mari, are not entirely reliable. Nevertheless, a series of documents attests that Christianity had some strength at the end of 2nd c., a strength that had rather remote roots, dating back to *Jewish Christian missionaries. In Mesopotamia, from the 3rd c. onward, the Syriac language, which derived from spoken Aramaic at Edessa, increasingly acquired literary value. The bishops of Mesopotamia, who were supporters of *Nestorius, after the Council of *Ephesus (431), established the so-called Nestorian church, which separated from the patriarchate of Antioch, thus establishing the episcopal see of their *catholicos at *Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Moreover, after the Council of Ephesus, the *monophysites, who were at that time called "*Jacobites," obtained the upper hand in Syria and N Mesopotamia. Both in Syria and Mesopotamia monasticism enjoyed a special development, establishing a form of Christianity that was very different from that in Western countries. Monasticism developed in every region of the East; the first Syrian monasticism is is recorded in *Theodoret of Cyrrhus's Historia Religiosa. Original forms such as those of the *stylites also developed. The column of St. *Simeon Stylites, surrounded by religious buildings, also became the center of pilgrimage. The monasteries assumed importance as centers of cultural and religious life.

PWK 23/2 (1932) 1622-1727; EC 9, 737-740; EAA 6, 576-578; RGG³ 6, 571-581; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e s., CSCO 127, subs. 2, Louvain 1951; Id., Le couvent de Bar Sauma et le patriarcat jacobite d'Antioche et de Syrie, CSCO 146, subs. 7, Louvain 1954; A. Vööbus, A History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, 3 vols., Louvain 1958-88; W. Hage, Die syrisch-Jacobitische Kirche in frühislamischer Zeit, Wiesbaden 1966; J. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, subs. 36, Louvain 1970; J.B. Segal, Edessa, the "Blessed City," Oxford 1970; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford ²1971, 226-294; R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom, Cambridge 1975 (with intr. on Christian origins and bibl.); B. Lifshitz, Études sur l'histoire de la province romaine de Syrie: ANRW II, 8, 3-30; J.P. Rey-Coquais, Syrie romaine de Pompée à Dioclétien: JRS 68 (1978) 44-73; E. Peretto, Il problema degli inizi del cristianesimo in Siria: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 197-214; U. Bianchi, Questioni storico-religiose relative al cristianesimo in Siria nei secoli II-IV: ibid. 19 (1979) 41-52; W.S. McCulloug, A Short History of Syriac Christianity to the Rise of Islam, Chico, CA 1982; S. Brock, Syriac Perspectives on Late Antiquity, London 1984; I. Peña, La desconcertante vida de los monjes sirios. Siglos IV-VI, Salamanca 1985 (It. tr. Cinisello Balsamo 1990); R. Contini, Il Hawran preislamico: ipotesi di una storia linguistica: Felix Ravenna 133-134, fasc. 1/2 (1987) 24-79; P. Canivet - J.-P. Rey-Coquais (eds.), La Syrie, de Byzance à l'Islam. VII^e-VIII^e siècles, Dams 1992; J.-M. Fiey, Pour un Oriens Christianus novus. Répertoire des diocèses syriaques orientaux et occidentaux, Beirut 1993; Syrien von den Aposteln zu den Kalifen, Linz 1993; F. Millar, Il ruolo delle lingue semitiche nel vicino oriente tardo-romano (V-VI secolo): Mediterraneo Antico 1 (1998) 71-94; H.J.W. Drijvers, Syriac Culture in Late Antiquity: Hellenism and Local Traditions, Mediterraneo Antico 1 (1998) 95-113; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins: processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'Empire Iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002.

A. Di Berardino

II. Archaeology. During the first Christian centuries, Syria was part of the patriarchate of *Antioch and extended from the Gulf of Antalya to the Tigris River, from the mountains of Taurus to the E shore of the Dead Sea. This latter part formed Arabia. Syria had different regions by language and custom: in this brief summary, we begin from the W, acc. to the scheme outlined by R. Devreesse (Patriarcat d'Antioche, Paris 1945).

Isauria. Today in Turkey, this region extended along the coasts of the Mediterranean opposite Cyprus. The chief city was Seleucia on the Kalykadnos, today Silifke, and was the port of this province. Its bishop Agapius was present at the Council of *Nicaea (325). In 359, a council called by the emperor *Constantius was held in the city. *Egeria went to Seleucia to see St. *Thecla, from whose famous sanctuary, placed to the N the city, some remains were discovered at Merianlik. Egeria wrote that it "was located above the city on an elevated plateau. . . . Near the sanctuary, there was nothing but countless monasteries of men and women" (Pereg. 23,2). The church, 80 m (262 ft) long, was constructed on a grotto, in which Thecla was said to have dwelt. It had a semicircular apse, a narthex and a portico to the S. On the spot are the remains of a church constructed in the 5th c. by the emperor *Zeno, with a rectangular layout and dome, and the ruins of a third basilica-style church (Guyer - Herzfeld, Mon. Asiae min. ant., II; Keil- Wilhelm, Mon. Asiae min. ant. III). Near Kaulidivan four churches were found. At the Alahan Monastery (ancient Apadnas), in the heart of Isauria, are the remains of a pilgrimage center dedicated to St. Conon; spread about in various places are the remains of Christian buildings constructed between the 5th and 6th c.

Diocaesarea. Today Uzuncaburç, this city has the remains of the church built on the site of the large temple of Jupiter as well as of two basilicas, a cemetery constructed on the tomb of the martyr Lucius and another dedicated to St. *Stephen in the 4th c. (Keil-Wilhelm, Mon. Asiae min. ant., III, 44-79). Other ruins of churches have been brought to light at Olba, modern-day Ura, with three buildings (Keil-Wilhelm, Mon. Asiae min. ant., III, 86). Syria properly so-called is divided into two parts: the first in the N and the second to the S. In the N part are found the chief monuments which have brought great fame to the religious architecture of Syria, esp. in the three mountains: Jebel Barisha, Jebel al-ʿAla and Jebel Seman with the well-known sanctuary of St. Simeon Stylites. The comprehensive and detailed study done by G. Tchalenko and other recent studies done by I. Peña - P. Castellana - R. Fernández offer us a description of the various places.

Neocaesarea (today Dibsi Faraj). This site has remains of a church from the 4th c. with mosaics (Donceel-Voûte, Les pavements, 69-86).

Beroea. Today Aleppo, in NW Syria halfway between the Euphrates River and the ocean, Beroea was one of the primary dioceses. Archaeologists have found traces of the church that was built by *Helena with a quadrilobate layout, in the mosque called Halawiya, which contains an amalgam of epochs. The city also had a Jewish-Christian community; it is also true that St. *Jerome was able to consult the Aramaic gospel of the Hebrews there (Bagatti, Church from Circumcision, 84). Sixty km (37.3 mi) from Aleppo at Qalat Seman is the church of St. Simeon Stylites (d. 459), who lived here on top of a column for 37 years.

Anasartha (called Theodoropolis by the emperor *Justinian). Today Khanasir, situated 60 km (37.3 mi) to the S of Aleppo, Anasartha still preserves the ancient circuit of walls around the city. Two large architraves have been preserved, one of which is near the large 5th-c. church and the other located more to the SE. The church is the martyrium constructed by Silvanus, the dux Arabiae, and in the architrave is found a scupture of the image of the Virgin with baby Jesus and two angels, who are in the act of transporting her into heaven (Lassus, Sanctuaires, 252, 294). In the region many Christian inscriptions have been found (Devreesse, Patriarcat d'Antioche, 164-167).

Epiphania. Today Hama, located at a road junction, Epiphania was admired by Jerome on account of its splendor (De locis hebraicis). It preserves in the large mosque the Qubbat al-Khazna made with columns and Byzantine capitals coming from various churches, probably from the one constructed on the pagan temple, which was then changed into a mosque, the Jamia el-Kebir. It was inhabited by a recluse (Peña - Castellana - Fernández, Reclus, 293-295). The archaeological digs have brought to light traces of the Byzantine era with a church and a "refuge," dedicated to the Virgin and Sts. *Cosmas and Damian. The inscriptions also mention the sanctuary of St. *Sergius and Bacchus with liturgical objects offered by the faithful (Jalabert - Mouterde, Inscriptions, V,15-38). Likewise in this region numerous testimonies of ancient Christianity remain (Devreesse, Patriarcat d'Antioche, 184-191). A low relief found to the E of Hama bears an image of St. Simeon Stylites with his disciple, who brings him food (Peña - Castellana - Fernández, Stylites, 181-183).

Phoenicia. Also divided into two parts: the first on the Mediterranean Sea, the second extended toward the E.

Sidon. Today Saida, the city preserves a church with a mosaic floor with geometric motifs from the 4th c. Many Christian lanterns with crosses and the image of *David with his sling were found in the cistern; all these objects today reside in the Museum of the Flagellation in Jerusalem.

Beirut. Studies on the topography of the city have confirmed that the church, or cathedral, called Anastasis, stood near the modern-day Greek Orthodox church of St. George. A law school was in the neighborhood. It does not seem certain, however, that the wall under the medieval church of St. John the Baptist belonged to a Byzantine church; it seems more likely that it was part of the nearby baths. An inscription of Ps 28:3 on a rock reused in the same church suggests that a Byzantine baptistery was nearby. Mosaic flooring and remains of an apse were also found to the E of St. George Maronite Cathedral. In the city's museum many mosaics of the region are preserved, among which is that from Jenat with the representation of the Good *Shepherd, who has the appearance of a young man with many animals.

Byblos (today Gebal). This city been restored, and the archaeological dig at the foot of the Acropolis has uncovered the well-known bas-relief of *Orpheus surrounded by exotic animals, reminiscent of the paintings of the catacomb of *Domitilla. The excavation of 1961 has also brought to light some early Christian mosaics.

Antaradus (today Tartus). In the N wall of the medieval church is perhaps preserved a trace of a more ancient chapel, as shown by the Corinthian capitals that were reused. A piece of marble bears a house inscription with two crosses at the beginning and at the end of the text.

Heliopolis (today Baalbek). This city had a church in the atrium of the large temple of Jupiter, with a polygon apse on the outside and a circular apse within. The orientation to the W, like the temple itself, was changed in 6th c. The church, which had been very well preserved, was destroyed in 1933 to investigate the original structure of the pagan temple; as a result, no trace of the building can be seen today. In the circular temple of Venus, which was converted into the church of St. Barbara, a cross in the internal portion of the wall has been preserved. The Christians said that even the Great Mosque rested on a church; it is also true that one can see some remains of the baptistery, pushed against an archway of the N part. Christian funerary remains have been noted in various grottoes.

Salamias (today Salamiyah). Scholars know of a 5th-c. church dedicated to St. Sergius and another from the 7th c. dedicated to the Virgin *Mary (Devreesse, Patriarcat d'Antioche, 207). The inscriptions also mentioned an "asylum" of the martyr *Cyriacus and various deceased persons. An encolpion made of wood bears the figure of Christ (Jalabert - Mouterde, Inscriptions, V,221-231).

In the central region of Syria and in the Hauran, ruins of churches and monasteries are scattered throughout in villages and small inhabited centers; the area to the S and W of Aleppo, between Antioch and Apamea, is an immense field of ruins of hundreds of monumental Christian testimonies that at times have been very well preserved, esp. in the territories of Jebel Shaik Barakat and Jebel Seman (where the monastery of St. Simen Stylites was located) to the E of Aleppo, Jebel Barisha and Jebel al-'Ala near the border with Turkey, and Jebel Zawiya in the SW toward the valley of the Oronte. This rural area was called the region of the "dead city," being a semidesert; nearly 1,200 churches have been counted, the mark of the deeply religious Christian population: many inhabited centers counted only some 10 inhabitants. There are numerous monasteries, the impressive remains of which have been preserved. After the 7th c., many churches were abandoned, even if various monasteries continued to exist, esp. that of St. Simeon Stylites, until the 10th c. One can mention several of these Christian buildings. Brad (Barad) (Jebel Seman; ancient Kaprobarada): the cathedral with three aisles with a portico dated to the years 399–402 and two monasteries; Kharba Shams (Jebel Seman), a well-preserved church from the 4th c. repaired in the 5th; Qasr al-Banat, near the Turkish border, a large monastic building; Al-Bara (ancient Kapropera, in Jebel Zawiya): five churches and six monasteries; in the vicinity there is the monastery of Dayr Sobat at Ruwayha (Jebel Zawiya), one of the largest churches in the region, with two towers; Serğile (Sergilla) and Jebel Zawiya Qalb Loze (Lauzeh, in Jebel Barisha), perhaps a center for pilgrims likewise having hospices, it possesses one of the best desert churches of Syria from the middle of the 5th c. with two towers on the façade: with three aisles and twenty small windows; at Deir Qita (Jebel Barisha) two Christian inscriptions from 350 and 355 attest to the presence of Christians, the church of 418, a hospice of 436, the church of St. Sergius (537), that of the Most Holy Trinity (551), and two baptisteries from the years 515 and 567; and Deir Dehes (Jebel Barisha), in the limy rock of N Syria, a large monastic center (J.-L. Biscop, Deir Déhès. Monastère d'Antiochène, Beyrouth 1997). Also worthy of note are Qanawāt (ancient Kanatha), deir el-'Adadas, Deir es-Sleib, Haourte and Hir esh-Sheik. The most important center was the structure of St. Simeon Stylites (Qalaat Semaan), constructed on a plateau during the years 480–490. Simeon lived for a long time on top of a column; around this column, after his death, were built the monastery and the church and subsequently a wall surrounding the city. The chief entrance was from the S through a monumental arch for pilgrims who came from Dair Samaan (ancient Telannisos), situated further down, St. Simeon's first place of residence, a village for pilgrims with churches, monasteries and hospices for lodging. Not far away, on the E side, are also found the ruins of Taqleh, with the 5th-c. church, and Fafertin, with a church dated to the year 372, the second oldest church of Syria after that of *Dura Europos.

The E provinces of Syria include the following: Euphratensis, with cities located to the W of the Euphrates; Osroene, with cities located to the E of the same river; and Mesopotamia, which reached to the point of the Tigris River, to the borders of the empire. The pilgrim *Egeria stayed in Euphratensis, the chief city Hierapolis (Mabbug, today Manbij), and found that it was "very beautiful and rich and everything abounds," but did not speak of its bishops or churches (Pereg. 18,1). The city does not preserve any ancient buildings, because the stones were reused for new ones. A bronze cross, or an encolpion, was found, with the figure, it seems, of St. *Chrysogonus, a martyr who lived under the emperor *Diocletian. At el-Bire, located 18 km (11.2 mi) to the SE of Hierapolis, a mosaic of flowers and birds remains, as well as an inscription that mentions an oratory of the martyrs.

Cyrrhus. Seventy km (43.5 mi) N of Aleppo, near the border with Turkey, Cyrrhus today is a field of ruins. In the urban area, to the SW, are traces of buildings, attributed to the pagan temple, which was followed by a Christian chapel, perhaps that of the martyrs *Cosmas and Damian.

Carrhae (modern-day Harran, Turkey). This is a small village where archaeological remains from the early Christian era have been preserved.

With respect to Mesopotamia, one can find some dioceses in E Turkey such as Amida (modern-day Diyarbakir), situated on the plateau of basalt near the bank of the Tigris River (Dicle Nehri).

In the fortress, a building is believed to have been a Nestorian church, which was constructed using local technique. It has two distinct parts and various remodelings. The historical era of the construction is much debated, but in all likelihood it is pre-Islamic (Monneret de Villard, Chiese della Mesopotamia, 31). There is also a church dedicated to the Virgin Mary (Meryem Ana Kilisesi) with a central layout (Lassus, Sanctuaires, XXIX,154), which is still open for worship services.

Ctesiphon (see *Seleucia-Ctesiphon; modern-day Takh i Kesra, Iran). Set on the Tigris River, 40 km (24.9 mi) S of Baghdad, Ctesiphon was the capital of the Persian Empire, and it had numerous churches. Only two Nestorian churches remain that belong to the patristic era, one lying over the other. The lower church, longitudinal in layout, contains large walls and columns almost butting up against them; the higher one has pillars and three rectangular cells like apses, the center of which shows three rectangular niches. The doors are numerous and always along the long sides (Monneret de Villard, Chiese della Mesopotamia, 9-31).

Al-Hirah (in Iraqi territory). Two Nestorian churches have been excavated here, although not completely. Both have large walls and columns close to them, as in the case of Ctesiphon. One, known as XI, contains a square apse with an altar in the back to the E and two side rooms; in the middle, there is the bema with semicircular sedilia. The other church, known as V, is simpler but not completely excavated; it is oriented like the other and has columns close to the walls (Monneret de Villard, Chiese della Mesopotamia, 32-44); so far it is not known to which saints the two churches were dedicated, because there were many of them. Scholars know that Christians were transferred into Mesopotamia during the wars, and therefore it comes as no surprise to find worship buildings in the forms proper to the host country. The bema seat, in this region, probably assumes a different function from the one it had in Syria, i.e., to liturgically imitate the functions that were done at Jerusalem at the Holy Sepulcher (Blomme, La liturgie: SBF 29 [1979] 221-237). For the patristic period, under the Sassanids, belong, among other things, several figurative seals with scenes from the OT, like the Sacrifice of Abraham; Daniel among the lions; and in the NT, Mary and baby Jesus, the Visitation, and Jesus' *Entry into Jerusalem.

An example of a monophysite church, closer to Syria than the Nestorian ones, can be seen at Qasr Serij, 60 km (37.3 mi) NW of Mosul. The church had a well-developed portico on three sides and was dedicated to St. Sergius.

S. Guyer - E. Herzfeld, Meriamlik und Korykos. Zwei christliche Ruinenstätten des rauhen Kilikiens. Monumenta Asiae Minoris antiqua, II, Manchester 1930; J. Keil - A. Wilhelm, Denkmäler aus dem rauhen Kilikien. Monumenta Asiae Minoris antiqua, III, Manchester 1931; U. Monneret de Villard, Le chiese della Mesopotamia, Rome 1940; R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche depuis la paix de l'Église jusqu'à la conquête arabe, Paris 1945; J. Lassus, Sanctuaires chrétiens de Syrie, Paris 1947; G. Tchalenko, Villages antiques de la Syrie du Nord, I-III, Paris 1953-58; L. Jalabert - R. Mouterde, Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie, V, Paris 1959; B. Bagatti, The Church from the Circumcision, Jerusalem 1971; I. Peña - P. Castellana - R. Fernández, Les stylites syriens, Jerusalem 1975; Id., Les reclus syriens, Jerusalem 1980; J.A. Lerner, Christian Seals in the Sassanian Period, Nederlands Inst. Istanbul 1977; V. Blomme, La liturgie de Jérusalem et son influence sur les Églises nestorienne et syrienne: SBF 29 (1979) 221-237; J. Peña - P. Castellana - R. Fernández, Les Cénobites Syriens, Jerusalem 1983; J.-M. Dentzer, Hauran. Recherches archéologiques sur la Syrie du Sud à l'époque hellénistique et romaine, 2 vols., Paris 1985-86; S.Th. Parker, Romans and Saracens: A History of the Arabian Frontier, Winona Lake, IN 1986; P. Donceel-Voûte, Les pavements des églises byzantines de Syrie et du Liban, Louvain-la-Neuve 1988; M. Tardieu, Les paysages reliques. Routes et haltes syriennes d'Isidore à Simplicius, Louvain 1990; P. Canivet - J.-P. Rey-Coquais (eds.), La Syrie, de Byzance à l'Islam. VII^e-VIII^e siècles, Actes du colloque international de Lyon, Lyon 1992; S.P. Brock, Studies in Syriac Christianity: History, Literature and Theology, London 1992; R. Burns, Monuments of Syria: An Historical Guide, New York-London 1994; I. Peña, El arte cristiano de la Siria bizantina, Madrid 1995; After Bardaisan: Studies on Continuity and Change in Syriac Christianity in Honor of Han J.W. Drijvers, ed. G.J. Reinink - A.C. Klugkist, Leuven 1999; G. del Olmo Lete - J.L. Montero Fenollós (eds.), Archaeology of the Upper Syrian Euphrates, Barcelona 1999; W. Ball, Rome in the East: The Transformation of an Empire, London-New York 2000; K. Butcher, Roman Syria and the Near East, Los Angeles 2004.

B. Bagatti

SYRIAC

I. Premise - II. Language - III. Literature - IV. Liturgy - V. Syriac studies.

I. Premise. Because of its geographic diffusion and the endurance of its use, and also because of its closeness to the dialect used by Jesus of Nazareth to proclaim the coming of the kingdom of God, Syriac is the most important language of the Christian *East. It was the mother tongue of the original orthodox community, which then became *Nestorian (Assyrian or Eastern Syrian or Chaldean, today the Eastern Church), *monophysite (*Jacobite or Western Syrian, today the Orthodox Syrian Church), *Maronite (from the monk *John Maron [d. ca. 410], and his disciples from the convent of the region of *Apamea, where in the 7th c. this branch of the Antiochene church began) and *Melkite (from malkō, "king," i.e., to refer to the communities that depended on the *Byzantine [= Orthodox emperor]) communities of Syria and Mesopotamia, thus the majority of the Eastern dioceses of the Roman Empire, but also of Persia. The missionary bent of these churches, moreover, led Syria to India during the early centuries (the Malabar and Malankarica churches are their heirs) and even *China. For various issues—from history to *hagiography, touching *exegesis and the history of *dogma—Syriac is essential for patristic studies, because of the relationship of the Aramaic culture and the translation of the Greek fathers, which have often been lost in the original language. Moreover, one should emphasize the mediating position that the Syriac churches acquired with respect to the nearby *Armenian and *Georgian churches, and their important role in the transmission to the Arabs (and through them to Westerners) of the classic Greek and ancient *Mesopotamian cultural heritage.

II. Language. This Semitic language assimilated such an extensive number of foreign words (Akkadian, Hebrew, Persian and esp. Greek) that it was rightly qualified as the "least Semitic of all the Semitic languages" (see biblio. B1). It is generally referred to as a late Aramaic dialect, deriving from the common Semitic northwestern root.

Having derived from Edessene (to which the most ancient *pagan inscriptions bear witness), Syriac was, thanks to the prestige of the small kingdom of *Osroene (capital *Edessa; Roman province after 217), the lingua franca of the Aramaic populations in Mesopotamia and *Syria. It established itself as a literary language in the 4th c., when these populations had by that point adhered in large part to the Christian faith. Subsequently, it was due to the defense of its own cultural and political identity in face of the Roman, Byzantine, Persian and Arab pressure that Syriac owed its growth and survival. Even though from the 8th c. onward *Arabic quickly supplanted it as a spoken language, it nevertheless remained very much alive as a literary and liturgical language. It is still used as a learned and liturgical language in some places of E Turkey, Syria and Iraq.

Syriac writing derives from a square Hebrew script: it contains many similarities with *Palmyran cursive in the first examples, that is to say, in the pagan inscriptions from the region of Edessa (1st and 2nd c. AD). From the beginning of the 5th c., the alphabet became uniform in a clear and distinct script, which was called "Estrangelo" (from the Greek term strongylos, "round, stout"). From the 8th c. onward two other alphabets developed alongside it: "Serta" in Jacobite and Maronite contexts and "Chaldean" among the Easterners. Until the 8th c., the vowels were indicated by diacritical marks (above and below the word). This system was subsequently developed in the East, and in the West it was replaced by Greek vowels.

We possess a considerable number of MSS in Syriac (scarce papyri), the most ancient of which are preserved in Europe. These collections are rather well documented, even if the catalogs were not edited with the same criteria. The MSS preserved in the East are less well known and have many surprises in store for Syriac scholars. Recent discoveries of MSS on Mount *Sinai and China bear this out. The most ancient parchments (the first dates back to 411) are of utmost importance, and their antiquity is determinative for the MS tradition of works translated from Greek.

III. Literature. A. 2nd–4th c. Although Edessa since the 3rd c. was the chief center of Aramaic Christianity, its *evangelization must date back to the end of the 1st c. Through the work of *Jewish Christians coming from Jewish communities of Palestinian obedience from the small kingdom of *Adiabene (to the E of the Tigris River; see *Persia). In these places the first attempts of a Syriac translation of the OT were worked out, as shown by the reciprocal relationships of some parts of the *Peshitta and the *Targumim.

It was in these Persian regions of Mesopotamia, without forgetting *Nisibis, which possessed a rabbinic school, and the syncretistic context of Edessa and in bilingual Syria, that the first writings in the Syriac language were redacted in the 2nd and 3rd c. and beginning of the 4th. These were rather connected or tied to *gnosticism, heterodox Judaism (*Ebionites, *Elkesaites) and Jewish Christianity. Many of these have survived in other languages (*Coptic, Greek: certain scholars still hesitate to take a position concerning an original Syriac text) or were reused in works compiled later. The most famous were as follows: the corpus of translations pertaining to *Thomas, among which was the Gospel of Thomas and the Hymn of the Pearl; the Gospel of Philip; the Odes of Solomon; the *ps.-Clementines; Tatian's Diatessaron;* the Didascalia;* and, moreover, the Acts of Thomas and the Manichean Psalter. The teaching of the gnostic astrologer *Bardesanes (d. 222) merits honorable mention.

This literature highlights the role and the originality of the two chief orthodox figures for Syriac literature: *Aphraates the Persian Sage (d. 345) and *Ephrem of Nisibis (d. 373) and, in their line, *Maruta of Maiferqat (d. ca. 420), just as several minor Edessene writers from the end of the 4th c. (esp. *Cyrillona). The chief characteristics of their Christianity, which was not yet contaminated by Hellenism, are the following: biblicism and "asceticism-*Encratism" (see the tendencies of Tatian's Diatessaron), Jewish translations (Targumim, Midrash and *liturgy) but also anti-Judaism, Mesopotamian traditions, *symbolism, and apophatic theology and poetic form.

We subsequently find these elements in the writings of the great Syrian authors such as *Jacob of Sarug (d. 521) but weakened and often in the shadow of Greek traditions. In effect, the minor isolation of the Persian communities, their frequent contact with *Antioch and *Constantinople, the growing organization and centralization of the Syriac churches both in the Persian and Roman territories, led them to Hellenize heavily at the beginning of the 5th c. Before this date translations of the NT had already been completed, which went under the name of Vetus Syriaca (known through the citations of writers and fragments contained in two very ancient MSS: Sinaiticus and Curetonianus) and some translations of the Greek fathers.

B. 5th–7th c. Although the beginnings of Syriac literature were primarily "Persian," and even though Syriac Christianity gives the impression of having gravitated toward small centers, with the beginning of the 5th c., we see the organization of two blocs: on the one hand, one sees Persian Christianity, having as its administrative center *Seleucia-Ctesiphon and as centers of study Edessa, then Nisibis and Seleucia-Ctesiphon; on the other hand, the Eastern provinces of the dioceses of the East (Mesopotamia, Osroene, Euphratesia, Syria I and II), which intellectually orbited around Edessa, which lost, however, the school of the Persians in 489, and, from the administrative point of view, was likewise dependent on Antioch. Alongside a still orthodox production, the evidences of which are *Balai (d. 435), the Liber Graduum, the Spelunca Thesaurorum* and *John of Apamea, the 5th c. saw an increase of translations, beginning with that of the "standard" version of the NT (Peshitta). To the school of Edessa, esp. under the episcopate of *Rabbula (d. 435) and *Ibas (d. 457), the chief Greek fathers were slowly translated as need presented itself. The importance of the monastic institution, which developed greatly starting from this age, and the division of Syriac Christianity explain the existence of various translations of the same work. The great *schism from the end of this century led to the classification, after this age, of writers acc. to their religious confession. The chief authors were for the Nestorian-Persian part: *Narsai (d. 502); Barsuma (*Barsauma) (d. around 495) and the founder of the School of Seleucia Mar *Aba (d. 552); then *Isho'yahb I (596) and *Babai the Great (d. 628); for the monophysite side *Philoxenus of Mabbug (d. 522); Polycarp, author of the new translation of the NT (the Philoxenian), which bore the name of its source of inspiration; the moderate Jacob of Sarug (d. 521); *Jacob Bardeus (d. 578), who gave his name to the Jacobites; *John of Tella (d.538); the historian *John of Ephesus (d. 586); *Peter of Callinicum (d. 591); *Henana of Adiabene (d.610); and Thomas of Harkel. The latter, who had taken refuge in *Alexandria during the outbreak of the Muslim invasion, was the author of a new translation of the NT, which was made on the basis of the Philoxenian, which is now lost. At the same time in Alexandria, Paul of Tella completed the Syro-Hexplar version of the OT, which was based on Origen's Hexapla.

C. 7th–10th c. With the Muslim invasion (the fall of the Persian Empire in 636; the occupation of Syria in 638), the Syriac-speaking churches benefited from a certain tolerance. They recovered their role as a cultural bridge between their own Aramaic and Greek heritage (esp. philosophical and medical) and the new culture. As Chabot says (p. 80), "The lively theological controversies of the preceding schools . . . were about to finish. Exegesis no longer had as its chief objective that of atomizing the text for finding dogmatic arguments; it became a literal and philological exegesis. The long treatises of moral teaching gave way to hagiographic accounts, and history assumed an important role in literature. . . . Arabic progressed to the detriment of Syriac, and the official language early on became the popular tongue." This period can therefore be called that of the advance of translations (and thereafter that of the retranslations of Syriac into *Arabic), reflection on the past, commentary and compilation. We note some of the most important writers from this era: church historian *Theodore Bar Koni, *Isaac of Nineveh (d. around 680), *Martyrius (Sahdona), *Timothy I (d. 823); and in the *Jacobite church: *Jacob of Edessa (d. 708), who in particular undertook the translation of the writings of *Severus of Antioch, which had been done by *Paul of Callinicum while the patriarch of Antioch was still alive, Bishop *George of the Arabs (d. 724), and Moses Bar Kepha (d. 903).

D. 10th–16th c. This historical era witnessed the decline of Syriac literature, despite a renaissance during the 12th and 13th c. One should mention several important authors for patristic studies: Dionysius Bar Salibi (d. 1171), Michael the Syrian (d. 1199), Bar Hebraeus (d. 1282) and Abdišo Berika (Ebedjesu) (1318). These last two authors wrote both in Syriac and Arabic.

IV. Liturgy. We can observe in *liturgy the same general movement already outlined for literature. The Persian and Edessene was a primitive period, characterized on the one hand by its relationships with Judaism, which is perceived not only with the date of *Easter, 14 Nisan (= *Quartodeciman), but also in the form of *eucharistic blessings, baptismal rites and the architecture of the sanctuary (see the well-known bema) and in music; on the other hand, for its relationship with Mesopotamia, traces of which are found primarily in liturgical poetry: the hymns (of Edessene origin?), the dramatic poem (sōgitō). These elements are found often corrected in the second era, that of Hellenization (see, e.g., the prestige of the sacramental theology of *Theodore of Mopsuestia in the school of the Persians). By that point the liturgies were being formed in the various geographically delimited areas, without interrupting links or mutual influences. Thus the Chaldean rite is composed primarily of Edessene and Persian elements (see, e.g., the anaphora of *Addai and Mari); the Syriac rite unites Antiochene, *Jerusalem (see the *anaphora of St. James) and Edessene tradition; the *Maronite rite depends on *Edessa, even though it underwent many Syriac influences. Another important factor for this historical era, at most tied to the formation of the office, is the growing influence of the monasteries. The third period can be called that of the *commentaries, compilations, repetitions and prolixities (see, e.g., the proliferation of poetic excerpts, often attributed either to Ephrem or Jacob of Sarug, in the Syriac and Maronite rites).

V. Syriac studies. Although humanism witnessed the printing of the first grammar (1539) and the first printing of the NT (1555; see W. Strothmann, Die Anfänge der syrischen Studien in Europa, Göttingen 1971) and although Renaudot (1646–1720) had to undertake important work, only the transfer of Eastern MSS into Europe, esp. those from the monastery of the Syrians in the *desert of Nitria, favored Syriac studies. Since the beginning of the 18th c., at *Rome, the work of the learned Maronite Assemani family revealed the wealth contained in Syriac literature (see the well-known constant Bibliotheca Orientalis by J.S. Assemani). A little more than a century later the formation, at London, of the most famous religious collection of MSS gave rise to countless studies and editions. The catalog of MSS of the British Museum (today the British Library) by W. Wright (1870–1872) continues to inspire new studies. At the beginning of the 20th c. the large collections of Syriac texts were born: the CSCO of Louvain and the PO of Paris.

A. General: (1) Introductions: J. Assfalg - A. Krüger, Kleines Wörterbuch des christlichen Orients, Wiesbaden 1975; M. Albert, Langue et littérature syriaques, in M. Albert et al., Christianismes Orientaux - lntroduction à l'étude des langues et des littératures, Paris 1993, 299-379; S.P. Brock, A Brief Outline of Syriac Literature, Kottayam 1997; P. Bettiolo, Lineamenti di patrologia siriaca, in A. Quacquarelli, Complementi interdisciplinari di Patrologia, Rome 1989, 503-603; Patrologia V, 415-493. (2) Histories of the literature: alongside the classical works written by Wright, Duval and Chabot, one should note esp. A. Baumstark and I. Ortiz de Urbina. (3) Bibliographies: C. Moss, Catalogue of Syriac Printed Books and Related Literature in the British Museum, London 1962; S.P. Brock, Syriac Studies: A Classified Bibliography (1960–1990), Kaslik 1996.

B. Language: (1) R. Köbert: EC 9, 734-740; (2) Grammars: alongside the classical works written by Duval, Nöldeke and Brockelmann, one could consult the following: L. Palacios, Grammatica Syriaca, Rome 1954; L. Costaz, Grammaire syriaque, Beirut 1955; H. Healey, First Studies in Syriac, Rome 1981; (3) Dictionaries: the most accessible are: C. Brockelmann, Lexicon syriacum, Berlin 1895 (repr. 1966); J. Payne Smith, Compendious Syriac Dictionary, Oxford 1903 (repr. numerous times); W. Jenning, A Lexicon to the Syriac NT, Oxford 1926 (repr.); L. Costaz, Dictionnaire syriaque-français (anglais-arabe), Beirut 1963; the chief reference work remains the Thesaurus Syriacus by R. Payne-Smith, Oxford 1889-1901.

C. Auxiliary bibliography: (1) Epigraphy: see Ortiz de Urbina 23; and the bibl. in Patrologia V, 420; (2) Manuscripts: (a) Catalogs: see Ortiz de Urbina 3; S.P. Brock, above A(3) and A. Desreumaux, Répertoire des bibliothèques et des catalogues de manuscrits syriaques, Paris 1991; (b) Paleography: W.H.P. Hatch, An Album of Dated Syriac Manuscripts, Boston 1946; (c) Codicology: see above A(3), and esp. the writings of J.-M. Sauget and by the same author, Un cas très curieux de restauration de manuscrit: le Borgia syriaque 39, ST 292, Vatican City 1981; (d) Iconography: J. Leroy, Les manuscrits syriaques à peintures, Paris 1964.

D. Collections: (1) Patrologia Syriaca, PO (Paris), CSCO (Louvain), OCA, Göttinger Orient Forschung; see esp. the Symposia syriaca in OCA and the miscellanea dedicated to Vööbus, Graffin and Strothmann. (2) Journals: (see the list of abbreviations provided in the first volume) AB, Le Muséon, OC, OCP, "Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica," OrSyr, PdO, "Revue de l'Orient chrétien," "Journal of the Syriac Academy" (Baghdad, in Arabic), ARAM, "Rivista di studi orientali."

E. (1) History: see above A(3) and the biblio. by J.-M. Fiey, Jalons pour une histoire de l'Église en Iraq, CSCO 310, subs. 36, 1970; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972; general framework: A.S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity, London 1968; (2) Bible: I. Ortiz de Urbina, Vetus Evangelium Syrorum: Diatessaron Tatiani, Madrid 1967; the publications issued by the Peshitta Institute Cessation of the Law (2:18-19): Old vs. New Interpretation at Leiden (ed. P.A.H. Boer); B.M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the NT, Oxford 1977; S.P. Brock, The Peshitta Old Testament—Between Judaism and Christianity: Cristianesimo nella storia 19 (1998) 483-502; B. Aland, Bibelübersetzungen - 4: Die Übersetzungen ins Syrische 2. Neues Testament: TRE 6 (1980) 189-196; (3) Theology: see above A(2) and A(3), and R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom, Cambridge 1975 (with an intro. on the origins of Syriac Christianity and biblio.); (4) Liturgy: see above A(2) and A(3) and J.M. Sauget, Bibliographie des liturgies orientales, 1900-1960, Rome 1962; S. Janeras, Bibliografia sulle Liturgie Orientali, Rome 1969 (p.m.); P. Youssif, A Classified Bibliography on the East Syriac Liturgy, Rome 1990; (5) Hagiographies: P. Peeters, Orient et Byzance: le tréfonds oriental de l'Hagiographie byzantine, Brussels 1950; (6) Spirituality: A. Guillaumont - I. Dalmais, Spiritualité syriaque: Dsp 14 (1990) 1429-1450; R. Beulay, La lumière sans forme. Introduction à l'étude de la mystique chrétienne syro-orientale, Chevetogne 1987; (7) Cultural Exchanges: var. aus., Syncretismus im syrisch-persischen Kulturgebiet, in Ab.d. Ak.d. Wiss. in Göttingen, Phil.-hist. Kb., III F. 96, Göttingen 1975; J.-M. Sauget, L'apport des traductions syriaques pour la patristique grecque: RThPh 110 (1978) 139-148 and Patrologia V, 420-421.

F. Rilliet

SYRIAC, PALESTINIAN CHRISTIAN. This language could also be called "Palestinian Christian Aramaic"; it is an Aramaic dialect used as a written language in certain areas of *Palestine and the Transjordan from the 5th to the 14th c. It is known through a small number of inscriptions and MSS, the most ancient of which (between the 5th and 8th c.) are all in fragments; in many cases the texts of Palestinian Christian Aramaic have been preserved in the underwriting of *palimpsests. Complete MSS date to the 11th c. or even later. With the exception of a letter in papyrus and a document on *magic, all the texts that have been preserved are translations from the Greek. With respect to what has been preserved, the corpus embraces three chief areas: biblical, patristic and *liturgical. The majority of biblical texts come from lectionaries; the most ancient fragments at times contain rubrics acc. to the ancient rite of *Jerusalem, better known by *Armenian and *Georgian sources. The most ancient of the three complete gospel lectionaries (Vat. Syr. 19) is dated to the year 1030 (the other two are dated to 1104 and 1118).

Patristic texts are only found among the most ancient fragments (ca. 5th/8th c.): the best preserved are passages from *Cyril of Jerusalem's Catecheses and two *hagiographic texts, the forty martyrs of Sinai and the story of Eulogius the rock cutter (from the cycle of texts associated with *Daniel of Scete). The other fragments include texts of (or are attributed to) *John Chrysostom (on the prodigal son), the Greek text of *Ephrem, the Life of Anthony by *Athanasius of *Alexandria, certain apocryphal texts of the NT (e.g., the Acts of Andrew and Matthias, the Acts of *Pilate, the Koimesis of *Mary in the account of the finding of Stephen's bones), several apophthegmata, different hagiographic pieces, including Alessius "the man of God," Abraham of Qidun and Philemon and Hadrian. Various other fragments must still be identified.

Almost all MSS after the 8th c. are liturgical; although the majority are in fragments, there are almost complete copies of an Eucologion and a Horologion, in addition to the three aforementioned gospel lectionaries. The liturgical texts clearly indicate that they were produced by an orthodox Chalcedonian Melkite community. This explains why many of the preserved MSS of the Palestinian Christian Aramaic belong, or rather at one time belonged, to the monastery of St. Catherine of Sinai.

The first editors of these texts were E. Miniscalchi (editor of the Vat. Syr. 19, 1861-64), J.P.N. Land (in Anecdota Syriaca IV,1875), G. Margoliouth, the twins Agnes Lewis and Margaret Dunlop (and various issues of the journals Studia Sinaitica and Horae Semiticae), P. Kokowzoff, F. Schulthess, H. Duensing and N. Pigoulewsky. The most ancient texts of Palestinian Christian Aramaic are now underway in preparation for their publication in considerably improved editions. Certainly the technical advances in the reading of palimpsests will lead to greater progress.

In general: D.G.K. Taylor, in S. Brock (ed.), The Hidden Pearl: The Syrian Orthodox Church and Its Ancient Aramaic Heritage, II, Rome 2001, 95-98.

Editions: A.S. Lewis - M.D. Gibson, The Palestinian Syriac Literature of the Gospels, London 1899; M. Back, Rituale Melchitarum: A Christian Palestinian Euchologium, Stuttgart 1938; Id., A Christian Palestinian Syriac Horologion, Cambridge 1954; C. Müller-Kessler - M. Sokoloff, A Corpus of Christian Palestinian Aramaic, I (OT and Apocryphal texts), IIAB (NT), III (XL Martyrs of Sinai, Eulogius, Anastasias), IV (near publication), V (Cyril Jer., Catecheses), Groningen 199ff. For a complete bibl., see C. Müller-Kessler, Grammatik des Christlich-Palästinisch-Aramäischen, I, Hildesheim 1991, XXV-XXXIV, with supplements in Syriac Studies: A Classified Bibliography: Parole de l'Orient 23 (1998) and 29 (2004).

S.P. Brock

SYRO-ROMAN LAWBOOK. This expression was used to refer to an anonymous private compilation which was translated several times into *Syriac, originally drafted in Greek—the early texts were in Latin—in the 5th c.; it contains a synthesis of leges ("laws") and iura ("rights") of Roman law—without reference to local Eastern Greek law (Selb) starting from the emperor *Constantine until the emperor Leo I (457–473). The author (or the compiler) does not mention the names of the emperors or the dates of the issuing of the laws. The compilation enjoyed large diffusion among Christians in the Middle East, esp. under Arab domination; perhaps it must have been a small booklet for use in schools, but in reality it would then serve bishops in the audientia episcopalis, because it primarily treats problems of succession, testaments, donations, the emancipation and the manumission of slaves, property relationships between spouses, and criminal and penal subject matter, etc. The compilation was also translated into *Armenian and *Arabic (11th c.).

Editions: K.G. Bruns, Syrisch-römisches Rechtsbuch aus dem fünften Jahrhundert, Leipzig (repr. 1961); FIRA 2, 751 (Latin text); DDC 3, 336-340; A. Vööbus, The Syro-Roman Lawbook, Stockholm 1982 (with Eng. tr.); W. Selb - H. Kaufhold, Das Syrisch-römische Rechtsbuch, 3 vols., Vienna 2002.

Studies: G. Nallino, Sul libro siro-romano e sul presunto diritto siriaco, in Studi in onore di P. Bonfante, Milan 1930, I, 203-261; E. Volterra, Il Libro siro-romano nelle recenti ricerche, in Problemi attuali di scienza e di cultura, Rome 1964, 298-328; W. Selb, Zur Bedeutung des syrisch-römischen Rechtsbuches, Munich 1964; A. Vööbus, An Important Milestone in the History of Research on the Syro Roman Lawbook, in Sodalitas. Scripta A Guarino, V, Naples 1984, 2105-2108; Id., A New Source for the Syro-Roman Lawbook: Labeo 21 (1975) 7-9; W. Selb, Die Geschichte des Kirchenrechts der Nestorianer (von den Anfängen bis zur Mongolenzeit), Vienna 1981; G.L. Falchi, Sull'origine delle due classi di manoscritti del Libro Siro-Romano di diritto: SDHI 58 (1992) 143-167; Id., Il diritto romano canonico nell'esperienza giuridica delle comunità cristiane dell'Oriente mediterraneo, in Il diritto romano-canonico quale diritto proprio delle comunità cristiane dell'Oriente mediterraneo, IX Colloquio int. romanistico-canonistico, Vatican City 1994, 1-72; W.

Selb, Diritto romano nella tradizione delle comunità cristiane dell'Oriente mediterraneo?, ibid., 538 (provides a brief one-page synthesis); J.-M. Carrié, Dioclétien et la fiscalité: Antiquité Tardive 2 (1994) 33-64; G. Falchi, Matrimonio cum scriptis et sine scriptis nel libro Siro-romano: SDHI 61 (1995) 875-887; G.R.M. Frakes, The Syro-Roman Lawbook and the Defensor Civitatis: Byzantion 68 (1998) 347-355.

A. Di Berardino

T

TABARKA. Thabraca, modern-day Tabarka (Tunisia), was a municipium at the beginning of the empire, a colony under *Antoninus Pius, but it did not truly develop until the 4th c. It was part of Proconsular Africa. The presence of Christianity is attested to in the city in the 3rd c. with Bishop Victoricus, who signed the synodal letters from the spring of 253, from 254/255, and the acts of the Council of Carthage from 1 September 256 (Cyprian, Epp. 57; 67; Sent. epp. 25). After him were Bishop Clarentius, who was present at the Conference of Carthage (411), and his *Donatist rival Rusticianus. *Victor of Vita mentions a *monastery at Tabarka (Hist. pers. Afr. prov. 1,10).

From the early Christian and Byzantine era two basilicas have been preserved: the urban basilica with an almost square central nave and the baptistery attached to the northern perimeter wall; a funerary basilica, without a doubt a memoria of a martyr unknown to us, which was noteworthy for its *sarcophagi with mosaic decoration: the deceased person is in the act of prayer between two lit candles; a chalice from which peacocks and doves quench their thirst; different animals, birds, lambs, fish in the middle of flowers, at times together with the deceased person, who is in the posture of prayer (DACL 1, 716-719; figs. 152-155). Another mosaic is famous because of its representation of an African-type church, a symbol of Ecclesia Mater (DACL 4, 2231-2234, with a color plate).

PWK 9, 1178-1179; LTK 10, 6; DACL 15, 2146-2169; M. Langerstay, Nouvelles fouilles à Tabarka (antique Thabraca): Africa 10 (1988) 220-253.

V. Saxer

TABITHA (iconography). A symbol, like other scenes of the early Christian figurative repertoire, of faith in the *resurrection (Acts 9:36-46), Tabitha appears for the first time in *sarcophagus of the Fermo Cathedral (Ws 116,3) from the end of the 4th c. The miracle performed by *Peter is presented in two scenes: Peter's arrival to the house of Tabitha and the resurrection of Tabitha, who is not on her bed but is standing, holding *Peter's hand. Other examples are found on two sarcophagi from *Gaul. One is a fragment from the Museum of Arles (Ws 145,6 = Benoit, Sarc. VII, 4), from the end of the 4th c., in which the event is portrayed in two moments: the arrival of Peter to Tabitha's home (damaged in part) and the resurrection (with two women standing and two under Tabitha's bed): Peter takes the little girl's wrist, who is lying on the floor, and lifts her up. A similar formulation appears on the lower side of a sarcophagus from the crypt of St. Maximin (Ws 145,5), from the same era. Stylistically it has a more lively and swift rhythm with respect to the one from Arles. There is just one example in the sumptuary arts on an ivory panel from the British Museum from the 1st decade of the 5th c.

DACL 15/2, 1947-48; EC 11, 1684; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952, pl. 38,117; M. Sotomayor, S. Pedro en la iconografía paleocristiana, Granada 1962, 156-160; TIP 284-285.

A.M. Di Nino

TABULA PASCHALIS PETROCORICENSIS. The Easter table of Périgueux, which is inscribed in uncial characters on a marble slab, was found at one time on the right side of the altar of the choir in the Church of St. Stephen, once the Cathedral of Périgueux (Dordogna), although it is now inserted on the E side of the S wall in the same church. It begins with the words: "Hoc est Pascha sine termino et numero: cum finierit a capite reincipe," followed by 91 dates for *Easter, with only the indication of the days and the months but without reference to any years, from which one concludes that the author proposed a perpetual Easter table. From the comparison with the Easter tables inspired by the 19-year Alexandrian cycle, popularized in the West through the work of *Dionysius Exiguus, one gathers that the table from Périgueux indicates the dates for Easter from 631 to 721.

A. Cordoliani, La table pascale de Périgueux: CCM 4 (1961) 57-60; CPL, Addenda 2297 b, Kl. Fitschen: LACL (1998) 581.

V. Loi - B. Amata

TABULAE ALBERTINI. These are inscriptions of 45 legal acts on small tables of cedar from the *Vandal age, Christian in origin, that were discovered in Algeria, ca. 90 km (55.9 mi) from *Tebessa at the border with Tunisia (Djebel Mrata) in 1928 and were studied for the first time by E. Albertini. These were written in cursive Latin between 17 September 493 and 21 April 496, at the time of King Gunthamund. They pertain to various topics, among which are the selling of lands, olive trees, a slave, a woman's dowry etc. The majority of the texts were edited by the magistri of the village or a priest. This documentation is a sign of the cultural and administrative continuity under the Vandal reign.

CPL 1837a; Ch. Courtois - L. Leschi - Ch. Perrat - Ch. Saumagne (eds.), Tablettes Albertini, actes privés de l'époque vandale (fin du Vᵉ siècle), Paris 1952; V. Väänänen, Étude sur le texte et la langue des tablettes Albertini, Helsinki 1965; H. Wessel, Das Recht der Tablettes Albertini, Berlin 2003.

A. Di Berardino

TACITUS on CHRISTIANS. Tacitus was a well-known Roman historian who lived between AD 55 and 120. His cursus honorum was aided by his marriage to the daughter of Julius Agricola. He kept to himself during the reign of *Domitian; in the year 97, under Nerva, he was made consul. He wrote his historical works during the 20-year period which goes from Nerva to the beginning of the reign of *Hadrian. Recalling the fire of *Rome of 19 July AD 64, he writes that *Nero blamed the Christians in order to ward away suspicions that had mounted against him. His judgment on them, which is different from the rather benevolent judgment given by *Pliny the Younger, is bitter, unjustified, and was owed to an indirect and distorted understanding of Christians and Christianity. He reports that the emperor "presented as guilty and subjected to the most exquisite tortures those people whom the masses, loathing them for their crimes, called 'Chrestians.' The author of this sect, 'Chrestus,' under the reign of *Tiberius was sentenced to death by the procurator Pontius *Pilate; although repressed for a while, the lethal superstition burst forth again, not only in Judea, the place of the evil's origin, but also the city of Rome, where they converge from every area and all the atrocious and shameful things have been exalted. First of all, those people were arrested who confessed their faith, then, at their accusation, a multitude of others, accusing them not so much of having set fire to the city, but more so for hatred of mankind" (Annals XV,44). Tacitus continues by describing the punishments to which the Christians have been condemned. Starting from the swift judgment expressed by the historian, the testimony confirms some foundational pieces of information about the life of *Jesus transmitted by the gospels and about the spread of Christianity to Rome. Although regarding the Christians as guilty of other crimes, which he carefully avoids listing probably because he did not have any proof—and the hostility of the people could not be considered a proof—he acknowledged that they were sacrificed not for the general interest of the people but because of Nero's cruelty, the person who was truly responsible for the disaster.

Tacitus's description, which is limited to the essential points, attests that during the 70s of the 1st c., the Christian community of Rome had a considerable number of members (ingens multitudo) and that the reason for the *persecution was not that authorities had discovered in Christianity a threat to the state but that Nero had used the *pagan population's hostility to vindicate himself from the serious charge of arson. The Christian religion was therefore not punished per se. The accusation of odium humani generis hinges essentially on the fact that the Roman Christians, living according to their customs, appeared to be suspect. A norm of behavior in Greco-Roman society was humanistic philanthropy, which was opposed to misanthropy (odium generis humani), which during the 2nd c. allowed the authorities to charge the Christians with the worship of the donkey, ritual crimes and incest. It was the first small step of the pagans' judgment on the Christians that Tacitus noted and reported. *Suetonius (Vita Caesarum: Claudius XXIX,1; Nero XVI,3) upheld the accusation of seditious activity linked to messianism.

H. Fuchs, Tacitus über die Christen: VChr 4 (1950) 69-74; J.B. Bauer, Tacitus und die Christen: Gymnasium 69 (1957) 495-503; J. Beaujeu, L'incendie de Rome en 64 et les Chrétiens, Brussels 1960; J. Daniélou - H. Marrou, Nuova Storia della chiesa. I. Dalle origini a S. Gregorio Magno, Turin 1970, 123-124; K. Baus, Storia della chiesa. I. Le origini, Milan 1976, 168-169; I pagani di fronte al cristianesimo, ed. P. Carrara, Florence 1984, 31-37; A. Giovannini, Tacite, l'incendium Neronis et les chrétiens: REAug

30 (1984) 3-23; M.J.G. Gary-Fow, Why the Christians? Nero and the Great Fire: Latomus 57 (1998) 595-616; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan ²2004, 49-74.

E. Peretto

TAIO of Saragossa (7th c.). Bishop of *Saragossa after *Braulio (651–683), he wrote a work titled the Sententiae, in five books: the first two are theological and exegetical (the first is on God and the OT, the second is on Christ and the church); the other three primarily pertain to moral questions: virtues, sins and the day of judgment. According to the custom of that time, the work was a collage of passages from other authors: alongside *Augustine's works, the writings of *Gregory the Great were primarily used, concerning whom Taio wrote a lofty elegy in one of his surviving letters to *Eugenius of Toledo. During a trip to *Rome, he transcribed by his own hand various works from Gregory's writings that he did not already possess.

CPL 1267-1270; Díaz 205-210; PL 80, 727-990; DHEE 4, 2516-2517; A.C. Vega, Tajón de Zaragoza. Una obra inédita: Ciudad de Dios 156 (1943) 145-177; P. Martínez, El pensamiento penitencial de Tajón: RET 6 (1946) 185-222; A. Palacios Martín, Tajón de Zaragoza y la "Explicatio in Cantica canticorum": Anuario de Estudios Filológicos 3 (1980) 115-127; Patrologia IV, 107-109.

M. Simonetti

TALMUD and MISHNAH. Mishnah, a term deriving from the Hebrew shānāh, which means "to repeat" (from which derived the verbs "to study," "to teach"), suggests what is imparted by memory through repetition and refers to the entirety of the oral law and its study—in contradistinction to Miqra,' which refers to the Scriptures and its study; and during a later period, the term Tanakh (TaNaKh) was also used, which is an acronym based on the initial Hebrew letters of the terms indicating each of the three parts in which Scripture was subdivided: Torah (instruction; these are "the five books of *Moses" [the Pentateuch]), Nevi'im (the Prophets) and Ketuvim (the Writings); *Eusebius of Caesarea spoke of the δευτέρωσις (Praep. Ev. 12,4). Mishnah could also refer to the totality of the halakhah (legislative part) or a form of a teaching that no longer takes its point of departure from the biblical text but begins instead from the judgments of the teachers of the tradition with respect to concrete problems. Mishnah is primarily the name given to the compilation of decisions of the Tannaim (doctors before the 3rd c.), arranged and reassessed, around the year AD 200, by Judah the prince in Galilee. The tradition mentions some of the preceding collections such as the one made by Rabbi Aqiba (d. 135) or the collection made by his student Rabbi Meir. Rabbi Judah's decision with respect to the opinions to be adopted thus established the halakhah (a practical decision concerning legal, ritual or religious questions), so much so that the work is not only a collection of oral law but also was immediately considered the official and canonical code of Jewish life. Written in late Hebrew, it was arranged, according to topics, 6 orders (sedarim) and 63 treatises. The tannaitic traditions that were not incorporated into the Mishnah were called baraitoth ("exterior"); a part of this was collected around 250, in the collection called Tosefta ("supplement, addition") and in the Talmud, which follow the same order of the Mishnah.

The oral tradition, once committed to writing, continued to be a matter of discussion and further reflection in the academies of Palestine and Babylonia: the Gemara ("supplement") is the commentary produced by the Amoraim (teachers from the 3rd to the 5th c.). Mishnah + Gemara = Talmud (lit.: "teaching"; abbreviation of the Talmud Torah). Two redactions exist, which are very different with respect to their content, method and language: the Palestinian Talmud (or "of Jerusalem"; Talmud Yerushalmi), finished around the end of the 4th c., and the Babylonian Talmud (Talmud Bavli; TB), finished a century later. Although both works only provide commentary for half the treatises of the Mishnah, the Babylonian Talmud does so much more extensively. The historical circumstances explain how the Babylonian Talmud soon eclipsed its Palestinian counterpart and was regarded as the sole canonical and normative Talmud. The text of the Mishnah implies numerous variants in the two versions of the Talmud to the point that it was even thought that there were two recensions. The Babylonian Talmud contains twice as many haggadah (the totality of the nonjuridical traditions) with respect to the Talmud edited in Palestine, where it had found a place in the midrashim. The Talmud is presented as the verbally concise and barely retouched Talmud of the academic disputes (with the names of the protagonists): and this explains the exuberant richness of its content, as well as the difficulty of its interpretation. The work of righteous men consumed in exegesis and law, who draw on the resources of dialectic in order to obtain all the possible meanings from the text and to justify their own point of view, the Gemara addressed, often without order and continuation, every type of topic (casuistry, philosophy, morality, geography, zoology, botany, superstitions and popular beliefs, etc.). There one finds all the opinions expressed, even the most diverse and contradictory, without seeking to impose them on others; J. Neusner has for this reason rightly emphasized this "nondogmatic quality of Talmudic discourse" (Invitation to the Talmud, 241). During the 8th c. the Karaite movement rejected the authority of the Talmud and accepted the Scriptures (Miqra') as the sole religious authority.

All the additions of the Babylonian Talmud reproduce the pagination structure (folio a-b) of the Venetian editio princeps (1520–1524). Many editions also contain twelve treatises (the "small treatises"), regarded as noncanonical.

Mishnah: EJ 12, 93-109; M. Mielziner, Introduction to the Talmud, Cincinnati 1894 (repr. New York 1968, 1977); M. Jastrow, Dictionary of the Targumim, Talmud Bavli, Talmud Yerushalmi and Midrashic Literature, London 1903 (Peabody, MA [4]2005); H.L. Strack, Einleitung in Talmud und Midrasch, Munich 1930 (Eng. trans. Philadelphia 1931); S. Lieberman, Hellenism in Jewish Palestine, New York 1962, 83-99; J. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature, Cambridge 1969, 53-61; C. Albeck, Einführung in die Mischnah, Berlin-New York 1971; R. Travers Hertford, Christianity in Talmud and Midrash, Farnebourgh [3]1973; J. Neusner, Classical Judaism: Torah, Learning, Virtue: An Anthology of the Mishnah, Talmud and Midrash, 3 vols., Frankfurt 1993; F. Manns, Leggere la Mishnah, Brescia 1987; F. Alvarez-Pereyre, La Transmission orale de la Misnah: Une méthode d'analyse appliquée à la tradition d'Alep, Paris 1990; H. Strack - G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash, Atlanta 1992; G. Stemberger, Introduzione al Talmud e al Midrash, Rome 1995; J. Neusner, The Mishnah: An Introduction, Lanham, MD 2004; G. Stemberger, Il Midrash. Uso rabbinico della Bibbia. Introduzione, testi, commenti, Bologna 2006.

Translations: H. Danby, The Mishnah, Oxford 1933; P. Blackman, Mishnayoth (Hebrew text and Eng. trans.), 7 vols., London 1951-56; New York [2]1964; V. Castiglioni, Mishnaiot, 3 vols., Rome [3]1962-65; J. Neusner, The Mishnah: A New Translation, Yale 1988; Id., Il Giudaismo nella testimonianza della Mishnah, It. trans., Bologna 1996; E. Schürer - G. Vermes - F. Millar, The History of the Jewish People, I, Edinburgh 1973, 80-84.

Talmud: EJ 15, 750-768, 772-779; Interpr. Dict. Bible, Suppl., 511-515 (I. Epstein). Cf. Mielziner, Strack, Bowker beforementioned Talmud di Gerusalemme: ed. printed at Krotoschin, 1866; Fr. trans. M. Schwab, Paris 1878-89, repr. 1960. Babylonian Talmud: text and Ger. trans. L. Goldschmidt, 12 vols., Berlin 1929-36, repr. 1965; Eng. trans. I. Epstein, London 1935-52 (in 35 vols.), 1961 (in 18 vols.), 1962 (ed. with the text also included); J. Neusner, The Babylonian Talmud: A Translation and Commentary, 22 vols., Peabody, MA 2005; E. Schürer - G. Vermes - F. Millar, op. cit., 89-90; E. Zolli - S. Cavalletti, Il trattato delle benedizioni del Talmud babilonese, Turin 1968; J. Neusner, Invitation to the Talmud, New York 1976; G. Stemberger, Der Talmud. Einführung-Texte-Erläuterungen, 1982; It. trans. Il Talmud. Introduzione, testi, commenti, Bologna [4]1999; S. Rosso - N. Deteschi - E. Turco, Quattro "porte" per conoscere l'ebraismo. Midrash, Mishnah, Talmud, Targum, Turin 1998; J. Neusner, Sources and Traditions: Types of Compositions in the Talmud of Babylonia, Atlanta 1992; Il Talmud, ed. E. Rostagno, 2 vols., Milan 2002; A. Cohen, Everyman's Talmud: The Major Teachings of the Rabbinic Sages, New York 1995; A. Cohen, Il Talmud, trans. A. Toaff, Rome-Bari [4]2003; A. Steinsaltz, Cos'è il Talmud, Florence 2004; Zadoq ben Ahron, Talmud Lexikon, Neu Isenburg 2006; E. Friedheim, Rabbinisme et paganisme en Palestine romaine: étude historique des Realia talmudiques (I[er]-IV[e] siècles), Leiden-Boston 2006; J. Neusner, The Talmud: What It Is and What It Says, Lanham, MD 2006.

R. Le Déaut

TANAKH. The term is an acronym to refer to the Hebrew Bible (the Christian OT), resulting from the three initial Hebrew letters of the name that indicates the three parts in which it was subdivided (TaNaKh): (1) Torah (instruction, also called Shumash, "the five," that is, the five books of *Moses; it corresponds to the Pentateuch); (2) Nevi'im (the *Prophets); (3) Ketuvim (the Writings; the Hagiographers). The term used during the Second Temple and during the rabbinic period was Miqra' ("what is read"), when this division was already in use, and is still in use along with the acronym. The Tanakh includes, according to the Jewish tradition, 24 books, that is, the five books of the Torah, the eight books of the Nevi'im (among the Prophets are included Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel; Joshua, Judges, Samuel; the book of Kings; the 12 Minor Prophets are regarded as one book), and the 11 Ketuvim (*Psalms, Proverbs, Job, *Song of Songs [Canticle of Canticles], Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes [Qohelet], Esther, Daniel, Ezra [and Nehemiah] and Chronicles). This canon corresponds to the one used by Protestants, but with a different order and a different number, because some books have acquired the subdivision totaling 39 separate books (for example, Samuel in two books; the book of Kings in two books; Chronicles in two books; Ezra in Ezra and Nehemiah). Orthodox and Roman Catholics, moreover, include another seven books in the biblical canon of the OT (Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Sirach and Baruch), which Protestants call the "Apocrypha" and Roman Catholics "Deuterocanonical." The book of *Daniel, moreover, and the book of Esther include additional material regarded as deuterocanonical in the Jewish Bible and among many Protestant groups. In ancient times, the Hebrew Bible was only written with consonants; in the Middle Ages, however, vowel pointing was introduced by the Masoretes. The subdivision into chapters and verses, however, was adopted from the one in use among Christians and introduced into *Spain for ease of use in debates with them; it is still preserved for facility of citation and is often only indicated at the margin of the page in order to not interrupt the continuity of the text.

RAC 14, 184-223; R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church and Its Background in Early Judaism, London 1985; J. Terbolle Barbera, La Biblia Judía y la Biblia cristiana, Introducción a la historia de la Biblia, Madrid 1993; Tanach: The Stone Edition, Hebrew with Eng. trans., Brooklyn 1996; A. Berlin, The Jewish Study Bible: Jewish Publication Society Tanakh Translation, New York 2004.

R. Le Déaut

TANNAIM (literally "teachers"). The plural form of the term tannā from a root that, in Aramaic, means "to repeat, transmit orally," and hence "to teach." The name given to the succession of Jewish teachers from the 1st and 2nd c. starting from Hillel and Shammai. The collection of their opinions constitutes the Mishnah (see *Talmud and Mishnah); those that were not included, the baraitoth, found a place in the Tosefta and the Talmud. They were also the creators of the ancient midrashim (called tannaitic) that were published by their successors the Amoraim.

Jewish Encyclopedia 12, 49; EJ 15, 798-803.

R. Le Déaut

TARGUM. Aramaic for "translation" or "interpretation." Targums were Aramaic versions of the OT biblical books written as soon as Aramaic supplanted Hebrew as the vernacular. The biblical texts (that is, of the Torah and the Prophets) were at that time translated by memory in the synagogue, after the text was read in Hebrew. Aiming to render the text immediately understandable and suited to their audience, the translator did not hesitate to conclude, gloss, clarify and even paraphrase, often taking as a model of inspiration all the sources of the midrash. Therefore, a targum is not a translation in the modern sense, but a transposition that reflects the religious conceptions of a certain era and esp. demonstrates how the Bible was understood in ancient times; hence its interest for the study of the NT and ancient Judaism. Moreover, targumic traditions have often been attested to in the writings of the Fathers (*Origen, *Jerome and *Ephrem).

Targums exist for the whole Bible (with the exception of Ezra-Nehemiah and *Daniel), but the composition of these texts spans some ten centuries. The discovery of fragments of Lev 16 and Job 17–42 at *Qumran proves the existence of texts written in the 1st c. BC.

The official targums of the Pentateuch (Onkelos) and that of the Prophets (Jonathan ben Uziel), in literary Aramaic, date back to a foundational text compiled in *Palestine at the beginning of the 2nd c., later published in the Babylonian academies (4th–5th c.). These two versions follow the Hebrew very closely, but they also contain numerous original interpretations. Also from Palestine come two complete recensions of the targums of the Pentateuch: (1) the Vatican codex Neophyti I, in Palestinian Aramaic close to that of the Talmud, which could substantially date back to the 3rd c.; (2) the late compilation (7th c.?) said to be the work of (ps.-) Jonathan derived from original material coming from the Palestinian recension and elements taken from Onkelos and the midrashim. Other recensions of the Palestinian translations have survived in the so-called fragmentary targum (ca. 800 verses) and in the Cairo Genizah fragments (whose affinity with Neophyti is evident), published in 1930 by P. Kahle.

The Targum of the Hagiographa, Palestinian in origin, are of more recent dates (from the 4th to the 8th c.), and each one of these has its own special problems. Some, such as the one for the book of Esther and the Song of Songs, have been paraphrased so much that they could be considered midrashim. Last, we note that the Samaritan Pentateuch also had its targum, which could date back to the 3rd–4th c.

With respect to these texts, one should note that the exegetical traditions that they encompass could also be more ancient than the date at which they were committed to writing and the Aramaic dialects that have transmitted them.

Texts: B. Walton, Biblia Sacra Polyglotta, London 1653-57 (with Lat. trans.); J.W. Etheridge, The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel . . . , 2 vols., London 1862-65 (repr. New York 1968, only translation); P. de Lagarde, Prophetae Chaldaice, Leipzig 1872 (repr. Osnabrück 1967); Hagiographa Chaldaice, Leipzig 1873 (repr. Osnabrück 1967); A. Berliner, Targum Onkelos, Berlin 1884; P. Kahle, Masoreten des Westens, II, Stuttgart 1930; J.F. Stenning, The Targum of Isaiah, Oxford 1949 (text and trans.); A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic, 4 vols., Leiden 1959-73; A. Díez Macho, Ms. Neophyti 1, 6 vols., Madrid-Barcelona 1968-79 (with Sp., Fr. and Eng. trans.); R. Le Déaut - J. Robert, Targum des Chroniques, Rome 1971 (text and trans.); D. Rieder, Pseudo-Jonathan—Targum Jonathan ben Uziel on the Pentateuch, Jerusalem 1974; R. Le Déaut, Targum du Pentateuque (Neofiti et Ps. Jonathan), 4 vols. (SC 245, 256, 261, 271), Paris 1978-80 (only trans.); M.L. Klein, The Fragment-Targums of the Pentateuch, Rome 1980.

Studies: R. Le Déaut, Introduction à la littérature targumique, Rome 1966; J. Bowker, The Targums and Rabbinic Literature, Cambridge 1969; M. McNamara, Targum and Testament, Shannon 1972; Id., Targums, in Interp. Dict. Bible (Suppl.), 856-861; A. Díez Macho, El Targum, Barcelona 1972 (repr. 1979), B. Grossfeld, Bibliography of Targum Literature, 2 vols., Cincinnati 1972, 1977; J.T. Forestell, Targumic Traditions and the New Testament, Missoula 1981. Also see E. Schürer - G. Vermes - F. Millar, The History of the Jewish People, I, Edinburgh 1973, 99-114.

R. Le Déaut

TARRA. During the *Visigoth reign of *Recared I (586–601), Tarra, a monk from the prestigious monastery of Cauliana, in the vicinity of Mérida, was accused of adultery and banished from the monastery. Once the accusation had been called into question, the monk wrote a letter of appeal to King Recared in which he presented himself as persecuted by not well-specified detractors and innocent of the accusation of having sexual relations with a prostitute. He swore, finally, that he had never kissed or touched a woman since the death of his wife and his entrance into the monastery. Beyond the specific question of Tarra's innocence and guilt, the letter, which is his only surviving document, provides scholars with a better ability to understand the ecclesial and monastic life of the Iberian Peninsula at the time in which the Visigoths converted to Catholicism and Recared, the first Visigothic Catholic King, was recognized to hold an ecclesial authority equal to that enjoyed by the Christian emperor in the East. The king also had the prerogative of superior judgment in questions between bishops and the faithful, although in the monasteries the monks during the Visigothic era, thanks to the pactum stipulated with respective *abbots, enjoyed the ius appelationis. From its original meaning of "sacred commitment" to an absolutely chaste life (pactum virginitatis in Conc. Illiberitanum from ca. 300, can. 13: PL 84,303), the pactum, esp. thanks to *Isidore (560–636) and then *Fructuosus (d. 665), became a true legal document that governed the duties of each party, abbots and monks, and defended the latter from the possible abuses of the abbot's power, with the right to appeal to other abbots or an ecclesiastical or civil authority (A. Mundò). In the specific case of Tarra, the resolution of a specific case by recourse to the authority of the king, however, seems to have been anticipated and foreseen by a special law that would be sanctioned only in the 7th c. by King Chindasuinth (Lex visig. VI,1,6). According to this law, anyone who was a victim of false accusations could have recourse to the king either directly or through someone fidelis regis (I. Velázquez).

E. Dümler - W. Gundlach, MGH III, Ep. Merowingii et Karolini aevi I, 676-671 (= PLS 4, 1593-1595); J. Gil, Miscellanea Wisigothica, Sevilla 972, 28-29.

Studies: A. Mundò, Il monachesimo nella penisola iberica: Il Monachesimo nell'alto medioevo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale, in Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di studi sull'alto medioevo, Spoleto 1957, 73-108; I. Velázquez, El suggerrendum de Tarra a Recaredo: Antiquité Tardive 4 (1966) 291-298; Domínguez del Val 2, 359; S. Castellanos, The Significance of Social Unanimity in a Visigotic Hagiography: Key to an Ideological Screen: Journal of Early Christian Studies 11 (2003) 387-419.

V. Lombino

TARRACONENSIS
I. History - II. Christianization - III. Archaeology.

I. History. Hispano-Roman province whose capital was Tarraco (*Tarragona); it was created by Augustus in ca. 27 BC starting from Hispania Citerior, which included a large part of the E and N territories of the Iberian Peninsula. The emperor *Diocletian (ca. 297) reduced its dimensions, taking the Valley of the Ebro as a central axis of the territory of the new Tarragona, whose border to the N was with *Gaul (separated from it by the Pyrenees); to the S, with Carthaginensis; to the W, with *Gallaecia; and to the E, with the Mediterranean Sea. During the mid-3rd c., Tarragona underwent the first Germanic wave (256–262), coinciding with the *martyrdom of Bishop *Fructuosus at Tarragona (259). Subsequently, in 409, the Alans, Suevi and the *Vandals penetrated again through the Pyrenees, and Tarragona was forced to stop both the advance of these peoples as well as the citizen revolts of the Bagaudi. The *Visigoths changed Barcino (Barcelona), a small coastal city of Tarragona, into a powerful royal seat during the time of Ataulf and Galla Placidia (415) and an occasional refuge for the *Gothic court each time the Franks threatened Narbo (Narbona). In 475, Euric incorporated Tarragona within the area of Visigothic rule and began to take away a stable Gothic settlement, which was accentuated after the defeat of Vouillé (507) and the Frankish invasion of 541. The Hispano-Roman aristocracy was not easily subjected, as shown by the failed attempts of Peter's rebellion, who was the military leader of Dertosa (Tortosa; 506), and the duke Paul, who, being of *Byzantine origin, was proclaimed king over Narbonensis (672–673), with the support of numerous ecclesial and civil leaders of Tarragona. Starting from 712, the province fell almost completely into the hands of the Arabs, but the immediate repression by the Visigoths (who had been barricaded in the Pyrenees) and the Franks resulted in the N territories of ancient Tarragona becoming structured as embryos of the medieval kingdoms of Asturia, Navarre and Catalonia-Aragon.

II. Christianization. Although the tradition (Jerome, Ep. 65,12; 71,1; 120,9; Theodoret, Interpr. epist. II ad Tim. 4,17) assumed that the trip planned by *Paul to Hispania was completed (Rom 15:24; 15:28), the presence of Christianity is attested with certainty for the first time thanks to *Cyprian of Carthage's Letter 67 (mid-3rd c.), from which emerges the controversy of the libellatici, which had erupted during the *Valerian persecution and where the existence of a bishop named Felix at Caesaraugusta is mentioned. The metropolitan see, at Tarragona, is documented in 385 by the decretal of the Roman bishop *Siricius to the bishop *Himerius, where it is said that the metropolitan of Tarragona was by that point the papal primate of Hispania. Consentius's letters to *Augustine bring to light the presence of *Priscillianism in Tarragona around 419.

The episcopal sees of Tarragona were as follows: Ampuria (Castelló de Empúries; 516), Barcelona (342), Calagurris (Calahorra; ca. 300), Gerunda (Gerona; 400-405), Osca (Huesca; 419), Ilerda (Lleida; 419), Auca (Oca; 589), Pompaelo (Pamplona; 589), Turiasso (Tarazona; 449), Tarragona (259), Egara (*Terrassa; 450), Tortosa (516), Urgellum (Seo de Urgell; 527), Ausona (Vic; 516) and *Saragossa (254). There exist noteworthy differences between these cities in the way in which they faced the changes that occurred during Late Antiquity: while Tarragona, Barcelona and Saragossa enjoyed a certain prosperity, other cities such as Bilbilis (Calatayud), Calahorra or Lledia were much less known.

The councils that gathered at Tarragona were as follows: Saragossa I (378/380), Tarragona (419), Tarragona (516), Gerona (517), Barcelona I (ca. 540), Lleida (546), Saragossa II (592), *Huesca (598), Barcelona II (599), Terrassa (614) and Saragossa III (691), and also a council at the beginning of the 5th c., summoned by the Roman bishop *Innocent, whose location is not mentioned, and others at the mid-5th c., which are well known thanks to the correspondence of the bishops of Tarragona with Pope *Hilarius of *Rome.

III. Archaeology. In the cities of Tarragona, the archaeology presents a highly mutable panorama for the discoveries and the research completed in recent years. The majority of the nuclei of certain entities—and esp. the episcopal sees—present a profile type, with the cathedral and its dependencies within the walls replacing the preceding administrative centers and incorporating the necropolises around it. To this was added a series of churches inside and outside the strictly urban perimeter, often above ancient funerary *pagan estates or above structures of abandoned habitations. All this contributed to the structure of the later Early Medieval city. The archaeological discoveries of Valencia, Tarragona and Barcelona are conspicuous. At Valencia, archaeologists determined the location of an important part of an episcopal group (dated to the 5th–7th c.): the apse of the cathedral, a small appended funerary cross-shaped church, and then another church in the area of Almoina. At Tarragona, the remains of a new basilica at the Francoli River and the identification of fragments of churches within the urban enclosure help scholars outline better the aspect of the first Christian city. At Barcelona the possibility has been ruled out that the building (discovered in 1944) with three naves joined to the baptistery was the early Christian basilica—which must instead be found under the modern-day cathedral—and was instead an episcopal hall; conversely, some ten meters away, in the Plaza del Rey, a cross-shaped church has been identified from the end of the 6th c. together with a necropolis; all of this in connection with the monumentalization and broadening of the Barcelonan episcopal group. At Terrassa, the recent digs in the complex of Sant Pere date its construction starting from the end of the 4th c. and display a planned monumental trajectory of this complex. At Ampuria recent archaeological digs were pushed forward near the Churches of St. Margarina and St. Magdalena, which in the beginning was believed to be from the Early Middle Ages but which, given the chronology of the Late Antique foundation, must be put in relation to the episcopal city and with the already known churches of Neapolis and Sant Marti.

In the countryside, the ancient Roman villas were renewed and adorned, among other things thanks to the settling of the courtly officials within them—who did not accept the episcopate—to escape the excessive taxation that struck the cities. The large landholdings were localized esp. in the internal areas and that level ground of Tarragona, far from urban centers. In many cases, there exists documentation for wealth in relation to the appearance of Christian churches within these rural structures, which, in many cases, did not hesitate to change into parishes and, therefore, into fiscal centers. In addition to the already known churches of Villa Fortunatus (Huesca), Sant Cugat del Vallès and Santa Margarita de Martorell (Gavà) or Marialba (Léon), in recent years there has been added to the list a good number of churches and rugged monasteries from the area of ancient Pastiglia and other such buildings as the Church of Monto de Tiermes (Soria) or the Basilica de Gavà (Barcelona), with the horseshoe-shaped apse. Scholars have well underscored the proliferation of mosaic sepulchral stones: at Al faro (La Rioja), at Coscojuela de Fantova (Huesca) and in the early Christian necropolis of Tarragona.

J. Blanch, Arxiepiscopologi de la Santa Església Metropolitana i Primada de Tarragona, Tarragona 1951; A. Fàbrega, Pasionario Hispánico (siglos VII-XI), Madrid-Barcelona 1953-55; J. Vives, Concilios visigóticos e hispano romanos, Barcelona-Madrid 1963; P. de Palol, Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; F. Udina, La Tarraconense y la Narbonense en la época del III Concilio de Toledo: Concilio III de Toledo. XIV centenario 589-1989, Toledo 1991, 641-657; P. de Palol, Transformaciones urbanas en Hispania durante el Bajo Imperio: los ejemplos de Barcino, Tarraco y Clunia. Transcendencia del modelo en época visigoda: Toledo, in Felix temporis reparatio, Atti del conv. arch. int. "Milano capitale dell'impero romano," Milan 1992, 381-394; J. Amengual, Vestigis d'edilícia a les cartes de Consenci i Sever: III Reunió d'Arqueologia Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 1994, 489-497; S. Fernández-Ardanaz, Cristianizzazione e cambiamenti sociali nelle culture montane del nord dell'Hispania, in Cristianesimo e specificità regionali nel Mediterraneo latino (sec. IV-VI), Rome 1994, 483-512; J. Vilella, La correspondencia entre los obispos hispanos y el papado durante el siglo V, in ibid., 457-481; J.C. Sánchez, Los Bagaudas: rebeldes, demonios, mártires. Revueltas campesinas en Galia e Hispania durante el Bajo Imperio, Jaén 1996; J.A. Abásolo, La ciudad romana en la Meseta Norte durante la Antigüedad Tardía: Acta Antiqua Complutensia 1, Alcalá de Henares 1999, 87-99; S. Castellanos, Hagiografía y sociedad en la Hispania visigoda. La Vita Aemiliani y el actual territorio riojano (siglo VI), Logroño 1999; var. aus., Del romá al románic. História, art i cultura de la Tarraconense mediterránia entre els segles IV i IX, Barcelona 1999; Ch. Bonnet - J. Beltrán de Heredia, El primer grupo episcopal de Barcelona, in Sedes regiae (ann. 400-800), Barcelona 2000, 467-490; J. Beltrán de Heredia, Continuidad y cambio en la topografía urbana. Los testimonios arqueológicos del cuadrante nordeste de la ciudad, in De Barcino a Barcinona (siglos I-VII). Los restos arqueológicos de la plaza del Rey de Barcelona, Barcelona 2001, 96-107; C. Buenacasa - J. Sales, Importancia geopolítica d'una ciutat en època visigoda: Girona després de Vouillé (ss. VI-VII): Annals de l'Institut d'Estudis Gironins 42 (2001) 59-75; J. Vilella, Los concilios eclesiásticos de la Tarraconensis durante el siglo V: Florentia Iliberritana 13 (2002) 327-344.

J. Sales

TARRAGONA

I. City - II. Councils - III. Archaeology.

I. City. The ancient Tarraco was the capital of Hispania Citerior from 197 BC and, after its division into three provinces, by the emperor *Diocletian, the capital of the *Tarraconensis province. During the entire Roman period, it was a flourishing city. In 456 it was conquered by the *Visigoth *Euric, and in 714 it was occupied and destroyed by the Muslims. Scholars do not know when Christianity arrived, but it must have arrived there very early, given the position of the port in connection to Rome and the importance of the city itself. The first valid document is the acts of the martyrdom of St. *Fructuosus, bishop of the city, and his deacons Augurius and Eulogius. These acts present us with a flourishing Christian community without conflicts with *pagans. In the year 385, Pope *Siricius sent a letter to Bishop *Himerius of Tarragona, in response to one of his letters, which had been sent by Pope *Damasus. Tarragona, the capital's province, must have already been the metropolitan see, given that Himerius must have made known the text of the letter to the bishops of his province (Ep. ad Himerium 16: PL 56, 562). But it did not take very long before it also became a religious metropolis. In 468, Pope *Hilary referred to Bishop Ascanius with the title of metropolitan (Ep. ad Ascanium: PL 58,17), a dignity that was recognized by the bishop of *Saragossa who appealed to him, precisely because he was a metropolitan, because the bishop of Calahorra, his suffragan bishop, was doing as he pleased. Ascanius's entire behavior confirms this title, and in the Council of *Toledo (516) it was stated expressis verbis that Tarragona was a metropolitan see.

Bishops: St. Fructuosus (d. 259), Himerius (before 385), Hilary (402), Ascanius (465ff.), John (516), Sergius (520–555), Tranquillinus (ca. 560), Stephen (d. 589), Arthemius (d. 599), Asiaticus (d. 599), Eusebius (610–632), Audax (ca. 633), Protasius (638–646), Faulax (645–668?), Cyprian (683–688), Vera (693), St. Prosper (711?).

E. Flórez, ES 24 and 25; DHEE 4, 2527-2531; NP 12,36-37; PW Suppl. 15, 570-644; P. de Palol, Tarraco hispanovisigoda, Tarragona 1953; J. Blanch, Arxiepiscologi de la santa Esglesia metropolitana i primada de Tarragona, Tarragona 1955; D. Mansifia, Orígenes de la organización metropolitana en la iglesia española: Hispania Sacra 12 (1959) 262-267; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; E. Morera Llauradó, Tarragona Cristiana, Tarragona 1981.

II. Councils. 464. That there was a celebration of the provincial council in Tarragona is deduced by some authors (Hefele-Leclercq) from the letter of Ascanius and other bishops from the province of *Tarraconensis to Pope *Hilarius to learn what approach to take with respect to Silvanus of Calahorra, who was illicitly performing ordinations; in the same letter, they sought advice on the transfer of Irenaeus from *Terrassa to the city of *Barcelona (PL 58,15). No other information exists that makes reference to this council.

516. Presided over by the metropolitan John. Seven other bishops from the province as well as the metropolitan of *Carthage and the bishop of Elvira were present. It has 13 canons aimed at regulating the life of the clergy (and the monks: can. 11). Of note was the decision to excommunicate ad tempus a bishop who, although summoned, was absent from the council for no reason (can. 6) and the invitation to the bishops to also bring with them countryside priests and several laypeople (can. 13).

Mansi 7,957-958; 8,539-546; E. Morera Llauradó, Tarragona Cristiana, Tarragona 1981; Synoden 124-126; 128-133 et passim.

P. de Luis

III. Archaeology. Hispano-Roman coastal city established during the Second Punic war by the Scipioni (218 BC) on top of the indigenous nucleus of Kesse. It was the capital of Hispania Citerior and subsequently *Tarraconensis (from 197 BC onward), and the center of the conventus Tarraconensis. Tarragona was damaged by the Frankish invasions of 260 (Eutropius, 9,8,2) and by those of the Alans, Suevi and *Vandals (409). In 475 it was occupied by the *Visigoths. It was a Visigothic city from Liuvigild (568–586) until Agila II (710–714) and maintained its economic preponderance with respect to the other nuclei of Tarraconensis. The Muslims took possession of Tarragona in 713, after the escape of Bishop Prosper and the church officials.

Although the tradition assumed that *Paul's trip to Hispania (Rom 15:24; 15:28) was completed (Jerome, Ep., 65,12; 71,1; 120,9; Theodoret, Interpr. Epist. II ad Tim., 4,17), the presence of Christianity is not attested with certainty until the time of the *Valerian persecution (259), through the martyrial acts of Bishop *Fructuosus and his deacons Augurius and Eulogius. Consentius's Letter 11 (ca. 419) traces a detailed panorama of the social-religious fabric in Tarragona already fully immersed in Christianity. The metropolitan see is documented for the first time in 385, through the decretal of the Roman bishop *Siricius addressed to Bishop *Himerius, where it is said that the bishop of Tarraconensis was changed into the papal primate of Hispania.

The Christian archaeology of the city provides some written sources: (1) Consentius's letter, which mentions the cathedral's secretarium and the monastery of Frontón; (2) the funerary carmen of Bishop Sergius—transmitted through the Anthologia Hispana (an Early Medieval document)—that praises his restoration of the roof of a church and the founding of a *cenobium; and (3) the Liber Orationum de festivitatibus (beginning of the 8th c.), which lists the churches of Santa Jerusalén, San Fructuoso, San Pedro and a fourth whose title is not indicated.

The material remains were more abundant than the written ones. In addition to the very numerous, although fragmentary and dispersed, sculptural, architectural, ceramic and other such remains, there is also extant a series of better preserved monuments. Within the walls—where one can trace the disappearance of large urban areas between the 2nd half of the 3rd c. and the end of the 4th—the following are documented: the martyrial basilica of the amphitheater (Visigothic era), constructed in the arena (certainly the church of San Fructuoso mentioned in the Liber Orationum de festivitatibus); fragmentary remains of the church in the Rovellat plaza; and the presumed identification of the site of the early Christian episcopal see under the modern-day cathedral, in the upper part of the Roman city.

Within the walls, in the suburbs of Tarragona, one finds the most spectacular remains. On the one side, the extensive early Christian necropolises of Francoli (chronologically late-imperial and Visigothic) contain the remains of a basilica and more than two thousand places of burial of various types and decorations, among which the *sarcophagi and mosaic stones—the stones of Ampelius, Optimum etc.—stand out for the epigraphical, iconographic and onomastic information they supply. These are necropolises ad sanctos (see *depositio ad sanctos) in the vicinity of the relics of Fructuosus and his deacons, in the cemetery's basilica. Thanks to the study of numerous sarcophagi discovered in this field, one could say that Tarragona was one of the smallest cities of the W Mediterranean to produce its own funerary sculpture during *Late Antiquity. On the other side stands the complex of the central park, near the early Christian necropolises, which was recently discovered and excavated, and which appears to be an important, probably monastic complex of 6 buildings presided over by a funerary basilica with an atrium surrounded by dependent structures; the discovery of a funerary inscription dedicated to blessed *Thecla stand out. Within the ager near Tarragona, the rich Villa dels Munts stands out (Altafulla), with clear indications of Christianization, as does the early Christian mausoleum of Centcelles (Constanti), with an impressive dome decorated with cynegetic mosaics and with scenes from the OT and NT, while various individuals enthroned and dressed in robes stand out in bold relief. Its iconographic interpretation—and therefore the identification of its owner—is still uncertain, although one cannot doubt the importance and influence that the person buried in that place wanted to display.

E. Morera, Tarragona cristiana, I-IV, Tarragona 1897-1959; J. Serra, Excavaciones en la necrópolis romano-cristiana de Tarragona, Madrid 1929; Id., La necrópolis de San Fructuoso, Tarragona 1948; Id., Santa Tecla la Vieja. La primitiva catedral de Tarragona, Tarragona 1960; J. Blanch, Arxiepiscopologi de la Santa Església Metropolitana i Primada de Tarragona, Tarragona 1951; A. Fàbrega, Pasionario Hispánico (siglos VII-XI), Madrid-Barcelona 1953-55; P. de Palol, Tarraco hispanovisigoda, Tarragona 1953; Id., Arqueología cristiana de la España romana, Madrid-Valladolid 1967; G. Alföldy, Die römischen Inschriften von Tarraco, Berlin 1975; R. Puertas, Iglesias hispánicas (siglos IV al VIII). Testimonios literarios, Madrid 1975; M. Del Amo, Estudio crítico de la necrópolis paleocristiana de Tarragona (3 vols.), Tarragona 1979-1989; Th. Hauschild, Arquitectura romana de Tarragona, Tarragona 1983; TED'A, L'amfiteatre romà de Tarragona, la basílica visigótica i l'església románica, Tarragona 1990; Id., Noves aportacions a l'estudi de la basílica cristiana de l'amfiteatre de Tàrraco: III Reunió d'Arqueologia Cristiana Hispánica, Barcelona 1994, 167-184; G. Alföldy, Tarraco, Tarragona 1991; P. de Palol, Transformaciones urbanas en Hispania durante el Bajo Imperio: los ejemplos de Barcino, Tarraco y Clunia. Transcendencia del modelo en época visigoda: Toledo, in Felix temporis reparatio. Atti del Conv. Arch. Int. "Milano capitale dell'impero romano," Milan 1992, 381-394; X. Aquilué, La seu del Collegi d'Arquitectes. Una intervenció arqueològica en el centre històric de Tarragona, Tarragona 1993; C. Godoy - M. Gros, L'oracional hispànic de Verona i la topografia cristiana de Tarraco a l'antiguitat tardana: possibilitats i límits: Pyrenae 25 (1994) 245-258; J. Amengual, Vestigis d'edilícia a les cartes de Consenci i Sever: III Reunió d'Arqueologia Cristiana Hispànica, Barcelona 1994, 489-497; Th. Hauschild, Hallazgos de la época visigoda en la parte alta de Tarragona: ibid., 151-156; X. Aquilué, Referent a les estructures de l'Antiguitat Tardana de la plaça de Rovellat (Tarragona): Annals de l'Institut d'Estudis Gironins 37 (1996-97) 1169-1185; M. Miró, *Epigrafia mètrica de transmissió exclusivament manuscrita: a propòsit de les inscripcions cristianes de Tarragona conservades en l'*Anthologia Hispana: Annals de l'Institut d'Estudis Gironins 37 (1996-97) 953-971; R. Mar et al., El conjunto paleocristiano del Francolí en Tarragona. Nuevas aportaciones: Antiquité Tardive 4 (1996) 320-324; J. Sales: Necrópolis cristianas tardoantiguas en el área catalana: estado de la cuestión, in Santos obispos y reliquias, Alcalá de Henares 2003, 319-333.

J. Sales

TARSICIUS (Tarcisius). The first testimony on Tarsicius is offered to us by Pope *Damasus (A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana, Vatican City 1942, 117-119). The pope compared him to *Stephen the first *martyr, probably because both were subjected to stoning. But from this parallel we cannot draw any conclusions with respect to Tarsicius's membership in the hierarchy. There remains the fact that he died for refusing to hand over the *Eucharist. Damasus does not say anything about the date of his martyrdom. The 7th-c. *Itineraries place his tomb in the catacombs of St. *Callistus on the Via Appia near that of Pope *Zephyrinus (CCL 175,317.327). According to the Passio S. Stephani pp. (BHL 7845), he was an acolyte of the Roman church. The Passio belongs to the epical type and is from a later era. The first to introduce the mention of the saint and his martyrology was Ado (15 August).

BS 12, 136-138; LCI 8, 420-421; BBKL 11, 543-544.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

TARSUS. A city of Cilia Campestris, on the River Cydnus (today Tarsus Çay), of very ancient origin (information about the place dates from the 9th c. BC), it was situated in the W part of the alluvial and fertile tract of land which developed over time by work of the three rivers Cydnus (Tarsus Çay), Sarus (Seyhan) and Pyramus (Ceyhan). At ca. 15 km (9.3 mi) from the ocean, one was nearly constrained, when one traveled by land, to go through it as a route between E and W, between Anatolia and the Mesopotamian flatland. The city was also connected with the ocean through river navigation. It was the capital of the Cilician kings and the Persian satraps: but the Greek coins issued by the local mints in the 5th and 4th c. BC indicate that it soon became autonomous and that Hellenization deeply penetrated it. It underwent the rule of Alexander and subsequently that of the Seleucids of Syria: annexed to the Roman state by Pompey in 67 BC, during the campaign against the pirates, it received from Antony the status of a free city, in addition to the concession of extensive benefits for groups of its citizens. Antony and Cleopatra met at Tarsus. With the creation of the province of Cilicia, it became its capital; its internal constitution was timocratic, and it included, among other things, the imposition of a tax of 500 drachmae on the exercise of civil rights, excluding from it, therefore, the majority of the population. A famous inscription that mentions the passage of *Septimius Severus through the passageway of the Pylae Ciliciae, which is not too far from the city, praised it as the largest and most beautiful metropolis of the three provinces of Cilicia, Isauria and Lyconia; with the *Diocletian reform, it became the capital of Cilicia Prima. Perhaps at the time of the emperor *Arcadius, in the system of the multiplication of the provinces, the campestris was subdivided into Cilicia Prima (metropolis, Tarsus) and Cilicia Secunda (metropolis, Anazarbus); in this way, the extension of its province and the importance of its metropolis was thus reduced. Different emperors were buried at Tarsus: Tacitus, *Maximinus Daia (313) and *Julian the Apostate (363), who had ordered the reopening of a *pagan temple there.

A center of lively productive activities (the local linen industries were famous), Tarsus was also the flourishing center of cultural life, the location of a reformed school of philosophy that had nothing to envy of those in *Athens and *Alexandria (see Strab., Geogr. XIV,5,13-14). Many of its professors went to *Rome; Strabo lists the numerous famous individuals. Even Dio Chrysostom (Dion of Prusa), around 110, praised its high intellectual and cultural standing and economic prosperity (Or. 33 and 34). Cilicia was the land of different cultural influences from both East and West. In the 4th c., although remaining the most important city of Cilicia, Tarsus lost its prestige (*Ammianus still describes it as "Tarsus, the well-known city, makes Cilicia noble" [Ciliciam . . . Tarsus nobilitat, urbs perspectabilis: Rerum gest], 14,8,3).

*Paul was born there (Acts 9:11); he spent his childhood there and returned there for some time even after his conversion (Acts 9:30); he was joined there by *Barnabas (Acts 11:25). This date could be the beginning of the Christian community at Tarsus. It was an episcopal see of great importance, and it already had bishops during the apostolic age, starting from Jason, a disciple of Paul (Rom 16:21), and his successor Urban; there followed, among the known names, Helenus (252–269), who at various times went to *Antioch during the controversy with *Paul of Samosata (Eus., HE 6,44; 7,5). *Cyprian of Carthage did not want to be in communion with him (Eus., HE 7,5,4). There followed Athanasius (a martyr in 259), Clino Lupus (314–325), who was present at the Council of *Ancyra in 314, Theodore (at *Nicaea), Antony (*Arian) and Silvanus (head of the *homoiousians, but deposed after the Council of *Constantinople [360], he died perhaps in 371). *Basil of Caesarea was worried about the divisions within the community of Tarsus (Epp. 113 and 114). Then there came the great exegete *Diodore (379–392), who was present at the Councils of Antioch and Constantinople (381), Falerus (394), Dositheus (415), Marianus, Helladius (431–434), who was deposed in the Council of *Ephesus and made recourse to the pope in 433, Theodore (449–451), Pelagius (458), Nestor (489), Syncletius (530), Peter (553) and Theodore (680). In the 6th c., the see of Tarsus had seven suffragan bishops and was dependent on the patriarchate of Antioch. During the persecutions, it had numerous *martyrs, among whom were *Pelagia, Boniface, Marianus, Diomedes, and Julietta and her son *Quiricus, natives of Iconia. During the Great Persecution, many Christians were deported into the mines of Cilicia (Eus., The Martyrs of Palestine 10,1-2). Tarsus came under Arab rule in the 7th c., around 660. In the 10th c. the Armenians established there one of their episcopal sees.

W. Ruge, Tarsos: PWK 23, 2, 2413-2439; W.M. Ramsay, The Cities of St. Paul, London 1907, 85-244; V. Schultze, Altchristliche Städte und Landschaften, Gütersloh 1913-1926, II, 266-290; D. Magie, Roman Rule in Asia Minor: To the End of the Third Century, Princeton 1950, 272ff.; J.D. Bing, Tarsus: Forgotten Colony of Lindos: Journal of Near Eastern Studies 30 (1971) 99-109; M.A.G. Haykin, And Who Is the Spirit? Basil of Caesarea's Letters to the Church at Tarsus: VChr 41 (1987) 377-385; P. Desideri, Le città della pianura di Cilicia in Strabone (14, 5, 8-19), in Hestíasis, Studi offerti a Salvatore Calderone, II, Messina 1986-88, 331-346; Id., La Cilicia ellenistica: Quaderni storici 76 (1991) 141ff.; A. Bilban Yalçin, Alcune sconosciute sepolture bizantine di Tarso, in VI Simposio di Tarso, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 2000, 325-334; Id., Sculture bizantine di Tarso, in VII Simposio di Tarso, ed. L. Padovese, Rome 2002, 335-344.

M. Forlin Patrucco - A. Di Berardino

TATIAN (mid-2nd c.). A Christian writer cataloged among the *Apologists. Of Eastern origin (he said of himself that he was "born in the land of the Assyrians" [Disc. 42]), that is, Mesopotamia true and proper or, generically, Syria, but of Hellenistic education. After various trips and vicissitudes of every type (Disc. 35), he stumbled on the *Scriptures of the Christians and converted (Disc. 29). He was a friend of *Justin, of whom he considered himself and was considered (at least for the early days after his conversion) a disciple; along with Justin he was involved in a controversy with the Cynic philosopher Crescens, who paid both men back threatening them with death (Disc. 19).

His Discourse to the Greeks (Λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας)—his only work that has remained because it was transmitted originally in the compendium of the Greek Apologists compiled by Aretas of Caesarea (cod. Par. gr. 451: in which, however, the sheets containing Tatian's works were subsequently lost: there remain, however, exact copies)—is a violent polemic against all the culture of the Greeks, mingled with a defense of the Christian ideas that are thus laid out with apologetic ends. The date of composition is uncertain: according to several points of view it is to be placed between 155 (very close presumably to his conversion to Christianity) and 170 (the final, although confused, pieces of information about his activity). Tatian accused the Greeks of depending on the barbarian cultures, although the sole invention of the Greeks was philosophy, which Tatian reviles in the person of its representatives, the philosophers, who fall into contradiction and who pontificate in the most foolish ways, even if he himself then makes extensive recourse to conceptual instruments that were originally philosophical (primarily *Stoic). He never mentions Christianity or Christians by name because his objective is not the comparison of the two religions, but ways of seeing the truth and life and therefore about personal and social ethics.

An orator, well-equipped with the most refined sophistic cavils to the point of prodding his opponents with polemical subtlety and aggressiveness, he ostensibly presented himself as a "barbarian," rich with that wisdom that the Greeks however mocked, the wisdom that is in fact to be identified in the biblical tradition. In this way, Tatian united Eastern nationalism, Christian *faith, restless theological speculation, intransigent polemic, sarcasm and contempt for his opponents. As it appears from the Discourse to the Greeks, he seems to have been a man of violent character, passionate, often dark, aspiring to formulations of thought that aim to be original, even through the accumulation of arguments that are not always coherent.

His theology had, on account of certain characteristics, an ancient character (*Jewish-Christian); with respect to other aspects, it anticipated or echoed radical, almost gnosticizing, tendencies. After a violent opening polemic against the intellectual culture of the Greeks and esp. the philosophers (chs. 1-3), Tatian summarizes the Christian concept of God (ch. 4), the relationship of the God-Logos and the creation of matter (ch. 5), the doctrine of the resurrection, a consequence of divine omnipotence (ch. 6), the creation of the angelic beings (ch. 7), and the fall of the angels and the protoparents, which led to the introduction of idolatry and *astrology (ch. 8). After a polemical interlude against idolatry, Tatian goes on to treat the topic of demonology, pneumatology, psychology and *soteriology (chs. 9-16), according to a theological scheme that might seem strange but which in fact is consistent for those times and for which there are still traces even in *Origen's De Principiis. This exposition is caused by continual polemical attacks against the various opinions of the Greeks, and it continues by accusing, as of demonic origin, the use of drugs, medicine, shows, *pagan moral behavior and their political regimes (chs. 17-28). Evident in this entire section is the influence of Jewish *apocryphal literature (esp. the Book of Enoch).

After another autobiographical interlude (chs. 29-30), Tatian develops two arguments. The first pertains to the moral superiority of the "Christian (or "barbarian") philosophy," which was contrary to the dissoluteness of the Greeks, demonstrated by the low moral level of their most famous men, by their works of art which were vulgarly immoral (catalog of statues), and by their mythological accounts that taught immorality and corrupted young people (chs. 31-35). The second argument, broadly developed in the second part of the Discourse (chs. 36-41), is the so-called chronological argument, intending to prove that the barbarians (that is, the Jews and, after them, the Christians), because they date back to *Moses, are earlier in time and are therefore more ancient and more authoritative than the Greeks. The former date back to Moses, the latter to Homer: on the basis of a series of compared chronological calculations, Tatian, broadly following the already beaten path of Jewish-Alexandrian apologetics, concludes with the superiority—on the basis of their greater antiquity—of the Christians with respect to the pagans. The Discourse closes (ch. 42) with a statement of faith ("I know the one who is God and his creation") and with Tatian's challenge that he is ready for a confrontation with the ideas of his opponents.

Tatian's newer and more original theological positions are those that pertain to the procession of the Logos, the presentation of the theme of the resurrection and his very extensive demonological development. The framework of his pneumatology and his cosmic conception of the fall of the angels is more archaic. Traces of rigorous asceticism are contained in the Discourse, even though it is difficult to say if it already pertains to the properly heretical positions.

After the death of Justin, as far as the heresiological tradition tells us (Iren., Adv. haer. I,28,1; III,23,8; Eus., HE 4,29,1; Epiph., Pan. 46), Tatian separated himself from the mainstream church and instead leaned toward *encratism; he emphasized his pessimism with respect to the problem of the fall of humankind to the point of maintaining the doctrine of Adam's damnation. These ideas seemed to make him close, at least in a certain sense, to ideas that were not only encratic but actually gnostic (the economy of the OT subjected to Satan or even a lower god). Tatian wrote various other works. In addition to the Diatessaron—which is the work that assured him greater fame in subsequent centuries, esp. in the East—even before the Discourse he had written a treatise On the Animals, which, in spite of the name, should have been most likely a treatise of natural anthropology of a heavily pessimistic tone. He had likewise devoted another document to demonology (Disc. ch. 16). A clearly encratic ascetic work is instead The Perfection According to the Savior (Περὶ τοῦ κατὰ τὸν Σωτῆρα καταρτισμοῦ), which is cited and refuted by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. III,12,81,1ff.), in which, among other things, Tatian interpreted *Paul's words in 1 Cor 7:5 in the sense that only abstention from marriage united one to God, while the custom of matrimony signified a communion of incontinence and fornication with the devil. In this treatise, Tatian set forth Christ as a model, who was a virgin and a continent man (and poor), contrasting radically the new man (Christ and with him the continent Christian) to the old man (Adam, who was condemned for this reason). Tatian also composed another treatise, titled the Problems, pertaining to difficult questions present in the sacred texts, of which one of his disciples, *Rhodo, had proposed, in turn, an explanation. It could be the case (but it is not certain) that in this work of Tatian even that peculiar exegesis of Gen 1:3 (fiat lux) found a home, which was understood as an imploring demand by God the Creator to the supreme God so that there might be light, an interpretation that seems to have had a clearly gnostic-*Valentinian orientation (Clem. Alex., Ecl. Proph. 38,1; Orig., C. Cels. VI,51; De orat. 24,5). Likewise working from information provided from a later age (and not very certain), Tatian also substituted water for the wine in the *Eucharist, being consistent with the Encratite convictions that prohibited the use of wine (Epiph., Pan. 46; Jer., In Amos 2,12). Of the NT *Scriptures, Tatian rejected a certain number of Paul's epistles; for some of Paul's writings, he corrected certain expressions (according to Eus., HE 4,29,6), although he accepted the Pastoral Epistles. According to the information provided by *Epiphanius, once he had returned to the East, Tatian spread his Encratite ideas from *Antioch on the Daphne toward *Cilicia, Pisidia and elsewhere. Even though these last pieces of information could pertain to the development of the Encratite movements that were contemporaneous with Epiphanius (loc. cit.), the information could have a some foundation, given the fact that this region was the place in which the most well-known work of Tatian, the Diatessaron, was spread and remained for a long time the official gospel text of the local churches.

Editions: CPG 1104-1110; PG 6, 803-888; E. Schwartz, Tatiani Oratio ad Graecos, TU IV, 1, Leipzig 1888 (with witnesses and fragments); E.J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten, Göttingen 1914 (Schwartz's text, 266-305, without the fragments); M. Marcovich, Berlin-New York 1995.

Translations: Ger.: R.C. Kukula, BKV² 12, Kempten 1913; Fr.: A. Puech, Recherches sur le Discours aux Grecs de Tatien, suivies d'une traduction française du Discours avec notes, Paris 1903; It.: P. Ubaldi, Turin 1931; M. Fermi, Rome 1924; C. Burini, Rome 1986; S. Di Cristina, Rome 1991; Sp.: D. Ruiz Bueno, BAC 116, Madrid 1954, 572-628 (with Greek text); Eng.: M. Whittaker, T. Oratio ad Graecos and fragments, Oxford 1982.

Studies: C.W. Steuer, Die Gottes- und Logoslehre des T. (Diss.), Jena 1892; R.C. Kukula, Tatians sogennante Apologie, Leipzig 1900; Id., "Altersbeweis" und "Künstlerkatalog" in Tatians Rede an die Griechen, Vienna 1900; A. Puech, op.cit.; R.M. Grant, The Date of Tatian's Oration: HThR 46 (1953) 99-101; Id., The Heresy of Tatian: JTS n.s. 5 (1954) 62-68; Id., Tatian and the Bible: SP 1 (1957) 297-308; Id., Tatian's Theological Method: HThR 51 (1958) 123-128; F. Bolgiani, La tradizione eresiologica sull'encratismo, I: Le notizie di Ireneo; II: La confutazione di Clemente di Alessandria: AAT 91 (1956-57); 96 (1961–62); A. Orbe, A propósito de Gen. 1,3 en la exégesis de T.: Gregorianum 42 (1961) 401-443; M. Elze, T. und seine Theologie, Göttingen 1960; S. Di Cristina, L'idea di dynamis nel "De mundo" e nell' "Oratio ad Graecos" di Taziano: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 485-504; E. Norelli, La critique du pluralisme grec dans le "Discours aux Grecs" de Tatien, in Les apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, ed. B. Pouderon and J. Doré, Paris 1998, 81-120; E.J. Hunt, Christianity in the Second Century, The Case of Tatian, London 2003; K.L. Gaca, The Making of Fornication: Eros, Ethics, and Political Reform in Greek Philosophy and Early Christianity, Berkeley, CA 2003; U.B. Schmid, In Search of Tatian's Diatessaron in the West: VCh 57 (2003) 176-199; U.B. Schmid, Unum ex quattuor. Eine Geschichte der lateinischen Tatianüberlieferung, Freiburg 2005.

F. Bolgiani

TATWINE. Born in Mercia, he was a priest in the monastery of Bredon and then the archbishop of *Canterbury from 731–734, receiving the pallium from Gregory III in 733 and establishing the primacy of Canterbury over *York. A man praiseworthy on account of his teaching and prudence, well-versed in the Sacred *Scriptures (Bede, Hist. Eccl. V,23: PL 95,283-284), Tatwine wrote an Ars grammatica (Ars Tatuini), inspired by *Isidore of Seville's Etymologiae and Priscian's Institutio de nomine, and 40 riddles (Aenigmata) written in hexameters, analogous to those composed by Eusebius the abbot of Jarrow. He died in 734.

CPL 1563, 1564; M. de Mauro - F. Glorie eds., CCL 133, Turnhout 1968, 1-93, 167-208; S.P. Cobbs, Prolegomena to the Ars grammatica Tatuini, Diss. University of Chicago 1937; V. Law, The Latin and Old English Glosses in the Ars Tatuini: ASE 6 (1977) 77-89; Id., The Transmission of the Ars Bonifacii and the Ars Tatuini: RHT 9 (1979) 281-288; R. Whitman, Aenigmata Tatuini: NM 88 (1987) 8-17; Z. Pavlovskis, The Riddler's Microcosm: From Symphosius to St. Boniface: Classica et Mediaevalia 39 (1988) 219-251; Patrologia IV, 414.

P. Marone

TAUROBOLIUM. A sacrificial rite belonging to the cult of the Great Mother Cybele, who was of Phrygian origin and officially accepted at *Rome in 204 BC. The rite, which is attested for the first time in AD 160, from an inscription at *Lyons, consisted in the sacrifice of a bull, at times accompanied by that of a male sheep (criobolium) and could have a dual purpose, public and private. In the first case, the taurobolium was celebrated for the benefit of the emperor (pro salute imperatoris), with whom other members of the imperial family were at times associated, and was intended to ensure the favor of the goddess for the supreme representative of the state, for the foundation and guarantee of the common good. The taurobolium completed by individual members of the faithful regarded as a personal benefit developed starting from the 3rd c. AD. A vivid description of this form of private taurobolium seems to be supplied in *Prudentius's Peristephanon (X,1006-1050) and in the anonymous Carmen adversus paganos* (vv. 57-62). Despite the heavy polemical tone of each document, the rite suggested in these can be identified with the Metroac form of the taurobolium, which therefore consisted of a sort of sprinkling of blood that the faithful received while standing within a pit covered by a trellis (i.e., a crisscrossing structure of bars of wood or metal) upon which an animal was slaughtered. The taurobolic rite, moreover, from the inner documentation turns out to have had a preeminently cathartic purpose, with the efficacy limited to a period of 20 years, after which it had been finished, the ceremony could be repeated. Notably spread throughout the empire during the 2nd–4th c., the rite met with special favor in the aristocratic Roman circles from the 2nd half of the 4th c., who had remained faithful to the traditional cults and were vociferous defenders of it against Christianity, which by that point had been officially recognized by the public authorities. The quality of "tauroboliate" of the Great Mother was placed as a seal for numerous religious duties of noteworthy proponents of the Roman aristocracy such as Vettius Agorius *Praetextatus (CIL VI,1778), although another personage from the same context declared himself, through it, in aeternum renatus ("born again forever") (CIL VI,510).

H. Graillot, Le culte de Cybèle, Mère des dieux à Rome et dans l'Empire romain, Rome 1916; R. Duthoy, The Taurobolium. Its Evolution and Terminology, Leiden 1969; M.J. Vermaseren, Cybele and Attis. The Myth and the Cult, London 1977; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Soteriologia e aspetti mistici nel culto di Cibele e Attis, Palermo 1979; Eng. tr. with additions and modifications, Soteriology and Mystic Aspects in the Cult of Cybele and Attis (EPRO 103), Leiden 1985; Ph. Borgeaud, La Mère des dieux. De Cybèle à la Vierge Marie, Paris 1996; Ph. Borgeaud, Taurobolion, in F. Graf (ed.), Ansichten griechischer Rituale. Geburtstags - Symposium für Walter Burkert Castelen bei Basel 15. bis 18. März 1996, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1998, 183-198.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

TAURUS, praetorian prefect. A personal correspondent with *John of Antioch (Ep. 123, PG 84,739) and *Isidore of Pelusium (Epp. III,224, PG 78,879-880; III,365, PG 78,1017-1018; V,40, PG 78,1351-1352), he presided over the general Council of *Rimini (359) and was able to convince all the bishops that took part to subscribe to a creed that was amenable to the theological position of the emperor *Constantius II.

CPG 6320; ACO I, 4,154; PLRE II, 1056-1057.

P. Marone

TE DECET LAUS. More than a hymn, it is a liturgical formula sung in the mode of the acclamation of the glory of the *Trinity. As in the case of the hymn Gloria Patri, it is made up of a minor doxology, in contradistinction to the Te Deum, which is considered a major doxology. Very ancient in origin, it already appeared in the Apostolic Constitutions* (VII,48) and the *Byzantine liturgy for the morning hours. St. *Benedict introduced it into the divine office in this form: Te decet laus / Te decet hymnus / Tibi gloria Deo Patri / Et Filio, cum Sancto Spiritu / in saecula saeculorum. Amen. It is no longer used in the Roman liturgy.

M. Righetti, Storia liturgica, I, Milan [2]1950, 201, see EC 11, 1861; G.M. Dreves - C. Blume, Lateinischer Hymnendichtung, Leipzig 1909, 178.

L. Dattrino

TE DEUM. A Latin hymn in praise of the *Trinity. Hincmar of Reims (Praedestinatione XXIX) in the 9th c. attributed it to *Ambrose and *Augustine, who had composed it during the *baptism of the latter, but modern scholarship has refuted such a theory of authorship. *Niceta of Remesiana has therefore been considered the author, based on *Paulinus of Nola's statements concerning Niceta's composition of liturgical hymns and chants (Carm. 17,90ff.). The rhythmic prose in which the Te Deum was composed, which was unusual in Latin hymnology, has led scholars to put forward the hypothesis that the hymn was derived from a Greek source. The Te Deum was recited during the morning office according to the testimony of *Caesarius of Arles (Reg. mon. 21).

A.E. Burn, The Hymn Te Deum and Its Author, London 1926; M. Simonetti, Studi sull'innologia popolare cristiana dei primi secoli: Atti Acc. Nazionale Lincei, Memorie, ser. 8, vol. 4 (1952) 478-481; Patrologia III, 183; K. Gamber, Das "Te Deum" und sein Autor: RBen 74 (1964) 318-321; LTK[3] 9, 1306-1307.

M.G. Mara

TEBESSA. Theveste, modern-day Tébessa (Algeria), a large agricultural market and an important strategic point, is one of the most ancient cities of North *Africa. The III Augustan Legion, at least from the age of *Vespasian (AD 69–79) until the beginning of the 2nd c., was stationed there. The city became a municipium under the Flavians and a colony under *Trajan. We do not know to which province it belonged at that time, but from the age of *Diocletian it was part of Proconsular Africa. It reached its apex in the 3rd c., as the arch of the triumph of Caracalla (inserted as a northern door in the Byzantine city walls), the temple of Minerva (the city's museum), the amphitheater and the forum all bear witness. The *Vandals destroyed its walls in 429, but the magister militum Solomon reconstructed them after *Belisarius's reconquest (CIL 8,16507). The walls still exist—a reason that the urban agglomerate never ceased to be inhabited. In the 11th c., the Arab geographer El Bekri praised the city's wealth.

Christianity appeared at Tebessa in the 3rd c. Lucius was among the bishops of the Council of *Carthage (1 September 256), which deliberated on the question of the baptism of heretics (Sent. epp. 31). A note on the margin of its Acts* that referred to him later than 259 call him a "confessor and martyr." His name appears in the Mart. hier. (18 January). This has led scholars to conclude that he died in 259. In 361–363 a *Donatist council was held at Tebessa (Optatus of Milevis, Schism. don. 2,18), but, despite this fact, the city was never a stronghold for the schismatic movement. Among the bishops, we know about a certain Romulus (Council of Carthage 345/348), Urbicus and his Donatist counterpart Perseverantius at the conference of 411, Felix who participated at the conference of 484, a bishop Palladius who was known thanks to his epitaph (CIL 8, 2011), which dates to the beginning of the 5th c., and finally a Faustinus in the 6th c. The city's martyrological fasti note for the date 12 March 295 the martyrdom of the draftee *Maximilian, who was buried at *Carthage (BHL 5813), and *Crispina and her companions for 5 December 304 (BHL 1988ab). On their tomb, under *Theodosius (383–395), was constructed a large basilica, which was the destination point for pilgrimages. Likewise in 883, Leo VI the Wise would mention Tebessa among the African episcopates.

PWK 11, 249-252; DACL 15, 1998-2028; LTK 10, 111-112; J. Christern, Das frühchristliche Pilgerheiligtum von Tebessa, Wiesbaden 1976; S. Ferdi, Augustin: de retour en Afrique 388–430; repères archéologiques dans le patrimoine algérien, Fribourg 2000.

V. Saxer

TELESPHORUS, pope (ca. 125–ca. 136). Greek or from Magna Graecia; he died ca. 136 following a "glorious martyrdom" (Iren., Adv. haer. III,3,3) after 11 years, 3 months and 25 days of his pontificate (LP I,129). The following have been attributed to Telesphorus: the institution of the Christmas midnight Mass, the Lenten fast, the hymn Gloria in excelsis Deo and some liturgical laws, but the decretal in question is a forgery (Jaffé 34). The Roman Martyrology and the missal mention him for 15 January.

LP I, 56-57, 129 and 263; Eus. HE 5, 6,4; L. Duchesne, Histoire ancienne de l'Église I, Paris 1923, 236-237; DTC 15, 82 (E. Amann); BS 12, 188-189 (N. Del Re); EPapi I, 218-219 (F. Scorza Barcellona).

M. Spinelli

TEMPLE. We are accustomed to investigating, with a somewhat anachronistic vision, the use of the "temple" during the earliest period of Christianity, without keeping in mind the literary nature of the sources, esp. during the first three centuries. Oddly enough, it is archaeology that confirms the claim found in the book of Revelation: "And I saw no temple in it" (i.e., *Jerusalem) (Rev 21:22); early Christian architecture of the 3rd c. does not exist (B.M. Apollonji-Ghetti, 1).

In effect, we derive only a few marginal allusions to the first Christian community and its presence in the temple of Jerusalem from Luke (e.g., Lk 24:53; Acts 2:36; 3:1); both the Pauline corpus and the book of Revelation allude to the temple in christological, ecclesiological and anthropological senses. It is therefore necessary to keep in mind the entire liturgical reflection offered by the epistle to the Hebrews with respect to the new covenant. Certainly the veil of the temple was torn (Mk 15:38) for the first Christian communities, which, from that time onward, offered the worship owed to God in the temple of creation (see Is 66:1-2, cited by *Stephen in Acts 7:48-50), or more specifically in the temple of their anointed flesh (see, e.g., Jn 2:19-21; 1 Cor 3:16; Eph 2:21; Ignatius, Ad Eph. 9,2; ps.-Barnabas 16,1; Justin Martyr, Dial. 86,6; II Clement to the Corinthians 9,3-5; Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 5,6,2; Tertullian, De pudic. 16,8). In the 3rd c. the idea continued (Cyprian, Ep. 55,27; ps.-Cyprian, De cent. 58; ps.-Cyprian, De mont. 4,3). The Alexandrians, with more reservations in directly applying to the body and the flesh the quality of being the temple of God, emphasized the role of the soul, but in certain cases, they gave an anthropological interpretation to the concept of "temple" (see Clem. Alex., Strom. 6,7,60; Origen, Ad Rom. 2,5; 6,9). The model, with its due adaptations, was also operative among the *gnostics from the very beginning (see *Heracleon, fr. 16).

The same fact appears again in the contrary sense in light of the results of historical and archaeological research (P. Lampe, 309; A. Provoost, 324), which indicate the nonspecific places that Christian gathered for worship (Justin Martyr, Acta 3,1-3; Minucius Felix, Octavius 32,1). The transition from private homes to the space that was the property of the community (domus ecclesiae), which was required by practical demands, must be seen in relation to the greater number of Christians and their greater ability to make purchases. However, the function of this domus was manifold: eucharistic gatherings, synods, the dwelling of the bishop or virgins subintroductae etc. The appearance of basilicas during the period between the years 200 and 320 does not imply of itself a change of mindset among the Christians and finds its explanation, once again, in practical motivations that led the Christian communities, in a time of relative prosperity, to adopt existing buildings or to build them ex novo (A. Provoost, 324-325).

It remains clear that the Christian mentality was novel. Their worship did not take place in the typical spaces used by *pagans or Jews. A testimony to this is the famous passage from the *Letter to Diognetus (5,1ff.), where the author describes Christian worship after having analyzed pagan and Jewish worship. Witnesses to this fact were also the pagans themselves, who particularly accused the Christians of being atheists because they did not possess temples or altars (Arnobius, Adv. nat. 6,1). Christians must not divide themselves into castes. The Christian community does not know of any separation or gradation. The Christian states that the entire creation is holy. The Christian does not build enclosures in contradistinction to the pagans, who were accustomed to distinguish between the holy and the profane.

Nevertheless, in a short amount of time, the sources begin to reflect a change. Terms such as consecrated, which were at first used to refer to the baptized (Irenaeus, Adv. haer. 4,16,1), now designated the buildings for woship constructed by *Constantine (Eus. Caes., De laudibus 17,4); the criticisms that the Christians leveled against the pagans (Arnobius, Adv. nat. 6,1) were completely reversed when *Faustus the Manichean accused the Christians of behaving like pagans (*Aug., Contra Faustum 20,4). The preoccupation became perceptible in Christian preaching (see C. Sotinel) when *Zeno of Verona had to warn his faithful of not falling into the same mindset of the pagans and the Jews with respect to the temple (see Tract. 2,6). In reality, the pagan temptation of defining sacred and profane spaces never left a church that was born amid the religions that were widespread in the empire. Thus, in the writings of such famous figures as Cyprian, one perceives a tendency to restrict, in imitation of the pagan model, the vast semantic field of the liturgical vocabulary of the early Christians (see, e.g., Ep. 76,3). This tendency of superficially Christianizing the pagan structures for worship, or in a different way, of paganizing those structures that had been Christianized, could be facilitated by the turn that took place in the 4th c. in the relations between the state and the Christians. Thus church leaders were able to put the Christian cult in perfect symmetry with the pagan cult with complete tranquility (see Zeno, Tract. 2,7), which was unthinkable during the first three centuries.

Finally, one must not forget the respect in which the so-called temple Christology or indwelling, which was used indistinctly by every type of informed Christian thinker during the first centuries (see P. De Navascués, 307-323), was eventually freed from its possible divisive connotations (*Nestorian). *Cyril of Alexandria, who in the beginning used it, only to then forget it, is a reflection of this approach (F.R. Gahbauer, 370-381). This fact could contribute to the weakening of the dogmatic basis of the liturgical anthropology or the dogmatic basis of the temple. Along the same lines, the doctrine that made of each Christian or of each member of Christ a temple and which, for this reason, excluded any other meaning of the term temple, would thus lose its concreteness. In effect, during the time of Cyril of Alexandria, this line of thought was already receding before the new wave of the construction of temples was completed, something that some scholars consider to be the fruit of the Christian conquest of time and space, or which, at times with greater caution, they consider to be a phenomenon of ambiguous meaning, in the sense that, at the same time in which Christianity was geographically spreading with its temples, in a latent way there spread the ancient temptation of calling profane what God had declared holy. For this reason, from the 4th c. onward, the history of the temple or the places of worship must be seen more from an artistic point of view than from dogmatic reflection.

B.M. Apollonji-Ghetti, Problemi relativi alle origini dell'architettura paleocristiana: IX Congr. Int. di Archeologia Cristiana, Rome 1975; F.R. Gahbauer, Das anthropologische Modell, Würzburg 1984; P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten, Tübingen 1989; A. Provoost, L'implantation des édifices ecclésiastiques d'après les textes littéraires antérieurs à 400 ap. J.-C., in Actes du XI^e Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrétienne, ed. N. Duval, I, Rome 1989, 323-326; C. Sotinel, Locus orationis ou domus Dei? Le témoignage de Zénon de Vérone sur l'évolution des églises (tractatus II,6): SP 29 (1997) 141-147; P. de Navascués, Pablo de Samosata y sus adversarios, Rome 2004.

P. de Navascués

TEMPTATION

I. Temptation in general and the temptation of Jesus - II. Typology of paradise: Christ, the new Adam - III. Typology of the desert: Christ, the true Israel - IV. Temptation and baptism - V. Temptation and passion - VI. Ecclesial dimension of Jesus's temptation.

I. Temptation in general and the temptation of Jesus. With respect to temptation, both the Greek and Latin fathers expressed a collection of reflections that can be schematically summarized in the following manner: (1) Types of temptation coming from the challenges and the troubles of life (emblematic figure: *Job) and temptation coming from affluence and prosperity (figure-type: the rich man in the gospels). Others drew a distinction between internal and external temptations. The most illuminating distinction we find, however, is in *Augustine of Hippo, who speaks of temptation as a "test" and as a "seduction": Alia est tentatio seductionis, alia tentatio probationis (Ep. 205,16). (2) Temptation in relation to God: properly speaking, God does not tempt anyone but "puts one to the test," to test, purify and educate. (3) In relation to the devil: temptation is attributable to him inasmuch as one is incited to evil. This aspect is esp. present in ascetical literature, esp. with respect to monks and hermits (*Athanasius, *Nilus, *Palladius, *Maximus the Confessor, *Jerome and *John Cassian). (4) Behavior in temptation: the following are recommended: courage and patience, prayer and fasting, obedience and prudence (in the sense of not willfully exposing oneself to temptations). (5) Effects: the proper behavior in temptation bears witness to one's love for God, nourishes humility and favors one's progress in the spiritual life.

Alongside this range of generally ascetic-spiritual meanings, the vocabulary of temptation was loaded with a more strictly theological, or historical-salvific, import, which was made explicit with respect to the temptation of Jesus. For this meaning, we will therefore reserve a more extensive treatment. An analysis of the synoptic gospels' account of the temptation, which was connected to the messianic character, will unveil an interweaving of other themes that were strictly connected to the antecedent biblical history (Christ, new *Adam, new Israel, new *Moses), with other mysteries of the life of Jesus (*baptism, passion), and with the life of the Christian community (exemplary and redemptive value of Christ's struggle with the devil). We will examine the patristic interpretation by returning to these themes (the synchronic aspect) and by emphasizing the contributions and the overtones of various authors (the diachronic aspect).

II. Typology of paradise: Christ, the new Adam. The parallelism already present in the writings of *Justin Martyr (Dial. 103) was elaborated in an organic way by *Irenaeus in the framework of "recapitulation" (Adv. haer. V,21). In fact, starting from the threefold temptation of Jesus, he reconstructed a threefold temptation of Adam (V,21,2). The connection between the two events is based on Gen 3:15 and transferred to Christ through Gal 3:19 and 4:4 (V,21,1). According to *Tertullian, Jesus with his fasting "inaugurated the new man in the reproach of the old man" (novum hominem in veteris sugillationem fastidiendi cibi initiabat: De ieiun, 8,2). For *Origen, the devil, moved by jealousy, attempted to make Jesus fall from the dignity of the Son of God using the same tactic employed with the first man (see Fragm. in Lc. 56). *Hilary of Poitiers described the temptations of Jesus on the model of those temptations underwent by Adam (tenens ordinem fraudis antiquae, In Mt. 3,5); he was followed in that respect by *Ambrose of Milan, whose eloquent text we cite: "In the desert Adam, in the desert Christ; he knew in fact where to find a condemned man in order to lead him back to paradise after having delivered him from his error" (Exp. in Lc. 4,7). The comparison between the two Adams, present in the thinking of all the 4th–5th c. Fathers, is esp. elaborated by *Maximus of Turin: "The Savior behaved himself in such a way as to destroy the offenses by following the same tracks [eisdem vestigiis] with which they were committed" (Serm. 51a: CCL 23,202), an idea to which *Gregory the Great alluded: "[The devil] was conquered by the second man with the same methods [eisdem modis] with which he boasted that he had defeated the first man" (In Ev. hom. XVI).

III. Typology of the desert: Christ, the true Israel. The parallelism, in its precise configuration as it is present in Mt, is evoked only incidentally by the Fathers. The first to recall the opposition between the temptation of the people in the desert and that of Jesus was Tertullian, for whom the outcome of the first temptation marked the passage from the ancient carnal people to the authentic representative of the people of God, who "turned back on himself the rebuke which Israel had incurred" (de figura Israelis exprobrationem in ipsum retorsit, Bapt. 20,4). Another similar text is the one in which Tertullian deplored Israel's inability to resist hunger, thus bringing upon itself the punishment of God (Nunquam non per impatientiam delinquendo perierunt, De pat. 5,25). According to Origen, Israel did not fulfill its historical duty by rejecting the true manna, which is the Word of God in which, on the contrary, Jesus found his true nourishment (see Fragm. in Mt. 63). For both authors, Christ in the desert therefore inaugurates the new man, bringing to completion the divine pedagogy disregarded by Israel's experience. To give more stress to absolute faith in God and his Word, both authors eliminated the term alone in Jesus' response, thereby emphasizing the spiritualization of Dt 8:2-3 in light of Wis 16:26. The later Fathers, although appealing to Israel's experience in the desert, did not interpret it in a typological-antithetical sense, but they mentioned it under the miraculous aspect, as a time of prodigious nourishment (manna and meat), a time that Hilary, e.g., referred to as "angelic" (In Mt. 3,1). It seems that one should understand the text of *Maximus of Turin in this manner (Serm. 51), although one could interpret another text from Hilary, in which he spoke of the "resistance to hunger" (patientia esuritionis) by Jesus—most likely depending on the aforementioned text from Tertullian—in a typological-antithetical sense. The miraculous nourishment unanimously recalled the figures of Moses, Elijah, Elisha and the Baptist himself.

IV. Temptation and baptism. The connection between the two events in the life of *Jesus and his disciples was systematically made by all the tradition. The first mention is found in the writings of *Justin Martyr (Dial. 103ff.). But "the most definite ancient testimony that has survived concerning this theme, which was very dear to the meditation of early Christianity" (Steiner, 43), comes to us from the Extracts of Theodotus (85), a *gnostic text where the parallel between the temptations of the gnostic and those of Jesus is closely connected to the rite of baptism. The connection is inferred by Tertullian (Bapt. 20,3) and esp. by Origen, according to whom, after baptism, in which both Jesus and the Christian "break the hammer of the whole earth" (see Jer 50:23), that is, the devil, it is necessary to be ready for a more arduous fight: "You have come to the water of baptism: this is the beginning of the spiritual combat: from this point forward your combat against the devil begins" (Hom. in Iud. 9,2). The devil, Hilary insisted, esp. tempts the "sanctified," that is, the baptized, just as he tempted Jesus after his baptism in the Jordan River: "The Lord therefore was tempted immediately after (statim post) his baptism, indicating with his temptation that the devil's temptations rage esp. when we have been sanctified [in sanctificatis], because, for him, a victory over the saints is desirable" (quia victoria ei est magis exoptata de sanctis, In Mt. 3,1). Likewise for *Cyril of Alexandria, temptations greatly test the Christian because the *Holy Spirit, who has been received, grants one strength for the combat; before baptism, however, it would be impossible to resist the onslaughts of the devil (Ad reginas, 36). *John Chrysostom, in turn, warned the baptized Christian not to become disturbed, as if it were something unexpected, if after baptism one experienced stronger temptations. Rather than become disturbed, resist and endure everything with courage, as if it were something normal. Believers receive weapons not to remain idle but so that they may become aware of having become stronger than steel, and as confirming evidence of the treasure that they have received (baptism). The devil would not assault them if the devil had not perceived that they had been exalted by such an honor (see Com. in Mt. hom. 13). The author of the treatise Opus imp. in Mt follow the same lines: in contradistinction to the catechumen, the baptized person is more exposed to temptations because, having been withdrawn from the devil, the baptized person has become a child of God and, having been anointed as an athlete of the Spirit, the baptized person belongs now to Christ, and like him this person is thrust into the desert to fight and win (Hom. 5).

V. Temptation and passion. This aspect was also seen by the Fathers as referring simultaneously to Christ and the faithful. Sufficiently alluded to in the writings of Justin Martyr (Dial. 125,4-5) but little emphasized by Irenaeus (but see Adv. haer. V,23,2), and only touched on by Tertullian (Scorp. 15,6), the theme comes to prominence in the writings of Origen. The most vigorous text is in his comments on Jer 50:23, which was already mentioned with respect to the baptism: "In that moment [i.e., in the desert] Jesus did not crush but only broke the hammer of all the earth. But when he returned, then . . . it was not only broken but also crushed. And because the hammer of all the earth was first broken, and then crushed, for this reason he was also broken by each one of us when we are introduced into the church and we advance in the faith; he is then crushed by us when we reach perfection" (Hom. in Jer. 20,2). For Origen, the apex of the "perfection" is *martyrdom, the supreme proof that most esp. conforms one to the passion of Christ the Lord. The parallelism between temptation and passion, which was not often discussed in the writings of subsequent Fathers, is alluded to by Ambrose of Milan (In Lc. 35) and is more explicit in Augustine: "Inasmuch as he is a teacher, he desired to be tempted in all things because we have been tempted; he wished to die because we die; he wished to rise, because we will rise" (In Ps. 60 serm. 2; cf., Serm. 284). This idea returns in a virtually identical form in the writings of *Maximus of Turin and *Gregory the Great: "It was fitting that he overcome our temptations with his own temptation, just as he defeated our death with his own death" (In Ev. hom. 16). Last, with a personal touch, we read: "He was led into the desert by the Spirit in order to be baptized in the fire of temptation, just as he would later have to be baptized in the fire of death" (Op. imp. in Mt. hom. 5).

VI. Ecclesial dimension of Jesus's temptation. The exemplary and salvific character of Jesus's temptation, already mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, constitutes the preeminent aspect of the Fathers' reflection. We must confine our examination to the chief witnesses. For Irenaeus, Christ's victory becomes the victory of each Christian. He cites in this regard Lk 10:19, a logion that would be continually repeated by the tradition in the context of the temptation (see Adv. haer. V,24,4). Origen offered a more vibrant portrayal of the paradigmatic and soteriological aspect of Jesus's temptation. Jesus's combat is seen by him in light of the "more authentic" combat that Christ waged in his church: "He was tempted so that even we might conquer thanks to his victory" (Hom. in Lc. 29,3). Athanasius gives us a valuable lesson in the Vita Antonii: what the Lord said and did in the third temptation he said and did for us (37,1-2); he fought in and with Anthony (5,7; 7,1; 10,2-3; 34,1; 41,5-6; 42,2; 91,3). According to *Cyril of Alexandria, the Lord subjected himself to temptation "not because fasting was necessary for him, but to set his deeds before us as a type and model, and to lay out for us the ideal of an excellent and marvelous life" (Com. in Lc. 4). "We have conquered in Christ. . . . Christ, by conquering, has given us the strength to conquer [to dynasthai nikan]" (ibid.). And again: "Christ first conquered for us, so that we might have peace after having trampled and conquered the enemy [see Lk 10:19]. It was necessary that he contend with Satan on our behalf to render us participants in his fullness. . . . Having fallen in Adam, in Christ we conquer" (Ad reginas 36). *Theodore of Mopsuestia famously said: "The Lord, having prevailed over the devil three times, has given us the victory he has accomplished" (Fragm. dogm. ex libro incarn. Filii Dei XIII). Especially rich and stimulating are *John Chrysostom's words on this topic (Com. in Mt. hom. 13; Op. imp. in Mt. hom. 5). With an original approach, *Hilary of Poitiers emphasized the true hunger of Jesus: the salvation of humankind: "He was hungry no longer for the food of human beings but for their salvation" (Non cibum etiam hominum esuriit, sed salutem . . . esuritionem se humanae salutis habiturum: In Mt. 3,2). "The Lord was hungry less for the bread than for the salvation of human beings" (non panem potius quam salutem hominum esuriens: In Mt. 3,3). With clear dependence on Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose stated: "The one who for 40 days was unable to be hungry brought me to understand that he did not at that time desire the nourishment of the body but rather the salvation of mankind" (se non cibum esurisse corporis, sed salutem: In Lc. 4,16). Maximus of Turin insisted on this same point: "For he was hungry not for the food of human beings but for salvation" (Esuriit enim non cibum hominum sed salutem: Serm. 60,4). With respect to the exemplary and salvific character, Ambrose also offers us very delightful points of reflection: "He allowed himself to be tempted by the devil so that all of us would know how to conquer in him" (In Lc. 4,4). "We therefore follow his footsteps so that from the desert we may return to paradise" (ibid. 4,12). "Therefore you too learn how to beat the devil. The Spirit leads you; follow the Spirit" (ibid., 4,24).

The exemplary and soteriological meaning of Jesus's temptation reaches its most theologically profound and stylistically more efficacious expression in the writings of Augustine: "He was the first to be tempted so that we too might not be conquered in temptation. Temptation was in fact not necessary for him: Christ's temptation is our lesson" (tentatio Christi, nostra doctrina: In Ps. 90, serm. 1). "If he had not conquered the tempter, how would you have learned to combat the tempter?" (ibid., serm. 2). But the most expressive text in this regard is in his comments on Ps 60, where the theme is centered on the category of the "whole Christ." We provide here the most significant passage: "Our life in this pilgrimage cannot be absent from tests, and our progress is achieved through temptation. No one can know himself if he is not tempted, nor can one be crowned without having conquered, nor can one conquer without waging combat; the combat presupposes an enemy, a test. . . . The Lord desired to prefigurare us, we who are his body, in the events of that body in which he died, arose and ascended into heaven. In this way, even the members can hope to reach where the head has preceded. He therefore possesses us as those who have been transfigured in himself when he desired to be tempted by Satan. . . . Christ was tempted by Satan, but in Christ you also were tempted. Because Christ took from you his flesh, but from himself he gives you salvation; from you, death; from himself, your life; from you, humiliation; from himself, your glory; from himself, your victory. If we have been tempted in him, it will be precisely in him that we will conquer the devil. You focus your attention on the fact that Christ was tempted: why do you not also consider the fact that he has conquered? It was you who were tempted in him, but recognize that in him you are a conqueror. He could have kept the devil far away from himself, but unless he had allowed himself to be tempted, he would not have taught you to conquer when you are tempted" (En. in Ps. 60,3).

K.P. Köppen, Die Auslegung der Versuchungsgeschichte unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Alten Kirche, Tübingen 1961; M.-F. Berrouard, Le thème de la tentation dans l'oeuvre de saint Augustin: Lumière et vie 10 (1961) 52-87; M. Steiner, La tentation de Jésus dans l'interprétation patristique de saint Justin à Origène, Paris 1962; F.G. Cremer, Die Fastenansage Jesu: Mk 2,20 und Parallelen, in der Sicht der patristischen und scholastischen Exegese, Bonn 1965; G. Leonardi, Le tentazioni di Gesù nella interpretazione patristica: Studia Patavina 15 (1968) 229-262; S. Raponi, Tentazione ed esistenza cristiana. Il racconto sinottico della tentazione di Gesù alla luce della storia della salvezza nella prima letteratura patristica, Rome 1974; Id., Tentazione, Diz. spirit. laici, Milan 1981, 332-333; Id., Cristo tentato e il cristiano. La lezione dei Padri: Studia Moralia 21 (1983) 209-236; J. Doignon, L'Argumentatio d'Hilaire de Poitiers dans l'exemplum de la tentation de Jésus ("In Matthaeum," 3,1-5): VChr 29 (1975) 296-308; J.-L. Chrétien, Nulla tentatio omnis tentatio: Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 60 (1980) 35-51; L. Panier, Récit et commentaires de la Tentation de Jésus au désert: approche sémiotique du discours interprétatif, Paris 1984; H. Crouzel, Diable et démons dans les homélies d'Origène: Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique 95 (1994) 303-331; J.B. Gibson, The Temptations of Jesus in Early Christianity, Sheffield 1995, J. Follon, Réflexions sur les tentations du Christ au désert comparées aux genres de vie distingués par les philosophes de l'Antiquité: Kernos 14 (2001) 133-146.

S. Raponi

TERASIA (ca. 370–409/415). Born in Hispania to a noble and rich family around 370, she died between 409 and 415 at Nola. In ca. 389, Terasia married the young prominent Meropius Pontius *Paulinus, and together they converted to Christianity, receiving baptism that same year at Burdigala (*Bordeaux); soon after, the couple moved to Hispania. In 392 they had a son named Celsus, but he died eight days after he was born and was buried at Complutum near the tomb of the martyrs, as mentioned by Paulinus himself (Carm. XXXI,605-610). After the death of her son Celsus, she along with her husband moved to *Barcelona; there Paulinus was ordained a presbyter by Lampio (394). During the summer of 395 they went together to Nola near the tomb of the martyr *Felix, where they decided to live a form of monasticism by practicing conjugal continence. In 408 she participated along with her husband at the wedding ceremony of Titia and *Julian, the son of Aemilius, the bishop of Benevento, who would then become the famous bishop of Eclanum. A year later, in 409, Paulinus became the bishop of Nola, but from that point onward we do not know anything about Terasia's life. Paulinus survived his wife, dying himself in 431.

Along with Paulinus, Terasia established an epistolary relationship with the African bishops *Augustine (Hippo Regius) and *Alypius (Thagaste), showing themselves to be closely united in Christian marriage and the common search for holiness (Aug., Ep. 31,6), and was praised as a sancta conserva by *Jerome (Ep. 58,6.11).

Gregorius Turonensis, Liber de gloria beatorum confessorum, 110-111 (on pp. 107-108); PL 71, 907-910; PCBE 2, 2190-2192; J. Lienhard, Paulinus of Nola and Early Western Monasticism, Cologne 1977 (with bibl.); P. Courcelle, Les lacunes de la correspondance entre saint Augustin et Paulin de Nole: REAug 53 (1951) 253-300; H. Crouzel, Les échanges littéraires entre Bordeaux et l'Orient au iV^e siècle: Sant Jerôme et ses amis aquitains: Revue Française d'Histoire du Livre (1973) 301-326; J. Desmulliez, Paulin de Nole. Études chronologiques (393-397): RecAug 20 (1985) 35-64; D.E. Trout, The Dates of the Ordination of Paulinus of Bordeaux and of His Departure for Nola: REAug 37 (1991) 237-260; F. Navarro, La correspondencia de Paulino de Nola con África durante los años 394 y 395. Una reconstrucción: Vichiana 1 (1999) 62-81; A. Ruggiero, I rapporti tra Paolino di Nola e Terasia negli scritti di Paolino e nella testimonianza di Ambrogio, Agostino, Girolamo e Gregorio di Tours: Impegno e Dialogo 15 (2002-06) 147-165.

M. Mendoza

TERRASSA (ancient Egara). The archaeological data bear witness to the presence of Christianity starting from the 4th c. The city was promoted to the status of a diocese in 450; around 465, its bishop Irenaeus was irregularly appointed successor of the bishop of *Barcelona, bringing it about that Pope *Hilarius demanded of him an immediate return to Terrassa with the threat of removing him from the episcopal cathedral. In 614 a council of the *Tarraconensis province was celebrated in the city, presided over by the metropolitan Eusebius. Twelve bishops participated and only two were represented by vicars. Its only canon confirms how much was decreed in the Council of *Huesca (598), and it extended to bishops the decrees pertaining to the lower clerics concerning chastity.

Mansilla, Geografía I, 154-156; Hfl-Lecl III, 1, 250; Mansi 10, 532; ES 3, 193-194; Palazzini, 2, 39; Vives, Concilios, 162; Martínez Díez, Hispana I, 119.

P. de Luis

TERTIUM GENUS. This statement was used to designate and distinguish—at the level of belief—Christians from *Jews and *pagans. 1 Pet 2:9 referred to Christians as "a chosen race" (cf. Is 43:20), "God's people," "the object of mercy" (see Hos 1:8-9; 2:1, 23-24) remaining on the terrain of fidelity, with veiled allusions to Israel's deviations. Eph 2:11-22 develops a concept that was not dissimilar with special attention to the former Gentiles, historically saved with Israel forming with them, in one church, one new man (an allusion to *Adam). The text of *Paul's epistle to the Ephesians sets the stage for the establishment and the subsequent evolution of the concept of tertium genus that leads back to one evident reality "Christ, our peace" (Eph 2:14), with obvious allusion to the elimination of relgious conflict between Jews and Gentiles (Eph 2:17) and the unification of the two operative zones ideally occupied and defended by two opposing religious components, namely Jewish and pagan.

The first clear mention was made in the *Martyrdom of Polycarp (3,2): the crowd that awaited in the stadium for the arrival of the bishop remained stunned "before the courage of the holy and pious race [γένος] of the Christians." The term "race" should be taken in a religious sense, as well as in the *Letter to Diognetus I, where it is asked, "Why has this new race come to light now and not earlier?" The title of tertium genus, as specific to the Christians, inasmuch as they are in a situation that is different and distinct from that of the Jews and Gentiles, occurs in the Kerygma of Peter (fr. V) and is closely connected to the new worship of God through Christ and the new covenant. *Clement of Alexandria explains what occurs: "They have been gathered in one sole race of people, which is saved, from the Hellenistic and the legal [Jewish] *paideia. The three peoples are not divided among themselves chronologically because no one thinks of three natures, but they were educated with three different Testaments of the word of one sole Lord, because there is just one Lord" (Strom. VI,5). It is a distinction not at the ethnographic level but at the level of religious ideas (see To Diognetus V-VI). *Aristides (Apol. II) reports the notion and term, but the uncertainty of the textual traditions of his work (i.e., Greek, *Armenian and *Syriac) does not allow us to be precise. According to the Syriac addition of the Apologia, there are four types of races of human beings that are distinguished by religious themes: the barbarians through Cronos and Rhea, the Greeks through Helen, the Jews through *Abraham and the Christians through *Jesus Christ. Although the religious theme is clear for Christians and barbarians, it is not clear for Jews and Greeks. According to Aristides, Christian particularity does not isolate the faithful because Christianity is a universal religion that is immanent to the entire universe (Apol. XV-XVII), and Christians participate in the history of the life of the world (To Diognetus VI,2). *Irenaeus moved along the same lines of the tertium genus (with an eye set on Eph 2:11ff.) with much delicacy and elegance, recalling the salvific project, to which God awaits from the very beginning (Epideixis 8.34). *Tertullian was the first who used the expression tertium genus as an insult for the Christians, an insult that derives from the circus and as a term of exclusion of Christians from society (Scorp. 10; Ad Nation. 1,8,1). For this reason, the author of the Letter to Diognetus and Tertullian held to this in affirming that the Christians were everywhere. But then the expression was accepted to refer to Christians, and it acquired a positive value for indicating the Christian identity, with a new form of life, which occurred through a new birth (Clem. Alex., Strom. 3,70,2; ps.-*Cypr., De pasc. comp. 17: PL 4, 962; ps.-Cypr., De montibus 2).

A. von Harnack, Missione e propagazione del cristianesimo nei primi tre secoli, Turin 1906, 31-52; C. Vona, L'Apologia di Aristide, Rome 1950; P. Batiffol, La Chiesa nascente e il cattolicesimo, Florence 1971, 87-88; Ch. Mohrmann, "Tertium genus," in Études sur le latin des chrétiens, IV, Rome 1977, 195-210; DSp 13, 23-25 (race); H. Inglebert, Les romains chrétiens face à l'histoire de Rome, Histoire, christianisme et romanités en Occident dans l'Antiquité tardive (IIIe-Ve siècles), Paris 1996; RAC 2, 1114-1138 (esp. 1124-1125); J.M. Lieu, The Race of God-Fearers: JTS 46 (1995) 483-501 (also tertium genus); J.W. Hargis, Against the Christians: The Rise of Early Anti-Christian Polemic, New York 1999.

E. Peretto

TERTULLIAN

I. Life and works - II. Teaching and problems.

I. Life and works. There are few pieces of information that we have concerning the life of Tertullian. They derive from a few remarks in his writings and from *Jerome's words in the De viris illustribus 53 (but there are those who have doubts about several pieces of information given by Jerome; for example, Tertullian's priestly ordination). Even the dates of his birth and death remain unknown to us. One can affirm with certainty that his literary activity is to be bracketed between the last years of the 2nd c. and the first decades of the 3rd and that his early writings, which can be dated with certainty, namely the Ad nationes and the Apologeticum (AD 197), reveal a mature spirit, a master of his tools.

Tertullian was a native of *Africa, more specifically, *Carthage, and, according to the information provided by Jerome (op. cit.), he was the son of a proconsular centurion. He, therefore, lived in a geographical area in which Christianity seems to have assumed from the very beginning a special characteristic that was expressed in the spirit of autonomy and at times particularism, a spirit that had deep roots in the fidelity with which the Africans always looked on their origins and their restlessness often shown toward the dominion of *Rome. So Christianity turned out be the catalyzing agent of long-standing impatience in that land and gatherered about itself over the course of time forms of latent resistance to Roman power. It was perhaps no coincidence then that Tertullian protested with a sarcastic tone against the abandonment of the ways and customs that were typically Carthaginian in favor of Roman habits (he did so in a treatise titled De pallio [1,2], which, on the one hand, establishes a true crux for scholars and which, on the other hand, inasmuch as it is in a certain sense an autobiographical work, well represents the enigmatic figure of the one who wrote it). Tertullian worked under the emperors *Septimius Severus (193–211) and Antoninus *Caracalla (211–217), in a period that was critical for Rome because of internal troubles and the external wars. Episodes of violence against the Christians were not lacking (we have information about the death sentences delivered in *Palestine, *Egypt and *Africa, just as, for Africa, one finds evidence in the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis). In 202 the emperor then prohibited Jewish and Christian proselytism (but the information contained in the Historia Augusta,* Aelius Spartianus, Septim. Sev. 17,1, has been regarded by some scholars as inauthentic). Those were very important years for the church, which saw the rise within its own domain figures of great importance: one thinks of Pope *Victor (189–198), Pope *Zephyrinus (199–217) and Pope *Callistus (217–222), among the bishops of Rome; or *Hippolytus of Rome, *Clement of Alexandria and Origen, among the writers in Greek.

Within these coordinates Tertullian lived his life, as was said, in such a way that it is difficult to reconstruct. He was born in the heart of a pagan family and was instructed in the schools of that age; he drew much benefit from his study, which he also subsequently nourished: his writings attest to his exceptional preparation in various fields, from history to philosophy to rhetoric and languages (in addition to Latin, he knew Greek to such an extent that he was able to compose treatises in this language). With respect to law, the identification by some scholars proposed between our author and the jurist bearing the same cognomen, the author of a treatise titled Liber singularis de castrensi peculio, fragments of which have been preserved in the Digest, has once again been rejected in recent years (see R. Martini, Tertulliano giurista, 79ff.). And scholars still debate whether the argumentation found in the Apologeticum is that of a jurist (see J. Gaudemet, Le droit romain, 15ff.) or rather that of an advocate. His passionate and lustful temperament led him as a young man to a dissolute lifestyle (see Ad nat. I, 10,47; Apol. 15,5; De res. 59,3); he had a wife, whom he addressed in the treatise Ad uxorem (1,1); at a time in which it is impossible for us to identify (before 197), he converted to Christianity, after perhaps having been drawn by the example of the *martyrs (see Apol. 50,15; Ad Scap. 5,4). In this way, one comes upon the first Christian author in the Latin language, or—as maintained by some scholars that set *Minucius Felix chronologically before him—one of the earliest, whose works are linked to a distinct personality. (It is well known, in fact, that J. Daniélou esp. [see Les origines du christianisme latin] proposed to identify in a series of ps.-Cyprianic treatises as an expression of an earlier *Jewish-Christian Latin literature, against which Tertullian himself reacted; thus Minucius Felix should be credited with being the first to have assimilated the Christian message to the structures and ways of thinking proper to the Latin West first, followed by Tertullian. This thesis, however, is far from being universally accepted.)

Tertullian's works are often divided according to their content into three categories: (1) apologetic, (2) doctrinal and polemical, and (3) moral and ascetic. This convenient and pedagogically clear division, however, does not actually correspond to the complex features of his literary production. The following list instead follows a chronological criterion: this allows us, among other things, to perceive the author's religious evolution, although raising difficulties where we do not find internal or external criteria that are able to chronologically situate one or the other work. This is the case with the treatise De pallio, the author's polemical and bitter response to those of his fellow citizens who mocked him because he had left the Roman toga to wear the mantle of the philosophers: in its brevity and obscurity, it has at one time been assigned as the first, at another as the last of Tertullian's treatises, or still at others as an intermediary work. The two most well-known apologetic works date to the year 197, the Ad nationes in two books and the Apologeticum, which were directed against the accusations of the pagans toward the new religion; in them, the defense and the illustration of the customs and the Christian teachings alternate in attacking the conduct and beliefs of the Gentiles. The dating of the Ad martyras, a brief but intense exhortation to his fellows to stand courageously in the face of persecution, is uncertain. It has placed at the beginning of 197 or over the course of that same year or in 202/203: in this latter case the recipients could be the martyrs known through another ancient document, namely the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis, a text attributed at times, by the editor, to Tertullian himself (recent research, however, opposes this hypotheses on the basis of linguistic and stylistic observations [see R. Braun, Nouvelles observations, 105ff.]). No less problematic is the dating attributed to the Adversus Iudaeos, which presents itself as the completion of an unfinished debate between a Christian and a Jewish proselyte and which sets forth the chief points of the Jewish–Christian controversy. The work, whose authenticity has been discussed for a long time, has been dated to 200 or, according to other scholars, before 197. The De testimonio animae, an apologetic document in which he makes recourse to the witness of the soul to demonstrate God's existence and the other truths affirmed by Christian doctrine, seems to have been composed shortly before 200. Between ca. 200 and 206 is placed a series of important moral treatises and more specifically De spectaculis (a condemnation of circus games, the stadium and the amphitheater, and a prohibition for Christians to participate in them); De oratione (on prayer and in a special way on the Pater noster); De patientia (on the importance of Christian patientia, for which Jesus is the example); De paenitentia (on first "penance," necessary for receiving baptism, and on the second penance, after the sacrament of initiation, which precedes ecclesiastical reconciliation); De cultu feminarum (on the dress and the ornaments of women and on the necessity for modesty); and Ad uxorem (a sort of spiritual testament in which he urges his wife not to remarry), written in two books. To the same period are added the three other important works: De baptismo, against the Cainite sect (on baptism, on its necessity, its effects, on the invalidity of the baptism administered by heretics), De praescriptione haereticorum (on the right of possessing and therefore interpreting the Sacred *Scriptures, a right reserved not for the heretics, but only for the church, which is its heir, through legitimate transmission, inasmuch as she has received the Scriptures from Christ through the *apostles; on the reasons why the heresies are in error; the term praescriptio was understood by our author in at least two ways: with a specifically legal meaning and with a rhetorical and dialectical meaning), and finally Adversus Hermogenem (a defense of the Christian doctrine of creation against those who, among the *gnostics, regarded matter eternal).

In the treatises composed starting from 207 we find an increasingly clear influence of *Montanism, the Phrygian religious movement that began in the 2nd half of the 2nd c. to which Tertullian wound up adhering. From 207 to 212 there followed numerous texts of a doctrinal and antignostic character: the first four books of Adversus Marcionem (this is a third edition of a work already previously elaborated against *Marcion and his every attempt to separate the God of the OT from the one of the NT), Adversus Valentinianos (an exposition and refutation of the teaching of the *Valentinian gnostics), De anima (with respect to the nature, origin, development and destiny of the soul, which is at the same time a refutation of heretical teachings), De carne Christi (on the incarnation of the Lord), De resurrectione mortuorum (on the second coming of Christ, the salvation of the body, which is destined to rejoin the soul, the demand for the judgment and the necessity of the resurrection), and book 5 of Adversus Marcionem. Within this great doctrinal undertaking, Tertullian seems to want to expound the essential points of the regula fidei* within a framework which has in mind the difficulties and the objections of the heretics and, more generally speaking, the mentality and culture of his age. Other works composed during this season of his literary activity, which was the most intense and fruitful, have a moral and practical character and clearly reveal the Montanist tendencies of the author: this was the case for De exhortatione castitatis (likewise on second marriage, but with a more rigid stance), De virginibus velandis (with respect to the need that virgins wear the veil not only in church but in every public place), De corona (which treats the incompatibility between Christianity and military service) and Scorpiace (or the medicine against the scorpion's sting, that is, every gnostic heresy, in which the value of martyrdom is exalted but is denied to the heretics). Ad Scapulam is somewhat of an open letter, apologetic in nature, addressed to Scapula, the proconsul of Africa, who around 211 began to persecute the Christians. As to the dating of De idolatria (a treatise against every idolatrous practice and against every activity or profession that comes into contact with it), scholars are divided: although many historians believe that it was composed shortly before 212, others propose 197 or the years immediately thereafter.

The third and last period saw Tertullian by that point positioned against the Great Church on the side of the Montanists. Scholars have examined the character of African Montanism with respect to that of *Phrygia; and although some scholars have suspected some differences, others have denied them, identifying the first with the so-called Tertullianist movement (see D. Powell, Tertullianists and Cataphrygians, 33ff.). From 212/213 onward his corpus, therefore, includes De fuga in persecutione (on the inadmissibility of flight during persecution); Adversus Praxean (against patripassian *Praxeas, he sets forth the teaching concerning the Trinity), De monogamia (likewise against second marriage, with more radical and harsh theses), De ieiunio adversus Psychicos (this is a defense of the Montanist practice on fasting and an attack on the psychici, that is, the *Catholics who had been accused of being lax) and De pudicitia, in which the church is denied the right of remitting sins, reserving it solely for "spiritual men," that is to say, the apostles and the prophets; he affirms that some very grave sins (idolatry, fornication and homicide) cannot be forgiven by anyone, and he is astonished at a bishop who, with respect to the last point, has expressed an opposite opinion. Tertullian's religious parabola has reached its end: the controversy that he set in motion is at its peak, so much so that many of the ideas that one reads in his last works are contradicted by the early ones.

Jerome (see De vir. ill. 53) suggests a reason for the African writer's entrance into the world of Montanism that is difficult to verify: the invidia and the contumeliae that the Roman clergy directed toward him in a disagreement the details of which we know nothing about and which, even if it did occur, we can suppose pertained to disciplinary questions; neither should we forget in this respect the resentment that Jerome had toward the Roman clergy. In all likelihood, external circumstances and interior correspondences led Tertullian to adhere to the Montanist movement, allowing him to develop to their extreme consequences an ideal of a rigid life, that is, a life without compromise toward which he always had a strong propensity; this facet was certainly favored by Tertullian's understanding of the moral life: his ascetic and rigorist spirit was permeated by notions of justice, retribution, fear, as well as hope, but it was not always sufficiently inspired by love. In this sense, Montanism only accelerated a process that had begun much earlier, a process that had emerged from his deep personal experience as a human being.

With De pudicitia, one of his last works (217–222), all trace of Tertullian is lost. *Cyprian bishop of *Carthage (d. 258) knew of his works but does not mention him by name. Jerome, covering himself behind a prudent "it is said," reports that Tertullian lived to an old age. Finally, *Augustine (De haeres. 86) affirms that Tertullian quickly fell into conflict with the Montanists and gave birth to his own conventiculae that existed at Carthage during his own time; indeed, Augustine's work contributed toward reconciling them with the church.

Among the lost works, one could mention De spe fidelium, De paradiso, Adversus Apelleiacos (against the followers of *Apelles, a disciple of *Marcion), De censu animae (on the soul's origin against Hermogenes), De fato, Ad amicum philosophum (on the difficulties of married life), and De ecstasi, in seven books (in defense of Montanism, against the church and the Asiatic bishop *Apollonius). The following titles are among the inauthentic writings that have been attributed to him by the tradition: Adversus omnes haereses, De execrandis gentium diis, the poem in five books titled Carmen adversus Marcionem, Carmen ad Flavium Felicem de resurrectione mortuorum et de iudicio Domini*, and other minor works.

II. Teaching and problems. Tertullian's surviving works are so numerous that it would seem sufficient to give the man and the writer himself a definite interpretation, but this is not the case. The complexity of his texts accompany the enigma of his personal life, when, after having delineated individual treatises with patience, scholars try to understand them in their totality. There is no question about Tertullian's historical importance for understanding the time in which he lived, just as there is no question that he made a very noteworthy contribution to the formation of Western Christian theological teaching. With respect to the articles of the regula fidei, formulated many times (see De praescr. haer. 13,1-6; De virg. vel. 1,3; Adv. Prax. 2,1), one perceives his most relevant doctrinal importance begins with his trinitarian theology. He was the first to speak of the trinitas unius divinitatis, Pater et Filius et Spiritus sanctus (De pud. 21,16); he was the first to use the Latin term persona in a theological sense: persona . . . quia iam adhaerebat illi Filius secunda persona, sermo ipsius et tertia, Spiritus in sermone, ideo pluraliter pronuntiavit "faciamus" et "nostram" et "nobis"; alium quomodo accipere debeas iam professus sum, personae, non substantiae nomine, ad distinctionem, non ad divisionem, Adv. Prax. 12,3 and 6). He was the first to elaborate the formula of the dogma: one sole substance in three persons, even if it carries with it a certain subordinationist influence. With respect to *Christology, to him is owed the affirmation of two "substances" in one sole person: Videmus duplicem statum, non confusum sed coniunctum in una persona, Deum et hominem Iesum—de Christo autem differo—et adeo salva est utriusque proprietas substantiae (Adv. Prax. 27,11).

These and many other expressions are of great interest which, however, in order to be fully understood, must be on the one hand inserted in the context of the works that belong to him and, on the other, considered in light of a historically rigorous terminological study (see R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, 141ff.). In this way, one can perceive the birth of a systematic theological reflection in a particular work on the early Christian teaching on the Trinity on the pages pertaining to Tertullian (see J. Moingt, Théologie Trinitaire, I, 8ff.), without for this reason having to believe that Tertullian was the founder of Western theology, given the fact that his thought borrowed from more than one source, which he also developed and articulated with an even greater synthesis. An analogous discussion can be had for the conception that he gave of the church, which is called "mother" throughout the entire course of his work, even during the Montanist period (see Ad mart. 1,1; De orat. 2,6; Bapt. 20,5: De pud. 5,14, etc.). For different aspects of this it is noteworthy to follow the way in which the idea of the church, at first along the lines of the preceding tradition, of which Irenaeus was also an interpreter, reflects, in the last period, the perspective of Montanism. However, it is interesting to point out the character of his eschatological teaching that was marked, in a special way in some of his treatises, by a clear opposition to gnostic interpretations (one thinks of the defense of the material element of the human being, the reasons used to prove the resurrection of the flesh etc.), which required him to develop an anthropology established on the account given in the book of Genesis. On other points, the content of his documents also appears relevant to understand trends in the Christian communities of that time: on the Eucharist, Roman primacy, traducianism, penance, *Mary's virginity, which—in order to oppose *Docetism—he denied in partu and post partum, according to H. Koch, Virgo Eva; but more recent studies (E. dal Covolo, Riferimenti mariologici, 121ff.) have emphasized the necessity of understanding that his ideas about this topic were more nuanced. Tertullian is, therefore, an originator and a witness to a milieu and an epoch; and much is known about his life and thought; nevertheless, scholarship, which in recent decades has dedicated to him an impressive number of studies, is far from unanimous in delineating his personality. If one could overlap, like photographic negatives, the different portraits that scholars have made of the African writer, one would only see a few clear common features, with respect to many others that do not coincide, so that in the end it would be difficult to easily identify the subject (see J.-C. Fredouille, Tertullien, 17).

One can usefully identify at least three areas around which the most lively discussions in recent decades have taken place. The first concerns Tertullian's attitude toward the res publica and pagan society. It has often been affirmed that he is one of the most rigid and inflexible representatives of the position that considers Christianity irreconcilable with the saeculum (Ch. Guignebert: other names could easily be added to those mentioned here, which are given solely as an example); it has been said that he maintained the separation of Christians from the romanitas, because between the believer and those who surround him there can be no bond of solidarity (Ch.N. Cochrane); consequently, some scholars have perceived in his character a revolutionary mindset established on apocalyptic hopes, which was dominated by the exaltation of martyrdom, such that it made him desire the overthrow of the society of that time (W.H.C. Frend). A far more nuanced position is held by other scholars (J.M. Hornus, W. Rordorf), which nevertheless is denied by others, on the basis of a contrary thesis, namely that Tertullian is a representative of a line of thought aimed at preparing the harmonious understanding between Christianity and Roman civitas (R. Klein).

Another area that has provided material for much debate pertains to the author's attitude toward ancient philosophy and reason itself. Some scholars have maintained that he radically opposed philosophy and that his antiphilosophism was the source of his most famous formulas when it developed into an antirationalism that rejected philosophy per se and not merely certain systems or certain philosophers of his time. In short, he exhibited a substantial mistrust that appears in the opposition between the irrational truth of the gospel and the rational "truths" discovered by the human mind (C.G. Jung, A. Labhardt). Others have reached differnet conclusions. Departing from the passages called on in support of his antirationalism (see, e.g., De carn. Chr. 5,4; De praescr. haer. 7,9), the problem is reframed by making reference to other pieces of information that seem essential for his understanding, esp. in a historical literary perspective (Decarié, Siniscalco, Ayers and Sider). In fact, on the one hand, it permits a better understanding of Tertullian's confrontation with heretics and pagan philosophers, inasmuch as they professed theories that contributed to the elaboration of heretical speculations, and, on the other hand, it avoids ignoring the antiphilosophical tradition that was much earlier than his (see J.-C. Fredouille: REAug 26 [1980] 327). This makes it possible to explain Tertullian's arguments against philosophy (see J.-C. Fredouille, Tertullien, 337ff.) while at the same time not being surprised by his use of philosophical concepts to construct his theology (R. Braun, J. Moingt).

A third area, finally, namely the linguistic and literary sphere, has proven to be the most fruitful in terms of results and the most suitable in supplying useful interpretive keys (including the writer's attitude toward philosophy and reason). Alongside the original elements—present in large number in his work—the strength of the literary tradition has put in evidence not only his use of the virtutes dicendi or taste imposed by the Second Sophistic movement, but also in the elaboration of the structure of his writings, his search for argumentative tools that were proper to the philosophical logic that was dear to the ancients. In particular, the study of his work, in light of *rhetoric (with respect to elocutio and, esp., the dispositio and the inventio in a speech), has contributed to better individuating the various rhetorical features of Tertullian's writing (P. Siniscalco, Ricerche, 77ff.; R.D. Sider, Ancient Rhetoric; J.-C. Fredouille, Tertullien, 29ff.). A separate chapter of great interest and use is established by the language employed by Tertullian, who is no longer considered the creator of Christian *Latin but rather the creator of theological Latin inasmuch as it was a structured language (see R. Braun, Deus christianorum, 10ff.; 687-688; Puente Sandidrián, 106ff.).

In the past two decades research on Tertullian has continued to multiply. To deal with it in general and necessarily approximate terms, one could say that the aforementioned topics have remained at the center of interest: if , however, the theme of the relationship between faith and reason, and more generally that of Tertullian and ancient culture, enjoys less attention (but see J.-C. Fredouille, 1982; F.-R. Doumas, 1995; A. Dihle, 1995; E. Osborn, 1997, C. Moreschini, 1999), the same cannot be said with respect to Tertullian and his position toward the empire. Scholars have continued to devote their attention to this topic (J.-C. Fredouille, 1984; R. Braun, 1990; A.Z. Ahondopke, 1991-92), broadening at times their look at the society of that time (G. Schöllgen, 1984), pagan religion (E. Heck, 1987), culture (H. Steiner, 1989) and military service (H.C. Brennecke, 1997, etc.). Moreover, a considerable number of studies have considered the linguistic, rhetorical, exegetical and literary sphere pertaining to Tertullian's works (J.-C. Fredouille, 1984 and 1992; P.A. Gramaglia, 1985; P. Puente Santidrián, 1987; P. Siniscalco, 1987; Ch. Munier, 1989; P. Raiskila, 1990; C.J. Classen, 1992; M.-L. Costantini, 1994; J.C.M. Van Winden, 1995; D. Rankin, 1995; R. Uglione, 1995; M. Kooreman, 1995; V. Ugenti, 1995; F. Chapot, 1996; R. Braun, 1997; H. Quellet, 1997; I. Cadoppi, 1996; M. Wellstein, 1999, etc.). Aside from the general presentations of Tertullian—one need only recall the volume written by T.D. Barnes, 1985—we must emphasize just two other types of contribution that have proven to be fruitful: the first pertains to the doctrines delineated by Tertullian's very extensive and complex work (B.J. Hilberath, 1986, on the concept of "person"; A. Viciano, 1986, P. Mattei, 1986, on divorce; C. Tibiletti, 1988, on the soul's lot after death; E. Lamirande, 1989, on marriage; P. Siniscalco, 1992 and 2000, on eschatology; G. Hébert, 1993, on his history of theology; D. Rankin, 1995, on the church; E. Osborn, 1995, on the concordia oppositorum in Tertullian's theology; G. Uríbarri Bilbao, 1996, on the divine "monarchy" and the Trinity pp. 141-227; C. Moreschini, 1997; E. Rossin, 1997, on the salvation of the "flesh"; P. Mattei, 2000, on ecclesiology; R. Kearsley, 1998, on God's power; J. Alexandre, 2001 and J. Leal, 2001, on anthropology; P. Mattei, 2001, on the conception of the human being as the "image" of God; W. Bähnk, 2001, on the theology of martyrdom, etc.).

The second type of research, among others, that for reasons of space can barely be mentioned here, pertains to Tertullian's individual works: in the last 20 years their number has become truly daunting: these are editions of his works that are most often supplied with introductions, critical text, commentary and translation in modern languages; or annotated translations with an introduction; or studies of individual works or articles on textual scholarship; or notes on individual passages. In the bibliography that follows, some of these publications have been listed. From the entirety of the recent bibliography there emerge, therefore, certain data of noteworthy importance on Tertullian's personality, alongside other more nuanced and ambivalent points. In any case, he enjoys a place of noteworthy importance in the history of the world, which by his lifetime was on the cusp of *Late Antiquity. His debt toward earlier pagan and Christian authors is clear (and among these latter it is opportune to mention esp. *Irenaeus); nevertheless, he was original and highly personal, as shown by his attempt to harmonize not only pagan culture with respect to certain elements in it (e.g., philosophical, legal, rhetorical, linguistic etc.) with the Christian faith, but also to reach new results, even if at times they were imperfect and unsatisfying. For a long time now, on the basis of an established analysis of the texts, it is no longer possible to accept the image of Tertullian that often occurs in modern manuals, namely that he was a man and writer bent on demonstrating the irreconcilability between Christianity and the pagan world. His person and his writings, one could say, are more coherent and, at any rate, more complex than previously thought.

For an update on Tertullian, the Chronica Tertullianea (et Cyprianea), which is published each year by the REAug, has proven and continues to prove useful, not only for the bibliographic entries but also for the notes and assessments for each title. In this respect, one should note that in 1999 a volume of more than 640 pages was released that collected the Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea from 1975, the year of its beginning, to 1994. The subtitle of the volume—published at Paris by the Institut d'Études Augustiniennes, by R. Braun - F. Chapot - S. Deléani - F. Dolbeau - J.-C. Fredouille—well reflects its contents: Bibliographie critique de la première littérature latine chrétienne. It presents, along with supplements of the publications, a selection of reviews (limited to the editions, translations and commentaries on the works) and "tables" (indexes of modern authors, names, words, subject matter etc.), which turn out to be very valuable if not indispensable for those who study Tertullian's life and works and, in a broader sense, for historians of early Latin literature and Late Antiquity.

CPL 1-36; PL 1-2; PLS 1, 29-32; CSEL 20, 47, 69, 70, 76; CCL 1-2; G. Claesson, Index Tertullianeus, 3 vols., Paris 1974-75. Given the breadth of numerous editions, commentaries, translations and modern languages of each individual work and critical studies, this entry has set limits by providing information that pertains to the tools that collect important information with respect to the aforementioned topics, although adding some information with special regard for the publications that appeared after the first edition of this encyclopedia (i.e., 1984). See Bibliographia selecta, in CCL 1, pp. XII-XIV (up to 1954); the Index bibliographicus, in R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, 2nd ed. , 596-598 (up to 1976). As was said above, since 1975 the REAug has annually published a nearly exhaustive bibliographic review, one section of which is dedicated to the editions and another to the translations. A useful index, which allows one to track down with ease the critical editions, translations and discussions on specific texts, concordances etc., is found in the aforementioned Chronica Tertullianea et Cyprianea. Bibliographie critique de la première littérature latine chrétienne, that collects titles from 1975 to 1994, pp. 621-627, s.v. Tertullien. Numerous general references to editions, translations and studies in BBKL 11, 700-720.

Critical editions of some particular works (which in the majority of cases have been translated into modern languages, commented on and prefaced with introductions): Ad Martyras: A. Quacquarelli, Rome-Parigi-Tournai-New York 1963; Ad nationes: J. Borleffs, Leiden 1929; A. Schneider (I), Inst. Suisse de Rome 1968; Ad uxorem: Ch. Munier, SC 273, Paris 1980; Adv. Herm.: F. Chapot, SC 439, Paris 1999; Adv. Iudaeos: H. Tränkle, Wiesbaden 1964; Adv. Marcionem: C. Moreschini, Milan 1971; books I and II: R. Braun, SC 365 (book I), SC 368 (book II), Paris 1991; R. Braun, SC 399 (book III); R. Braun, SC 456 (book IV), Paris 2000; De baptismo: B. Luiselli, Turin ²1968; R.-F. Refoulé - M. Drouzy, SC 35, repr. Paris 2002; Adv. Praxean: G. Scarpat, Turin 1985; Adv. Valentinianos: J.-C. Fredouille, SC 280, (vol. I), Paris 1980; vol. II, Paris 1981; Apologeticum: J.P. Waltzing, Paris 1929; J. Martin, Bonn 1933; De anima: J.H. Waszing, Amsterdam 1947; De carne Christi: J.-P. Mahé, SC 216 and 217, Paris 1975; De corona: G. Marra, Turin ²1951; J. Fontaine, Paris 1966; F. Ruggiero, Milan 1992; De cultu foem.: G. Marra, Turin ²1951; M. Turcan, SC 173, Paris 1971; S. Isetta, Florence 1986; De exhort. castitatis: C. Moreschini - J.-C. Fredouille, SC 319, Paris 1985; De idololatria: J.C.M. van Winden, Leiden 1987; De monogamia: P. Mattei, SC 343, Paris 1988; De oratione: G.F. Diercks, Bussum 1947; De paenitentia: G. Rauschen, Bonn 1915; Ch. Munier, SC 316, Paris 1984; De pallio: G. Marra, Turin 1932; A. Gerlo, Wetteren 1940; S. Costanza, Naples 1968; De patientia: J.-C. Fredouille, SC 310, Paris 1984; De paenitentia: E. Preuschen, Tübingen ²1910; G. Rauschen, Bonn 1915; Ch. Munier, SC 316, Paris 1984; De praescriptione haeretic.: J. Martin, Bonn 1930; R.-F. Refoulé - P. de Labriolle, SC 46, Paris 1957; De pudicitia: E. Preuschen, Tübingen ²1910; G. Rauschen, Bonn 1915; C. Micaelli - Ch. Munier, SC 394-395, Paris 1993; De spectaculis: E. Castorina, Florence 1961; De testimonio animae: C. Tibiletti, Florence 1984; De virginibus velandis: P. Mattei - E. Schulz Flügel, SC 424, Paris 1997; Scorpiace: G. Azzali Bernardelli, Florence 1990.

The critical biography is extensive: in addition to CCL 1, pp. XV-XXV and R. Braun, Deus Christianorum, 599-623, 726-732, see J. Quasten, Patrologia, Turin 1967, 494ff.; B. Altaner - A. Stuiber, Patrologie, Freiburg i. Br. 81978, 118ff. and 149-150. Here it will be sufficient to mention a few of them, referring, even if not exclusively, to the portion of works used in the editing of this entry: C. Guignebert, T. Études sur les sentiments à l'égard de l'Empire et de la société civile, Paris 1901; P. Monceaux, Histoire littéraire de l'Afrique chrétienne, t. I, Paris 1901; A. D'Alès, La théologie de T., Paris 1905; C.G. Jung, Psychologische Typen, Zürich 1921; R. Roberts, The Theology of T., London 1924; J. Lortz, T. als Apologet, 2 vols., Münster 1927; J. Morgan, The Importance of T. in the Development of Christian Dogma, London 1928; C.L. Shortt, The Influence of Philosophy on the Mind of T., London 1933; Ch.N. Cochrane, Christianity and Classical Culture, New York 1940; A. Labhardt, T. et la philosophie ou la recherche d'une "position pure": MH 7 (1950) 159-180; B. Nisters, T. Seine Persönlichkeit und seine Schicksal, Münster 1950; F. Refoulé, T. et la philosophie: RSR 30 (1956) 42-45; H. Finé, Die Terminologie der Jenseitsvorstellungen, Bonn 1958; J.M. Hornus, Évangile et Labarum. Étude sur l'aptitude du christianisme primitif devant les problèmes de l'État, de la guerre et de la violence, Geneva 1960 (rev. Eng. ed. , Scottdale, PA-Kitchener [Ontario] 1980); P. Siniscalco, Il motivo razionale della resurrezione in due passi di T. (Apol. 48,4; De res. 14,3 ss.): AAT 95 (1960–61) 195-221; V. Decarié, Le paradoxe de T.: VChr 15 (1961) 23-31; W.H.C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford 1965; J. Moingt, Théologie Trinitaire de T. Histoire, Doctrine, Méthodes, 4 vols., Paris 1966-69; P. Siniscalco, Ricerche sul "De resurrectione" di T., Rome 1966; R. Klein, T. und das römische Reich, Heidelberg 1968; W. Rordorf, T.s Beurteilung des Soldatenstandes: VChr 23 (1969) 105-141; T.D. Barnes, T. A Historical and Literary Study, Oxford 1971; R.D. Sider, Ancient Rhetoric and the Art of T., Oxford 1971; R. Martini, T. giurista e T. padre della Chiesa: SDHI 41 (1975) 79-124; J.C. Fredouille, T. et la conversion de la culture antique, Paris 1972; D. Powell, Tertullianists and Cataphrygians: VChr 29 (1975) 33-54; R. Braun, Deus Christianorum. Recherches sur le vocabulaire doctrinal de T., Paris ²1977; J. Daniélou, Les origines du christianisme latin, Paris 1978; J. Gaudemet, Le droit romain dans la littérature chrétienne occidentale du IIIᵉ au Vᵉ siècle, Milan 1978, 15ff.; R.H. Ayers, Language, Logic and Reason in the Church Fathers: A Study of T., Augustine and Aquinas, Hildesheim-New York 1979; R. Braun, Nouvelles observations sur le rédacteur de la "Passio Perpetuae": VChr 33 (1979) 105-117; P. Puente Santidrián, T. y el latín cristiano. Revisión de las diversas posiciones: Durius 6 (1978) 93-115; R.D. Sider, Credo quia absurdum?: Class. World 73 (1980) 417-419; S. Vicastillo, T. y la muerte del hombre, Madrid 1980; J.-C. Fredouille, Tertullien et la culture antique, in Mélanges E. Gareau, Ottawa 1982; Q. Quispel, African Christianity before Minucius Felix and T., in Studies in honour of H.L.W. Nelson, Talen 1982, 257-335; J.-C. Fredouille, Argumentation et rhétorique dans le 'De corona' de T.: MH 41 (1984) 96-116; Id., T. et l'Empire: RecAug 19 (1984) 111-131; G. Schöllgen, Ecclesia sordida. Zur Frage der sozialen Schichtung frühchristlicher Gemeinden am Beipsiel Karthagos zur Zeit T.s (JbAC, Ergänzungsb., 12), Münster 1984; T.D. Barnes, T. A Historical and Literary Study, Oxford 1985; P.A. Gramaglia, Il linguaggio eresiologico in T. L'approccio cattolico all'eresia: Augustinianum 25 (1985) 667-710; B.J. Hilberath, Der Personbegriff der Trinitätstheologie in Rückfrage von Karl Rahner zu T.s 'Adversus Praxean,' Innsbruck-Vienna 1986; A. Viciano, Cristo Salvador y Liberator del hombre. Estudio sobre la soteriología de T., Pamplona 1986; P. Mattei, Le divorce chez T. Examen de la question à la lumière des développements que le 'De monogamia' consacre à ce sujet: RSR 60 (1986) 208-234; P. Puente Santidrián, La terminología de la resurrección en T. con un excursus comparativo de esta con la correspondente en Minucio Felix, Burgos 1987; P. Siniscalco, Appunti sulla terminologia esegetica di T., in La terminologia esegetica nell'antichità, Bari 1987, 103-122; P. Petitmengin, Recherches sur le citations d'Isaïe chez T., in Recherches sur l'histoire de la Bible latine, Louvain-la-Neuve 1987, 21-41; C. Tibiletti, Le anime dopo la morte: stato intermedio o visione di Dio? (dalla patristica al sec. XIV): Augustinianum 28 (1988) 631-659; E. Lamirande, T. et le marriage. Quand un moraliste s'adresse à son épouse: Église et Théologie 20 (1989) 47-75; H. Steiner, Das Verhältnis T.s zur antiken Paideia, St. Ottilien 1989; P. Raiskila, Periphrastic Use of 'habere' in T., in Latin vulgaire - latin tardif. II. Actes du II[e] Colloque int. sur le latin vulgaire e tardif, Tübingen 1990, 209-217; R. Braun, Christianisme et pouvoir impérial d'après T. - Aspects de l'oeuvre de T., Toulouse 1990 (now in R. Braun, Approches de T. Vingt-six études sur l'auteur et l'oeuvre [1955-1990], Paris 1992); A.Z. Ahondopke, La vision de Rome chez T., (thèse de doctorat), Besançon 1991-92; J.-C. Fredouille, Langue philosophique et théologie d'expression latine (II[e]-III[e] siècle), in La langue latine, langue de philosophie, École française de Rome, Rome 1992, 187-199; C.J. Classen, Der Stil T.s. Beobachtungen zum 'Apologeticum': Voces 3 (1992) 93-107; P. Siniscalco, Argomentazioni escatologiche e pubblico in alcune opere di T., in De T. aux Mozarabes. Mélanges offerts à Jacques Fontaine, t. I, Paris 1992, 393-402; G. Hébert, T. une philosophie de l'histoire, in Penser la foi. Recherches en théologie aujourd'hui. Mélanges offerts à Joseph Moingt, Paris 1993, 413-423; M.-L. Costantini, Le terme 'caro' dans le 'De carne Christi' de T. Essai d'interprétation structuraliste et intersubjective, in Nomina rerum. Hommage à Jacqueline Manessy-Guitton, Nice 1994, 133-150; J.C.M. Winden, The Adverbial Use of 'cum maxime' in T.: VChr 49 (1995) 209-214; D. Rankin, T.'s Use of the Word 'potestas': JRH 19 (1995) 1-9; R. Uglione, Gli 'hapax' tertullianei di matrice fonica: BBStudLat 25 (1995) 529-541; V. Ugenti, Norme prosodiche delle clausole metriche nel 'De idololatria' di T.: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 241-258; F.-R. Doumas, Les attitudes de T. devant la philosophie et les philosophes. Études chronologiques, Lyon 1995; D. Rankin, T. and the Church, Cambridge 1995; A. Dihle, T.s Lehre vom zweifachen Willen Gottes, in Panchaia. FS f. Klaus Thraedde, Münster (Westf.) 1995, 61-65; E. Osborn, The Conflict of Opposites in the Theology of T.: Augustinianum 35 (1995) 623-639; F. Chapot, La préverbation en 'prae' chez T.: RechAug 29 (1996) 75-89; G. Uríbarri Bilbao, Monarquía y Trinidad. El concepto teológico 'monarchia' en la controversia 'monarchiana,' Madrid 1996; E. Osborn, T., First Theologian of the West, Cambridge 1997; D. Rankin, Was T. a Jurist?: SP 31 (1997) 335-342; H.C. Brennecke, 'An fidelis ad militiam converti possit?' (T., 'De idololatria' 19, 1). Frühchristliche Bekenntnis und Militärdienst im Wiederspruch?, in Die Weltlichkeit des Glaubens in der alte Kirche. FS f. U. Wickert, Berlin 1997, 45-100; C. Moreschini, T. e la salvezza della carne, in Liturgia e incarnazione, ed. A.N. Terrin, Padova 1997, 93-111; E. Rossin, 'Caro cardo salutis'. Una promessa di salvezza a partire dalla 'carne' di T., in Liturgia e incarnazione, cit., 113-164; R. Kearsley, T.'s Theology of the Divine Power, Carlisle-Edinburgh 1998; M. Wellstein, Nova verba in T.s Schriften gegen Häretiker aus montanistischer Zeit, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1999; P. Mattei, L'ecclésiologie de T. Bilan provisoire, in Anthropos laikos. Mélanges A. Faivre, ed. M.A. Vanner - O. Wermelinger - G. Wurst, Fribourg (CH) 2000, 162-178; P. Siniscalco, L'escatologia in T. tra rivelazione scritturale e dati razionali, 'psicologici,' naturali: Annali di storia dell'esegesi 17/1 (2000) 73-89; J. Alexandre, Une chair pour la gloire, L'anthropologie réaliste e mystique de T., Paris 2001; J. Leal, La antropología de T. Estudio de los tratados polémicos de los años 207–212 d.C., Rome 2001; P. Mattei, 'Angelus ad imaginem'? L'anthropologie de T.: vue d'ensemble et nouveaux aperçus par le biais de son angélologie (avec une note sur Novatien): Augustinianum 41 (2001) 291-327; W. Bähnk, Von der Notwendigkeit des Leidens. Die Theologie des Martyriums bei T., Göttingen 2001; G. Dunn, T., London 2004.

P. Siniscalco

TERTULLIANISTS. The idea that the Tertullianists were simply African *Montanists has been criticized by T.D. Barnes. The information that we have about *Tertullian's followers is limited to a few words in two treatises: *Augustine's De haeresibus (428–429) and the Praedestinatus, a work that is difficult to date and whose author is difficult to identify (it was probably written around 435 by *Arnobius).

Augustine tells us that Tertullian had doctrinal successors whose enthusiasm had waned slowly over time, and that a few had remained at *Carthage. They reentered the mainstream church, even handing over their basilica. The chief characteristic of their teaching was the corporality of the soul, which was also reflected in their corporeal conception of God. They understood the corporality of the soul as its existence. Augustine affirms that that teaching did not necessarily mean that they had on that point fallen into heresy. It was, instead, a step toward the sect of the Cataphrygas, united to an attitude hostile toward second marriage. They subsequently separated also from this group and began their own gatherings (conventicula). According to this testimony, Tertullian had also stated that the souls of wicked human beings change into demons after death, although in Tertullian's extant works, one does not find this claim.

The Praedestinatus, in turn, informs us that the Tertullianists were condemned by Pope *Soter (166 and 174) and also tells the story of a certain Octaviana, who had acted together with a Tertullianist presbyter who affirmed that the saints Processus and Martinianus were also Phryges. Under the emperor *Theodosius (379–395), this presbyter fled, and no one ever heard anything about him after. According to this document, the entrance of the Tertullianists into the Catholic Church was owed to Augustine's credit.

The close analysis done by Powell completes the framework of the Tertullianists. They had prayer meetings outside, adding such things to the usual ceremonies of the church because they did not constitute (at least when Tertullian was alive) a schismatic group but an ecclesiola in Ecclesia. In fact, the Tertullianists' differences with the Montanists are very apparent: they neither rejected the *Eucharist nor did they remain separate from Catholics in the assemblies. *Cyprian would not have been able to consider Tertullian his teacher (according to *Jerome's testimony) if he or the Tertullianists were notoriously schismatic. For the same reason we do not have evidence of the moment at which the Tertullianists became a schismatic movement, as they had become by the time of Augustine. They were initially associated with the new prophecy because the name of *Montanism arose only in the 4th c., and, along with the terminological aspect, one must emphasize that the development of the new prophecy in Montanism was only a geographical phenomenon, which caused it to evolve into the *Cataphrygian sect. Its condemnation did not have a bearing on the Tertullianists, who remained circumscribed to the West. Labriolle correctly affirmed that the Tertullianists wanted to be distinguished from the Cataphrygian sect, and Massingberd-Ford observed that Tertullian's Montanism was different from the new prophecy. If the Tertullianists initially remained within the Catholic Church, they certainly did so by remaining moderate in their disposition, seeking to revitalize the church from within.

Augustine, De Haeresibus LXXXVI; Arnobius, Praedestinatus, I.86; P. De Labriolle, La Crise Montaniste, Fribourg-Paris 1913; J. Massingberd-Ford, Was Montanism a Jewish-Christian Heresy?: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 17 (1966) 145-158; T.D. Barnes, Tertullian: A Historical and Literary Study, Oxford 1971; D. Powell, Tertullianists and Cataphrygians: VChr 29 (1975) 33-54.

J. Leal

TESTAMENTS of the TWELVE PATRIARCHS. *Jewish-Christian apocryphal text. The Testaments constitutes one of the most interesting Jewish works of *Late Antiquity. It was written on the inspiration of Jacob's blessing (Gen 49:1-27); the text's message is directed toward all the people. It consists of the testaments of the 12 sons of Jacob: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Zebulon, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Joseph and Benjamin. The work contains 12 units composed according to the same schema: the autobiography of a patriarch (hagiographic midrash), then a parenesis based on the elements of the preceding autobiography with an exhortation to faithfulness to the law of the Lord and preparation for difficult times, and, lastly, an eschatological-messianic or historical emphasis. The pivotal Testament is that of Joseph, although that of Levi is the most important (thus emphasizing the role of his line); that of Benjamin finishes the collection. The text contains interesting pieces of information on morality (love for God and neighbor) and Jewish messianism. It is difficult to identify the location of this work's composition. The text was probably composed in a Hebrew milieu, but there also exists The Testament of Judah and that of Naphtali in late Hebrew in a different version; moreover, there exist fragments in Aramean of The Testament of Levi, which were discovered at *Qumran and Cairo Genizah (i.e., storage-depository room in a Jewish synagogue or cemetery) and the other patriarchs discovered at Qumran, but these also come from a different version. The entire work exists in two versions, *Greek and *Armenian; moreover, there also exist *Syriac and *Paleoslavonic versions. The work was probably written in the 2nd c. BC, then redacted in the 1st c. and finally Christianized in the 2nd c. AD perhaps in Palestine. Another hypothesis suggests that it had an Alexandrian or Syrian provenance. The text was known to Christian authors but was rarely cited (e.g., *Irenaeus, *Origen and *Jerome); it is cited in the lists of apocryphal books: Nicephorus's Stichometria (13th c.), ps.-Athanasius Synopsis and by other authors; in the 13th c. it was translated into Latin by Robert Grosseteste (d. 1253).

Alongside the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs there exist many other testaments ascribed to single individuals (e.g., *Abraham, Isaac, *James, *Job, *Moses, *Solomon, *Adam, Qehat and Amran); this phenomenon reveals the existence of the literary genre of the "testaments," which was popular in the Jewish world of this era.

CAVT 118; BHG 2358-2360. Greek text: M. de Jonge, Leiden 1978; ed. of the Armenian text begun by M.E. Stone (Testament of Levi, Jerusalem 1969); ed. of the Slavonic texts in the collection of the apocrypha made by the following scholars: N.S. Tichonravov, N.A. Pypin, I. Franko, I.Y. Porfir'ev, J. Becker, Untersuchungen zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen, Leiden 1970; H.D. Singerland, Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Missoula, MT 1977; M. de Jonge, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: Central Problems and Essential Viewpoints: ANRW II, 20/1 (1987) 359-420 (status quaestionis); Denis, 1, 227-289. Translations: It.: P. Sacchi, 1, 725-948 (intr., bibl.); Fr.: M. Philonenko, in A. Dupont-Somer - M. Philonenko, La Bible, Écrits intertestamentaires, Paris 1987, 813-944; Span.: A.

Piñero, in A. Díez Macho, Apócrifos del Antiguo Testamento, 5, Madrid 1987, 9-158; R.M. Boixareu i Viplana, El gènre literari dels Testaments dels Dotze Patriarques, Barcelona 1999; M. de Jonge, TRE 33 (2002) 107-113 (along with other Testaments); Id., Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament as Part of Christian Literature: The Case of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and the Greek Life of Adam and Eve, Leiden-Boston 2003.

M. Starowieyski

TESTAMENTUM DOMINI (Testament of Our Lord Jesus Christ). Various works bear this title. The most well known is a liturgical-canonical treatise preserved in *Syriac. In 1853, Lagarde published fragments of a Syriac translation of the Testament, and then in 1893 James released two *Latin fragments of the apocalyptic portion, but only in 1899 was it published in its entirety by Rahmani from a MS of the Metropolitan Library of the Syriac Catholics of Mossul and translated into Latin. The primitive text, now lost, was written in Greek and edited in *Syria. (Scholars surmise that it was written in the mid-5th c. because it was cited by *Severus of Antioch.) It presents itself as a text written by the *apostles, reporting a conversation that *Jesus had with them after the resurrection. One finds the following elements in this text: (1) a description of the precursory signs of the coming of the *Antichrist (it must have circulated as an independent text); (2) a few rules for the construction of church buildings; and (3) some norms concerning ordination and the duties of clerics, the *Eucharist, baptism and the Christian life. This third section has as its foundation the Apostolic Tradition (as one reads in the Latin, *Coptic, *Arabic and *Ethiopian collections), but the prayers there are considerably developed, while other prayers and rites are included. Some of the Testament's prayers are still used in the Syriac Pontifical. The same treatise exists in an Arabic and Ethiopian version. Another Testament of Our Lord Jesus Christ, in Ethiopian, which was published by H. Geurrier and S. Greébaut in the PO IX,2, has nothing to do with the preceding text and is less interesting. Fragments of the Testament of Our Lord Jesus Christ were identified in 1992.

CPG 1743; P.A. de Lagarde, Reliquiae iuris ecclesiastici antiquissimae. Graece et syriace (partial ed.), Leipzig 1856 (repr. Osnabrück 1967) (partial Syriac text with retroversion in Greek); I.E. Rahmani, Testamentum Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Mainz 1899 (Syriac and Latin trans.); F. Nau, La version syriaque de l'Octateuque de Clément traduite en français, Paris 1913, 18-77, new ed. by P. Ciprotti, Milan 1967; liturgical passages: J. Quasten, Monumenta eucharistica et liturgica vetustissima, Bonn 1935-37, 235-273; A. Vööbus, The Synodicon in the West Syrian Tradition, I, CSCO 367, Louvain 1975, 1-49 (text); CSCO 368, Louvain 1975, 27-64 (Eng. trans.); R. Beylot, Le Testamentum Domini éthiopien, Louvain 1984 (1-143 [text], 144-234 [Fr. trans.]); J. Cooper - A. Maclean, The Testament of Our Lord Translated in English from Syriac, Edinburgh 1902 (on the text of Rahmani, with an excellent commentary); E. Lodi, Enchiridion Euchologicum, Bologna 1979, 510-529 (chosen passages).

Studies: DACL 2, 1909, 1936-1938 and 1949-1950; R.-G. Coquin, Le Testamentum Domini: problèmes de tradition textuelle: Parole de l'Orient 5 (1974) 165-188; B. Steimer, Vertex Traditionis. Die Gattung der altchristlichen Kirchenordnungen, Berlin 1992, 95-105; B. Gain, Fragments grecs inédits du Testamentum Domini attribués à saint Basile: Augustinianum 32 (1992) 261-277; LACL 672-673.

P. Nautin

TESTIMONIA. J.R. Harris coined this term to refer to the systematic collections of citations, esp. of the Prophets, *Psalms and the OT in general, whose existence he recognized as the basis of many pages of the most ancient Christian literature, which was characterized by some stereotypical citations from textual variants and tendentious interpretations (Testimonies, I-II, London 1916-20). It was difficult to acknowledge that these texts came directly from the Hebrew or Greek *Bible; outside their original context, these elements seemed to evolve, in turn illuminating each other, changing the attribution of the author and tending toward *midrash. The very work of selection which was at the basis of these collections privileged certain themes, not only the person and the work of Christ, but also all those matters on which depended theological controversy, reflection and worship. We have here an ancient phase of early theology, even earlier than the redaction of the first gospel (K. Stendahl, The School of S. Matthew, Uppsala 1954), the writings of *Paul and *John (C.H. Dodd, According to Scriptures, London 1952; Id., Historical Tradition in the IV. Gospel, Cambridge 1965), the Acts of the Apostles (J. Dupont, Études sur les Actes, Paris 1967, 245-390) and, of course, *Barnabas, *Justin Martyr et al. The proper exegesis of many pages of ancient Christian literature presupposes the reconstruction of these collections in their history. The only collections that have survived are very elaborated and revised according to the originals (Cypr., Ad Quirinum [ed. R. Weber, CCL 3, Turnhout 1972] and Basil, Moral Rules [PG 31, 653-869]).

J. Daniélou, Études d'exégèse judéo-chrétienne (Les Testimonia), Paris 1966; E. Lupieri, Il cielo è il mio trono. Is. 40,12 e 66,1 nella tradizione testimoniaria, Rome 1980; P. Monat, Les testimonia bibliques de Cyprien à Lactance, in Le monde latin antique et la Bible, Paris 1985, 499-507; E. Cavalcanti, Dai "testimonia" all' "armonia delle Scritture": la raccolta dei profeti nel libro XVIII del "De civitate Dei": AnnSE 11 (1994) 491-510.

J. Gribomont

TESTIMONIES ON THE FATHER AND THE SON AND THE HOLY SPIRIT (or The Florilegium Fuldense) (5th c.; *Africa). Probably a 5th-c. anti-*Arian text coming from Africa and transmitted in the Codex Fuldensis Bonifatianus 2 (8th c.). Its presence in the ps.-Augustine text De Trinitate contra Felicianum Arrianum led to its being regarded in the past as a document written by Augustine himself; because he lived before the composition of this work, however, this idea is no longer tenable. The MS tradition of this latter text, even though it attributed it to Augustine, was always included and transmitted along with the writings of *Quodvultdeus and *Fulgentius of Ruspe, confirming the extensive African tradition in the use of the work, and allowing us to date it not beyond the 2nd half of the 5th c. The authoritative opinion held by de Bruyne has definitively established the anonymous origin of the document.

The eight chapters of the Testimonia are developed by a list of citations, even though not primarily from the NT, inasmuch as 41 of the 81 citations come from the OT. The Testimonia are gathered in thematic form and laid out in the following order: (1) De uno Deo; (2) De distinctione personarum Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti; (3) De Spiritu Sancto; (4) De substantia Dei; (5) De Spiritu Dei; (6) Quod in Christo est Deus; (7) Quod non est alius Deus praeter Deum nostrum; (8) De Spiritu Sancto, quia Deus est. In the anti-Arian expositio, the doctrine on the Son can be perceived primarily in ch. 6; the biblical argument is established on Is 45:14-15: tu est Deus . . . salvator noster, and reaffirmed in Col 1:19 and 2:2-3 with respect to the plenitudo divinitatis in the person of Christ, seeking to establish, at the christological level, the right relationship between the substantia and the distinctio personarum, according to the African interpretation of Arian teaching (Aug., De haer. 45), explained in chs. 2 and 4. In the Testimonia, however, there appears a greater preoccupation with pneumatology, offering biblical arguments on the divinity, the procession and the action of the *Holy Spirit in the history of salvation, esp. in relation to the Son, that is, *Jesus Christ; probably in contradistinction to the semi-Arian doctrine maintained by the *Visigothic barbarians, inasmuch as the De Trinitate contra Felicianum Arrianum 3 takes into consideration the disputation between *Ambrose and the disciple of *Wulfila, the bishop of Auxentius, even if one cannot exclude the Macedonians and the Eunomians, esp. the latter group, on account of the doctrinal rapprochement between Wulfila and *Eunomius.

CCL 90, 225-233; CPL 386; D. de Bruyne, Un florilège biblique inédit: ZNTW 29 (1930) 197-208; R. Kurz, Die handschriftliche Überlieferung der Werke des heiligen Augustinus V, 1, Vienna 1976, 237.

M. Mendoza

TESTIMONIUM FLAVIANUM. The phrase Testimonium Flavianum commonly refers to the text that was read in Flavius Josephus, Antiquitates Iudaicae 18,63-64. The text in question affirms that *Jesus is the Christ and that, after having been crucified under Pontius Pilate because of the hostile schemes of the Jews, he was raised from the dead. In an eloquently doubtful form, he insinuates, moreover, the idea that Jesus was more than a simple human being. This text, which seems more likey to have been the work of a Christian than a Jew, caused some scholars beginning as early as 1592 (Lucas Osiander, Epitomes Historiae Ecclesiasticae) to doubt whether the entire text of the Testimonium Flavianum was a Christian interpolation into Flavius Josephus's work. The controversy has dragged on until our day, with the appearance of three schools of thought: one that considers the entire Testimonium Flavianum an interpolated text, a second that accepts it in toto, and a third, now the majority, a group that maintains that the Testimonium Flavianum known to us is the fruit of a combination of Josephus's authentic core of information with some Christian interpolations. It remains, however, almost impossible to attempt to reconstruct, apart from conjecture, Josephus's original text inasmuch as the entire MS tradition is unanimous in reporting the common text of the Testimonium Flavianum, with a noteworthy exception of an Arabic version reported by Agapius of Mabbug's [Membiğ-Hierapolis's] Universal History (10th c.), which, even though possibly interpolated, is so only moderately. In the writings of *Origen, there are three references that could suggest, albeit in a problematic way, the Testimonium Flavianum. They can be found in the following texts: Contra Celsum 1,41; 2,13 and in the In Matthaeum 10,17. In these texts, Origen, maintaining that he is reporting an idea from Josephus, makes the destruction of *Jerusalem out to be a divine punishment for the murder of *James the brother of the Lord. In fact, Josephus in the Antiquitates 20,200 writes about "James, the brother of the Lord, called the Christ," but without any reference to the disaster at Jerusalem. Origen's imprecision requires much caution on the part of the reader in accepting it as a witness for or against the Testimonium Flavianum. His contribution, however, makes Josephus's second reference to Christ plausible (namely the one from Antiquitates 20,200) and, because it seems that Josephus makes mention of an individual already known, namely the Christ, it gives a certain value also to the authenticity of the Testimonium Flavianum; however, Origen rebuked Josephus for not having maintained that Jesus was the Christ, a rebuke that would have been unmerited if the common text of the Testimonium Flavianum were authentic. *Eusebius of Caesarea, however, provided the text of the Testimonium Flavianum three times in a form that was substantially identical to that of the common text: see Historia Ecclesiastica 1,11,7-8; Demonstratio Evangelica 3,5,105-106 and Theophania 5,44. *Jerome, translating the text of the Testimonium Flavianum from Eusebius of Caesarea's Historia Ecclesiastica, attempted to attenuate its heavily Christian tone (De vir. illus. XIII). It seems that one can therefore conclude that the Christian interpolations of Josephus's text must have taken place in the 2nd half of the 3rd c., that is, in the arc of time between the work of Origen and Eusebius.

L.H. Feldman - G. Hata (eds.), Josephus, Judaism, and Christianity, Leiden 1987; M.E. Hardwick, Josephus as an Historical Source in Patristic Literature Through Eusebius, Atlanta 1988; P.A. Gramaglia, Il Testimonium Flavianum. Analisi linguistica: Henoch 20 (1998) 153-177; S. Bardet, Le Testimonium Flavianum. Examen historique, considérations historiographiques, Paris 2002; A. Whealey, Josephus on Jesus: The Testimonium Flavianum Controversy from Late Antiquity to Modern Times, Frankfurt a.M. 2003; G. Jossa, Jews, Romans and Christians: From the Bellum Judaicum to the Antiquitates, in J. Sievers - G. Lembi (eds.), Josephus and Jewish History in Flavian Rome and Beyond, Leiden-Boston 2005, 331-342.

C. Caruso

TESTIMONY – WITNESS. Very frequent terms that appear in ancient literature. Their presence confers to the account a sense of veracity. Testimony is the active form of presenting oneself and giving evidence as a witness (Homer, Odyssey XI,235). The primitive meaning, connected to the etymology, connotes becoming aware of a remote reality that cannot be forgotten but is brought to the attention of others (Plato, Symp. 179b).

In the Greek Bible those cases deserve attention where the term "testimony" calls to mind the meaning of the corroborating document that recalls a specific event or rather that of the documents of the law or the covenant. The phrases "tent of the covenant" (or "testimony") and "ark of the covenant" (or "testimony") respectively call to mind the time or the place where the agreement with Yahweh occurred and where documentation of this event is preserved (see Ex 29:4ff.; 40:2ff.; Lev 4:4ff.; Num 4:25ff.). The OT is not aware of a testimony expressed on the basis of a subjective, unverifiable conviction, but presupposes a personal knowledge of the event.

The NT, although it considers fundamental the testimony made on the facts, leaves broad space for the subjective conviction of the truth (religious) for which proofs were admitted and one was disposed to give one's life (see Mk 6:11 and parallel texts in the Synoptic gospels, Mk 13:9; Lk 21:13). With respect to the terms "witness" and "testimony," which occur with almost equal frequency, the mention of the legal use of false witnesses in the condemnation of *Jesus (see Mk 14: 55, 56, 59 and 63 and parallel texts in the Synoptic gospels) and in that of *Stephen (Acts 6:13; 7:58) is significant. In *Paul's epistles, the message of salvation in Christ, which is the object of the proclamation, coincides with the testimony (see 1 Cor 2:1; 2 Th 1:10); the Acts of the Apostles, however, discounting the utterances of human testimonies, introduces the meaning of "giving testimony," which is understood as the preaching of Christ, which was entrusted to Paul at *Rome (Acts 23:11; see Acts 4:33). The apostles and the disciples, esp. because they were in a position to give testimony to the resurrection and the works of Jesus (Acts 2:32; 3:15; 13:31; 22:15; 26:16ff.), were charged with spreading the message. The Johannine writings present testimony in the following forms: indicative in the Baptist, personal in Jesus and needing to be proclaimed in the disciples.

In the fourth gospel, testimony primarily has as its object, in addition to documentable facts, the self-communication of God in Jesus Christ in line with the prophets. This concept, which is typically Johannine, is integrated by the testimony of the *Holy Spirit (Jn 15:25, 27) and by those who have received the Word, thus confirming the truth of God (Jn 3:33; 4:39). In 1 Jn 5:10, testimony, knowledge and the message of the faith are identical. Here the experience of the senses does not say much, but only one's involvement in faith.

In patristic literature classical semantics had great importance and was combined with biblical semantics. The Greek term μάρτυς ("witness"), which pertained to the legal sphere, starting from the 2nd c., began to refer, in Christian language, exclusively to the believer who suffers and dies on account of the faith, rendering an oral testimony to Christ, who was confirmed by torture and death (Mart. Polyc. 19,1); μάρτυς would also then include those who died in prison or exile. The term underwent a semantic evolution in the Christian milieu by acquiring other meanings. The term martyrion, however, indicated the testimony itself (see Eus., HE 5,2,3-4). The two Greek words, which were only transliterated in Latin, had the same meaning. During the first centuries of the Common Era, Christianity, in its political and social aspects, presented itself as a "testimony" to the "initial event of Jesus of Nazareth, the suffering and crucified Messiah." This testimony was articulated in different ways: orally, with his own life, but also with death because of faith in Christ or through love for Christ: "And you will be dragged before governors and kings for my sake, to bear testimony before them and the Gentiles" (Mt 10:18). God testifies on behalf of Christ in *Scripture (Clem. of Alex., Paed. III,1) and in Christ's *baptism (Const. Apost. II,32,2). Christians, faithful to the decision they have made, are witnesses to Christ (Letter to Diognetus 12,6; Clem. of Alex., Strom. IV,6; Orig., Contra Celsum I,8), moved by charity (John Chrys., Hom. 27,3 in Rom.), and give their lives for Christ and for the faith (Eus., HE 5,21,4; John Chrys., Hom. 66 in Gen.). In the writings of the Fathers, where the abstract term is privileged, the distinctive semantic features do not change: God testifies on behalf of Christ (Orig., Contra Celsum VIII,9) and on behalf of Christians (Justin Martyr, Dial. 123-124; Tatian, Ad Graecos 12). The testimony of Christians to their faith is an act of thanks to God (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 4), performed through the power of the love that is in them (Clem. Alex., Strom. IV, 4.7). The martyrs, shedding their blood, have given testimony to God the Father (Athan., Contra Arianos III, 10), to Christ (Polyc., Mart. 2,25; Orig., Mart. 14), whom the heavenly Father has presented as his first begotten son in baptism (Clem. Alex., Paed. 16; Meth. Olymp., Symp. VII,1), and to the *Holy Spirit (*Hipp., In Danielem 2,21,1; Athan., De fuga 22; *Didymus the Blind, De Trinitate II,1), and have proclaimed the superiority of the Christian religion over all others (*Iren., Adv. haer. V,9,2; Clem. Alex., Strom. IV,5). The purity of God's testimony to Scripture, the *prophets, Christ and the bishops (Const. Apost. II, 25) is the object of contamination by the heretics (Iren., Adv. haer. IV,33,9).

C.L. Masson, Le témoignage de Jean: RThPh 38 (1950) 5-63; L. Cerfaux, Témoins du Christ d'après le Livre des Actes, in Recueil L. Cerfaux II, Gembloux 1954, 157-174; A. Vanhoye, Témoignage et vie en Dieu selon le quatrième évangile: Christus 16 (1955) 150-171; R. Koch, Témoignage d'après les Actes: Masses Ouvrières 129 (1957) 16-33; 131 (1957) 4-25; I. de la Potterie, La notion de témoignage dans Saint Jean, in Sacra Pagina II, Paris 1959, 193-208; H. Strathmann, μάρτυς: GLNT VI, 1269-1392; Enc. Bibbia, Turin 1971, VI, 907-910; E. Günther, Zeuge und Martyrer: ZNTW 47 (1956) 145-161; H.A.M. Hoppenbrouwers, Recherches sur la terminologie du martyr de Tertullien à Lactance, Nijmegen 1961; E. Weiner - A. Weiner, The Martyr's Conviction, Atlanta 1990; T. Baumeister, La teologia del martirio nella Chiesa antica, Turin 1995; J.-P. Mahé, Le témoignage véritable (NH IX, 3). Gnose et martyre, Leuven 1996; S.Th. Pinkaers, La spiritualité du martyre, Fribourg 2000, 51-66.

E. Peretto

TETRAMORPH. The image of the Tetramorph is in itself a monstrous OT apocalyptic apparition presented in the context of the vision of the "chariot of the Lord" in Ezek 1 and later taken up in the image of the cherubim in ch. 10. It should be stated immediately, however, that the versions known to us in early Christian iconography also received the variants of this theophanic motif as construed by the NT book of the Apocalypse. In the book of Ezekiel, the vision of the Tetramorph is presented as a vision of four distinct "living beings, and this was their appearance: they had a human form and each one had four faces and four wings"; with a four-sided head, "each one of the four had the features of a human being; then the features of a lion to the right, the features of an ox to the left and the features of an eagle to the back" (Ezek 1:5-6, 10). Ezekiel mentions, in his text, the image of the Assyrian kâribu (whose mythical name corresponds to that of the cherubim of the ark of the covenant in Ex 25:18), beings which possess a human head, the body of a lion, the feet of a bull and the wings of an eagle, and were regarded as the servants of the gods, and their idol was placed as a protection for the Babylonian palaces. Because they were images of God's transcendence, Ezekiel made use of them in his vision of the chariot of fire.

John's Apocalypse adopts this vision in the composition of the great revelation of the "great day" of God that begins in ch. 4. Reflecting on the Jewish cosmology that was contemporaneous to him, the author of the book understands the four living beings as the angels who rule the world (the number of the cardinal points, of the winds). To the animals of the Tetramorph, he attributes some characteristics of the cherubim in Ezek 10, just as the wings of many eyes (which in the Apocalypse, however, are six, instead of four), interpreted as a symbol of divine omniscience and providence. The reference to the preservation of the creature is emphasized by the words that the 25 elders direct to "the One who sits upon the throne" each time the four winds sang to him the Trisagion: "You are worthy, O Lord and our God, to receive glory, honor and power, because you have created all things and through your will they were created and subsist" (Rev 4:10, 11). The fathers of the church, beginning with *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. 4,20,10-11), perceived in these four "servants" of the Lord the figures of the four Evangelists, for which they took pains to identify the corresponding animal, set around Christ, the King/Messiah who sits on the throne of the *parousia.

The image of Christ in the mandorla, surrounded by the Tetramorph and the angels—which van der Meer refers to as "the Theophany of the Trisagion" (van der Meer 1938)—appears initially in *Egypt, most likely in the declarations found in apses, but the first known example is that on a wood panel from the door of basilica of Santa Sabina (at *Rome), from the beginning of the 5th c., in which the Christ of the parousia, appearing as a young man and depicted intact, sitting in the posture of a ruler holding a scroll bearing the letters alpha and omega, is inserted into a round shield/mandorla, on the outside of which are placed the four animals of the Tetramorph. At the bottom, under the starred firmament, is perhaps *Mary among *Peter and *Paul, who are holding a small shield (or stylized crown). The entirety of this decoration recalls the Eastern iconography (later!) of the ascension—which is also present on the door in the iconography with the divine hand—and bears witness to the connections of that iconography with the theme of the glorious advent of the Lord at the end of time, just as the voices at the ascension and the parousia clarify.

At the beginning of the 6th c., the scene of the "theophany of the Trisagion" appears more times on the frescoed apses of Bawît, where Christ is on the apocalyptic throne, within the circular mandorla. On one of the apses (chapel XVII), the animals of the Tetramorph are in turn inserted on wheels of fire; this representation is thus faithful to the actual text of the chariot of fire found in Ezek 1. In chapel XXVI, the mandorla is on a true and proper fiery chariot and the animals are depicted in their entirety with six wings with six eyes interspersed (the vision of the Apocalypse). The chapels of Bawît, a true shrine of the iconography of the Tetramorph, have variants that subsequently illuminate its meaning: in various chapels, the register painted under the dome has the array of *Mary with the twelve apostles on the model of the Eastern ascension-parousia, while in one of these Ezekiel stands in place of *Mary (the prophet is also present in the portrait), and in another in place of the apostles are 24 elders, this time a citation of Rev 4:11. Among the *Syriac ascensions, one should at least mention that of the Codex of *Rabbula (586), with the chariot of fire joined to the Tetramorph and placed beneath at the foundation of the mandorla with Christ.

The image of the four distinct animals is, however, proper, in early Christian iconography, to the most accurate description of the vision of Rev 4, the vision that is of the throne of the One who is seated on it, known as the portrayal of the hetoimasia (i.e., the prepared throne of Christ or the throne of the second coming). Alongside it—generally occupied by the glorious cross (a symbolic replacement of the Christ of the passion and the last judgment) or the Lamb or an image of Christ himself—appear the seven-branched candlestick and the four distinct animals, in addition to the group of the 24 elders, which are occasionally omitted. A first depiction, not perfectly coherent with the account, but off balance in the christological clarification (there the apostles take the place of the elders alongside Christ), is in the apse of St. *Pudentiana, with the animals of the Tetramorph on the top, in the celestial part. But the scene would immediately be transmitted to the apse arches, leaving the Christ of the parousia in the dome portion and only preserving the hetoimatic throne. This is what one finds, for example, in the mosaics of Sts. *Cosmas and Damian (and in the later basilica of St. *Praxedis that was inspired from it) and St. Paul Outside the Walls, at Rome, and in those of the churches of *Ravenna of S. Michele in Africisco (today at Berlin), with Christ depicted in his entirety, to S. Apollinare in Classe and in the lost decoration of St. *John the Evangelist. Other examples exhibit the animals with the hetoimatic throne appearing on the vault of the basilica of S. Matrona in S. Prisco, at the basilica of S. Maria Capua Vetere, or rather in the starred sky of the vault of the Mausoleum of Galla Placidia, still at Ravenna, where one finds in place of the throne the glorious cross of the Risen One. In subsequent centuries, the scenes of the Trisagion and the hetoimasia would be slowly abandoned, and the animals of the Tetramorph would increasingly appear more as a mere attribute of the figures of the four Evangelists, losing any apocalyptic connotation of the coming of Christ the Judge at the end of time.

F. van der Meer, Maiestas Domini. Théophanies de l'Apocalypse dans l'art chrétien. Étude sur les origines d'une iconographie spéciale du Christ, Vatican City 1938; G. Vezin, L'Apocalypse et la fin des temps. Étude des influences égyptiennes et asiatiques sur les religions et les arts, Paris 1973; F. van der Meer, L'Apocalypse dans l'art, Anvers 1978; R. Petraglio et al., L'Apocalypse de Jean: Traditions exégétiques et iconographiques, III^e-XIII^e siècles (Actes du Colloque de la Fondation Hardt, 29 février-3 mars 1976, Section d'Histoire de la Faculté des Lettres de l'Université de Genève), Geneva 1979 (see F. Bisconti: RivAC 56 [1980] 209-213); U. Utro, s.v. Tetramorfo: TIP 286-287.

U. Utro

THAGASTE. In Proconsular Numidia, today Souk Ahras (the market of the lions) in NE Algeria in the sector of Constantine, ca. 80 km (49.7 mi),

S of *Hippo (today Annaba) and 30 km (18.6 mi) N of Madaura, where *Augustine completed his first studies. The toponym was written Thagaste or Tagaste. The site was identified through two inscriptions discovered onsite (CIL VIII,5145-5146). The city, already mentioned by *Pliny (V,4,4) and the Itinerarium Antonini (44), was called a municipium by Augustine (Conf. 2,3,5; 4,4,7; 67,11; C. Acad. 2,2,3): it was a municipium from the 2nd c. onward (CIL VIII,5145). *Patricius, Augustine's Father, was a curialis (Possidius, Vita Aug. 1,1-2); he did not belong to the upper, wealthy class but owned some properties there: when Augustine returned to Thagaste, after staying in *Italy, he was able to establish a *monastery on his family's property (Possidius, Vita Aug. 3,1). Among his family members there was also *Severus, who then became the bishop of Milevis. The first known bishop was Firmus at the end of the 3rd c. The Christians for a few decades were *Donatists but then became Catholics. Between the 4th and 5th c., *Alypius was the bishop; in the 2nd half of the 5th c., the office was held by certain Januarius, who had been sent into exile by *Huneric in 484. It belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Numidia and not to Proconsular *Africa (Aug., Ep. 227; Mansi 3, 870-871; 4,334, 433, 497, 509). Even during the period of Byzantine rule, it was still an episcopal see. There are no significant archaeological remains as in the case of Hippo; many vestiges were destroyed by the construction of the buildings in the modern city. Much archaeological documentation has been destroyed or lost since 1960. Different inscriptions, some Christian, allow us to perceive partially the city's social and religious life.

Augustine was born at Thagaste (13 November 354). Among the other natives of Thagaste, one could mention the following people: Alypius, who studied law, and his relative *Romanianus (Ep. 27); a rich benefactor (CIL VIII suppl., 17226) named Cornelius, and his son *Licentius (C. Acad. 2,3,8; De ord. 1,3,7; 1,8,23); and *Evodius (Conf. 4,4,7) bishop of Uzalis. The rich Romans *Pinianus and *Melania owned vast properties at Thagaste. Inscriptions also attest to important individuals in the imperial administration. There existed various monasteries at Thagaste, some of which were constructed by order of Pinianus and Melania.

DACL 15, 2169-2170; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au Bas-Empire, Paris 1981; O. Perler, Les voyages de saint Augustin: RechAug 1 (1958) 5-42; A. Caserta, Evodio di Tagaste amico e discepolo di S. Agostino: Asprenas 3 (1956/1957) 123-152; A. Gabillon, Romanianus, alias Cornelius. Du nouveau sur le bienfaiteur et l'ami de saint Augustin: REAug 24 (1978) 58-70; T. Kotula, Les principales d'Afrique. Étude sur l'élite municipale nordafricaine au Bas-Empire romani, Wrocław 1982; N. Benseddik, À la recherche de Thagaste, patrie de saint Augustin, in Augustinus Afer, ed. P.-Y. Fux - J.-M. Roessli - O. Wermelinger, Fribourg 2003, 413-436; M. Bouchenaki, Augustin et l'africanité à partir des oeuvres historiques et de l'étude des sites de Thagaste, d'Hippone, et de Carthage, in op. cit. 2003, 131-139.

A. Di Berardino

THALASSIUS. Abbot of a monastery in the Libyan desert, probably near *Carthage (ca. 650). He was a friend of *Maximus the Confessor, who dedicated to Thallasius his 65 Quaestiones ad Thalassium and wrote to him five letters, two of which have survived. Thalassius wrote the treatise Centuriae IV de caritate et continentia, *Georgian and Arabic translations of which still exist; the work is about aphorisms in which one perceives the influence of *Evagrius of Pontus and ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite on the relationship between the body and the *soul. The so-called Libellus ad imperatores (CPG 5774) is another one of Thalassius's works.

CPG 7848; PG 91, 1428-1470. G.E.H. Palmer - P. Sherrard - K. Ware, The Philokalia: The Complete Text Compiled by St Nikodimos of the Holy Mountain and St Makarios of Corinth, 2, London 1979, 306-332; M.T. Dissidier, Le témoignage spirituel de Thalassius le Libyen: REByz 2 (1944) 79-118; M. van Parys, Un maître spirituel oublié: Thalassius: Irénikon 52 (1979) 214-240; Patrologia V, 131-132.

S. Samulowitz

THALASSIUS of Angers. Bishop of Angers during the mid-4th c. During his ordination at Angers (Andegavum) a council was also held (Mansi 7,941), at which he participated. Lupus of Troyes sent a letter to him in response to some of his questions concerning the way to celebrate the vigils for *Christmas, *Epiphany, *Easter and the new marriage of minor clerics (CPL 988).

PL 58, 66; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, II, Paris 1912, 246-250; P.M. Duval, La Gaule jusqu'au milieu du Ve siècle, Paris 1971, 808.

F. Cocchini

THAMUGADI. See *TIMGAD

THEBAID. Southern region of *Egypt and one of the provinces in which the diocese of Egypt had been divided under *Diocletian. It took the name from the ancient city of Thebes. In the monastic texts, however, this name is extended to refer generically to the desert on the two sides of the Nile Valley, in which the monks took residence to exercise various types of *ascesis.

PWK 48, 1577-1582; CE 14, 6-7 (bibl.); LTK³ 9, 1385; Coptic Encyclopedia 4, 1225.

T. Orlandi

THEBAN LEGION. Around 450 Bishop *Eucherius of Lyons wrote the first Passio (CPL 490): under the emperor *Maximian, an Egyptian Legion of Thebes, under the primicerius *Mauricius, the campidoctor Exuperius and the senator militum Candidus, was crossing the Alps, and they were put to death at Agaunum for collectively refusing to sacrifice to the gods (St. Maurice el Gran S. Bernardo). This large number of Christian soldiers continually provoked new legends and cults: Sts. Felix and Regula at Zürich, St. Tirsus at Trier, Sts. Cassius and Florentius at Bonn, St. Gereon at Cologne, and St. Victor at Xanten. Bishop Theodulus of Octodurum (Martigny) rediscovered the relics and constructed a basilica in their honor. We know that in the 4th c. there were in fact numerous legions that bore this nickname: the II Flavia Constantia, stationed at Cusa, 296–297; the II Flavia Constantia Thebaea, removed by *Constantius from the previous location, which depended on the magister militum per Orientem; the II Felix Valentis Thebaea, which probably formed one unit with the II Valentiniana in Egypt; the I Maximiana Thebaea and the II Diocletiana Thebaea; the Thebeae legiones spoken of by Ammianus Marcellinus; and the Thebaei, stationed in *Italy. Of these bodies of troops, only those that bore the name of Maximian or Diocletian were stationed in Europe, more specifically in *Thrace, and there were those that were identified with the Theban Legion of the Passio mm. Acaunensium. But there is a strong likelihood that all of this is nothing more than a hagiographic novel, whose topographical precision does not guarantee its historical accuracy.

BHL 5737-5764; BS 9, 193-205; LCI 8, 429-432; BBKL 11, 784-791; E. Chevalley, La passion anonyme de saint Maurice d'Agaune: Vallesia 45 (1990) 37-120; J. Kremer, Studien zum frühen Christentum in Niedergermanien, Cologne 1993, 201-228; Mauritius und die Thebäische Legion, ed. O. Wermelinger, Fribourg 2005.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

THECLA. Different saints with this name were venerated during Antiquity. The most known was the native of *Iconium. *Egeria, who had set off from *Tarsus after 384, went to *Seleucia in Isauria to see the tomb of St. Thecla, which stood over a place today called Meriamlik; the remains preserved date back to the 5th c. The life of Thecla is narrated in the Acta Pauli et Theclae, which was composed around 180 in *Asia Minor. Egeria went to the church where the tomb was found and venerated the saint; she spent two days there. The cult of Thecla spread greatly in the East. Other saints with this name are as follows: (1) Thecla of *Aquileia and Trieste is a doubling of the saint from Iconium; (2) in the Santa Sophia, at Benevento, the faithful pretended to possess the relics of the 12 children of a certain Boniface and Thecla who are certainly to be identified with the martyrs of Hadrumetum in *Africa, or with those of *Abitina; (3) at Chamalières in Auvergne the faithful venerated the relics of the saint from Iconium in a 7th-c. monastery; (4) in *Palestine, *Eusebius of Caesarea (Mart. Palest. 3,1) and the Mart. hier. (24–25 March) mention a martyr with this name at Gaza; (5) at *Rome, on the Via Labicana, this saint's name is mentioned without a doubt in the Mart. rom. (25–26 March), which was caused by the author confusing this saint with the preceding one; (6) likewise at Rome, on the Via Ostiense, a 3rd-c. catacomb was rediscovered in 1963 with the tomb of a martyr who had this name.

G. Morin, La formation des légendes provençales. Faits et aperçus nouveaux: RBen 26 (1909) 24-33; Monceaux 3, 140-147; U. Fasola, Il complesso catacombale di S. Tecla: RivAC 40 (1964) 19-50; Id., La basilica sotterranea di S. Tecla: ibid. 46 (1970) 193-288; Vies des SS. 9, 477-484; BS 12, 172-181; Vie et miracles de sainte Thècle, texte grec, tr. et comm. par G. Dagron, Brussels 1978; W. Rordorf, Sainte Thècle dans la tradition hagiographique occidentale: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 73-81; L. Hayne, Thecla and the Church Fathers: VChr 48 (1994) 209-218; BBKL 9, 816-814 (extensive bibl.); C. Nissen, Un oracle médical de Sarpédon à Séleucie du Calycadnos: Kernos 14 (2001) 111-131; S.J. Davis, The Cult of St. Thecla: A Tradition of Women's Piety in Late Antiquity, Oxford 2001.

V. Saxer - A. Di Berardino

THECLA, ACTS of. In the Acts of Paul one finds the story of Thecla of Iconium, a young virgin follower of *Paul who rejected her fiancé out of love for chastity, suffered persecution and was thrown to wild beasts in the theater, where she was baptized alone and found protection from Queen Tryphaena (a historical figure); she then went to *Seleucia in Isauria, where she died. Seleucia was the center of the cult of Thecla, which spread throughout the entire East (*Egypt, *Palestine and *Cyprus). Later legends exist of the rock that opened and received Thecla. This part of the Acts of Paul, which was ad hoc and even independent of the Acts, was very popular; it was translated and paraphrased into various languages. The figure of Thecla, virgin-martyr, became a symbol of virginity (the song of Thecla in *Methodius of Olympus's Symposium), which was praised by *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa, ps.-*John Chrysostom, *Theodore Mopsuestia (?), *Severus of Antioch and many others. A very interesting work titled The Life and Miracles of St. Thecla, in two books, was written by a presbyter of Seleucia; in the second book, one finds a description of the sanctuary in Seleucia, which was one of the most important centers of the cult in Antiquity and the miracles of Thecla.

CANT 211v; BHG 1710-1722; BHL 8020-8025; BHO 1152-1156; LCIK 8, 432-436; BS 12, 176-177; DACL 13 (1998) 2666-2677. Editions: Acts: Lipsius-Bonnet 1, 104-117; L. Vouaux, Les Actes de Paul, Paris 1913, 146-238. The Acts in Turkish: P. Zieme: Apocrypha 13 (2002) 53-62. Life and Miracles: G. Dagron, Brussels 1978; trans. in all the collections of the translations of the apocrypha. C. Holzhey, Die Thecla-Akten. Ihre Verbreitung und Berurteilung in der Kirche, Munich 1905; J. Festugière, Les origines de S. Thècle: Comptes Rendus des Séances de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres (1968) 52-63; M. Aubineau, Compléments au dossier de Sainte Thècle: AB 93 (1975) 256-262; W. Rordorf, Sainte Thècle: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 73-81; L. Hague, Thecla and the Church Fathers: VChr 48 (1994) 209-218; F. Corsaro, Elementi romanzeschi e aretologia negli Atti apocrifi di Paolo e Tecla, in La narrativa cristiana antica, Rome 1995, 77-99; A. Jensen, Thecla, die Apostolin, Freiburg 1995; J.N. Bremmer, The Apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla, Kampen 1996 (bibl.).

M. Starowieyski

THEFT of the GREEKS. With this expression it is customary to indicate the idea that Greek wisdom (and esp. of philosophy) derived from the Jewish wisdom contained in the OT (see W. Löhr, The Theft of the Greeks: RHE 95 [2000] 403). Its origin and its growth should be sought in *Hellenistic-Jewish environments: Already present in Artapanus (Löhr, 404) and in ps.-Hecataeus, cited by *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V,113,1 [II, 402,17]) and an author, according to Schürer (Gesch. des jüdisch. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi III, Leipzig [4]1909, 595-597), of falsified verses attributed to Greek poets, it was developed above all by Aristobulus, the most outstanding exponent of this tendency. It reappears also in *Philo and in Flavius Josephus (Löhr, 405-406). In the Christian field, this motif is adopted in greater or lesser degree by various authors, such as *Justin Martyr, ps.-Justin (in Cohortatio ad Graecos and in De monarchia), *Tatian, Isidore (cited by Clement, Strom. VI, 53,2-5, II, 458,19-459,5), *Theophilus of Antioch, *John Cassian, *Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria—whose Stromata, esp. in book 1, 5 and 6, contain the largest and most erudite treatment of the theme—*Eusebius of Caesarea and *Theodoret; *Origen mentions it only occasionally (for the various references see Löhr, 411-425; on Clement, Eusebius and Theodoret, see in particular D. Ridings, The Attic Moses, Göteborg 1995, pp. 29-139, 139-196, 197-239 respectively). Among non-Christian authors, the Neo-Pythagorean philosopher Numenius seems to approach this thesis when he defines Plato as "a Moses who speaks Attic" (fr. 8, 13 des Places; see also Numenius of Apamea).

Beyond the studies of Valckenaer, Boeckh, Scheck, Schürer and Walter cited in *Hellenistic Judaism and in the related bibl. and those of Elter, Hody and Simon related to Aristobulus cited by Walter, pp. XIII, XV, XVIII, see also: W. Christ, Philologische Studien zu Clemens Alexandrinus, ABAW 21, Abt. 3, Munich 1901, 457-526 (on the dependence of Clement on Tatian, Cassian, Dionysus of Halicarnassus, Apollodorus, Tallus, Justus of Tiberias); L. Gabriellson, Über die Quellen des Clemens Alexandrinus, Uppsala 1906 (on the dependence of Clement on Favorinus); W. Bousset, Jüdisch-christlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandria und Rom, Göttingen 1915, 205-218, 219-236 (repr. Hildesheim-New York 1975) (in the erudite treatment of the "Theft of the Greeks," Diebstahl der Hellenen, 205, Clement would have used an already constituted source, "ein Fremdkörper," "ein umfangreiches zusammenhängendes Werk" 216, which he would have incorporated later into the original text of the Stromata, see above all 216-218); J. Munck, Untersuchungen über Klemens von Alexandria, Stuttgart 1933, 136-142 (critique of the Bousset thesis); E. Molland, The Conception of the Gospel in the Alexandrian Theology, Oslo 1938, 52-65; J. Whittaker, Moses Atticizing: Phoenix 21 (1967) 196-201 (= Studies in Platonism and Patristic Thought, London 1984, VII); S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 29-31, 31-33; W. Speyer, Die literarische Fälschung im heidnischen und christlichen Altertum, Handbuch der Altertumswissenschaft I, 2, Munich 1971, 160-163; M.J. Edward, Atticizing Moses? Numenius, The Fathers and the Jews: VChr 44 (1990) 64-75; P. Pilhofer, Presbyteron Kreitton. Der Altersbeweis der jüdischen und christlichen Apologeten und seine Vorgeschichte, Tübingen 1990; D. Ridings, The Attic Moses: The Dependency Theme in Some Early Christian Writers (Studia Graeca et Latina Gothoburgensia 59), Göteborg 1995; W. Löhr, The Theft of the Greeks: RHE 95 (2000) 403-426.

S. Lilla

THELA (Thelepte), Council of. On 24 February 418, some 30 bishops of *Byzacena (*Africa) met under the presidency of their primate Donatianus of Thelepte, in the presence of Vincent and Fortunatian, legates to Proconsular Africa. It is likely that this council discussed some problems pertaining to *Pelagianism, thus preparing the plenary African council of 1 May 418, but what remains of the conciliar acts only addresses the reading of the circular letter sent by Pope *Siricius to all the African bishops to communicate to them the decisions reached in the Roman council of January 386. With this reading, the council accepted the Roman conciliar norms of 386, but modified them somewhat according to the African juridical tradition.

CCL 149, 54-65; Hfl-Lecl II, 68-75; Palazzini 5, 298; M.-E. Mombili Thumaini, L'aspect d'autonomie et de communion dans la praxis africaine des recours à Rome (IIIe-Ve siècles), Rome 2001, 173ff.; 202ff.

CH. MUNIER

THEMISTIUS. Deacon of *Alexandria (6th c.). A *monophysite Severian who opposed the doctrine embraced by the adherents of *Julian of Halicarnassus. According to *Liberatus of Carthage (Breviarium 19), during the patriarchate of *Timothy of Alexandria (517–535), Themistius revealed his conviction that "if we admit that the Christ's body is corruptible, we must also say that he was ignorant on any given topic, such as when he spoke about Lazarus." In response to Timothy's objections, Themistius began a *schism with Timothy's followers who were called the "*Agnoetae," or "those who do not know." *Theodosius, the patriarch of Alexandria at the time, went to *Constantinople in 536 and composed his Tomus ad Theodoram Augustam against Themistius, who responded in a first and a second antirrētikos, but only one has survived. Three other works of Themistius, which are attested to by the Lateran Council of 649, pertain directly to the agnoetic controversy. Among these is a document written "against what had been written by Constantine, bishop of Laodicea," which attempts to provide a response to a letter of *Constantine of Laodicea (d. 553) to the empress *Theodora (d. 548), a text that has only recently come to light. From *Photius's Bibliotheca (cod. 108) we learn that for a long time scholars knew about a debate between Themistius and the Alexandrian monk Theodore; nevertheless, only recently have many fragments from Theodore's work been edited and translated. The influence of Themistius's teaching on Christ's ignorance was not limited to monophysite circles nor to those of *Alexandria or *Constantinople. When Damian succeeded to the patriarchal throne in 578, he judged it necessary to write to the clergy in the monasteries of the East to condemn the Agnoetae. *Stephen, the Chalcedonian bishop of Hierapolis, who died before 594, condemned those who professed one sole nature in Christ and who used the *Scriptures to prove Christ's ignorance. *Gregory the Great in his Letter X,21 wrote a list of biblical objections against the doctrine of the Agnoetae.

CPG 7285-7292. For the editions, see E. Amman: DTC 15 (1946) 219-222; T. Hermann, Monophysitica: ZNW 32 (1933) 287-294; A. Grillmeier, 2/2, 1989, 379-400; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century, OLA 56, Leuven 1994, 3-102; Patrologia V, 152-153; 359-362.

P. ALLEN

THEOCTISTUS of Caesarea (d. after 260). Bishop of Palestinian *Caesarea, he was a friend and protector of *Origen. In agreement with *Alexander of Jerusalem he made him preach when he was still a layman, and in this respect he answered the protests voiced by *Demetrius of Alexandria (Eus., HE 6,19,16-19). Later, he ordained Origen a priest, according to *Photius (Bibl. cod. 118)—who confused him with his successor *Theotecnus—and received him at Caesarea when he was expelled from *Egypt. Upon Origen's death, he received from *Dionysius of Alexandria a letter of condolence (Photius, Bibl. cod. 232, 291B). He invited the same Dionysius to the Council of *Antioch, which addressed the question of the *Novatian schism (Eus., HE 6,46,3). He survived the *Decian and *Valerian persecutions and died after 260 under *Gallienus (HE 7,5,1; 7,14).

H. CROUZEL

THEODELINDA (Theodolinda). Queen of the *Longobards (Lombards) (ca. 589–616). The daughter of Garibald, king of the Bavarians, she married Authuri, king of the Longobards (probably in 589), and upon his death (590) she married *Agilulf, making him king. She obtained from him Catholic *baptism for their son Adaloald (who was born in 603). She received various letters from *Gregory the Great (Ep. IV,4 and 33; IX,67; XIV,12), who also made mention of her in other letters (IV,2 and 37). She helped reconcile the Longobards with the Roman population, but she opposed the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, in contrast to Constantius bishop of *Milan. Upon the death of Agilulf (616), Theodelinda continued to reign with Adaloald: a letter of the *Visigothic king *Sisebut sent to this king and queen has been preserved (Ep. Wisig. 9). Some precious objects preserved in the treasure of the Cathedral of Monza have been traced back to her, as in the case of the famous Iron Crown.

CPL 1719a; PLRE III 1235-1236; EC 11,1925.

E. MALASPINA

THEODERIC (Theodoric) the Great. King of the *Ostrogoths (471–526) and ruler over *Italy (493–526). Born in *Pannonia to Theodemir, who belonged to the Amaling family, and his Catholic mother Ereleuva; he was held hostage at *Constantinople, where he was educated (461–471). Having succeeded his father as the head of the Ostrogoths stationed around Novae in Moesia Inferior (i.e., N Bulgaria/coastal Romania), he supported the recovery of the imperial power by *Zeno (476), who as a reward appointed him as patricius and magister militum praesentalis, uniting him more closely to himself with a treaty for adoption. After years of warfare in *Macedonia, *Epirus and *Thessaly, Theoderic renewed his alliance with Zeno (483), which allowed him to establish himself with his people in Dacia Ripensis and in Moesia Inferior, appointing him again as the magister militum praesentalis and conferring on him the consulate (484). But when the Ostrogoths found themselves suffering again from starvation, Theoderic undertook to sack *Thrace, even to the point of threatening Constantinople. Finally, in 488 Zeno offered him the opportunity to organize his people in Italy, substituting him in the place of *Odoacer: once the Gepids had been conquered at *Sirmium, Theoderic's Ostrogoths reached Italy in August of 489 and defeated Odoacer at Soča and then at Verona; Odoacer fled to *Ravenna, while Theoderic established himself at *Milan. Besieged by Odoacer at Pavia, Theoderic freed himself with the assistance of the *Visigoths and defeated him on the Adda River, besieging him then for three years at Ravenna; after he had made peace with him, he shortly thereafter killed him, thus becoming the king of Italy (493). Already in 490, Theoderic had asked Zeno for the imperial insignia for a formal recognition of his authority in the West, but *Anastasius, who had succeeded Zeno (491), repeatedly evaded his requests until 497, when he sent Theoderic the insignia of power sent to him by Odoacer to Constantinople; however, he did not receive the purple garment and retained the title of rex but not Augustus.

Conceiving of the West as a confederation of Germanic nations presided over by the king of Italy through a web of alliances, Theoderic gave his daughter Theodegotha as wife to the *Visigothic king Alaric II and his Ostrogoth daughter Arevagni to *Sigismund, the hereditary Burgundian prince, while he himself in 493 underwent a second marriage with Audofleda, the sister of the Frankish king *Clovis I; in 500, moreover, he gave his sister Amalfrida as wife to the *Vandal king Thrasamund, whose daughter from his first marriage, Amalberga, married Ermanaric the king of the Thuringii; he adopted per arma Rudolf king of the Eruli. With diplomatic action, Theoderic sought to check Frankish expansionism, receiving in 506 the Alemanni, who had been defeated by Clovis, and then by attempting to impede the Franco-Burgundian coalition against the Visigoths, who were, however, defeated at Vouillé (507). After the death of his son-in-law Alaric II, Theoderic took over the Visigothic hegemony in southern *Gaul, warding off the Frankish occupation (508), while operating in the capacity of regent for his grandson Amalaric.

As king of Italy, he governed the *Arian Goths and the Romans by placing special value on Roman expertise in service of the public administration and encouraging the preservation of the bellicose traditions of the Gothic aristocracy. He promoted public works, esp. at *Rome and Ravenna; he allowed for the recommencement of the shows but called back the Roman officials to safeguard the public order. Among his collaborators were *Cassiodorus and *Boethius; *Ennodius commemorated him with a long *panegyric, composed shortly before the Battle of Vouillé (507); Cassiodorus's Variae contain many letters inspired by Theoderic and written in his name. One should perhaps also attribute to the Visigothic Theodoric II (453–466) the so-called Edictum Theodorici, which was decreed for Romans and Goths from the kingdom of *Toulouse, but in Italy Theoderic began the codification of Ostrogoth law (see Anon. Vales. 60). Perhaps under his kingdom at Ravenna the Codex Brixianus and the Codex Argenteus were composed, which contain *Wulfila's translation of the Bible. He promoted the healing of the Laurentian schism (499–506) which had broken out at Rome after the election of Pope *Symmachus, and he sent to the Senate the praeceptum Contra sacerdotes substantiae ecclesiae alienatores, dated to 11 March 507 or 508. But it was precisely at that time that the emperor Anastasius I preferred the Frankish king Clovis, the conqueror of the Visigoths, over Theoderic as his own Western partner (see Greg. Tur., Franc. II, 37). Worried about the destiny of his own kingdom—after the death of his son-in-law Eutharic (522)—the pro-Byzantine politics of the new Vandal king Hilderic and the imprisoning of the Burgundian King *Sigismund by work of the Franks (523), Theoderic suspected several Roman officials of treason—among whom were Albinus, Boethius and his father-in-law Thrasymachus—and accusing them of conniving with the emperor *Justin I, he sentenced them to death (524–525). Although the Byzantine court increasingly hardened its political action toward the Arians, Theoderic had Pope *John I go to Constantinople and intercede before Justin (525). Suspicious of the triumphal reception received by the pope, upon the pope's return to Ravenna, Theoderic ordered that he be imprisoned, where John died shortly thereafter. Three months later (30 August 526), Theoderic also died and was buried at Ravenna in the mausoleum that he had prepared for himself. His grandson Athalaric succeeded him under the regency of his mother Amalasuntha, the daughter of Theoderic and Audofleda. In the Germanic sagas, Theoderic is remembered with the name of Dietrich von Bern.

CPL 1806-1807; PLRE II, 1077-1084; A. Lippold: KLP 5, 685-687 (with bibl.). – MGH, Auct. ant. XII, 1894, 392.420-422.424 (T. Mommsen).

Studies: G. Della Valle, Teoderico e Roma: Rend. Acc. Arch. Lett. Napoli 34 (1959) 119-176; W. Ensslin, Theoderich der Grosse, Munich [2]1959; G. Astuti, Note sull'origine e attribuzione dell'Edictum Theoderici regis, in Studi in onore di E. Volterra, Milan 1971, V, 647-686; O. Hoelfler, Theoderich der Grosse und sein Bild in der Sage: AAWW 111 (1974) 349-372; D. Claude, Universale und partikulare Züge in der Politik Theoderichs: Francia 6 (1978) 19-58; G. Vismara, Edictum Theoderici, in Scritti di storia giuridica, 1, Milan 1987, 1-338; Teoderico il Grande e i Goti d'Italia. Atti del XIII Congr. Int. di Studi sull'alto Medioevo, Milan 2-6 novembre 1992, Spoleto 1993; B. Luiselli, Teodorico e gli Ostrogoti tra romanizzazione e nazionalismo gotico: RomBarb 13 (1994-95) 75-98; A. Garzya, Teoderico a Bisanzio. Teoderico e i Goti fra Oriente e Occidente, Ravenna 1995; F. Delle Donne, Teoderico "rex genitus": il concetto della nobiltà di stirpe nel panegirico di Ennodio: Invigilata lucernis 20 (1998) 73-84; U. Pizzani, Le lettere di Teoderico a Boezio e la mediazione culturale di Cassiodoro: Cassiodorus 4 (1998) 141-161; B. Saitta, The Ostrogoths in Italy: Polis 11 (1999) 197-216; S. Rota, Teoderico il Grande fra "Graecia" e "Ausonia": la rappresentazione del re ostrogotico nel "Panegyricus" di Ennodio: MEFRM 113/1 (2001) 203-243; G. Pilara, Ancora un momento di riflessione sulla politica italiana di Teoderico re dei Goti: StudRom 53/3-4 (2005) 431-469.

E. Malaspina

THEODORA (497–548). Empress of the East (527–548), wife of *Justinian I. Daughter of a guard of the hippodrome, she was born at *Constantinople in 497; an actress and a courtesan, she then followed one of her lovers into the Libyan *Pentapolis. In the East, she came into contact with the *monophysite hierarchy; she renounced her previous way of life and returned a redeemed woman to the capital, where she supported herself by spinning wool. In 520, she met *Justinian, who married her only after having abolished the restrictive juridical norms (CI 5,4,23) and after having elevated Theodora to the patrician rank (524/525). Theodora had an exceptional personality, a sharp mind, life experience and an energetic character. As the Augusta from 527 and co-regent of her husband, she had an important role in the leadership of the state, more than any other queen before or after her. Her name was mentioned in decretals and treatises; she demanded the proskynēsis; she met with ambassadors and exerted great influence on all the political officials. She supported the monophysites and was a friend of *Severus of Antioch, whom she recalled from exile, and facilitated the placement of *Anthimus of Trebisond over the patriarchal see of Constantinople. She favored the deposition of Pope *Silverius and the election of *Vigilius in 537. With her immense power, she supported ecclesiastical and humanitarian initiatives. Majestic and autocratic, she appears at the side of her husband in the mosaic of the basilica of S. Vitale in *Ravenna. She died on 28 June 548 and was buried in the Church of the Apostles at Constantinople. The contemporary historian *Procopius, who expressed the interests of the Senate and the landholding aristocracy, has distorted Theodora's image, emphasizing her negative qualities and thus also influencing subsequent biographies.

PWK 5A, 1776-1791; R. Browning, Justinian and Theodora, London 1971; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972; M. Amelotti, Teodora, moglie o imperatrice?: AFGG 20 (1984-85) 13-22; L. Migliardi Zingale, Osservazioni sulla domus divina di Teodora: AFGG 20 (1984-85) 142-149; H.-G. Beck, Lo storico e la sua vittima. Teodora e Procopio, Bari 1988; C. Capizzi, Giustiniano I tra politica e religione, Messina 1994; M.L. Silvestre, Prospettive politiche femminili tra tardo-antico e altomedioevo: Teodora e Amalasunta: Koinonia 21 (1997) 83-104.

J. Irmscher

THEODORA and DIDYMUS, martyrs. The memory of these two names should be connected to a text from the 4th c.: the Passio ss. Didymi et Theodorae. We possess an ancient Greek and Latin redaction of this text, for which we have two primary versions, one by *Eusebius of Emesa and the other by *Jerome. In sum, the work treats the episode of a virgin from *Alexandria who is sentenced by the law to the place of dishonor (i.e., the brothel), but she is rescued by the heroism of a young Christian man. The episode occurred in Alexandria when Culcianus, a man to be forgotten, persecuted the Christians (in magna illa aliquando Alexandrinorum civitate). Theodora was a virgin consecrated to God, as we know from the very moment she was summoned before him (Vocate Theodoram virginem). This detail allows us to understand that she was not a mere puella, but a virgo perpetua. In fact, in response to the judge's usual question about her condition, she answered: Christiana sum. To the judge's second question, whether she was a free woman or a slave, the young woman responded that she had been freed by Christ. Franchi de' Cavalieri, who has studied this text extensively both in Latin and in Greek, believes that the work was interpolated by a later hand.

Aside from all the philological discussions, one notes the courage of the young woman before the judge to give testimony to her faith during the trial and her resolve to maintain her identity as a virgin consecrated to God. One also sees this quality in her when, contrary to her ideal of life, a few days after she had been thrown into prison, the young woman was forced to obey the edict and sacrifice to the gods (Imperatores statuerunt vos quae estis vergines aut diis sacrificare aut iniuria meritorii provocari). He was unable to change her will in remaining resolute in her Christian faith. Her response bears witness to her faith and the Lord's promise (Nam et ego in Deo volo manere; Dei enim est promissio quantum ad meum votum pertinet: ipsi enim adiacet virginitas et confessio). With her usual calm, the young woman responded that she wished to maintain her promise of chastity to Christ.

This type of loyalty to God, an expression of her hope in Christ, should be considered an act of civil disobedience and even an attitude of disregard for imperial law, esp. when she reaffirms that she does not fear the emperors, but the King of the Martyrs (Ego confiteor Christum Dominum). For this reason, the judge allowed her three days of reflection before the sentencing. In jail, a young Christian man named Didymus arrived dressed in military clothes in order to deliver her. Following Didymus's instructions, she puts on the clothes of her deliverer (masculi vestimenta induta, imitabatur et habitum). Didymus remained in the place of the young woman, dressed in her clothing. When the soldier enters and sees a man, he does not hide his surprise (video enim virginem ad virum translatam et stupeo). Finally, Didymus, the athlete of Christ, is taken for martyrdom, and the young woman remains a virgin. The chief of the tribunal, taken over by anger and wanting to know nothing about his identity, orders the executioners to torture and decapitate him.

With respect to the value of the text, we maintain that despite the interpolations of the hagiographer, the Passio ss. Didymi et Theodorae can be considered authentic. The dialogue of the interrogation follows the procedure and the form of the judicial process, which was well known for the sobriety and the naturalness of its style, without insisting on the identity of Theodora. Nothing is known of her family or the circumstances of her arrest. According to Franchi de' Cavalieri, such a "disposition [condemnation to a brothel] must not have existed; we can be morally certain about this. Above all, the most authoritative sources—most notably Eusebius of Caesarea, who summarizes the contents of the various Diocletian edicts against the Christians—are completely silent about this" (ST 65,261). From the historical point of view, it seems strange that the name of the prefect is ignored. The redactor of this passio actually ignores not only the name of the prefect but also the name of the judge. Given this line of thought, the information that places the episode of this passio at *Antioch should be deemed a lapsus memoriae on the part of St. *Ambrose.

AASS. Aprilis, III, Venezia 1738, 570-575; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Note agiografiche: ST 65, Vatican City 1935, 233-278; A. Galuzzi, Teodora e Didimo: BS 12 (1969) 227-228; J. Gerard, Ces femmes qui firent l'histoire, Brussels s.d.; J.P. Kirsch, Theodora: LTK[1] 10, 45, and B. Kötting, Theodora: LTK[2] 10, 29-30; C. Lanéry, La Passion de Théodore et Dydime. Édition des trad. latines BHL 8072 et 8073: AB 122 (2004) 5-50.

M.W. Libambu

THEODORE, martyr. Theodore, a soldier, died a martyr at *Amasea and was buried at Euchaita in *Pontus (Aukhat, Turkey), where his tomb became a destination point for *pilgrimage, famous from the 4th c. onward. *Gregory of Nyssa delivered a homily (PG 46,736-748) there, which establishes our most ancient piece of information about Theodore. His feast day was celebrated there on 17 February. Other churches in his honor were constructed at *Constantinople in 452 (dedication 5 November), at *Ancyra (5 November 518), in Asia Minor and throughout the East. At *Rome, he is depicted on the apse mosaic of Sts. *Cosmas and Damian and is venerated in a church that bears his name located at the foot of the Palatine (dedication 9 November). Testimonies of the cult attributed to him exist at Messina, *Ravenna, *Naples, in Latium, Venice and Vercelli. In the 9th c., the legend divided the saint into a soldier and general, thus bringing with it a division of the liturgical feasts.

H. Delehaye, Les légendes grecques des saints militaires, Brussels 1909, 11-43, 121-202; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Attorno al più antico testo del Martyrium S. Theodori tironis, ST 22, 91-107; Vies des SS. 2, 150-52; LTK 10, 39-40; BS 12, 238-242; N. Oikonomides, Le dédoublement de saint Théodore et les villes d'Euchaita et d'Euchaneia: AB 104 (1986) 327-335; C. Zuckermann, The Reign of Constantine V in the Miracles of Theodore the Recruit (BHG 1764): REByz 46 (1988) 191-210.

V. Saxer

THEODORE, monk (6th c.). *Photius (cod. 108) spoke of the debate between *Themistius, the head of the *Agnoetae, and the Alexandrian monk Theodore, whose work titled the Confutatio brevis has recently been published. It is now possible to better document the development of the discussion between the two supporters of the doctrine of the sole nature in Christ. According to Photius, Themistius primarily set forth arguments to prove Christ's ignorance; Theodore responded to this challenge. Themistius subsequently wrote against Theodore a monobiblion titled Kalonymus, alias Themistius, Apologia pro Theophobio, which Theodore refuted in three volumes. Photius had read one of Theodore's works titled the Confutatio brevis. Just as the apology for Theophobius is cited in the recently edited fragments, the Confutatio brevis must be identified with the apology in three volumes. Given that in Theodosius of Alexandria's text, it is spoken of in the past tense, a dating subsequent to the death of Theodosius in 566 can be assigned to the apology. Theodore's refutation of Themistius, then, was not a compendium, as the title could suggest.

Seven fragments from Theodore's work have been preserved. In the first two, the monk affirms that Christ as a human being was ignorant; he was responsible for this fault. In the third fragment, Theodore concludes that the knowledge that Christ possessed did not come from his humanity but that the humanity becomes perfect in knowledge because of the hypostatic union. Then the monk summarizes the proof starting from the teachers of the orthodox faith on the question (fr. 5). In the last two fragments he attempts to refute Themistius's claims that the doctors of the church, esp. *Cyril of Alexandria, contradict each other. Theodore's Confutatio brevis helps illuminate Themistius's teaching and likewise demonstrates the crucial importance of patristic proof in the agnoetic debate.

CPG 7295; A. Van Roey - P. Allen, Monophysite Texts of the Sixth Century, OLA 56, Leuven 1994, 78-102 with Latin trans.; see Photius, Bibliotheca 108. T. Hermann, Monophysitica: ZNW 32 (1933) 287-293; W. Ensslin, PWK 2. Reihe, 5 (1934) 1916-1917; A. Van Roey, Unedited Monophysite Documents of the Sixth Century: SP 20 (1989) 79; A. Grillmeier 2/2, 1989, 380-383; Van Roey - Allen, 3-15, 72-77.

P. Allen

THEODORE, pope (642–649). Theodore's Father was a Greek from *Jerusalem. Upon succeeding Pope *John IV, he was consecrated on 24 November 642. During this historical period, many exiles from the Middle East, which had been invaded by the Arabs, came to *Rome. He lived the first months of his pontificate during the revolt of the chartularios Maurice at Rome against the exarch of *Ravenna Isaac the Armenian (LP I,331-332). Theodore's selection is a sign of the close relations between Rome and *Palestine, which, with *Africa, was a center of opposition to *monothelitism (Bertolini, 327-328). Theodore continued these relations by deposing *Sergius of Jerusalem and appointing his vicar Stephen of Dor, primarily to safeguard orthodoxy in that location (Mansi 10,891). Immediately upon being elected, he received three letters from *Constantinople: from the emperor *Constans II (641–668); the synodical letter of *Paul, the new patriarch who had succeeded *Pyrrhus; and a letter from consecrated bishops, which was sent to John IV, who in the meanwhile had died. Theodore responded to all three individuals (Jaffé 2049-2050; 2052). In a letter to Paul, he demanded as a condition of his recognition a regular juridical procedure for the deposition of Pyrrhus, and asked from all the condemnation of monothelite teaching. Pyrrhus, moreover, went to Africa where, in 645, he was refuted in a public debate by *Maximus the Confessor (Mansi 10,709-760); then he went to Rome along with Maximus: here he publicly and solemnly recanted and was treated with all honor (LP I,332); but subsequently, having fled to Ravenna at the court near the exarch Plato, he returned to monothelitism, for which reason Theodore excommunicated him (LP I,332), and he (i.e., Pyrrhus) went to Constantinople. In the meanwhile, relations with Paul also became more tense; through pressure from the African bishops (Jaffé 2055), Theodore sent a delegation to Constantinople to demand a profession of faith from Paul, who responded by professing his open adherence to monothelitism (Mansi 10,1019-1026). As a result, the pope deposed him (LP I,333; Mansi 10,878), and the patriarch responded with harsh rejoinders (LP I,333). The emperor Constans, with the objective of overcoming the debates, published in 648 the Typos (Mansi 10,1029-1039; see Martino 1), which was condemned with *Heraclius's Ekthesis in the Lateran Council of 649. Theodore had several religious building projects undertaken at Rome, esp. in the chapel of St. Venantius in S. Giovanni in Fonte, where he is represented on a mosaic. He died on 14 May 649 and was buried in St. *Peter's Basilica; *Martin I succeeded him.

CPL 1732; Verzeichnis 558; PL 78, 75-102; PLS 4, 1997–1999; LP I, 331-335; III, 94; DTC 15, 224-226; CE 14, 16; Fliche-Martin V, 230-235, 531-532; G. Ladner, Die Bildnisse der östlichen Päpste des 7. und 8. Jahrhunderts in römischen Mosaiken und Wandgemälden, in Atti del V Congr. Int. Studi Bizantini, II, Rome 1940, 169-182 (repr. 1978); O. Bertolini, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi, Bologna 1941, 327-337; P. Conte, Chiesa e Primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971, 433-442 (MS tradition and discussion on the epistolary correspondence; moreover, see the index on p. 585); L. Magi, La sede romana nella corrispondenza degli imperatori e patriarchi bizan- tini (VI-VII sec.), Rome-Louvain 1972, 212-221; A.N. Stratos, Il Patriarca Pirro: Byzantina 8 (1976) 9-19 (in Greek); J.-M. Sansterre, Les moines grecs et orientaux à Rome aux époques byzantine et carolingienne: milieu du VI^e s. - fin du IX^e s., 2 vols., Brussels 1980-93; P. Conte, Il sinodo lateranense dell'ottobre del 649, Rome 1989; EPapi 1, 594-598.

A. Di Berardino

THEODORE, presbyter (d. after 687). The presbyter Theodore, who was twice a candidate for the bishop of *Rome, is probably to be identified with the Roman legate of the same name at the Sixth Council of *Constantinople (680). The first time, upon the death of John V (2 August 686), he was supported by the military party against the archpriest Peter, the clergy's candidate. After two months of disagreement, the two parties agreed on the name of *Conon, who was consecrated pope on 21 October 686. After Conon died on 21 September 687, Theodore, who had become archpresbyter in the meantime, supported by the army entered the fray onc eagain against the archpresbyter Paschal. Over these two competitors, a third candidate was once again preferred, the priest *Sergius, who was of Eastern origin. When he had entered the Lateran basilica, forcing its doors open, Theodore, in contrast to Paschal, refrained from any form of resistance and professed obedience to him and gave him the kiss of peace. The events surrounding Theodore revealed the divisions existing at Rome at the end of the 7th c.

LP I, 350.368, 371-372; EC 11, 1932; EPapi 1, 627, 629-633.

A.V. Nazzaro

THEODORE ABU QURRAH (8th–9th c.)
I. Introduction - II. Life - III. Works.

I. Introduction. "The first Father of the church who wrote in Arabic," according to Becker (Christliche Polemik, 1912), and we can certainly say that he was a representative of the *Melkite Church, who provided the most extensive interpretation of the changes underway in the Eastern churches after the Arab rule, which occurred in the 1st half of the 7th c., changes that led to an attitude of absolute closure to a climate of cultural confrontation.

II. Life. For the reference that he himself made in the treatise on the defense of icons, we know that he was born at *Edessa; however, with respect to the date of his birth, various hypotheses have been made starting from certain pieces of information interpreted in different ways. The first piece of information is that Abu Qurrah himself says that he was the spiritual disciple of *John of Damascus. The second piece of information pertains to his presence in 824 at the court of the Caliph al-Ma'mūn, after which he held a long discussion with the caliph in the year 829 (a third marker). The reconstructions of the dates of his birth and death depend on the interpretation of these three pieces of information. Generally speaking, the wavering goes from 720 to 755 for the date of his birth, depending whether, on the one hand, the mention of discipleship under John of Damascus in the monastery of St. *Sabas is understood only spiritually, without conceding that the two men ever met or, on the other hand, whether it is understood as a true and direct discipleship. Following from these data and related to them, it is proposed that his itinerant ministry (more difficult to allow in an advanced age) and the debates with the Caliph al-Ma'mūn (assuming they actually took place) are easier to accept if they occurred in an advanced age rather than when he was almost 100 years old.

Having been formed at Edessa in a Syrian milieu, he entered as a young man in the laura of St. Sabas, where he studied theology and the writings of the church fathers and where he acquired a knowledge of Greek. He was appointed Bishop of Ḥarrān in 795. Between 812 and 815, he began his itinerant activity when he went to *Armenia for a debate with a representative of the *Jacobite church after having sent a letter to the king of Armenia at the request of Thomas patriarch of *Jerusalem (811–820). His itinerant activity continued in *Egypt at *Alexandria and at Jerusalem, where he convinced his Jacobite friend David to become a Melkite Christian. His trip to Baghdad is disputed, but he was certainly reelected bishop of Ḥarrān around 820. Those who maintain the authenticity of the dialogue with the Caliph al-Ma' mūn of 829 set this date as the terminus post quem of his death.

III. Works. According to Bach, his literary production began at the monastery of St. Sabas and did not stop once he entered the episcopate. He embraced three languages: *Greek, *Syriac and *Arabic. Nothing remains of the 30 treatises in Syriac that he tells us he wrote, although his literary production in Greek and Arabic has survived. His literary production in Greek includes 43 works of various lengths that were published in the PG 97,1461-1610. Scholars have debated the authenticity of this literary production, recognizing, however, that the brief and concise style of the dialogues and the procedure of the theological thought that rest primarily on logic rather than on the authority of the *Scriptures correspond to Abu Qurrah's style. Dick maintained that the dialogues occurred in Arabic and were transcribed in Greek at a later time. Nevertheless, the critical edition is lacking. The literary production in Arabic includes 19 works that have already been published and partially translated into the major European languages and nine unpublished works, along with some works that have been attributed to him. Among his major compositions in Arabic, the following treatises are of note: On the Existence of the Creator and the True Religion; On the Veneration of Images; Freedom; On the Path of the Knowledge of God and the Truth of the Eternal Son, a treatise that refutes those who deny the incarnation and substantiation of God the Son; On the Fact That Christ Died by His Own Choice; A Refutation of the Armenians with Respect to Confessional Questions; A Debate with the Muslim Mutakallimūn at the Court of al-Ma'mūn.

S.K. Samir, Abū Qurrah. Al-sīrah wa-al-marāgi,' Beirut 2000 (this is the Arabic text with biographical information and the most updated bibl.); S.K. Samir, Abū Qurrah. Al-mu'allafāt, Beirut 2000 (in Arabic, the author attempts to create a complete portrait of Abu Qurrah); Teodoro Abū Qurrah, La libertà, Arabic text, ed. S.K. Samir, intr. and tr. ed. P. Pizzi, Turin 2001 (in the intro., the author draws a complete picture of the life and all the literary works of Abu Qurrah); S.H. Griffith, Reflections on the Biography of Theodore Abū Qurrah: Parole de l'Orient 18 (1993) 150-152; Teodoro Abū Qurrah, La difesa delle icone. Trattato sulla venerazione delle immagini, ed. P. Pizzo, Patrimonio Culturale Arabo Cristiano 1, Milan 1995; C. Bacha, Mayāmir Tāwdūrus Abī Qurrah usquf Ḥarrān, Beirut 1904; Id., Un traité des oeuvres arabes de Théodore Abou-Kurra, évêque de Haran, publié et traduit en Français pour la première fois, Tripoli-Rome 1905; H. Becker, Christliche Polemik und islamische Dogmenbildung: Zeitschrift für Assyriologie und verwandte Gebiete 26 (1912) 175-195, now in Islamstudien: Vom Werden und Wesen der islamische Welt, Hildesheim 1967, vol. 1; I. Dick, Maymar fī wuǧud al-hāliq wa-l-dīn al-qawīm li-Tāwdūrus Abī Qurrah (al-mutawaffā ḥawla sanat 825 m.), Junieh-Rome 1982; G. Graf, Geschichte der Christlichen Arabischen Literatur, II: Die Schriftsteller bis zur Mitte des 15. Jahrhunderts, ST 133, Vatican City 1947, 3-26; Id., Die arabischen Schriften des Theodor Abū Qurra, Bischofs von Ḥarrān (ca. 740-820). Literarhistorische Untersuchungen und Übersetzung, Forschungen zur christlichen Literaturund Dogmengeschichte, 10 Band, 3 und 4 Heft, Paderborn 1910; S.H. Griffith, Free Will in Christian Kalām: The Doctrine of Theodore Abū Qurrah: Parole de l'Orient 14 (1987) 79-107; J. Nasrallah, Histoire du mouvement littéraire dans l'église melchite du Ve au XXe siècle, t. II/2, (750-Xe s.), Louvain 1987, with respect to Abu Qurrah, see esp. pp. 104-134; B.N. Nassif, Religious Dialogue in Eighth Century: Example from Theodore Abu Qurra Treatise: Parole de l'Orient 30 (2005) 333-340.

D. Righi

THEODORE ASKIDAS (d. 558). Archbishop of *Caesarea in *Cappadocia, he died in January 558 at *Constantinople. Theodore was the abbot of the New *Laura near *Jerusalem. He was a strong admirer of *Origen and was secretly favorable to *monophysitism. He participated at the Council of Constantinople (536) and remained in the capital, where he enjoyed much respect before the empress *Theodora and became an intimate friend with the emperor *Justinian (Evagr. Schol., HE 4,38). In 537 he obtained the metropolitan see of Cappadocia, but he resided more often in the imperial court than in his own diocese. Theodore, however, was unable in 543 to hinder Justinian and the patriarch *Menas from condemning the Origenists, and he signed the edict. In 544–545, probably to vindicate Origen from this condemnation (Liberatus of Byzacena, Brev. 24,167-169), he suggested to the emperor that the best means for bringing the monophysites back to ecclesial unity was to condemn as infested with *Nestorianism the so-called *Three Chapters, and Justinian did this very thing. This act incited a broad controversy, during which Pope *Vigilius, who was already under surveillance, deposed Theodore in 551. In the following year, Theodore submitted; as a result, the last years of his life were spent in peace. Only one fragment from his writings exist in a work written by *Evagrius Scholasticus (HE 4,38) in which he says that after the resurrection all human beings will be equal to Christ.

CPG 6988; PG 86, 2777c-2780d; E. Schwartz, Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians (ABAW.PPH. 18), Munich 1939; W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972, 279-280; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 75; B. Daley, What Did "Origenism" Mean in the Sixth Century?, in Origeniana Sexta, Leuven 1995, 626-638; Patrologia V, 316-317.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEODORE BAR KONI (8th c.). Theodore bar Koni was a monk at Kaskar, in Beth Aramaye (Iraq), near the school of which, probably established toward the end of the 6th c., he taught biblical *exegesis. The document by which he is known to us and which was probably completed around 792 bears the title of The Book of the Scholia, a title in conformity with the custom of thus naming the collections of brief notes of clarification pertaining to the passages and topics of specific points of difficulty in the *Scriptures or in theological debate. What Theodore, therefore, proposed was the composition of a manual that introduced students to the exegesis practiced in the schools, or rather, to the teaching of the interpreter par excellence of the Scriptures in the *dyophysite milieu, namely *Theodore of Mopsues-

tia. Of the eleven treatises that compose the work, nine correspond to this project, containing notes in the forms of questions and answers, pertaining to the methodological questions that were philosophical-theological and exegetical in the strict sense. At the end of the ninth treatise, the copyist's note could allow one to conclude that this was probably the point at which a first redaction of the text came to an end. There are, however, two subsequent "books" added to the first, in which Theodore redacted an apology for Christianity against Islam (one should recall that Kaskar was near the Arab city of al-Wasit, established in 702; for this reason relations with the Islamic world were esp. intense in the region) and, therefore, a list of the heresies that contains at times information of extraordinary interest such as that pertaining to *Bardesanes, *Mani and the *Mandeans, which Theodore derived directly from the original sources in Aramaic. The Book of the Scholia has come down to us in two recensions of different sizes and internal organization, with slightly different materials.

Duval 368-369; Baumstark 218-219; Chabot 107-108; Ortiz de Urbina 216-221; BBKL 11, 967-968; Patrologia V, 492-493. Editions: CSCO Scriptores syri 19, 26; 187-188; 193-194; 197-198.

Studies: E. Benveniste, Le témoignage de Théodore bar Konai sur le Zoroastrisme: Le Monde Oriental 26 (1932) 170-215; L. Brade, Untersuchungen zum Scholienbuch des Theodoros bar Konai; die Übernahme des Erbes von Theodoros von Mopsuestia in der nestorianischen Kirche, Wiesbaden 1975; Id., Die Herkunft von Prologen in den Paulusbriefexegesen des Theodors bar Konai und Ishodad von Merv: OC 60 (1976) 162-171; S.H. Griffith, Chapter Ten of the "Scholion": Theodore bar Kônî's Apology for Christianity: OCP 47 (1981) 158-188; D. Kruisheer, Theodore Bar Koni's Ktābā d-ʿeskolyon as a Source for the Study of Early Mandeism: Jahrbuch "Ex Oriente Lux" 33 (1993–94) [1995] 151-169.

P. Bettiolo

THEODORE of Alexandria (6th c.). *Jacobite patriarch of *Alexandria; the successor of *Theodosius after a certain interval of time. The circumstances of his ordination are interesting for the history of *monophysitism. Theodosius, the archpresbyter, with his nephew Theodore the archdeacon, sent *Longinus bishop of Nobadae, in Nubia, to consecrate a new patriarch. While on his way to Alexandria (575), in the monastery of Rhamnis, Longinus, along with two Syrian bishops, consecrated Abbot Theodore to the patriarchate, a man who was of Syrian origin, and that against the latter's will. Paul, who was the suspended patriarch of *Antioch and who was found by Longinus in the monastery of Mareotis, stated that he was in agreement with the ordination. In a letter, Longinus informed the Alexandrian Christians of what had taken place, but the clergy became outraged because they already had Peter as their patriarch. Although Theodore had already changed the synodica with Paul (John of Ephesus, HE 4,48), he remained in his monastery; he was a humble and peaceful monk and did not fret about his ordination. After Peter's death (577), the Alexandrians left him alone and proceeded to elect *Damian. Theodore was still alive in the year *Paul of Antioch died (582). His letter to Paul has been preserved (in *Syriac).

CPG 7236. 7205; I.-B. Chabot: CSCO 17, 298-308; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés, Louvain 1951, 200-204 (see the index); J. Maspéro, Histoire des Patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923; Patrologia V, 391-392.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEODORE of Aquileia (d. 319?). When *Constantine promulgated the edict of freedom (i.e., *Edict of Milan, 313), Theodora was governing the church of *Aquileia. Later episcopal lists (9th c.) situate him in the fourth or fifth place in a series of Aquileian bishops. Scholars have debated the years of his episcopate (308–319?), but a definite date for his life and participation is attested to at the anti-*Donatist Synod of *Arles in 314, where, along with his deacon Agatho, he signed the synodal Acts as the episcopus de civitate Aquileiensi, provincia Dalmatiae. But more than his participation at this council, the most eloquent testament to his work are two famous inscriptions on the splendid mosaic floor from the first buildings built by him in the rich and populated Adriatic metropolis immediately after Constantine's Edict of Milan.

PCBE 2, 2166; G.C. Menis, Nuovi studi iconologici sui mosaici teodoriani di Aquileia, Udine 1971; G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 156-168 (with bibl.); G.C. Menis, La cultura teologica del clero aquileiese all'inizio del IV secolo: AAAd 22 (1982) 463-527.

G. Cuscito

THEODORE of Bostra (d. after 570). Along with *Jacob Baradeus (542–578), Theodore had a decisive influence on the survival of the *monophysite church (*Jacobite) after the death of *Severus patriarch of *Antioch (d. 538). When the Ghassanid Emir Hareth bar Gabala asked the empress *Theodora for two monophysite bishops for the regions of *Mesopotamia, *Syria, *Palestine and *Arabia, the patriarch of *Alexandria Theodosius, a monophysite who had been exiled to *Constantinople, appointed in 542 (1) Jacob Baradeus (hence the name "Jacobite church") for the see of *Edessa, and (2) Theodore, a monk from Arabia, for the province of Arabia Secunda, whose metropolis was *Bostra. Theodore never resided in the city but in the Field (hertha) of the Saracens, located in Golan. Theodore's episcopal activity was not extraordinary: it was certainly less known than that of Jacob Baradeus. While he was at Constantinople in 564, he certainly approved with the Letter to Paul of Beth Ukkāmē the election of *Paul as patriarch of Antioch (J.B. Chabot, Documenta ad origines monophysitarum illustrandas, CSCO 17, 94-96: text; 113, 65-66: translation). In 567 he was in the East; in 569 he was again at Constantinople, where he attacked the tritheists and excommunicated *Conon of Tarsus. In 570, while he was in the East, he was sent by *Justin II (565–578) to discuss issues about the faith at Constantinople, once he was able to return to the East with safe conduct, despite the opposition of patriarch John of Sirmin. He died shortly after 570. There also remain two fragments from Letters written along with Jacob Baradeus, one directed to the monks to exhort them to protect themselves from the tritheists, and the other to Paul of Antioch to comfort him in his persecutions (J.B. Chabot, CSCO 17, 165-166 and 179-180: text; 113, 115-116 and 125-126: translation).

CPG III, 7201, see 7173-7174; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VI[e] siècle: CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 157-164. 169. 172. 176. 185. 201, 1.211,5; Patrologia V, 320.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Canterbury. Greek monk residing at *Rome but a native of *Cilicia. Already 70 years old, he was ordained on 26 March 668 as the archbishop of *Canterbury by Pope *Vitalian by appointment of the abbot *Hadrian of Nisida, who followed Theodore to England. Here the church's condition had for a long time deteriorated through a lack of bishops and the inadequacy for the role of the few who had remained, with disastrous results for all aspects of religious life. Theodore dedicated himself with great energy to quelling the abuses and to filling the gaps of the episcopate. In 673 he convoked a council at Hertford to provide a more solid disciplinary organization for the church of England. With Hadrian's collaboration, he promoted study and introduced the use of Gregorian chant in England. He did not hesitate to depose *Wilfrid from his see of *York because he regarded him as insufficiently deferential to his authority. His great achievement was the reorganization of England's dioceses: he divided the dioceses of Mercia and Northumbria, which were too large; he was able to stop idiosyncratic movements and provided unity for the entire ecclesiastical organization. With him, after the troubled results from *Augustine's mission, the church of England assumed a structure that was destined to remain definitive. He died in 690.

CPL 1885; DCB 4, 926-932; W. Reany, St. Theodore of Canterbury, Saint Louis 1944; BS 12, 243-244; Archbishop Theodore: Commemorative Studies on his Life and Influence, ed. M. Lapidge, Cambridge 1995; BBKL 11, 869-874.

M. Simonetti

THEODORE of Constantinople (7th c.). Deacon and also rhetorician and synodicarius of patriarch *Paul II of Constantinople (641–654), Theodore was the author of two aporiae ("questions" or "difficulties") against the orthodox teaching of the two wills in Christ. These are to be found among the writings of *Maximus the Confessor (580–662; PG 91,216-217), who provided his response to the presbyter Marinus (PG 91,217-228). The first aporia such as ignorance places ignorance and will in Christ on the same level and therefore concludes that in Christ the will must be preached κατ' οἰκείωσιν ("according to appropriation"); Maximus showed that the aporia is contradictory in its own terms: in fact, the will signifies the position of something, although ignorance is its destruction; if then the will and ignorance have the same rationale (λόγος), it follows that in God there is ignorance and that inanimate things have a will; he, therefore, lists the consequences for *Christology (there would be in Christ two ignorances and two wills; according to the mode of understanding the appropriation falls into *Docetism, *Apollinarism etc.). The second aporia affirms that the statement "natural will," which, not having been used by the church fathers, leads to a new teaching; Maximus approved the patristic use of the expression and affirmed that the Fathers attributed the will to nature.

CPG III, 7632; Bardenhewer 5, 20; Beck 433.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Copros. *Monophysite deacon of Copros (or Copris near *Alexandria) in the 2nd half of the 6th c. He is perhaps the same individual named by *John of Ephesus as the *archdeacon. He, along with the presbyter and the church attorney (ἐκκλησιέκδικος) Theodosius (John of Ephesus speaks of an archpresbyter Theodosius), invited *Longinus, bishop for six years of Nobadae (a people of *Nubia near the border with the Byzantine Empire), to come secretly to Mareotis (near Alexandria) to consecrate a patriarch for the *Jacobite church of Alexandria, whose see had been vacant for nine years: Theodore the Syrian *archimandrite was ordained (575; John of Ephesus IV,9, in E.W. Brooks, CSCO 105,188-189: text; 106, pp. 140-141: translation). The fragment of the Letter to Longinus is in J.B. Chabot, Documenta ad origines monophysitarum illustrandas (CSCO 17,273-274: text; 103, 191: translation).

CPG III, 7225; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VI^e siècle: CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 226-227; Patrologia V, 405.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Echinus (5th c.). Bishop of Echinus in *Thessaly in the 1st quarter of the 5th c. The city of Echinus was Christianized after *Constantine's victory. We know very little concerning the life of this church; the only thing we know is that four of its bishops, one of which was Theodore, took part in the Council of *Ephesus (431) and signed its conciliar acts.

G. Ladocsi

THEODORE of Heraclea (d. ca. 355). Elected bishop of Heraclea—ancient Perinthus, situated on the Sea of Marmara and the metropolis of the Diocletian province of Europa (modern-day Marmara Ereğlisi)—Theodore was one of the proponents of the anti-Nicene front established and guided by *Eusebius of Nicomedia. Although *Gelasius of Cyzicus named him among the representatives of that minority of the Council of *Nicaea that supported the teaching of *Arius (HE II,7), the documentation pertaining to the list of participants attests that instead it was his predecessor Paideros who took part in that council (Turner I,1 n. 203). His election as bishop occurred in the context of the personal politics led by Eusebius of Nicomedia against the Nicene front. It could not have occurred before 328, the year of the latter's reentry from exile to which he was sentenced immediately after the Council of *Nicaea (*Socrates, HE I, 23), and certainly not after 333/334, the year in which Theodore appears for the first time in the sources, mentioned by *Sozomen (HE III,1), inasmuch as he was an opponent of the election of *Paul of Samosata as bishop of *Constantinople (334). During the Council of *Tyre (335) he was among the chief opponents of *Athanasius and took part in the synodal commission charged with examining the validity of the protests forwarded by the Meletians against him (Soz., HE II,25; Athan., Apol. 13,2; Socr., HE I,31; Theod., HE I,30). Not all the sources are in agreement on his presence at the Council of Constantinople, which was convoked by *Constantine to reexamine the case of Athanasius (336), although it is certain that he participated in 342 in the delegation sent to provide clarifications for the emperor *Constans II concerning the deposition of *Paul of Samosata and Athanasius, in an attempt to bring an end to the differences between Easterners and Westerners (Soz., HE III,10; Socr., II,18). He was among the signatories of the council of Eastern bishops that occurred at Philippopolis in 343 (Theod., HE II,8; Athan., Apol. 46,1.47,3) and, precisely because of his influence within the anti-Nicene front, was excommunicated by the parallel Council of *Sardica (343), which was held by the Westerners (Hilary, FH B II, 1). His name is also found among the list of signatories of the theological formula of the Council of *Sirmium of 351 (Hilary, FH B VII,9; Athan., De Synod., 27,2). He was opposed to Athanasius's reentry at *Alexandria, participating at a gathering of nearly 30 bishops at *Antioch which Sozomen dated between the death of Pope *Julius (352) and the Council of *Milan of 355 (HE IV,8). During this same year, Pope *Liberius informed the emperor *Constantius of his death (Theod., HE II,16).

The majority of the information pertaining to his exegetical activity is owed to *Jerome (Vir. ill. 90), who states that he knew his commentaries on *Matthew, *John, the *Psalms and Paul's epistles, appreciating his style and exegetical insight. In the 5th c., *Theodoret referred generically to Theodore's commentaries on the gospels, thereby confirming Jerome's judgment (HE II,2) and, likewise in the 2nd half of the 6th c., *Ammonius of Alexandria used his commentary on the gospel of John (Reuss, Der Presbyter Ammonios, 159ff.). Of all his work, only fragments preserved in the catena remain, limited to commentaries on Matthew, John and Isaiah, in which he shows that he was very well-versed in the different techniques of interpretation used by the representatives of the two exegetical schools of the time, without, however, subjecting the biblical text to one method over another, but choosing to make use of an exegetical procedure that was different in relation to the meaning that he wished to attribute to each passage of Scripture. In particular, even those passages on which he seems to have commented according to a rigidly literal exegetical perspective and in which he allows himself to engage in an extensive paraphrase, he always lets his readers know that the true understanding of Scripture is the spiritual meaning, regardles of whether in order to reach it, it is sufficient to stop at the literal sense or it is necessary to have recourse to an *allegorical procedure.

From the doctrinal point of view, his christological formulation is heavily subordinationist, even though far from the radical positions articulated by *Arius. The inferiority of the Logos is established primarily between the Father, who is the only unbegotten, and the Son, who is the only begotten from the Father, and who were conceived as two subsistent hypostases. The intermediary function of the Son is understood according to the traditional thinking in which the incarnation is the fulfillment of the revelatory activity of the Logos, already begun with the OT theophanies, to which is added the soteriological character of the death and resurrection of the Son. Trinitarian theology is, practically speaking, absent, although there is the exception for the very few references to the *Holy Spirit, which reveal the Spirit's subordination to the Father and the Son and a function of mediation between God and the world, which is more limited with respect to the latter. This perspective is perfectly inserted within the framework of the trinitarian reflection of the first phase of the Arian controversy, during which the question of the Holy Spirit had little importance. Among the fragments published under his name, some have been included that contain the term homoousios, but precisely for this reason they cannot be attributed to him (see frags. 133, 134 on Mt and frags. 70, 257, and 334 on Jn). Likewise for doctrinal reasons, one cannot consider authentic those fragments whose contents refer to later theological contexts, which can be traced back to *Apollinaris of Laodicea and *Basil of Caesarea (see frags. 117, 126, 302, 310, 315 and 336 on Jn). In the commentary on Isaiah, however, one uncovers the problems of attribution owed to the disagreement between the MSS which can in large part be attributed to errors of erasure and transcription of lemmata (see frags. on Is 26:10, Is 26:14, Is 32:15, Is 57:15, Is 60:10, Is 64:5).

CPG III, 3561-3567; DCB 4, 933; LTK 10, 40; A. Mai, Nova Patrum Bibliotheca, VI, 6, Rome 1853; M. Faulhaber, Die Propheten-Katenen, Freiburg 1899, 39-62; J. Reuss, Matthäus-Kommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Berlin 1957 (TU 61), 55-95; Id., Johannes-Kommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Berlin 1966 (TU 89), 65-176; Id., Der Presbyter Ammonios von Alexandrien und sein Kommentar zum Johannesevangelium: Biblica 44 (1963) 159-170; Simonetti 596; K.Ch. Felmy, Orthodoxe Theologie. Eine Einführung, Darmstadt 1990, 40ff.; BBKL 24, 1479-1485; K. Schäferdiek, Theodor von Heraklea (328/34-351/55). Ein wenig beachteter Kirchenpolitiker und Exeget des 4. Jhs., in Romanitas-Christianitas. FS J. Straub, Berlin 1982, 392-410.

E. Valeriani

THEODORE of Marseille (d. 594). Theodore lived at the time of the internal wars which, because of dynastic reasons, disrupted the city of *Marseille after the death of the Merovingian king *Chlothar I (561). Theodore actively participated there once he had become bishop (575), just as he had undertaken under the religious aspect to reorder a diocese which was otherwise rebellious and in an uproar. Imprisoned twice (the second time for having supported the nomination of Gundovald, who came from *Constantinople and was perhaps sent by the emperor Tiberius II: hence the hypothesis of Theodore's Eastern origin—Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. VI,24) and was persecuted for a long time but was always miraculously delivered from death (Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. VIII, 12). He participated at the Synod of Macon (Mansi 9, 957). *Gregory the Great wrote to him advising him of the need for greater meekness and more active work in preaching and his commitment to the Christianization of the *Jews (Ep. I, 45). He died on 2 January 594.

BS 12, 253-257; S. Boesch Gaiano, Per una storia degli Ebrei in Occidente tra Antichità e Medioevo. La testimonianza di Gregorio: Quaderni Medievali 8 (1979) 12-43.

F. Cocchini

THEODORE of Martigny (d. after 390). First bishop of Martigny (Octodurus), he participated along with *Ambrose of Milan at the Council of *Aquileia in 381 (Mansi 3,599) and that of *Milan around 390, signing the letter sent by the synod to Pope *Siricius (Mansi 3,664-667; 689-690). According to the letter written by *Eucherius to bishop *Salvius, Theodore is the source of the information pertaining to the *martyrdom of St. *Maurice and his companions at Agaunum (Eucher., Ep. ad Salv.: CSEL 31,173). He had found their bodies and constructed a basilica in their honor (Eucher., Pass. Acaun. 7). For the miraculous events attributed to Theodore and the spread of his cult, see BS 12,257-258.

L. Lathion, Théodore d'Octodure et les origines chrétiennes du Valois, Lausanne 1961; BBKL 11, 881-884 (bibl.); LTK[3] 9, 1416 (bibl.).

A. Pollastri

THEODORE of Mopsuestia (d. 428). Student of *Diodore of Tarsus, who was likewise an Antiochene, Theodore's birth can be set around 350. If he is to be identified with the Theodore whom *John Chrysostom addressed, he was one of his fellow students at the school of *Libanius and a monk, whom his friend dissuaded from abandoning the ascetic for a worldly life. A presbyter around 383, he was ordained bishop of *Mopsuestia (*Cilicia) in 392 and died in 428. A famous representative of Antiochene *exegesis and theology, he was highly valued and admired during his life, but he subsequently became involved in the *Nestorian controversy inasmuch as he was considered, as with Diodore of Tarsus, a forerunner of *Nestorius's *Christology. Having become the favorite target of the *monophysites, he was condemned at the Council of *Constantinople of 553 (the controversy of the *Three Chapters).

The condemnation of Theodore at the Council of Constantinople brought about the disappearance of almost all his numerous theological and exegetical writings. The few remains are almost all in *Syriac translation because his legacy was greatly respected in the Nestorian Church. The Nestorian Ebedjesu (14th c.) has left us a catalog of his works. Apart from three ascetic treatises (The Priesthood, To the Monks and Perfect Direction), and a collection of letters (Book of the Pearls), all of which have been lost with the exception of fragments and one of his responses to the emperor *Julian's treatise Against the Galileans, few fragments of which remain, Theodore's work is divided between theology and exegesis. In the first area, his interests pertain (1) to the *Arian controversy (For Basil, Against Eunomius, in which he refuted *Eunomius's response to *Basil' work, a description of which remains in Photius [Bibl., cod. 4]; Disputation with the Macedonians, which has come down to us in a Syriac translation and which refers to a debate that actually occurred in 392 at Anazarbus); (2) to the Apollinarist controversy (The Assumer and the Assumed, now lost); and (3) to questions pertaining to free will and original *sin (Against Magic, spoken of by Photius [Bibl., cod. 81]; Against the Defenders of Original Sin, likewise described by Photius [Bibl., cod. 177]). This last work took a stance against *Augustine and the supporters of original sin as inherent to our nature. In effect Theodore amicably hosted *Julian of Eclanum, Augustine's opponent who, after having been condemned in the West, sought help and protection in the East.

Theodore's most important and controversial doctrinal work was the Incarnation, written in 15 books and directed against the *Anomoians and *Apollinarists, in which he treated difficulties pertaining to the *Trinity, Christology and anthropology. In 1905 a Syriac translation of the work was discovered in the East, but the MS was lost during World War I (1914–1918). Numerous fragments of the work, however, remain in Latin, Greek and Syriac, but these fragments should be examined with much caution because they were collected either by defenders or opponents of Theodore.

A better knowledge of his Christology, along with information of cultic and liturgical character, we gather from his Catechetical Homilies, a collection of 16 texts discovered in 1932 in Syriac translation. According to traditional use, the first ten, directed at catechumens, treat topics pertaining to the Trinity and Christology in commenting upon the *Nicene Creed; the other six explain the Our Father (see *Lord's Prayer) and the baptismal and eucharistic liturgy. In addition to a trinitarian theology which by that point had become traditional in the anti-Arian sense and affirmed the unity of the divine substance in three distinct hypostases of equal dignity, the homilies present us with a treatment of the christological question that kept in mind some of the difficulties brought to light by the Apollinarist controversy. Theodore was a typical representative of the Antiochene tradition; he therefore placed utmost value on the humanity assumed by the divine Logos and his capacity to operate in an autonomous way: it represents a true and proper subject that Theodore loved to call the "Son of David" in correlation with the Son of God, the Logos. It is unnecessary to note that he made a normal use of the phraseology of the homo assumptus to present the union (the inhabitation of the Logos in time represented by the body etc.). But Theodore was also aware of the criticisms that the Apollinarists directed at this so clearly divisionist Christology, and therefore he was certain to also outline the union between the two components, human and divine, of Christ, with more attention than had been used in the Antiochene milieu. He denied that one could speak of two Lords and two Sons, because the two natures were united in an ineffable and eternally indissoluble way in one sole prosōpon*. Just as the union was not destroyed by the distinction of the natures, so too this distinction did not prevent the two from being one. It is evident that Theodore took great pains at safeguarding the unity of Christ without denigrating the integrity and autonomy of his human nature: but it is beyond a shadow of a doubt that to an Alexandrian the result appeared insufficient, both in the terminology used and because the way in which the union was achieved is unclear, so much so because the prosōpon ("figure, external aspect") seemed to be less substantial than the *hypostasis to refer to this union. In effect, Theodore, esp. in his Commentary on John, treated Christ, man and God, as two subjects that were distinct from each other.

Theodore was above all a biblical exegete, the most typical example of Antiochene exegesis in opposition to Alexandrian *allegorism. We know that he wrote *commentaries on Genesis, the other books of the Pentateuch, the *Psalms, the Major and Minor *Prophets, *Job, *Exodus and Ecclesiastes. In a letter he made known his thoughts about the *Song of Songs. With respect to the NT, we are aware of his commentaries on Matthew, Luke, John, Acts and Paul's epistles. In addition to numerous fragments for chs. 1–3 of Genesis, there remain the following commentaries: the Commentary on John in the original Greek, the Commentary on John in Syriac translation, the Commentary on Paul's Minor Letters in *Latin translation and more fragments of the Commentary on Paul's Four Major Letters. Moreover, Devreesse, making full use of the catenae, Julian of Eclanum's Latin translation and other testimonies, has reconstructed his commentary on Psalms 1–80.

Theodore proceeds in his commentary on a book of Scripture by an introduction in which he describes the characteristics of this particular book and offers a brief treatment about the author and the chronology. His historical observations here are noteworthy: he, for example, understood that the historical situations described in the book of Psalms were often later than *David, who was traditionally considered the author of the entire book, and to salvage the authority of this biblical author, he explained that, inasmuch as he was a prophet, David described the deeds and situations that took place after him. His interpretation of texts moves along very quickly, attentive to the literal sense with historical, linguistic, grammatical and, less frequently, doctrinal observations. Even though attention is given to passages that are difficult to interpret, for large portions the commentary is reduced to a long paraphrase of the biblical text. Theodore was esp. attentive to emphasize that, when the sacred text contains a number, this number has no other objective than that of the obvious objective of determining the quantity of persons or things, in clear opposition to the Alexandrians, who were always quick to assign symbolic values to numbers. And when a text communicates in an emphatic and figurative language, he always explains it in a literal sense, making use of the figures of hyperbole, in instances where the Alexandrians, as a normal course of operation, detected difficulties in literal interpretation and without a doubt skipped over to the allegorical meaning.

However, Theodore does not at all deny that various passages of the OT are to be interpreted as a prefiguration, typoi of the deeds and figures of the NT: *Jonah is a figure of Christ; the deliverance of the Israelites from *Egypt, the legal prescriptions and the episode of the serpent of bronze are typoi of Christ's death and the deliverance from sin accomplished by him. He specifies that an OT deed, in order to be considered a typos of a NT deed, must present a likeness with it, turning out to be useful for its own time and expressing a lesser reality than that in the future time (PG 66,320ff). Establishing himself on this passage and other analogous ones, some modern scholars have sought to minimize the differences between Theodore's literalism and Alexandrian allegorism in the interpretation of the OT, but, if one goes beyond this theory to the actual facts, we note that Theodore reduces as much as possible the number of OT passages that he considers typoi of the NT: he would only list four of those types of texts in the Psalms (2, 8, 44, 109) and very few prophetic passages, rejecting typologies, however traditional they may have been considered, such as the one that referred to Christ, the sun of justice from Mal 4:2 (3:20 LXX). He preferred to believe that almost all the prophetic passages that were usually referred to Jesus Christ and the church were fulfilled at the time of Zerubbabel and the Maccabees. He was the only one, or nearly so, among all the Antiochene exegetes, who denied that the husband and wife from the Song of Songs could be considered typoi of Christ and the church, thereby reducing the work to a love song written by Solomon for an Egyptian princess. In fact, Theodore tended to consider the OT an expression of an economy finalized in itself, namely that of Jewish monotheism, in contradistinction to pagan polytheism and Christian trinitarianism, which is expressed in the NT. Moreover, his teaching of the two ages, opposing the present age, namely the age of sin, to the future age, the age of liberation and happiness, and recognizing in face of the present age inaugurated by the incarnation of Christ the anticipation of the future age, led him to read the NT more as a projection of the future than as a continuation of the past. Theological presuppositions and systematic rejection of excessive allegorism of the Alexandrians led Theodore to minimize the presence of Christ in the OT. The NT does not pose the same problems for Theodore because here the sacred text presents Christ and the church directly, and therefore his interpretation is systematically and exclusively literal. But precisely for this reason, a text like *John's gospel, which is so rich with symbolic meanings, emerges extrememly impoverished from his flat literal explanation, which contains only a few doctrinal overtures. By contrast, the aforementioned tendency to identify more of a fracture than a continuity between the OT and the NT placed Theodore in perfect harmony with the thought of the apostle *Paul, in contradistinction to earlier commentators who, because of antignostic concerns, sought to read Paul in harmony with the OT. Theodore in fact knew how to fully receive and illustrate with eloquence the Pauline opposition between the law and grace, the slavery of the old man and the freedom of the new.

CPG II, 3827-3873; PG 66, CCL 88A (Latin trans. of the Exp. in ps. by Julian of Eclanum); CSCO 115-116 (Com. Jn.); PO 9, 637-667 (Disp. Mac.); H.B. Swete, Theodori episcopi Mopsuesteni in epistulas B. Pauli commentarii, I-II, Cambridge 1880-82; R. Devreesse, Le Commentaire de Théodore de Mopsueste sur les Psaumes, ST 93, Vatican City 1933; Commentarius in XII prophetas, ed. H.N. von Sprenger, Göttingen 1977; K. Staab, Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, Münster 1933, 113-172; R. Tonneau - R. Devreesse, Les homélies catéchétiques de Théodore de Mopsueste, ST 145, Vatican City 1949; R. Devreesse, Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste, ST 141, Vatican City 1949; DTC 15, 235-279; Quasten II, 405-426 (bibl.); U. Wickert, Studien zu den Pauluskommentaren Theodors von Mopsuestia, Berlin 1962; R.A. Norris, Manhood and Christ, Oxford 1963; J.M. Lera, ". . . y se hizo hombre." La economía trinitaria en las Catequesis de Teodoro de Mopsuestia, Bilbao 1977; M. Simonetti, Note sull'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Teodoro di Mopsuestia: VetChr 14 (1977) 69-102; L. Fatica, I Commentari a Giovanni di Teodoro di Mopsuestia e Cirillo di Alessandria. Confronto tra metodi esegetici e teologici, Rome 1988; D.Z. Zaharopulos, Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Bible: A Study of His Old Testament Exegesis, New York 1988; S. Zincone, Studi sulla visione dell'uomo in ambito antiocheno (Diodoro, Crisostomo, Teodoro, Teodoreto), L'Aquila-Rome 1988; TRE 33, 240-246 (bibl.); Replica a Giuliano imperatore, ed. A. Guida, Florence 1994; D. Fairbairn, Grace and Christology in the Early Church, Oxford 2003; S. Gerber, Theodor von Mopsuestia und das Nicänum: Studien zu den katechischen Homilien, Leiden-Boston 2000; G. Kalantzis, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Commentary on the Gospel of John (Early Christian Studies 7), Sydney 2004; R.C. Hill, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Commentary on the Twelve Prophets, Washington, DC 2004; Theodore of Mopsuestia, Commentary on the Gospel of John, ed. and trans. by M. Conti (ACT), Downers Grove, IL 2010.

M. Simonetti

THEODORE of Paphos (7th c.). Bishop of Paphos (island of *Cyprus) around the mid-7th c., on 12 December 655 delivered the *panegyric for the feast of St. *Spyridion, a speech that has survived to our time. Spyridion, a shepherd who was married and had children, was the bishop of Trimethus (Cyprus); it is uncertain whether he participated at the Council of *Nicaea (325); he signed the *acts of the Council of *Sardica (343; Athan., Apol. c. Arian. 2: PG 25, 340b; Mansi 3,69a). Spyridion is mentioned by *Rufinus (HE 1,5: PL 21,471-472), *Socrates (HE 1,12: PG 67, 164-165, which depended on Rufinus's work) and *Sozomen (HE 1,11: PG 67,885-889). Around the person of this saint there circled oral traditions and biographies (lost) and also a poem in iambic verses attributed to Triphyllios (also lost). This poem was used by Theodore; Theodore's panegyric was in turn reformulated by Simon Metaphrastes and by the two anonymous Lives of St. Spyridon.

CPG III, 7987; Bardenhewer 5, 138-139; P. van den Ven, La légende de S. Spiridon: Bibliothèque du Muséon 33, Louvain 1933; Beck 463, see 456, 1; BS 11, 1354-1356; Altaner 247; Patrologia V, 248-249.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Petra (6th c.). Theodore was the author of a *panegyric for St. *Theodosius the cenobiarch. From this work one can deduce that he was a disciple of the saint in the monastery established by Theodosius. The encomium, which is very verbose and composed according to the rhetorical canons of that literary genre, was held for the monks of the monastery on the first anniversary of Theodosius's death, that is, 11 January 530, and, after having been revised on several points, was published after 552 (the date of death for the patriarch *Peter of Jerusalem). From the heading we see that Theodore was later bishop of *Petra (*Arabia).

CPG III, 7533; H Usener, Der heilige Theodosios. Schriften des Theodoros und Kyrillos, Leipzig 1890; A.J. Festugière, Les moines d'Orient, III, 3, Paris 1963, 83-160; Bardenhewer 5, 128-129; Beck 406 and 409; Patrologia V, 288-289; 294.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Pharan (570–ca. 638). Bishop of Pharan in the western Sinai desert, from the 6th or the 7th c. According to the documents of the Council of *Rome (649), he was the first representative of *monoenergism, following the requests of the patriarch of *Constantinople, *Sergius I. The Sixth Ecumenical Council of *Constantinople in 681 condemned him along with Sergius I. The acts of the two aforementioned councils cited several passages from his letter to Sergius of Arsinoe, in *Egypt, and his commentary on the sayings of the Fathers. Theodore became interested in the question concerning the union of the two natures in Christ without having ever been an observant *monophysite. In all likelihood, he is to be identified with *Theodore of Raithu.

BBKL 14, 1545-1546; W. Elert, Theodor von Pharan und Theodor von Raithu: Theologische Literaturzeitung 76 (1951) 67-76; Id., Der Ausgang der altkirchlichen Christologie, Berlin 1957; K.-H. Uthemann, Neuchalkedonismus: SP 29 (1997) 373-413.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEODORE of Philae (d. 570/584). *Monophysite bishop of Philae in Upper *Thebaid. Along with *Longinus, bishop of Nobadae (a people near the Roman border), he was an eminent figure in the *Jacobite Church of *Egypt in the middle of the 6th c. He was consecrated by *Timothy IV (517–535) in 525/526 and ruled his own diocese for nearly 50 years: he died between 577 and 584. For a period of 18 years, the Nobadae were entrusted to him. In 575 Theodore prescribed a mandatum (entolikon) to Longinus with which he authorized him to also proceed in his name to the consecration of a Jacobite patriarch of *Alexandria, which had been vacant for nine years (J.B. Chabot, Documenta ad origines monophysitarum illustrandas: CSCO 17, 274-275: text; 103, 192: translation). Indeed Longinus, unknown to the civil authorities of Nubia, went with this mission (he had been called by *Theodore of Copros and the presbyter Theodosius) to Mareotis (near Alexandria); when he passed through Philae, he invited the elderly Theodore to accompany him, but Theodore did not want to join him because of his advanced age and also "because of the wickedness [neklo, dolum: translation] of those who at the time governed the churches" (this was perhaps an allusion to Bishop John of Keliya); he gave him, however, the mandate for ordination.

CPG III, 7227; John of Ephesus, IV, 7,9; R. Payne Smith, The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John Bishop of Ephesus, Oxford 1860, 255.259; W. Brooks: CSCO 105, 186-189: text; 106, 139-141: translation; Theodorus (36), DCB 4, 949; J. Maspéro, Théodore de Philae: RHR 59 (1909) 299-317; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VI^e siècle: CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 175.224-227.232-233; Patrologia V, 405-406.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Raithu (d. 649?). Monk and priest in the monastic colony near Raithu, a port city in the SW portion of the Sinai Peninsula; he was the author of a προπαρασκευή, a propaedeutic text that included a heresiological and a dialectical part (philosophical ideas); it was distinguished by its *Neochalcedonian tendencies, which was characterized by the pressure of harmonizing the formulas of the Council of *Chalcedon with that of *Cyril of Alexandria. According to Richard, one must attribute to him the treatise De Sectis (CPG III, n. 6823), composed after 579, a sort of summary of contemporary theology, with a severe criticism of *Leontius of Byzantium and the religious politics of *Justinian I. Other scholars, however, believe that *Leontius Scholasticus was the author of this text. If, however, one agrees with Elert in identifying Theodore with *Theodore of Pharan, a city near Raithu, these would be the following consequences. Theodore would have been one of the first eminent representatives of *monoenergism—something that should not be excluded even for a theologian who was previously Neochalcedonian (Beck). Moreover, he would have been a confidant of *Sergius patriarch of Constantinople and condemned along with him by the Council of *Constantinople of 680/681. Finally, the date of his death would have to be placed no later than 649, probably, however, in 638. W. Klein, following A.Th. Niklas (Athens 1981), rejects this identification.

Editions: CPG III, 7600ff., see 6823; PG 91, 1484-1504 (incomplete); F. Diekamp, Analecta Patristica, Rome 1938, 173-227; Mansi 10, 957-961; 11, 567-572 (fragments); PG 86, 1193-1268 (= De Sectis).

Studies: DTC 15/1, 282ff.; W. Elert, Der Ausgang der altkirchlichen Christologie, Berlin 1957; Beck 374, 382-383, 430-431; J. Speigl, Der Autor der Schrift "De Sectis" über die Konzilien und die Religionspolitik Justinians: Annuarium Hist. Conc. 2 (1970) 207-230; A. Grillmeier - T. Hainthaler, Jesus der Christus II/2, 514-523; Patrologia V, 306; T. Hainthaler, Bemerkungen zur Christologie des Ps. Dionysius, in Y. de Andia (ed.), Denys l'Aréopagite, Paris 1997, 269-292; LTK 9, 1417-1418 (the two entries: T. of Raithou - T. of Pharan); LACL (2002) 680-681; W. Klein, in TRE 33 (2002) 246ff.; BBKL 14, 1545-1547.

B. Studer

THEODORE of Scythopolis. Palestinian Origenist of the 6th c., from the faction of the isochrists who had as their center the New *Laura. Theodore was its *hegumen before becoming the staurophylax and the metropolitan of *Scythopolis thanks to the support of *Theodore Ascidas (Cyril of Scythopolis, V. Sab. 89). Subsequently, by an inversion of *Justinian's religious politics that would lead to the condemnation of Origenism at the Council of *Constantinople (553), Theodore was forced to retract his convictions. The Libellus de erroribus Origenianis, which was redacted at Constantinople probably around the end of 552, contains 12 anathemas broadly directed against the following teachings: the preexistence of souls and the apokatastasis and, more specifically, against the christological and soteriological developments of the isochrists.

CPG 6993, PG 86, 232-236; F. Diekamp, Die origenistischen Streitigkeiten im 6. Jahrhundert und das 5. allgemeine Concil, Münster i.W. 1899, 125-129; B. Flusin, Miracle et histoire dans l'oeuvre de Cyrille de Scythopolis, Paris 1983; D. Hombergen, The Second Origenist Controversy: A New Perspective on Cyril of Scythopolis' Monastic Biographies as Historical Sources for Sixth-Century Origenism, Rome 2001; L. Perrone, Palestinian Monasticism, the Bible, and Theology in the Wake of the Second Origenist Controversy, in J. Patrich (ed.), The Sabaite Heritage in the Orthodox Church from the Fifth Century to the Present, Leuven 2001, 245-259.

L. Perrone

THEODORE of Tabennesi (d. 368). Religious superior of the monastery of Tabennesi, and as such, head of the Pachomian monasteries from ca. 350 until his death in 368. The office was assigned to him by *Horsiesi, who, it seems, was unable to bring an end to the disagreement that had arisen after the death of *Pachomius. Theodore brought back peace to the monasteries so much so that after 368 Horsiesi was able to take up the leadership of the monasteries without difficulty. Information about his life is found in several more extensive redactions of the works of Pachomius. *Jerome translated one of his letters into Latin along with other works of Pachomius and Horsiesi. Another one of his letters was recently discovered in *Coptic—therefore in the original redaction—a document addressed to convents during the annual gathering of the month of Mesor, at which they celebrated the festival of the "remission" (of sins?).

CPG 2373-2376; PG 23, 99-100; A. Boon, Pachomiana latina, Louvain 1932, 105-106; AASS, Mai 3, 63-71; L.Th. Lefort, CSCO 159, Louvain 1959, 37-62 (text); CSCO 160, 195, 38-62 (Fr. trans.); Patrologia II, 161-162; C. Joest, Pachom und Theodoros: Konflikte im Autoritätsverständnis bei den Pachomianem: Theologie und Philosophie 68 (1993) 516-529; Id., Ein Versuch zur Chronologie Pachoms und Theodoros: ZNTW 85 (1994) 132-144; Coptic Encyclopedia 7, 2239-2240.

T. Orlandi

THEODORE of Trimethus. Bishop of Trimethus (Trimithousa on the island of *Cyprus), he participated at the sixth ecumenical council (Constantinople III, 680), from the 14th session onward, representing Epiphanius II, archbishop of Constantia, Cyprus (Mansi 11,584e, 603c, 613a: Basil was substituted with Theodore, 625c). He once spoke there with the bishops of Cyprus in favor of the two wills in Christ (Mansi 11,596e, see, Hfl-Lecl 3,1,506: the reading of a speech of *Athanasius) and signed its *acts (Mansi 11,640e, 669b, 688de). He was the author of a life of St. *John Chrysostom, published for the first time by A. Mai (Nova Patrum Bibliotheca, VI,263ff.) and reproduced in PG (47,51-88). This life, which is better than the one attributed to patriarch *George of Alexandria (see Photius, Bibl., cod. 96; Beck 460), provides extensive documents that illustrate the final, tormented period of the saint's life (the Letters of *Arcadius, *Honorius, Pope *Innocent, *Theophilus, the Roman synod, *Eudoxia etc.).

CPG III, 7989; F. Halkin, Douze récits byzantins sur saint Jean Chrysostome: Subs. Hagiogr. 60, Brussels 1977, 7-68; Bardenhewer 5, 140; Beck 460 and 463; Patrologia V, 249; BBKL 11, 917-918.

A. De Nicola

THEODORE of Tyana (4th c.). Bishop of *Tyana (from 383 until at least 404), metropolis of *Cappadocia II, detached from *Caesarea at the beginning of *Basil of Caesarea's episcopate, with vociferous appeals for ecclesiastical autonomy by its bishop *Anthimus. Theodore was, therefore, the metropolitan of *Gregory of Nazianzus, who dedicated to him the Philocalia, drawn from the writings of *Origen, and wrote him the following letters: 139, 152, 157, 160-163 and certainly 122-124, but not 77 and 183. He showed sympathy toward *John Chrysostom during his exile (*Palladius, Dialogue 132,4).

M.M. Hauser-Meury, Prosopographie zu den Schriften Gregors von Nazianz, Bonn 1970, 161-162.

J. Gribomont

THEODORE SPUDAEUS (7th c.). With respect to the Σπουδαῖοι, see S. Pétridès, Le monastère des Spoudaei à Jérusalem et les Spoudaei de Constantinople: EO 4 (1900-01) 225-231; 7 (1904) 341-348. Theodore was almost certainly the author of the Commemoratio (Sirmond, 81-113) and the Hypomnesticum (Sirmond, 251-272; BHG 2261), testimonies of first importance with respect to the persecutions connected to the debates on *monothelitism. The first certain pieces of information concerning him date back to the year 653, when he was present at the arrival of Pope *Martin I to *Constantinople, who had been led there after he was arrested upon the order of *Constans II. Thoroughly moved by the sad sight, Theodore came into contact, we do not know in what way, with the prisoner and received two letters from him; namely, the Quoniam agnovi (Jaffé 2078) and the Noscere voluit (Jaffé 2079), which he summarized in the Commemoratio. The work, probably composed around the end of 654 (Devreesse, Le texte grec, 58), illustrates the vicissitudes undergone by Pope Martin I and was addressed to the faithful of *Rome and *Africa to praise the pope's behavior. We have only a Latin version of this document thanks to Anastasius Bibliothecarius. The Hypomnesticum, published by Devreesse (who at one point attributed the work to *Theodosius of Gangra, Theodore's brother: Le texte grec, 49) on the basis of a single MS witness, the Vatic. 1671 (10th c.), previously known by the Latin version of the Anastasius

Bibliothecarius (BHL 5844), presents the events of other victims of monothelitism, Anastasius the Apocrisarius, his two disciples, the brothers Theodore and Euprepius, *Maximus the monk and his disciple Anastasius. They were all friends of Theodore, whom he often went to visit and comfort in their exile. The document closes with an extensive doxology that, from a grammatical and stylistic point of view, contains numerous errors: the author is aware of this; he maintains, however, that it is necessary to present the work of the martyrs and to invite the faithful to prayer so that the persecutions may end as soon as possible.

CPG 7968-7969; BHL 5593-5598, Suppl. 1911, 220, Suppl. 1986, 615; CPL 1734; PL 129, 591-604, 681-690; PG 90, 173-178, 193-202; R. Devreesse, Le texte grec de l'Hypomnesticum de Théodore Spoudée (le supplice, l'exil et la mort des victimes illustres du monothélisme): AB 53 (1935) 49-80; Beck 462-463; M. Simonetti, Un falso Ippolito nella polemica monotelita: VetChr 24 (1987) 113-146; P. Allen - B. Neil, Scripta saeculi VII vitam Maximi Confessoris illustrantia, Turnhout-Leuven 1999, 199-227; Maximus the Confessor and His Companions: Documents from Exile, ed. and trans. by P. Allen and B. Neil, Oxford 2002, 148-171 (Latin and Greek text and English translation of the Hypomnesticum); Patrologia V, 131.

A. Labate

THEODORE SYNCELLUS (7th c.). Presbyter and syncellus of the "Great Church" (Hagia Sophia) of *Constantinople, he took part in the embassy sent by the emperor *Heraclius, in July of 626, at Hadrianopolis on a mission of peace to the khan of the Avars, who were moving toward the Byzantine capital (Chronicon paschale: PG 82,1009 BD). Passed down under his name by several codices (others transmit it without name) is a Discourse on the discovery at *Jerusalem, the translation to Constantinople and the internment in the sanctuary of Blachernae of the clothing of the Mother of God, a speech held on 2 July between 620 and 626 (BHG 1058). Moreover, another Logos has been preserved for the feast of the Deliverance of Constantinople from the siege of the Avars in August 626.

CPG 7935-7936; A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la T.S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du VI^e au X^e siècle, Paris 1955, 111-136, 294-303; Beck 545 (with a mistaken reference to the 9th c.); J.L. van Dieten, Geschichte der Patriarchen von Sergios I. bis Johannes VI. (610-715), Amsterdam 1972, 114-121, 174-178; ODB 3, 2048; Patrologia V, 105-106.

D. Stiernon

THEODORE the LECTOR. Church historian (beginning of the 6th c.). A lector at the Hagia Sophia who was sympathetic to the Chalcedonians, he was the author of a "tripartite history," a compilation in four treatises derived from the ecclesiastical histories of *Socrates, *Sozomen and *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, through the age from *Constantine until the reign of *Theodosius II. Extensive portions of this work, which are important for the reconstruction of the textual form of the original models, were translated into Latin by the monk *Epiphanius for the Historia ecclesiastica tripartita by *Cassiodorus (ca. 560). Theodore followed it with his own original Ecclesiastical History, which was also written in four books, for the historical era from 439 to the reign of *Justin I (518). One finds within it an intense interest in the political-ecclesiastical aspects compared with the general history of the empire, esp. in the narrow horizon of *Constantinople and with a strong misunderstanding of Anastasius's overtures toward the *monophysites. Both works have come down in a fragmentary state, but it is possible to reconstruct its layout and individual parts thanks to an Abridgment of the ecclesiastical history redacted between the 7th and the 8th c.

CPG 7502-7503; PG 86, 165-228; G.C. Hansen, Theodoros Anagnostes, Kirchengeschichte (GCS), Berlin 1971; PWK 24/2 (1934) 1869-1881; G. Moravcsik, Byzantinoturcica I, Berlin-DDR [2]1958, 519-520; P. Allen, Teodoro il Lettore, in Patrologia V, 42-43; BBKL 11, 971-972; Ph. Blaudeau, Alexandrie et Constantinople (451-491): de l'histoire à la géo-ecclésiologie, Rome 2006, passim.

L. Perrone

THEODORET of CYRRHUS (ca. 393–ca. 466). Born at *Antioch of *Syria around 393. He was brought up in *Syriac monastic circles, where he learned Christian and classical culture. He would bring to life again the ascetic milieu in a collection of 30 chapters of biography of 28 monks and three women, the Religious History or Manners of Ascetic Life. Some traditions, which have not been proven, maintain that he had *John Chrysostom and *Theodore of Mopsuestia among his teachers, and *Nestorius and *John of Antioch among his fellow disciples (see Tillemont, XV, 207ff.).

In 423 he was elected bishop of Cyrrhus; it seems that at the beginning of his episcopate he dealt with various heresies present in the communities of his region in various writings that have now been lost: in addition to refuting the *Jews, he wrote against the *Arians, the *Macedonians and the *Marcionites. From the first period, he must have also written the refutation of Hellenic paganism, Graecarum affectionum curatio, the last of the Christian apologies, preserved intact, which consists of 12 speeches where pagan and Christian ideas are set against each other in response to philosophical questions. From a theological point of view, the years immediately preceding the Council of *Ephesus were probably the most demanding and decisive for Theodoret: when *Cyril of Alexandria wrote his 12 anathemas against Nestorius (November 430), Theodoret undertook to defend the latter and wrote, at the beginning of 431, the refutation of the Anathemas upon the request of John of Antioch. Because this document, Reprehensio duodecim capitum seu anathematismorum Cyrilli, was condemned by the fifth ecumenical council (*Constantinople 553), it has been lost; however, because Cyril defended his Anathemas with three apologies, the second of these (Epistula ad Euoptium adversus impugnationem duodecim capitum a Theodoreto editam [PG 76,385-452]) preserves Theodoret's text.

We are now at the most delicate moment of the controversies between schools of Antioch and Alexandria; Theodoret developed what was historically the most interesting characteristic of his theological work: a reexamination and reevaluation of the tradition until this time. Cyril of Alexandria was portrayed as dependent on *Apollinaris of Laodicea and at risk of denying the full humanity of Christ; at the same time, he pointed out the Arian danger of a teaching that did not distinguish the humanity from the divinity in the incarnate Word.

In the same years immediately preceding the Council of *Ephesus, he wrote two books, De sancta et vivifica Trinitate and De incarnatione Domini, which have come down to us under the name of Cyril of Alexandria (PG 75,1147-1190, 1419-1478) and which were restored to Theodoret by A. Ehrhard. These are documents of extreme interest because the Athanasian tradition is called on to distinguish theology from economy, and on this basis Theodoret constructs and justifies the divisive Christology: the text of Phil 2:5-8: “Christ Jesus though being of a divine nature . . . emptied himself, assuming the condition of a servant,” performs an important role in such a formulation.

It was probably in this environment and climate that the ps.-Athanasian writings were written: this seems to be the historical context for the two ps.-Athanasian dialogues C. Macedonianos (PG 28, 1291-1338).

After the council, Theodoret published five books once again attacking Cyril of Alexandria's ideas and the council's decisions in a work titled the Pentalogus. These works have also been lost as a result of their condemnation in 553. Latin fragments remain in the Collectio Palatina and some Greek citations in Niceta of Heraclea's *catena on the gospel of *Luke.

The attempts at union in 433, although Theodoret almost certainly was employed firsthand to draft the formula of reconciliation, did not lead to his personal commitment because it still required the endorsement of the condemnation of Nestorius (see Ep. 171).

In 447 Theodoret composed Eranistes (“the beggar”) or Polymorphos (“the man of many shapes”): this is a work of great theological importance, which was composed to refute the *monophysite teaching that *Eutyches was spreading at *Constantinople and which was successful in *Egypt, esp. at *Alexandria, through the support of Cyril's successor, the patriarch *Dioscorus. The work, composed of four books, is written in the form of a dialogue between an orthodox and monophysite Christian (a beggar, or a man in many forms, because in his teaching one finds elements from preceding heresies scraped together, beginning with *Docetism and ending with *Apollinarianism). It is a document that is truly typical of that historical era and Theodoret's operative method: the era and methods of evaluation and synthesis of tradition; compilation of florilegia; extensive use of the sources (the Eranistes preserves 238 passages of 88 patristic sources). All of this is important for the sense of the tradition that was developing, at least for the transmission of parts of works which we would otherwise know nothing about; it has its limits, if we keep in mind that, alongside the sense of tradition, there was likewise developing a tendency to manipulate preceding materials, from *pseudepigraphal production intended for polemics to the uses of the tradition that were not exempt from confusion. Eranistes has come down to us in a second edition that was expanded after the Council of *Chalcedon.

During the so-called robber council (latrocinium) of *Ephesus, which forcibly imposed Eutyches's exoneration, who had already been condemned by Pope *Leo the Great with a dogmatic letter, Theodoret was deposed from his episcopal see. He was restored, however, by the Council of Chalcedon (451), in which he agreed to endorse the condemnation of Nestorius, certainly not for personal gain, but more so for a sense of condescension to the real needs of the entire church, because a sufficiently comprehensive formulation of certain fundamental requirements of Antiochene Christology had been reached.

Theodoret remained the head of the church of Cyrrhus until his death, which occurred around 466.

Theodoret's *exegesis remains attested in various works in which the two genres are distinguished: on the one hand, there is a series of continuous commentaries: Interpretation of the Psalms, a commentary on the *Song of Songs, the Major and Minor Prophets, Chronicles, St. *Paul's epistles; on the other hand, we have a type of commentary elaborated in the form of questions and answers: on the Octateuch and the book of Kings. *Paleoslavonic versions remain, complete or in part, of almost all Theodoret's exegetical works; from the Commentary on the Psalms there remains an *Armenian and *Georgian version; from the *Commentary on Ezekiel there remains an Armenian version. The Ten Speeches on Providence, the dating of which is highly contested, should be placed later than the Council of Ephesus. From several citations that Theodoret himself made from it, we know that he also wrote a work of refutation against the attitude of the Persians toward the Christians (Replies to the Magi). In recent years many significant steps forward have been made in the knowledge and evaluation of Theodoret's exegetical work, and two different but not antithetical readings between them have been made: Theodoret appears, on the one hand, as an exegete of definite Antiochene stamp, who knew, however, how to work in an entirely original way with the influences of the school of Alexandria, esp. Origen, to the point of creating a "plural" method, that is, he changes from a literal, historical/allegorical reading according to the text commented on; on the other hand, it reveals the difficulty of framing Theodoret's exegetical ratio within a definite milieu, although one recognizes on the one hand his strict dependence on *Diodore of Tarsus and *Theodore of Mopsuestia, and on the other hand the presence of interpretive peculiarities which, for the christological sense, send one back to Origen.

Theodoret's historical work was extensive: in addition to the aforementioned Religious History, he wrote an Ecclesiastical History, which continued the work of *Eusebius of Caesarea, from 323 to 428, and which is also—according to Theodoret's method—a treasure chest of sources and otherwise unknown pieces of documentation. Finally, he wrote a treatise titled Haereticorum fabularum compendium, in five books: the first four describe the heresies from *Simon Magus to Nestorius and Eutyches; the fifth compares the chief heretical doctrines with the teaching of the church.

There remain fragments from his Sermons, and more than 200 of his Letters have survived, which are a valuable historical source for the events of that age and a testament to his pastoral commitment.

Two works passed down under the name of *Justin have been traced back by various scholars to the Antiochene milieu and probably to Theodoret: the Expositio rectae fidei and Quaestiones et responsiones ad orthodoxos. Other scholars attribute to Theodoret a treatise titled There Is Only One Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ (PG 83,1433-1441).

CPG III, 6200-6288 Suppl. 382-384; Editions: Theodoret's works are found in PG 80-84; SC 40, 57, 98, 111, 234, 257, 276, 295, 315, 429; Theodoretus, Quaestiones in Octateuchum, por N. Fernández - A. Sáenz Badillos, Madrid 1979; E. Cavalcanti, I Dialoghi pseudoatanasiani contro i Macedoniani, critical text, trans. and comm., Turin 1983, 157-169; Theodoretus, Quaestiones in Reges et Paralipomena, ed. N. Fernández - J.R. Busto Saíz, Madrid 1984; Theodoret, Kirchengeschichte, ed. L. Parmentier, GCS, Neue Folge, Bd. 5, Berlin 1998.

Translations of Individual Works: Eng. trans.: On Divine Providence, T. Halton, New York 1988; A.C. Vrame, Theodoret, Bishop of Kyros as an Exegete of Isaiah 1: A Translation of His Commentary with an Introduction: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 34 (1989) 127-147; Commentary on the Psalms, R.C. Hill, Washington, DC 2000-2001; Eranistes, G.H. Ettlinger, Washington, DC 2003 (with bibl. on pp. ix-x); Ital. trans.: Il mendicante, G. Desantis, Rome 1997; Commentario alla Lettera ai Romani, F. Cocchini - L. Scarampi, Rome 1998; Storia ecclesiastica, A. Gallico, Rome 2000; D. Borrelli, Teodoreto di Cirro, Commento a Daniele, intr. trans. and notes, Rome 2006.

Studies: A. Ehrhard, Die Cyrill von Alexandrien zugeschriebene Schrift Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Κυρίου ἐνανθρωπήσεως, ein Werk des Theodoret von Cyrus, Tübingen 1888; J.T. Lienhard, The Exegesis of 1 Cor 15, 24-28 from Marcellus of Ancyra to Theodoret of Cyrus: VChr 37 (1983) 340-359; J.-N. Guinot, La christologie de Théodoret de Cyr dans son Commentaire sur le Cantique: VChr 39 (1985) 256-272; M. Simonetti, La tecnica esegetica di Teodoreto nel Commento ai Salmi: VetChr 23 (1986) 81-116; P. Allen, Some Aspects of Hellenism in the Early Greek Church Historians: Traditio 43 (1987) 368-381; J.-N. Guinot, L'exégèse du bouc émissaire chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie et Théodoret de Cyr: Augustinianum 28 (1988) 603-630; M. Simonetti, Le "Quaestiones" di Teodoreto su Genesi e Esodo: Annali di Storia dell'Esegesi 5 (1988) 39-56; S. Zincone, Studi sulla visione dell'Uomo in ambito antiocheno: Diodoro, Crisostomo, Teodoro, Teodoreto, L'Aquila-Rome 1988; A. Camplani, In margine alla storia dei Meliziani: Augustinianum 30 (1990) 313-351; A. Viciano, Cristo el autor de nuestra salvación, Pamplona 1990; S.-P. Bergjan, Theodoret von Cyrus und der Neunizänismus: Aspekte der altkirchlichen Trinitätslehre, Berlin 1994; F. Cocchini, L'esegesi paolina di Teodoreto di Cirro: Annali di Storia dell'Esegesi 11/2 (1994) 511-532; J.-N. Guinot, Théodoret de Cyr. Une lecture critique de la Septante: "Selon les Septante." Hommage à Marguerite Harl, ed. G. Dorival - O. Munnich, Paris 1995, 393-407; Id., L'exégèse de Théodoret de Cyr, Paris 1995; P. Crego, Theodoret of Kyros on the Relationship of the Body and Soul Before Birth: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 41 (1996) 19-37; J.-N. Guinot, Les fondements scripturaires de la polémique entre Juifs et chrétiens dans les commentaires de Théodoret de Cyr: Annali di Storia dell'Esegesi 14/1 (1997) 153-178; D. Krueger, Typological Figuration in Theodoret of Cyrrhus's "Religious History" and the Art of Postbiblical Narrative: JECS 5 (1997) 393-419; Id., Writing as Devotion: Hagiographical Composition and the Cult of the Saints in Theodoret of Cyrrus and Cyril of Scythopolis: Church History 66 (1997) 707-719; M.A. Calvet-Sebasti, Comment écrire à un païen? L'exemple de Grégoire de Nazianze et de Théo- doret de Cyr, in Les Apologistes chrétiens et la culture grecque, ed. B. Pouderon - J. Doré, Paris 1998, 369-381; J.-N. Guinot, Foi et raison dans la démarche apologétique d'Eusèbe et de Théodoret, ibid., 383-402; H. Patapios, The Alexandrian and the Antiochene Methods of Exegesis: Towards a Reconsideration: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 44 (1999) 187-198; R.C. Hill, Theodoret, Commentator on the Psalms: EThL 76 (2000) 88-104; T. Urbainczyk, Theodoret of Cyrrhus: The Bishop and the Holy Man, Ann Arbor, MI 2002.

E. Cavalcanti

THEODOSIUS, archdeacon (6th c.). Around 530 he composed the treatise De situ terrae sanctae (or the Expositio civitatis Ierusalem), which was discovered in 1864. This work contains a brief description of *Palestine. The author shows that he was well acquainted with the buildings that were constructed at *Jerusalem by the emperor *Anastasius I but not those by *Justinian; from this fact scholars can infer the dating of the document. Theodosius's North African origin was conjectured from the fact that in a passage of the De situ terrae sanctae (ch. 14), the opposition between *Arians and *Catholics was seen in terms of *Vandals versus Romans.

CPL 2328; PLS IV, 1456-1463; J. Gildemeister, Theodosius de situ terrae sanctae, Bonn 1882; CSEL 39, 137-150; CCL 175, 113-125; LTK 10, 50; BBKL 18, 1370-1371.

S. Zincone

THEODOSIUS, cenobiarch (423–529). Saint (feast day 11 January). Born in 423 at Mogariso (Mogariasso, Garisso) in *Cappadocia to a pious and religious family, Theodosius was ordained as a lector while still a young man. He visited St. *Simeon the Stylite in the neighborhood of *Antioch. At *Jerusalem, he submitted to the spiritual direction of the aged ascetic *Longinus in the Tower of David (451). He then went (455) to the Monastery of the Theotokos of the Kathisma (between Jerusalem and Bethlehem), established by the pious Ikelia, but in order to not become its *hegumen, he retired to the monastery of Metopa and, in the solitude of the Grotto of the Magi (the desert of Judah, northeast of Bethlehem), he lived for 38 years in great austerity and continual prayer. Not wanting to reject the numerous faithful who wished to become his disciples, he established a monastery with adjoining buildings for the sick, the elderly, those suffering from mental illness (called energumens, that is, "the possessed"), and pilgrims. The psalmody was in *Greek, *Armenian and *Paleoslavonic, and each group worshiped in their own chapel. But everyone gathered together in the Greek chapel for the liturgy and Communion; a fourth church was for the penitents. Even today the place is called Deir Dosi ("monastery of Theodosius"), and there the church was rebuilt with the monastery. In 494, the patriarch of Jerusalem, Sallustius, appointed Theodosius as *archimandrite of the cenobium (hence his name), and St. *Sabas as archimandrite of the laurae in his jurisdiction. Theodosius along with St. Sabas fought against *monophysitism, which was being promoted by the emperor *Anastasius. Anastasius exiled him, but the emperor's death (1 July 518) allowed Theodosius to return to his monastery with the favor of the emperor *Justin I, a fervently orthodox man.

Theodosius died in 529 and was buried in the Grotto of the Magi, where he had begun the life of a recluse. The Life (encomium) was written by his disciple *Theodore, who subsequently became bishop of *Petra (H. Usener, Der heilige Theodosios, Leipzig 1890, 5-101), and by *Cyril of Scythopolis (H. Usener, op. cit., 105-113; ed. Schwartz, Cyrillos von Skythopolis, TU 49,2, Leipzig 1939, 235-241); it was later reworked by Simeon Metaphrastes (PG 114, 469-553).

CPG III, 7533 (Theodore of Petra), 7539 (Cyril of Scythopolis); AASS Ianuar., Venezia 1734, I, 680-701; Bardenhewer V, 128-129; EC 11, 1940-1942; Beck 833 (index); LTK 10, 48-49 (Theodosios Koinobiarches) and 49 (Theodosioskloster); BS 12, 290-292; Patrologia V, 294; BBKL 11, 996-997.

A. De Nicola

THEODOSIUS, monk (5th c.). *Monophysite zealot who lived after the Council of *Chalcedon (451). According to the testimony of *Evagrius Scholasticus, he was first removed from his monastery because of his sins; he subsequently incited a revolt among the Alexandrian people and therefore, after having been flogged as subversive, he was dragged through the city streets (HE 2,5). During the Council of Chalcedon and immediately after its closure, he incited another revolt in the church of *Jerusalem by forging a letter from Pope *Leo the Great. He found a great protector in the person of *Eudoxia, the widow of *Theodosius II, who was living at Jerusalem far from the imperial court. After having incited the population, Theodosius sought to force the patriarch *Juvenal (422–458), once he had returned from Chalcedon, to deny the Council's decisions; Juvenal refused, but after having undergone an attack, he fled to *Constantinople (Nicephorus Callistus, HE 15,9). Theodosius was therefore ordained in the church of the Anastasis, and he subsequently ordained bishops throughout *Palestine. Finally, in 453, the emperor *Marcian was able to deprive him of his office, and Theodosius fled to an unknown hideaway.

E. Honigmann, Juvenal of Jerusalem: Dumbarton Oaks Papers 5 (1950) 209-279; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEODOSIUS I (the Great), emperor (347–395). Of Spanish origin, appointed Augustus for the Eastern Roman Empire in 379, he died at *Milan on 17 January 395 at 48 years of age. His political-military action was particularly vigilant on two fronts: namely that of Illyricum, where *Gratian had entrusted to him the duty of reestablishing peace, which he sought to accomplish by establishing a foedus with the *Goths stationed there; and that of the West, where the continually unstable situation led him to first intervene in favor of *Valentinian II against the usurper *Maximus, then against the *Frankish Arbogast, then against the Catholic *Eugenius. Of no less interest was his religious politics, which was committed to totally changing the religious situation established by the emperor *Valens. Also in view of the political unity, Theodosius was committed to pursuing the religious unity of the empire. To this objective, on the one hand, he pursued antipagan politics, and on the other, he sought to heal the existing fracture within the Christian sphere between *Catholics and *Arians. A convinced supporter of the *Nicene Creed (for his baptism, see Socr., HE V,6), he issued in 380 a decree to *Thessalonica, in which he ordered his subjects to follow the Catholic faith of *Rome and *Alexandria (CT XVI,1,2). Likewise in 380, he forced the Arian *Demophilus to resign from the patriarchate of *Constantinople in order to put in his place the Catholic *Gregory of Nazianzus, prohibiting in the city the gatherings of those who did not profess the Nicene faith (CT XVI,5,6). The Council of Constantinople was convoked by him (381), and the council *fathers credited him with having established peace among Christians (Mansi 3,557; Socr., HE V,8; Soz., HE VII,9), while they were asking for the ratification of the sanctions promulgated against the *heresies connected in various ways to the Arian controversy (CT XVI, 1, 3). Between 381 and 383, the imperial depositions against the *pagans and *apostates followed (CT XVI,7,1-2).

Once his attempt at doctrinal unification between Christians had failed, through a series of edicts (25 July and 23 December 383, 21 January 384), he recognized the Catholic religion alone, confiscating and depriving places of worship from the heretics (CT XVI,5,11-13; Philostorgius, HE X,6). A law from 14 June 388 once again struck the heretics (CT XVI,5,15). To the anti-Arian controversy also belong Letters 13 and 14 of Ambrose to Theodosius in the name of the bishops of Italy who had participated at the Council of *Aquileia (381). Other letters written by Ambrose to Theodosius were likewise indicative of the action carried out by the emperor and the intervention of the bishop of Milan. In Ambrose's Ep. 40 one finds extensive echoes of the imperial orders after the episode of Callinicum and the position taken by the bishop of Milan (see also Ep. 41 and Paulinus of Milan, Vita Ambr. 22). Ep. 51 marks Ambrose's intervention after the massacre of *Thessalonica of 390 (on the remote motivation behind the slaughter, see the various interpretations offered by Palanque, Saint Ambroise, 228ff., and Mazzarino, L'impero romano, III: Bari 1973, 379ff.). In the letter, Ambrose also laments the imperial orders directed against his own person (Ep. 51,2) of a series of orders that were hardly favorable to the church (CT XII,1,121; XVI, 2,27), but he alludes esp. to his various interventions to avoid the massacre (with respect to the number of the victims, see Soz., HE VII, 25; Theodoret, HE V,17-18; see CT IX,40,13) before explicitly inviting Theodosius to do public *penance. Reconciliation took place on Christmas of 390 (Paulinus of Milan, Vita Ambr. 24; Aug., Civ. Dei V,26,9-16). Ambrose's Epp. 61 and 62 are likewise directed to Theodosius; the first for justifying the recognition by him to Eugenius, the second for asking for clemency for those defeated.

The extent to which Theodosius became a point of reference for orthodoxy is shown by the Libellus precum sent to him in 384 by *Faustinus to obtain his intervention in favor of the *Luciferians. To establish the order disturbed repeatedly by the monks, imperial orders followed on 2 September 390 (CT XVI,3,1), 9 April 392 (CT XI,36,31) and 17 April 392 (CT XVI,3,2). No less significant was Theodosius's action against paganism. 25 May 385 (CT XVI,10,9) witnessed the renewal of the prohibition against bloody and divinatory sacrifices. 24 February 391 saw the prohibition against any pagan ceremony at *Rome (CT XVI,10,10) and then extended the prohibition to *Egypt (CT XVI,10,11). While the Edict of Concordia of 391 stripped the apostates from any civil or political rights (CT XVI,7,4-5), that of Constantinople on 8 November 392 outlawed paganism outright (CT XVI,10,12). The funerary oration in honor of Theodosius delivered by Ambrose (De obitu Theod.) is indicative of the harmony reached by the emperor and bishop. A panegyric in honor of Theodosius was requested from *Paulinus of Nola by a certain Endelechius (Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 28).

A. Guldenpennung, Kaiser Theodosius der Grosse, Halle 1878; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'empire romain, Paris 1933; W. Ensslin, La politica ecclesiastica dell'imperatore Teodosio agli inizi del suo governo: NDid 2 (1948) 5-35; M. Pavan, I cristiani e il mondo ebraico nell'età di Teodosio il Grande: AFLPer 3 (1965-66) 367-550; Y.M. Duval, L'éloge de Théodose dans la Cité de Dieu (V 26,1). Sa place, son sens et ses sources: RecAug 4 (1966) 135-179; A. Lippold, Theodosius der Grosse und seine Zeit, Stuttgart 1968; J. Rougé, La législation de Théodose contre les hérétiques. Traduction de CTh. XVI 5,6-24, in Epektasis, Mélanges J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 636ff.; M.G. Mara, La storia di Naboth, L'Aquila 1975, 12-23; L. De Giovanni, Chiesa e Stato nel Codice Teodosiano. Saggio sul libro XVI, Naples 1980; A. Paredi, Ambrogio, Graziano, Teodosio, in Antichità altoadriatiche 22, Udine 1982; A. Lovino, Su alcune affinità tra il Panegirico per Teodosio di Pacato Drepanio e il De obitu Theodosii di Sant'Ambrogio: VetChr 26 (1982) 371-376; P. Volpe Cacciatore, I panegirici di Temistio e Pacato per l'imperatore Teodosio, in Politica, cultura e religione nell'impero romano (sec. IV-VI) tra oriente e occidente, Atti del II Conv. dell'Ass. di Studi Tardoantichi, Naples 1993, 315-324; S. Williams - G. Friell, Theodosius: The Empire at Bay, London 1994; H. Leppin, Theodosius der Grosse, Darmstadt 2003.

M.G. Mara

THEODOSIUS II, emperor (401–450). Emperor of the Eastern portion of the Roman Empire, born on 10 April 401 at *Constantinople, died on 28 July 450. The son of *Arcadius and *Eudoxia and the grandson of *Theodosius I. In 402, while he was still an infant, he was appointed Augustus. Succeeding his father in 408 he became the sole sovereign of the Eastern empire. Theodosius was weak in character and was attached to the honors of the imperial dignity. For the entirety of his life he was a slave to the high dignitaries and the women of his court, namely his tutor, the praefectus praetorio Antemius; his sister *Pulcheria; his wife Athenais; Bishops *Atticus, *Nestorius and *Proclus; and the praepositus sacri cubiculi Chysaphius. His reign witnessed wars with the Persians and the Armenians and the great empire of the Huns, to whom, from 430 onward, he was forced to pay large tributes. In 424/425, Theodosius once again gave official recognition to Valentinian III and, therefore, his dynasty, over the Western empire. The Codex Theodosianus, which during the years 429–438 continued the collection of the imperial edicts from 312 onward, was promulgated in the name of the two emperors and entered into effect in the two portions of the empire. With respect to the capital (i.e., Constantinople), Theodosius made a name for himself by the construction of the city wall, which is preserved to this day, and for the reorganization of higher education.

PWK, Suppl. 13, 961-1044; E. Karagiannópoulos, Ἱστορία βυζαντινοῦ κράτους, 1, Thessaloniki 1978, 231-275; P.E. Pieler, in H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner, 2, Munich 1978, 388-390 (for the Codex Theodosianus); editions of the CTh: Th. Mommsen - P.M. Meyer, 2 vols., Berlin 1905; P. Krüger, 2 vols., Berlin 1923-26 (only books 1-8); G.G. Archi, Teodosio II e la sua codificazione, Naples 1976; T. Barnes, The Baptism of Theodosius II: SP XIX, 8-12; L. Brottier, L'impératrice Eudoxie et ses enfants: RSR 70 (1996) 313-332; E. Dovere, Contestazione religiosa e regionalismo: la "medicina legum" in Oriente a metà del sec. V: AHC 30 (1998) 1-36; S. Wessel, The Ecclesiastical Policy of Theodosius II: AHC 33 (2001) 285-308.

J. Irmscher

THEODOSIUS of Alexandria (6th c.). A *monophysite presbyter and legal ecclesiastical consultant, Theodosius lived in the 2nd half of the 6th c. Along with the monophysite deacon *Theodore of Copros, he invited *Longinus to come to Mareotis, which was near *Alexandria, to consecrate a patriarch for the *Jacobite Church of Alexandria. In a collection of capitula, which has been handed down in a *Syriac translation, composed by the archimandrite John Claudus from the monastery of Mar Bassus, one finds one of Theodosius's letters, who by that point was presbyter in Alexandria, then bishop in *Nubia: the author exhorts the recipient to enter communion with *Theodore bishop of Philae.

CPG III, 7223; J.B. Chabot, Documenta ad origines monophysitarum illustrandas, Louvain [2]1952, 273-276 (text), 191-193 (trans.); E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VI^e siècle, Louvain 1951, 226-227, W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972; Grillmeier 2/4, Freiburg i.B. 1990, 72.

J. Irmscher

THEODOSIUS of Carthage, deacon (6th c.). Nothing is known about the life of this individual (he is not to be found in the PCBE); his name is given by the signature for the MS in the Biblioteca Capitolare di Verona (ms. LX [58]) with the name Theodosius diaconus. Attributed to him is the Collectio Theodosii, discovered by Maffei, a debated canonical collection made around 530. It reproduces 27 documents, among which are the texts of the Council of *Nicaea (in the version said to be that of *Caecilian but which in reality is from the beginning of the 5th c.), *Neocaesarea (*Pontus), *Gangra, *Laodicea, *Constantinople, *Ancyra, *Chalcedon, *Breviarium Hipponense, *Carthage (from the year 421), the Canones Apostolorum (translation of *Dionysius Exiguus) and other documents: a letter of the Council of Nicaea to the Egyptian bishops, the letter of the Council of *Rome from 378 addressed to the Eastern bishops, a document pertaining to the Council of *Sardica, the biography of *Athanasius, the letter of *Constantine to the church of *Alexandria, *Constantine's edict against *Arianism, two letters on the origin of the *Meletian schism, the Creed of the Council of Constantinople (it reads as follows: symbolus sanctae synodici Sardici), and *Gennadius's Definitio dogmatum (incomplete).

PL 56, 143-148; F. Maassen, Geschichte, 546-559; Verzeichnis, ed. 1995, 354-355, esp. numbers 13-27; Hfl-Lecl II, 2, 1367; DDC 7, 1214-1215; J. Friedrich, Die sardischen Aktenstücke der Sammlung des Theodosius Diaconus, in Sitz. phil. philol. hist. Kl. der bayr. Akad. Wiss. zu Munich 1903, 321-343; W. Telfer, The Codex Verona LX (58): HTR 36 (1943) 169-246; C.H. Turner, EOMIA 1, 625-671; G. Turrini, Indice dei Codici Capitolati di Verona, Verona 1965; ODC, 1601-1602; A. Martin - M. Albert, Histoire 'acephale' et Index syriaque des Lettres festales d'Athanase d'Alexandrie, SC 317, Paris 1985, 13-19; 107.

A. Di Berardino

THEODOSIUS of Gangra (d. after 662). Monk, brother of *Theodore Spudaeus. His work enters the complex *monothelite controversy, during which time, in close connection with the thought and activity of *Anastasius Apocrisarius, he along with his brother produced a body of documents pertaining to the controversy and *martyrdom of *Maximus the Confessor (13 August 662), Anastasius the Disciple (22 or 24 July 662) and the same Anastasius the Apocrisary (11 October 666). In particular, in Anastasius's letter sent to Theodosius one finds the condemned man describing the fate inflicted on him and his companions in exile after the trial, and he announces Maximus's near end. This corpus of documents ends with a text known by the name of Scholium sive Hypomnesticum, which is of uncertain attribution, and which, in addition to providing historical information on the events and the persecutions brought against the opponents of monothelitism, offers several pieces of information on Theodosius and his commitment to helping the exiles and those condemned, spreading word, moreover, about their texts and witness to the faith.

R. Devreesse, Le texte grec de l'Hypomnesticum de Théodore Spoudée (le supplice, l'exil et la mort des victimes illustres du monothélisme): AB 53 (1935) 49-80; Beck 462-463; Patrologia V, 130; M. Simonetti, Un falso Ippolito nella polemica monotelita: VetChr 24 (1987) 113-146.

G. Pilara

THEODOTION (2nd c.). Author of a Greek version of the OT. The ancient biographical information about him is not in agreement. According to *Irenaeus, he was a proselyte from *Ephesus (Adv. Haer. 3,21,2). It is hardly likely that he was an *Ebionite (*Jerome, Vir. ill. 54,6; Comm. in Daniel., Prol.: PL 25,493) or a disciple of *Marcion (*Epiphanius, Mens. et pond. 17). Theodotion's translation on the whole is substantially a revision of the *Septuagint, harmonized with the Hebrew text. It seems, however, that in many passages of the Bible he did nothing more than retouch the Jewish-Palestinian revision of the Septuagint, which was probably used by the authors of the NT. His translation is of great importance esp. for the book of *Daniel because it contained the deuterocanonical portions of the book. His version constituted the sixth column of *Origen's Hexapla and is present in the fifth column sub asterico. Theodotion's work was not highly regarded by the *Jews and *Eusebius of Caesarea, but it was highly esteemed by ancient Christians, esp. Origen.

D. Barthélemy, Les devanciers d'Aquila. Première publication intégrale du texte des fragments du Dodécaprophéton, Leiden 1963, 144-157; R. Bodenmann, Naissance d'une Exégèse, Tübingen 1986; G. Dorival - M. Harl - O. Munnich, La Bible Grecque des Septante, Paris 1988, 151-157; E. Würthwein, Der Text des AT, Stuttgart [5]1988; M. Pazzini, La trascrizione dell'ebraico nella traduzione di Teodozione: Liber Annuus (1991) 201-222; M. Cimosa, Guida allo studio della Bibbia Greca (LXX). Storia - Lingua - Testi, Rome 1995; N. Fernández Marcos, La Bibbia dei Settanta, Brescia 1998, 147-158.

S. Samulowitz

THEODOTUS and the SEVEN VIRGINS. All *martyrs at *Ancyra (Theodotus is not to be confused with Bishop *Theodotus of Ancyra). Accused of being Christians during the *Diocletian persecution, seven virgins of an advanced age were drowned in a pond: Thecusa, Alexandra, Fainé, Claudia, Euphrasia, Matrona and Julitta. Thecusa's nephew, the innkeeper Theodotus, recovered their bodies and gave them a proper burial, but he in turn underwent martyrdom. Theodotus's martyrdom was told by a certain Nilus, who claims to have been an eyewitness of the event (BHG 1782). Delehaye thought that the account was a hagiographical romance; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri on the whole agrees with him but recognizes a historical foundation in the text. The saints are commemorated on 18 May.

BHG 1782-1783; BS 12, 309-312; LCI 8, 455; H. Delehaye, La Passion de S. Théodote d'Ancyre: AB 22 (1903) 320-328; P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Sopra alcuni Atti di martiri di Settimio Severo e di Massimo Daza: NBAC 10 (1904) 27-37; Id., I martìri di S. Teodoto e di S. Ariadne, Rome 1901, 7-87; H. Grégoire - P. Orgels, La passion de S. Théodote, oeuvre du Pseudo-Nil, et son noyau montaniste: ByzZ 44 (1951) 165-184.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

THEODOTUS of Ancyra (d. before 446). Bishop of *Ancyra (Galatia), first a friend of *Nestorius and then his enemy at the Council of *Ephesus (Mansi 4,1457-1464). He was a member of the delegation that the orthodox side of the council sent to the emperor *Theodosius II to inform him about the actions taken by *John patriarch of *Antioch and the small gathering of church leaders he presided over (at Ephesus, see Synodicum 38: PG 84,640-641; 432). He died before 446, so that as a result his successor was consecrated by *Proclus of Constantinople (434–446; see Mansi 7,452b). The iconoclast Council of *Constantinople (754) cites one of his supposed texts against sacred images, but in the Council of Nicaea II (784), it was demonstrated that the citation did not belong to any of Theodotus's works, for which the council provides us the list (Mansi 13, 309-311).

The following works written by Theodotus have survived: Three Books Against Nestorius; the Expositio symboli Nicaeni, directed against the Nestorians, in which he demonstrates that there is only one Son of God, who has two natures; a fragment of the Epistula ad Vitalem monachum (PG 84,814; ACO 1,4, p. 212); and six or seven Homilies. The two homilies In diem nativitatis Domini (I and II), delivered at Ancyra, were read in the Council of *Ephesus; here too was given homily (III) In Nestorium—all three, which were included in the conciliar acts, were directed against Nestorius (who is not mentioned by name), whom they accuse, among other things, of renewing *Photinus's error; likewise against Nestorius is homily IV, In s. Deiparam et in Simeonem (referred to by the Council of Nicaea II as Εἰς τα φῶτα); homily V, In Domini nostri Iesu Christi diem natalem, first only known in Latin, was published in the original text by M. Aubineau (Une homélie de Théodote d'Ancyre sur la nativité du Seigneur: OCP 26 [1960], 221-250), and so too VI, In s. Deiparam et in navititatem Domini, by M. Jugie (Homélies mariales byzantines: PO 19,289-317 [intr.], 318-335 [text and Latin trans.]), the genuineness of which, however, raises a few doubts among scholars; finally, there is preserved in Ethiopian a homily given at Ephesus during the council (A. Dillmann, Chrestomathia Aethiopica, Leipzig 1866, 103-106). The homily In baptisma Domini is doubtful (ed. M. Aubineau, in Διακονία πίστεως, Mélanges J.A. de Aldama, Granada 1969, 6-30).

Theodotus was called *Cyril of Alexandria's comrade-in-war (συναγωνιστής) by the Council of Nicaea II; he clearly professed the two natures of the one sole person of Christ, but he did not want to investigate the mystery of the mode of their union; he eloquently praised *Mary, whose perpetual virginity, which was connected to the divine maternity, he esp. lauded.

CPG III, 6124-6141; PG 77, 1308-1432; Hfl-Lecl 2 (passim); Bardenhewer 4, 197-200; DTC 15, 328-330; BBKL 11, 997-999; G. Roschini, Dizionario di Mariologia, Rome 1960, 474-475; Id., Maria SS. nella storia della salvezza, I, Isola del Liri 1969, 314; LTK 10, 51; L. Cignelli, Maria Nuova Eva, Assisi 1966, 157-201; Patrologia V, 35; M. O'Carroll, Theotokos. A Theological Encyclopedia of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Wilmington, DE 1982, 339-340; F.E. Sciuto, Identificazione di una citazione da Teodoto d'Ancira nel VII secolo: Orpheus n.s. 13 (1992) 84-92; Teodoto di Ancira, Omelie cristologiche e mariane, trans., intro. and notes by G. Lo Castro, Rome 1992.

A. De Nicola

THEODOTUS of Antioch (d. 429). Theodotus succeeded *Alexander as the bishop of *Antioch in 420. Like his predecessor, he rehabilitated *John Chrysostom. He readmitted the *Apollinarians to the church (Theodoret, HE V,38). He condemned *Pelagius in a synod at *Antioch, perhaps that he himself presided over, in 422 (Mansi 4,296). He died in 429. *Theodoret of Cyrrhus had great words of praise for him (HE V,38; Ep. ad Dioscorum). Two fragments remain from his works.

CPG 6505-6506; DCB 4, 983; Fedalto 2, 682; LACL 687; LTK[3] 9, 1425; Patrologia V, 181.

E. Prinzivalli

THEODOTUS of Byzantium, banker. Disciple of *Theodotus the Tanner, he devised the Melchizedekian variant of *adoptionism between the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd c.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884, 611-612; DTC 10, 514-515; 5, 2427; 7, 464; 8, 1256; EPapi 1, 234; P. Lampe, Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003, 344-348.

M. Simonetti

THEODOTUS of Byzantium, tanner. Toward the end of the 2nd c. Theodotus spread the teaching of *adoptionism (so-called) at *Rome. He had maintained that Christ was only man to mitigate in some way the weightiness of the apostasy into which he had fallen during a persecution, inasmuch as he had denied a man and not God.

A. Hilgenfeld, Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristentums, Leipzig 1884, 610-611; DTC 5, 2427 (see 8, 1255; 10, 2197-2198); EPapi 1, 234, P. Lampe, Christians at Rome in the First Two Centuries, Minneapolis 2003, 344-348.

M. Simonetti

THEODOTUS of Laodicea (4th c.). Bishop of *Laodicea (*Syria), modern-day Latakia, a port city for many years. Theodotus was highly regarded by *Eusebius of Caesarea because "he made a name for himself in the knowledge of healing the body but also in spiritual therapeutics" (HE 7,32,23). He was among the supporters of *Arius from the very beginning (Theodoret, HE I,5 and V,7, Athanasius, De Synodis Arim. et Seleuc. I,17) and as such was condemned along with Eusebius of Caesarea and *Narcissus of Neronias in the council held at *Antioch shortly before the Council of *Nicaea (325). No record was made of his presence at Nicaea, but immediately after *Constantine threatened to punish him if he continued to assist the Arians. In 327 he was among the bishops in the Council of Antioch, presided over by Eusebius of Caesarea; they condemned and deposed *Eustathius (Theodoret, HE I,21). He had clearly died by 341, inasmuch as at the Council of Antioch (Encaeniis), which was held that year, his successor George was present (Sozomen, HE III,5), but neither was he present at the Council of *Tyre (335). According to *Socrates (HE II,46) and *Sozomen (HE VI,25), Theodotus had some disagreements with the two *Apollinarises, father and son, who resided at Antioch.

DCB 4, 981 (confuses our author with *Theodore of Heraclea and with the Theodotus who was present at the Council of *Seleucia in 359); Simonetti 596; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 146.

M. Simonetti

THEODOTUS the Valentinian (2nd c.). Among the works of *Clement of Alexandria, another work has been transmitted, which is titled: Extracts from the Writings of Theodotus and the Eastern School at the Time of Valentinus. We have no other information about Theodotus than the figure, in the work, as the author of some *gnostic propositions cited by Clement. But other information is generically attributed to the followers of *Valentinus. The character of the extracts is heavily dependent on other sources and, in addition to the passages that are the work of Clement himself, it presents derivations from more Valentinian sources of a different orientation. Therefore, although the Extracts are very important for the knowledge of Valentinian teaching in general and in its various ramifications, it seems difficult to obtain from them something specific about Theodotus.

CPG 1139; SC 23, Paris 1948; CE 14, 27; A.-J. Festugière, Notes sur les Extraits de Théodote de Clément d'Alexandrie: VChr 3 (1949) 193-207; A. Orbe, A propósito de Excerpta ex Theodoto 54,2 (κατ' ἰδίαν): Gregorianum 41 (1960) 481-485; Id., La trinidad maléfica (A propósito de "Excerpta ex Theodoto" 80,3): i Gregorianum 49 (1968) 726-761; J.F. McCue, Conflicting Versions of Valentinianism? Irenaeus and the Excerpta ex Theodoto, in The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I: The School of Valentinus, ed. by B. Layton, Leiden 1980, 404-416; LACL 687-688.

M. Simonetti

THEODULUS (5th c.). Presbyter of Coele-Syria; he died at the time of the emperor *Zeno (474–491) and was probably a disciple of *Theodore of Mopsuestia. Ebedjesu referred to him as a "Nestorian" (Catalog. 21). According to *Gennadius (Vir. ill. 91), Theodulus wrote many books, all of which have been lost, with the exception of five groups of fragments which are as follows: (1) De consonantia Veteris et Novi Testamenti, an antiheretical work probably directed either against the *Manicheans or the *Marcionites; (2) Fragmenta duo in Iudices; (3) Fragmentum in Isaiam, originally contained in two volumes; (4) Fragmentum in Ps 73,4, and 5 and the best way of reciting them; and (5) Fragmentum in epist. ad Romanos 9,11. In the Doctrina Patrum, he appears among the witnesses in favor of *monoenergism and the veneration of icons.

CPG 6540-6544; F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum, Münster [2]1981 (= [1]1907), 315; Patrologia V, 196.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEOGNIOS. Presbyter of the church of *Jerusalem who can be identified with the monk and bishop of the same name of Betalia (425–522), concerning whom the Vitae of *Paul of Elusa (ed. I. Van den Gheyn: AB 10 [1891] 78-113) and *Cyril of Scythopolis speak (ed. E. Schwartz: TU 49/2 [1939]). Theognios wrote the Homilia in ramos palmarum, a work that is not particularly original but which allows one to catch a glimpse of the deep repercussions of the 5th-c. doctrinal controversies.

CPG 7378; J. Noret, Une homélie inédite sur les Rameaux par Théognios, prêtre de Jérusalem (vers 460?): AB 89 (1971) 113-142; I. v. d. Gheyn, Théognios, évêque de Bétélie, Revue des Questions Historiques 50 (1891) 559-567; L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina, Brescia 1980, 97, 111 and 228.

P. Marone

THEOGNIS of Nicaea (4th c.). Disciple of *Lucian of *Antioch and bishop of *Nicaea in *Bithynia, he was among *Arius's supporters from the very beginning. At Nicaea he succumbed to signing the anti-Arian formula of faith as a result of *Constantine's pressure, but shortly thereafter he was deposed and exiled along with *Eusebius of Nicomedia, by Constantine himself, because he continued to support the Arians. Exiled to *Gaul, he returned in 328 and reobtained his episcopal see. In 335 he was among the protagonists both at the Council of *Tyre and subsequent discussions at *Constantinople before the emperor, which had as an effect the condemnation, deposition and exile of *Athanasius. *Sozomen (HE III,7) says that in 342 Theognis ordained *Macedonius bishop of Constantinople, after the death of Eusebius, but it does not seem that at that moment this election was recognized to be valid. He must have died shortly thereafter because he was not among the participants at the Council of *Sardica (343).

DCB 4, 989; Quasten II, 195-196; D. de Bruyne, Deux lettres inconnues de Theognius: ZNTW 27 (1908) 107-110; G. Bardy, Recherches sur S. Lucien d'Antioche et son école, Paris 1936, 210-216; Simonetti 597; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, see index; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328-373), Rome 1996; LACL 688-689.

M. Simonetti

THEOGNOSTUS (3rd c.). Information derived from *Philip of Side places Theognostus at the head of the school of *Alexandria after *Pierius, that is, ca. 300; but such a late date seems unacceptable; therefore, scholars usually place Theognostus's scholarchate between that of *Dionysius and Pierius, between ca. 265 and 280. His only work that we are aware of was the Hypotyposeis, provided by the description of *Photius (Bibl., cod. 106). Written in seven books, it treated the following topics: God the Father and the creation of the world, the Son, the *Holy Spirit, other spiritual creatures and the *incarnation of the Son. Photius praised his literary gifts and pious spirit, but he rejected his erroneous opinions on the Son, the Holy Spirit and rational creatures, ideas derived from *Origen. In fact, the Hypotyposeis seems to have been a work similar in structure and content to Origen's De principiis, that is, a work of synthesis dedicated to the treatment of questions pertaining to God and the world. And the very few fragments that have survived, which are cited by *Athanasius and other authors, confirm Theognostus's close adherence to Origen's thought.

In two of these fragments, which are theologically very important, Theognostus, perhaps in controversy with Lucian of Antioch, maintained that the ousia ("essence, substance") of the Son does not derive from nothing, but precisely from the ousia of the Father, just as the reflection derives from the light and the vapor of the water: the Son is the emanation (aporroia) of the Father's ousia. Therefore, the Son, inasmuch as he is the Logos and the wisdom of the Father, is similar to him with respect to the ousia, a concept which in the 4th c. would be rejected by the *homoiousians.

CPG 1626-1629; PG 10, 235-242; Quasten I, 375-376; F. Diekamp, Ein neues Fragment aus den Hypotyposen des Alexandriners Theognostus: ThQ 84 (1902) 481-494; A. v. Harnack, Die Hypotyposen des Theognost (TU 24,3), Leipzig 1903, 73-92; L.B. Radford, Three Teachers of Alexandria: Theognostus, Pierius and Peter, Cambridge 1908, 1-43; J.A. Munitiz, A Fragment Attributed to Theognostus: JTS 30 (1979) 56-66; G. Anesi, La notizia di Fozio sulle Hypotyposeis di Teognosto: Augustinianum 21 (1981) 491-516; J. Naumowicz, La question de la perigraphe du Christ chez Théognoste d'Alexandrie d'après la Bibliothèque de Photius: SP 19 (1987) 216-220; LACL 689; A. Grillmeier, Le Christ dans la tradition chrétienne. De l'âge apostolique au concile de Chalcédoine, Paris [2]2003, 402-407.

M. Simonetti

THEOGNOSTUS (5th c.). Presbyter of the church of *Alexandria in the 5th c., with the presbyter Carmosinus and the deacon Leontius, was the *apocrisarius of *Cyril of Alexandria at *Constantinople, and in this capacity he received a letter from the patriarch of Alexandria (Cyril, Ep. 37: PG 77, 167-170).

CPG 5337; ACO I, 4, 123-124.

P. Marone

THEOLOGIA NEGATIVA – VIA NEGATIVA
I. Apophatism and Neoplatonism - II. Negative and mystical theology.

I. Apophatism and Neoplatonism. 1. Definition of negation (ἀπόφασις, ἀφαίρεσις). The term ἀφαίρεσις indicates the movement of distancing (remotio), exclusion or privation of something (Plato, Critias 46 c.). It is opposed to πρόσθεσις, the action of placing (Plutarch, Lycurgus 13). It is a term typically found in the writings of the mathematicians: *Aristotle opposes ἀφαίρεσις to πρόσθεσις in his Metaphysics A2, 982a28, as "subtraction" to "addition"—and it is also a term used in logic: ἐξ ἀφαιρέσεως means "through abstraction" in Aristotle's Second Analytics (I,18,7), and this was the meaning that was adopted by many Latin versions that translated the term ἀφαίρεσις with abstractio. 'Αφαίρεσις is opposed to θέσις as negation is to affirmation but is also distinguished from ἀπόφασις, which likewise means negation, inasmuch as ἀφαίρεσις indicates an overcoming or transcendence.

Latin translators rendered the term ἀφαίρεσις, on the basis of the context, both according to the concrete meaning of "diminution" or "suppression" (ablatio) and according to the meaning of abstraction (abstractio) or negation (negatio). Thomas Aquinas pointed out the two meanings, namely, the concrete and abstract sense of ἀφαίρεσις which is translated, on the principle of its force, with remotio and, subsequently, with negatio.

a. For Aristotle, the aphaeretic method is a process of separation or subtraction of additions that leads to the loss (νόησις) of an intelligible form or an essence. This method of separation or diminution is the abstraction. This abstraction goes from the complex to the simple and from the visible to the invisible.

b. This method is represented by the authors of *Middle Platonism such as Alcinous who, in the Didaskalos (ch. 12), distinguishes four ways through which the human spirit can elevate itself to God: affirmation, analogy, transcendence and negation.

2. Plato's Parmenides and its Neoplatonist commentaries. a. The foundational text of negative theology is that of the first hypothesis of the Parmenides, that "the One is one," where, after having affirmed that "the One does not participate in any way in being, and does not have sufficient being to be one because it would be and would participate at once in being" (141e), Parmenides adds to this daunting statement: "It is clear, on the contrary, that the One is not one, and that the One does not exist" (141e), which is itself the negation of the hypothesis, namely that "the One is one." The result of the first hypothesis is therefore the unknowable and ineffable character of the One: "Therefore no name belongs to it; it has no definition, no knowledge, no sensation and no opinion" (142a). "So the One has no name, no definition, no knowledge, no sensation, no opinion."

b. We find this apophatism in the Neoplatonist commentaries on the Parmenides, with a reference to the anonymous commentary, whose author has been identified as *Porphyry by Pierre Hadot (Porphyre et Victorinus, Paris 1968), or to that of Proclus.

This unknowability and this ineffability of the One from the first hypothesis of the Parmenides is a teaching common to the "Platonic theology" of *Proclus of Constantinople and the apophatic theology of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite.

II. Negative and mystical theology. 1. Apophatic theology. a. Philo of Alexandria and the early fathers of the church. *Philo was at the origin of the entire reflection on the incomprehensibility of the divine essence (οὐσία): "The greatest good is in understanding that God, according to his essence [κατὰ τὸ εἶναι] is incomprehensible [ἀκατάληπτος]" (Poster. 15). The affirmation that the knowledge of the divine being transcends human natural forces is a commonplace in the writings of the early Christian theologians (Justin Mart., Dialogue 127,2; Clem. Alex., Strom. II,2; Iren., Adv. haer. IV,20,5; Orig., Against Celsus VII,42).

b. The Eunomian crisis and the Cappadocians' refutation. Against the heresy of *Eunomius, who, identifying the divine essence with character of the unbegotten (ἀγέννητος), denied its incomprehensibility, the Cappadocians and *John Chrysostom elaborated a teaching of Christian negative theology. For Eunomius, the concept of being unbegotten properly expressed (ἀκριβῶς) the divine essence in the sense that the divine essence does not present any mystery and that we know God as God knows himself: "God knows no more of his own being than we know about him; his being is no more clear to him than it is to us" (Socrates, HE IV,7).

*Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nyssa, in their treatises Against Eunomius, indicate that there is no concept that properly expresses the divine essence (it remains unknowable), and they seek to define the properties and the relations of the divine persons. Finally, negative theology is articulate in a positive way and in a superior way. The Word prevents the human being from falling into the impossibility of speaking, the Neoplatonist ἀλογία. Gregory of Nyssa would express this deep meaning of God's mystery in such mystical works as the Life of Moses and the Homilies on the Song of Songs.

John Chrysostom explored the arguments put forward by the Cappadocians, not when addressing theologians but rather when speaking to the faithful. He delivered two series of homilies against the Eunomians at *Antioch in 386–387, and at *Constantinople, after 398. "The essence of God is incomprehensible for every creature" (IV,6). All this is true for natural reason as well as for the Bible: the psalmist "standing before the infinite and expanded ocean of God's wisdom is overcome by dizziness" (Ps 138:6); *Moses maintained that "no one could see God without dying" (Ex 33:20); and Paul says that God's judgments are "difficult to understand" and his ways "inaccessible" (Rom 11:53).

These authors used a certain number of terms that derived from the NT such as "invisible" (ἀόρατος), "unspeakable" (ἄρρητος), "indescribable" (ἀνεκδιήγητος), "inscrutable" (ἀνερεύνητος) and "inaccessible" (ἀπρόσιτος). Other terms derive from the writings of Philo of Alexandria: "incomprehensible" (ἀπερινόητος), "impossible to circumscribe" (ἀπερίγραπτος), "impossible to describe"

(ἀσχημάτιστος) and "impossible to contemplate" (ἀθέατος). Last, the term ἄφατος ("ineffable") derives from the writings of the Neoplatonists. The vocabulary of negative theology was constructed in this manner.

This vocabulary is found in the Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom, the Byzantine Liturgy of St. Basil and in the spirituality of *Maximus the Confessor and Symeon the New Theologian.

2. The affirmative and negative theology in the writings of ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite. Dionysius was the first to systematize the relationship between affirmative and negative (or apophatic) theology in the Mystical Theology. Affirmative theology takes into consideration the divine names that negative theology denies in order to demonstrate that God is always beyond such names. It is therefore in relation to the transcendent Cause that Dionysius defines the state of negation in relation to superiority.

a. The state of negation. Negation is defined by three points of view:

(1) As a noncontradiction of the affirmations and the negations. In fact the negation is not in contradiction to the affirmation. This would be true if it remained in the sphere of beings, but it does not pertain to the transcendent Cause.

(2) As an overcoming of each privation. The negation must not be understood according to privation (κατά στέρησιν) but, as in the case of Darkness, according to transcendence or superiority (καθ' ὑπεροχήν). The Darkness is still a negative metaphor of the transcendence of the inaccessible light. To say that the negation (ἀφαίρεσις) is not a privation (στέρησις) is like affirming that privation does not exist in the Cause, that it "is superior to the privations," and, from that point onward, to affirm a certain positivity of the negation through transcendence (ὑπεροχικὴ ἀφαίρεσις) in the doubling of the negation. This idea would be developed later by such medieval authors as St. Thomas Aquinas, for whom negation, when it pertains to God, is a negation of the privation itself.

(3) As beyond every negation and every position. The overcoming of privation is doubled with an overcoming of the negation and the position. In this case Dionysius used the term ἀφαίρεσις and not ἀπόφασις in the opposition between ἀφαίρεσις-θέσις.

b. The double limit of the negation. Negative theology is also defined in relation to this double overcoming of the Cause that marks its dual upper and lower limits.

(1) The negation of the privation. On the one hand, negative theology is not a negation according to privation but according to transcendence. On the other hand, negative theology is itself superseded by the Cause which is beyond the negation of position. "We do not affirm anything," says Dionysius, "and we do not deny anything because the sole Cause is beyond every affirmation and is the transcendence beyond every negation" (MT V,1048 B). There is a doubling of the negation of transcendence: it is a negation because it affirms something, and it is a negation because it denies something. It is so to speak: "neither . . . nor . . ." or "nothing."

(2) Beyond the negation. What does "nothing" mean? This nothing is the inverse of beyond. It is the same thing as saying: "The Cause is beyond the negation of position" or "we do not affirm anything and we do not deny anything."

c. The negation and the superiority. God is named according to the superiority as: "the One who is beyond every essence and knowledge," "the One who is beyond everything," "the One who is above everything," "the One who is totally unknown," "the One who overcomes vision and knowledge," "the ineffable," "the Cause of everything and the One who is above everything," "the transcendence of the One who is absolutely free from everything and beyond everything."

He is qualified by a twofold series of adjectives containing a hyper- or an alpha-privative. On the one hand, he is beyond Being, the Good and the Divine (ὑπερούσιος, ὑπεράγαθος, ὑπέρθεος), hyper-luminous (ὑπερφανής) and hyper-unknowable (ὑπεράγνωστος). On the other hand, he is invisible (ἀόρατος), intangible (ἀναφής), ineffable (ἄρρητος) and invisible (ἀθέατος), void of intellect (ἄνους), void of word (ἄλογος), void of life (ἄζωος), void of substance (ἀνούσιος), and unutterable (ἄφθεγκτος).

God could be called Silence (σιγή), Rest (ἡσυχία), Ineffable (ἀφθεγξία). God eluds every vision and every contact, just as eludes every form of knowledge. This is because mysticism, to know, to carry out a "union" of all the operations of the senses of the intelligence requires a suspension of every knowledge or absence of every intellectual activity (ἀνενεργησία), closure of the mouth, closure of the eyes (ἀβλεψία), absence of vision and knowledge (ἀγνωσία). In this way, *Moses, in penetrating through the truly mystical cloud of unknowing, "stares at all the fears of knowledge frees himself from the spectacle and the spectators."

The mystical journey values the negative way, but negative theology is not to be confused with mystical theology that goes beyond it.

Y. de Andia, Négative (théologie): Dictionaire citique de théologie, 791-795, D. Carabine, "'Απόφασις" in East and West: RTAM 55 (1988) 5-29; M. Corbin, Négation et transcendance dans l'oeuvre de Denys: RSPT 69 (1985) 41-76; É. Des Places, La théologie négative du Pseudo-Denys. Ses antécédents platoniciens et son influence au seuil du Moyen Âge: SP 17, 81-92; J.W. Douglass, The Negative Theology of Dionysius the Areopagite: DR 81 (1963) 115-124; A.J. Festugière, La Révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, IV. Le Dieu inconnu et la Gnose, Paris 1954, ch. 4, § 6: "La voie de négation"; C. Guérard, La Théologie négative dans l'apophatisme grec: RSPT 68 (1984) 183-200; P. Hadot, Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, Paris 1981, ch. 8, p. 185-193: "Apophatisme et théologie negative"; Id., Théologie négative: Encyclopaedia Universalis, 22, Paris 1990, 495-498; J. Hochstaffl, Negative Theologie. Ein Versuch zur Vermittlung des patristischen Begriffs, Munich 1976; M.J. Krahe, Von der Wesenheit negativer Theologie (diss.), Munich 1976, H.-J. Krämer, Die Ursprung der Geistmetaphysik, Amsterdam 1967, S. Lilla, La Teologia negativa dal pensiero greco classico a quello patristico e bizantino (First part): Helikon 22-27 (1982-87) 211-279; (First part: continuation): 28 (1988) 203-279; V. Lossky, La théologie négative dans la doctrine de Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite: RSPT 5 (1930) 204-221; Id., Essai sur la théologie mystique de l'Église d'Orient, Paris 1944; Id., Théologie négative et connaissance de Dieu chez Maître Eckhart, Paris 1960; R. Mortley, From Word to Silence, I. The Rise and Fall of Logos, II. The Way of Negation, Theophania 30-31, Bonn 1986; H. Theill-Wunder, Die archaische Verborgenheit. Die philosophischen Wurzeln der negativen Theologie, Munich 1970; H.D. Saffrey, Connaissance et inconnaissance de Dieu: Porphyre et la Théosophie de Tübingen, Gonimos, Buffalo, NY 1988, repr. in Recherches sur le Néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris 1990, 11-20; J. Whittaker, Neopythagoreanism and Negative Theology: Symbolae Osloenses 44 (1969) 109-125; H.A. Wolfson, Albinus and Plotinus on Divine Attributes: HTR 45 (1952) 115ff.; Id., Infinitive and Privative Judgments in Aristotle, Averroes and Kant: Philosophy and Phenomenological Research VII (1947) 173ff.; É. Zum Brunn - A. de Libera, Métaphysique du Verbe et Théologie négative, Paris 1984.

Y. de Andia

THEOLOGY. For Greek *pagans, the term θεολογία and the related words θεολογεῖν and θεόλογος refer primarily to the mystical-religious world of speaking about the gods, their origin and their relation to the world (Plat., Rep. 379[a]). *Aristotle, however, rather exceptionally, used the term θεολογική for a portion of philosophy (Metaph. 1026a.19). During the Hellenistic period there appears, above all in the writings of the *Stoics, the distinction between mythical, political and natural theology. This was a concept that helped describe religious phenomena: those phenomena concerning which the poets spoke, esp. in the case of Homer, those things that, according to the politicians and the historiographers, guarantee the salus publica, and those for which the philosophers were interested, esp. in the *allegorical interpretation of poems. Otherwise, one finds in the *Middle Platonist contexts the tripartite scheme according to which a distinction is made between dialectical, ethical and theoretical philosophy, the last of which was in turn subdivided into theology, physics and mathematics.

Christian authors such as *Origen and then the authors of the imperial church did not hesitate to adopt this language (Lampe, 627ff.). Because the mythical-religious meaning remained prevalent, one can understand why Christian authors until the 3rd c., although speaking of the true philosophy, used the term θεολογία only in the negative sense of pagan mythology. In the Praeparatio evangelica, *Eusebius of Caesarea, responding to his context, adopted the word to designate the pagan speculations about the divine (see Praep. evang. IV,5,1: SC 262,110ff., with a reference to A.M. Malingrey, Philosophia, 189-194). Nevertheless, in Origen's writings one finds the specifically Christian use of the term theology (C. Cels. VI,18: SC 147,224; VII,41: SC 150,110), which, thanks esp. to *Eusebius of Caesarea, became commonplace in the 4th c. Thereafter, Christian authors called the hagiographers or even the angels of praise to God "theologians" (see Eus., HE 1,2,5; 5,28,5; 10,4,70). They used the terms θεολογία and θεολογεῖν (Basil Caes., CE II,16: SC 305,62; see the index SC 305,328; Gregory Naz., Or. 27,1: SC 250,80; see the index SC 250,263). Following Origen's lead (Com. Io. II,34,205: SC 120,346), Eusebius in particular introduced the trinitarian meaning of θεολογία (see HE 1,1,7; 2 praef. 1; Dem. III pr.: PG 22,164A; C. Marc. I,1: PG 24,721A-C, etc.). Subsequently, it became very common to express with the term θεολογία the divinity of the Son and the *Holy Spirit or for presenting with this word the doctrine of the Trinity, which was often distinct from the doctrine on the salvific incarnation of the Word, called οἰκονομία (Basil Caes., CE II,3: SC 305,16; Gregory Naz., Or. 12,6: SC 405,360; 38.8: SC 358,118; Theodoret, In 1 Cor.: PG 82,309C; see Plagnieux, Grégoire, 168-196). In a similar way, they apply the title "theologians" to the sacred authors or those who spoke correctly about Christ's divinity (*John the Evangelist, *Athanasius and *Gregory of Nazianzus). Also worth noting are several special uses of the term theology: for the Trisagion* (Cyril Jer., Cat. 23,6), for mystical theology in the writings of monastic authors, and for negative and affirmative theology in the writings of ps.-*Dionysius (Myst. 3).

On the Latin side, only *Marius Victorinus (Ephes. prol.) adopted from the Greek authors the term θεολογία in the positive sense. *Augustine rarely used the word theologia. He does so almost exclusively in the De civitate Dei. Elsewhere, he used it in the pagan sense (see Ep. 149,2; Doct. chr. II, 28,43; C. Faust. XII, 40). In his apology he used the term theologia when discussing tripartite theology (Civ. VI, 5-12; VII, passim; VIII,1.5.12). Discussing this topic, he also spoke in a positive sense of theology. But it always concerned the theology of the Greek philosophers, whom Augustine recognized as verae sapientiae amatores (Civ. VIII,1, see esp., Neque enim hoc opere omnes omnium philosophorum vanas opinones refutare suscepi, sed eas tantum quae ad theologiam pertinent quo verbo graeco significari intelligimus de divinitate rationem sive sermonem ("For in this work I have not undertaken to refute all the vain opinions of all the philosophers, but only those opinions that pertain to theology by which Greek word we understand to be signified that reason or speech concerning the divinity"; see also VI,8,1; XVIII,41,2). When, however, the development of the Christian faith is in question, the intellectus fidei, Augustine preferred to speak of verissima philosophia (see Studer, Schola, 14, with Acad. III,20,43; ord. II,5,15. See G. Madec, Philosophie: HWP 7 [1989] 630-633, with bibl.). Only indirectly did he prepare the later Christian use of the phrase "Christian theology." Moreover, Augustine was not the first to treat the question of tripartite theology, which he himself attributed to Varro. Other Christian writers before him pursued this topic and that even in apologetic texts; for this point, see the following authors: *Tertullian (Nat. II,1,2), Origen (C. Cels. VII,41ff.; III,48; IV,99), *Lactantius (Instit. div.), Basil of Caesarea (Ad iuv. 2,85) and esp. Eusebius of Caesarea (Praep. evang., passim) (see Studer, Schola, 33).

DTC 1511, 341-346 (bibl.); J. Plagnieux, S. Grégoire de Nazianze théologien, Paris 1951; K. Bärthlein, θεολογία: JbAC 15 (1972) 181-185; G. Lieberg, Theologia tripartita in Forschung und Bezeugung: ANRW I,4 (Berlin 1973), 63-115; J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie, Paris ²1976 (with response to Lieberg); A. Dihle, Die Theologia tripartita bei Augustin: FS M. Hengel II (Tübingen 1996), 183-202; B. Studer, Schola Christiana. Die Theologie zwischen Nizäa und Chalzedon, Paderborn 1998 (bibl.).

B. STUDER

THEONAS of Alexandria (d. ca. 300). Bishop of *Alexandria, saint, feast day 23 August. He succeeded Maximus and ruled from 281/282 to ca. 300. He placed *Achillas over the school of Alexandria and ordained *Peter, who became Theonas's successor, and *Pierius (Eus., HE 7,32,30). There is a letter to *Diocletian's chamberlain, Lucian, transmitted under Theonas's name (PG 10,1567-1574).

BS 12, 354; Cath 14, 1109.

E. PRINZIVALLI

THEONAS TRITHEIST. *Monophysite bishop of Marmarica, in the 2nd half of the 6th c. After having been deposed, Theonas supported *Eugenius of Seleucia and *Conon (bishop of *Tarsus) in the spread of tritheist teaching in the East and West, likely able to escape the persecution of the monophysites commissioned by the emperor *Justin II (571). From the writings of Theonas there remain fragments in *Syriac of a letter that he wrote with Eugenius and Conon (Ep. ad eorum asseclas) to refute the trinitarian teaching of *John Philoponus.

CPG 7283; A. Van Roey, Les fragments trithéites de Jean Philopon: Orientalia Lovaniensia Periodica 11 (1980) 141-143; G. Furlani, Un florilegio antitriteistico in lingua siriaca: Atti del Reale Istituto Veneto di Scienze, Lettere ed Arti 83 (1923-1924), second part, 671-673; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie Antérieure au VIᵉ siècle, CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 179-187; A. Van Roey, La controverse trithéite jusqu'à l'excommunication de Conon et d'Eugène (557-569): OLP 16 (1985) 141-165.

P. MARONE

THEOPASCHITES. The theologians who insisted on the distinction of the two natures in Christ (anti-*Arians, anti-*Apollinarists, *Nestorians and Chalcedonians) referred to those who attributed the suffering and death to the Word itself as theopaschites (θεός, "God"; πάσχειν, "to suffer"). Against them, orthodox authors at first pointed to the biblical titles that expressed the humanity of Christ as the Son of *David (see the texts cited in Grillmeier, Christus I, 20[54]) and the Son of Man (see Grillmeier, Christus I,56-57; I, 379, with anti-Arian texts). After the Council of *Chalcedon, the controversy pertained primarily to the two formulas: qui crucifixus est pro nobis, added to the Trisagion* (Grillmeier, Christus II/2,268-277) and the unus de Trinitate passus est (Grillmeier, Christus II/2,333-359). In reality, the controversy was about an aspect of the teaching of the communicatio idiomatum, which was understood differently, on the one hand, by the Alexandrians, and, on the other, by the Antiochenes and the Latins, but which in the end was accepted by all according to the Alexandrian meaning, a meaning which was sanctioned already by *Cyril's 12th anathema (DS 263) and was deeply understood in the title of the theotokos, recognized by the Council of *Ephesus. Progress on this question was made esp. by *Severus of Antioch (see Hom. 125: PO 29,245); by his opponent *John of Scythopolis (see scholia: PG 4,196C; 221D-224A); by the so-called monks who sought to combine the christological formulas of *Chalcedon and Cyril and came together on this question at *Rome (see Maxentius, Ep. in CCL 85A,134-135); by the emperor *Justinian (see. Cod. Iustin. I,1,5, an 527); by *Boethius (see C. Nest. Eutych. 3: PL 64,1345AB); and finally by Pope *John II

(cf. DS 401-402). Theopaschites properly so-called should be distinguished from the *patripassians who, ignoring the distinction of the two natures, confused the persons of the Father and the Son. Nevertheless, in an extended sense, the patripassians too are also called "theopaschites," inasmuch as they spoke, in an even less differentiated way, of God's death (see Ign., Rom. 6,2; Eph. 1,1).

TRE 24 (1994) 289-296; LTK³ 9, 1464-1465; A. Grillmeier, Vorbereitung des MA: Chalkedon II, Würzburg 1953, 791-839; L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980; B. Studer, Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf 1985 (It. trans. 1986), 262-283 (bibl.); Grillmeier I and II/1-4, Freiburg 1979-2002 (see the indexes).

B. Studer

THEOPHANES the CONFESSOR (760–818). A Byzantine monk born in *Constantinople around 760, in the years 810–814 he wrote a Chronography that extends from the years 284 to 813. In the work, in addition to the narration of the creation of the world and the birth of *Jesus, we have many pieces of information on the years of governance for Byzantine emperors, Persian and Arab leaders, popes, and four patriarchs. This Chronography is important for its enumeration according to the cycles of the indictions and the events of the 7th and 8th c., for which Nicephorus is the only source. The work was translated into *Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius in the 9th c. Theophanes was a vociferous defender of the veneration of images; he was sent into exile in a land far from Constantinople and died there in the year 818.

C. de Boor (ed.), Chronografia, Leipzig 1883-85 (repr. Hildesheim 1963); A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa 2/1, Brescia 1996, 62; P. Yannopoulos, Constantin Porphyrogénète et Théophane le Confesseur: Byzantion 75 (2005) 362-372; F.J. Thomson, The Name of the Monastery Where Theophanes the Confessor Became a Monk: AB 125 (2007) 120-138.

C. Dell'Osso

THEOPHANY (iconography). The emergence of theophanic iconographic themes are to be connected to the invasion of apocalyptic subjects into Christian art, which took place around 400 with regard to *christological concerns. The triumphal character of such scenes likewise signaled a return to compositions reflecting the hieratism of imperial apotheoses after the Christian "naturalism" of the first centuries.

In the strict sense, many other divine appearances should be considered scenes of theophany, all inspired by the biblical *Scriptures and elaborated independently in the slow formation of the early Christian figurative repertory. A first broad group of such scenes pertains to OT theophanies. A series of these is used to indicate the divine appearance of the sending of the divine hand that appears from heaven, which was used to indicate the acceptance or rejection of the offerings made by Cain and *Abel, or to intervene on behalf of *Noah in the scenes of the universal flood. The hand is also the sign of God's self-manifestation to *Abraham, to deliver Isaac from the sacrifice and, in the MSS, to promise him descendants as numerous as the stars of the sky. As a more explicit sign, the scene of the three angels (interpreted as an image of the *Trinity) who appeared to Abraham near the Oak of Mamre: at S. Maria Maggiore (Rome), the theophanic element, otherwise hardly evident, is enhanced by the use of the mandorla of light, which indicates the eruption of the divine light. The appearance of the scala coeli to *Jacob is likewise a theophany. The cycle of *Moses was also interspersed with theophanies. Moses was often depicted with the assistance of the divine hand; moreover, the virga itself is the image in a certain sense of that hand referred to in the Bible as the "finger of God" (Ex 8:15). Another theophany, in the stories of *Exodus, was the appearance of the pillar of fire, which led the people of Israel toward the shallow place of the Red Sea. Other OT theophanies were those of the appearances of angels, God's messengers and images of his salvific presence (the young men in the fiery furnace; *Habakkuk), or even the apocalyptic scene of the *tetramorph narrated in Ezek 1.

The NT theophanies are often connected to the scenes of the life of Christ, starting from the appearance of the angel to *Mary during the Annunciation or the portrayal of the angelic theophany that provokes and precedes the adoration of the shepherds. The scene of the *magi also has a theophanic implication in the sense of the divine manifestation of *Jesus. At the *baptism of Christ, the divine appearance is manifested through the divine hand that comes from heaven and sends the dove of the *Holy Spirit. At the Transfiguration, the luminous halo of the mandorla, although once again God's hand, often appears on the scene of the crucifixion. Again an angelic theophany marks the proclamation of the resurrection to the pious women, and at the ascension God manifests himself in the hand of Western iconography and in vision of the Eastern Syro-Palestinian tetramorph (as in the Rabula Gospels).

In the Acts of the Apostles, an angel appears to *Peter to deliver him from prison, while the mosaics found in S. Maria Maggiore depict Christ's appearance to *Paul from heaven in the same likeness as God in the story from Exodus. Numerous theophanic scenes were taken from *John's *Apocalypse and interpreted in an overtly christological sense: from the theophany of the *Lamb, to the scenes of the parousia, the numerous vision such as that of the candelabra, of the "one who is seated on the throne" (Rev 4; the throne that is singled out in the representation of the Hetoimasia), or even the theophany of the Trisagion (sung by the worshiping tetramorph).

Christological scenes not tied to specific biblical citations such as that of the Maiestas Domini or the Traditio Legis* have elements connoting a theophany.

F. van der Meer, Maiestas Domini. Théophanies de l'Apocalypse dans l'art chrétien. Étude sur les origines d'une iconographie spéciale du Christ, Vatican City 1938; Id., L'Apocalypse dans l'art, Anvers 1978; R. Petraglio et al., L'Apocalypse de Jean: Traditions exégétiques et iconographiques, IIIe-XIIIe siècles (Actes du Colloque de la Fondation Hardt, 29 février - 3 mars 1976, Section d'Histoire de la Faculté des Lettres de l'Université de Genève), Geneva 1979; J. Engemann, Images parousiaques dans l'art paléochrétien, ibid., 73-107; F. Bisconti, recensione a R. Petraglio et al., L'Apocalypse de Jean . . . : RivAC 56 (1980) 209-213; M. Perraymond, Sogni, visioni e profezie nell'antico cristianesimo: Abramo, Giacobbe, Ezechiele, Pastore d'Erma, Felicita e Perpetua, in Atti del XVII Incontro di Studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana, Roma 5-7 maggio 1988, Rome 1989, 549-563; U. Utro, s.v. Teofania, in TIP 285-286.

U. Utro

THEOPHILUS of Alexandria, patriarch (385–412). Uncle of St. *Cyril of Alexandria, his successor. He was an exceptional individual. Intelligent, gifted with energy and decisiveness, and aware of the prestige that his position conferred on him, he was at the same time somewhat inflexible and did not think very much about the means he employed to achieve his objectives. The literary sources (*Palladius, *Socrates and *Sozomen) are hostile toward him; nevertheless, good assessments of his character were offered by *Arnobius, *Theodoret, *Leo the Great, Vigilius of Thapsus and monastic circles.

At the beginning of his pontificate, he used violent means to bring about the end of *paganism in *Egypt: he was famous for the destruction of the *Serapeion (391; the adjoining library was also destroyed). Theophilus, however, was a great builder of churches. In ecclesiastical questions, he was, for a brief period, a peacemaker (e.g., the Antiochene schism, the disagreement between *Jerome and *Rufinus), but he subsequently acted in a rather inconsiderate and imprudent manner. Although initially an admirer of *Origen, he became in 399 his staunch opponent; he condemned him in a synod of 401 and persecuted his supporters at all costs, among whom were the four "long brothers"—Dioscorus, Ammon, *Eusebius and Euthymius. When these men accused Theophilus before the emperor *Arcadius and when they had found hospitality with *John Chrysostom, Theophilus was very resentful and began to plot against John Chrysostom, whom he himself had consecrated (398). Called to *Constantinople to defend himself in a synod presided over by the patriarch, at the behest of the emperor, he formed a coalition with John's numerous enemies and the accused became, through intrigue, John's accuser, and in the Synod of *Oak (403) Theophilus deposed John. The popular riots that immediately broke out following John's departure for exile forced Theophilus to make a quick flight from Constantinople. *Innocent I, to whom John had made an appeal, excommunicated Theophilus. In the Byzantine and Latin churches, Theophilus was always judged with severity and disfavor because of the dark shadows that have concealed his person; he enjoys, however, considerable esteem among the Copts and the Syrians, who venerate him as a saint.

From Theophilus's numerous writings, scarce relics remain, and very few in the original text. Jerome's Epistolary (87, 89, 90, 92, 96, 98, 100) respectively preserves two letters sent to Jerome by Theophilus, one to *Epiphanius, a synodical letter to the bishops of *Palestine and *Cyprus, and three festal letters from the years 401, 402 and 404: all provide an up-close look at the Origenist controversy and partly *Apollinarianism. The Ep. ad Theodosium imp., preserved intact only in *Latin, is a dedicatory letter that functions as a preface to the Paschal cycle for the years 380–479 sent to the emperor so that he might adopt it. For many other letters, including the festal ones, we possess only fragments or only know the names of the recipients. The Homilia in mysticam coenam belongs to Theophilus, which is included among the works of Cyril of Alexandria (PG 77,1016-1029) and provides a commentary on Christ's Last Supper. Among the numerous homilies that have survived in *Coptic under his name, two could possibly be authentic (De crucifixione and De poenitentia), although others should be attributed to late legendary constructions. We have fragments of some other writings: De morte et iudicio (PG 65,200), on the woman with the issue of blood (F. Diekamp, Doctrina Patrum, Münster i.W. 1907, 120 under the title De poenitentia) etc. Numerous other homilies and narrations of doubtful or no authenticity have been passed down under his name. Theophilus also wrote against Origen and John Chrysostom; he commented on various books of Sacred *Scripture and promulgated ecclesiastical canons. His various *apophthegmata circled among the monks of the desert (PG 65,197-201). Numerous homilies survive in *Armenian that have been attributed to Theophilus; their authenticity is still to be examined.

CPG II, 2580-2684; PG 65, 33-68; DTC 15, 523-530; LTK 10, 80; DSp 15, 524-530; F. Rossi, I papiri copti del Museo Egizio di Torino, I, Turin 1887, 64-90; E.A.W. Budge, Coptic Homilies in the Dialect of Upper Egypt, London 1910, 65-225 (text and Eng. trans.); G. Lazzati, Teofilo d'Alessandria, Milan 1936; A. Favale, Teofilo d'Alessandria. Scritti, vita e dottrina, Turin 1958; Bardenhewer 3, 115-117; Quasten 2, 102-108; Altaner 291; Fliche-Martin IV, 21-193 (passim); S. Der Nersessian, Armenian Homilies Attributed to Theophilus, in P. Granfield - J.A. Jungman, Kyriakon. FS J. Quasten. I, Münster Westf. 1970, pp. 390-399; Patrologia V, index.

A. De Nicola

THEOPHILUS of Antioch (2nd c.). Bishop of *Antioch in Syria, he composed, at the end of the 2nd c., at least four works. The only one that has been preserved, the Ad Autolycum, provides us a few pieces of biographical information on Theophilus: born not far from the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers (2,24), he converted to Christianity (1,24) and lived among the Christians, who were an opposed and denigrated minority (3,4); when he finished the Ad Autolycum, the emperor *Marcus Aurelius was already dead (3,28): he therefore wrote after 17 March 180. Autolycus, to whom the work is dedicated, was a learned *pagan man who did not know why someone would become a Christian. Theophilus sought not only to respond to his objections but also to vindicate his faith in the invisible God, the creator, and the resurrection (book 1). Book 2 emphasizes the contradictions of the philosophers and Greek poets with respect to God and the origin of the world; he sets them against the prophets, who were inspired by God. We therefore find the first Christian commentary on the beginning of the book of *Genesis and, in 2,15, the first example of the use of the term "*Trinity" (trias), to refer to the "God, Word and Wisdom" (*Holy Spirit). Book 3 contains a chronology of the world aimed at demonstrating that *Moses was before Homer and the most ancient Greek writers.

Another one of his works was written Against Hermogenes. *Eusebius only mentions that John's *Apocalypse was cited (HE 4,24). *Jerome specifies that it consisted of "one sole book" (Vir. ill. 25). Scholars have been able to determine that it was the source for *Tertullian's Adversus Hermogenem. And in all likelihood Theophilus made an allusion to that treatise through his Ad Autolycum (2,28), where he affirms that he had explained elsewhere that the dragon or the devil in the beginning was an angel (see Rev 20:3); in Tertullian's Adversus Hermogenem (11,3) one in fact finds a mention of this explanation.

Theophilus also composed a text titled Against Marcion, which is described by Eusebius as "a work of great value" (HE 4,24). The undeniable influence of Theophilus on *Irenaeus and his Adversus Haereses is probably explained through the latter's reading of this treatise mentioned by Eusebius.

Theophilus himself makes recourse to a work On History that he had published in multiple books (Ad Autol. 2,30,31; 3,19). There he establishes the genealogy of humanity after Seth. He identifies *Noah with Deucalion and lists the descendents of Shem, Ham and Japheth. It was probably there that *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I, 21,142,1) and the author of the List (10,31) discovered, independently, that the descendents of Shem, Ham and Japheth formed 72 nations (see RHR 130 [1971] 164-166).

In his reference to Theophilus, *Jerome affirms that he had "read under his name some commentaries on the gospel and the Proverbs of Solomon," whose authenticity seemed to him to be doubtful (Vir. ill. 25). He also specifies (Ep. 121,6) that the first was a synoptic commentary on the four gospels. The influence of Theophilus's *exegesis can be detected in the writings of later Antiochene authors.

Editions: CPG 1107ff. Best eds.: R.M. Grant, Oxford 1970, with Eng. trans.; G. Bardy, SC 20, with Fr. trans., Paris 1948; Marcovich, New York-Berlin 1995 (marred by risky conjectures); It. trans.: C. Burini, Gli apologisti greci, Rome 1986, 363-462.

Studies: W. Hartke, Über Jahrespunkte und Feste, insbesondere das Weihnachtsfest: Akad. der Wiss., Sektion für Altertumwiss., 6 (Berlin), 1956, 13-17; M. Simonetti, La Sacra Scrittura in Teofilo di Antiochia, in Epektasis, Mélanges J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 197-207; P. Nautin, Ciel, pneuma et lumière chez Théophile d'Antioche (Notes critiques sur Ad Autol. 2,13): VChr 27 (1973) 165-171; N. Zeegers-Vander Vorst, La création de l'homme chez Théophile (Gen 1,26): VChr 30 (1976) 258-267; F. Bolgiani, L'ascesi di Noè. Apposito di Th., Autol III, 19, in Forma futuri (Studi . . . M. Pellegrino), Turin 1975, 295-333; F. Bolgiani, Sullo scritto perduto contro Ermogene, in Paradoxos Politeia (Misc. G. Lazzati), Milan 1979, 77-118; A.J. Droge, Homer or Moses?, Tübingen 1989, 102-123; N. Zeegers, Les trois cultures de Théophile d'Antioche, in Les apologètes chrétiens et la culture grecque, ed. B. Pouderon - J. Doré, Paris 1998, 135-176; R.M. Rogers, Theophilus of Antioch, Lanham 2000; S.J. Voicu, Teofilo e gli antiocheni posteriori: Augustinianum 46 (2006) 375-388.

P. Nautin

THEOPHILUS of Antioch (pseudo). He lived between the 5th and the 6th c. in S *Gaul; he is believed to be the author of a commentary on the four gospels that was attributed by the MS tradition to *Theophilus of Antioch or even to *John of Jerusalem. Theophilus composed this work keeping in mind *Jerome's writings and the exegetical solutions proposed in *Augustine's De consensu evangelistarum, *Maximus of Turin's Expositio de capitulis evangeliorum, *Eucherius of Lyons's Formulae and in *Arnobius's Adversus nationes.

CPL 1001; T. Zahn, Der Evangelienkommentar des Theophilus von Antiochien: Forschungen zur Geschichte des nt. Kanons 2 (1883) 29-85; PLS 3, 1282-1329; G. Morin, Homélies inédites attribuées à Jean de Jérusalem du ms. 427 de Reims: RBen 22 (1905) 12-14; H. Quentin, Jean de Jérusalem et le commentaire sur les Évangiles attribué à Théophile d'Antioche: RBen 24 (1907) 107-109; R. Hessling (ed.), ZKG 33 (1912) 529-536; Patrologia IV, 299-300.

P. Marone

THEOPHILUS of Caesarea. Bishop of Caesarea, in *Palestine, end of the 2nd c. At the time of Pope *Victor (189–199), along with *Narcissus bishop of *Jerusalem, Theophilus was at the head of the provincial council called to bring an end to the controversy over the date of *Easter. Once the decision had been made, he wrote an encyclical letter which the council also sent to *Rome, in which they declared that having celebrated Easter on the Sunday after 14 Nisan, they, just like the Romans and the Alexandrians, followed their apostolic tradition (Eus., HE 5,22 and 25). Under his name survive this council's acts (which are certainly forgeries), as well as a polemical document on the date of Easter, likewise apocryphal, probably the work of a British author from the 6th or 7th c.

B. Lohse, Das Passahfest der Quartadezimaner, Göttingen 1953; P. Nautin, Lettres et écrivains chrétiens des IIe et IIIe siècles, Paris 1961, 85-89; J.A. Fischer, Die Synoden im Osterfeststreit des 2. Jh.: AHC 8 (1976) 15-39; A. Strobel, Ursprung und Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Berlin 1977; K. Gerlach, The Antenicene Pascha, Leuven 1998.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEOPHILUS of Castabala (d. 377). He was at first a bishop in *Palestine (Soz., HE IV,24). Transferred then by *Silvanus of Tarsus to Castabala in *Cilicia, he exercised the episcopate there from 362 to 375. In 362 he appears among the leaders of the *homoiousians and took part, with Silvanus and *Eustathius of Sebaste, in the embassy sent to *Rome by the Synod of *Lampascus. He signed the *Nicene Creed and was received in communion by Pope *Liberius. In 375 he contributed to the split between his friend Eustathius and Basil of Caesarea. He later became a member of the pneumatomachi (see Basil of Caesarea, Epp. 130,1; 244,2; 245).

DCB 4, 999; R. Devreesse, Le Patriarcat d'Antioche, Paris 1945, 157; Simonetti 393.395.415; BBKL 26, 1480-1482.

J. Gribomont

THEOPHILUS the INDIAN (d. 361). Called the Thaumaturge, he is written about by the *Arian historian *Philostorgius (d. 430). An *anomoian bishop and native of Diva (or Dibus, perhaps modern-day Sokotra opposite Somalia, another location in the Gulf of Oman), he was considere by *Gregory of Nyssa to be from the tribe of the Blemmi (Contra Eunomium I, ed. W. Jaeger, 38) in *Nubia. Taken as a young man as a hostage by the Romans, under *Constantine he converted and dedicated himself to the monastic life. He was consecrated a deacon and then presbyter by *Eusebius of Nicomedia (d. 341). Upon becoming bishop, he was sent by *Constantius II (337–361) on missionary journeys, first among the Sabaeans, among whom he established three churches, at Taphanam, Adane (Aden, Yemen) and Hormuz, then to the *Ethiopians (who had already been evangelized by *Frumentius, who had been sent by *Athanasius in 327). Exiled the first time by Constantius for interceding in favor of the Caesar Gallus, he was recalled to heal his sick wife, on account of his thaumaturgic powers. A partisan of *Aetius, Theophilus was exiled by the Council of *Seleucia (359), to Heraclea Pontica. He returned upon the advent of the emperor *Julian. He was present at *Eudoxius's consecration as patriarch of Constantinople (360) and the election of Bishop Aetius in the Arian synod of 362.

Philostorgius, HE, ed. J. Bidez, F. Winkelmann, GCS 21, 1981[3], 18, 33-36, 57, 61-63, 69, 84, 105, 116 and 125.

J. Ryckmans, Le christianisme en Arabie du Sud préislamique, in Atti del conv. int. "L'Oriente cristiano nella storia della civiltà," Rome 1964, 413-454, esp. 416-420; A. Dihle, Die Sendung des Inders Theophilos, in Politeia und Res publica, FS R. Starks, ed. P. Steinmetz, Wiesbaden 1969, 330-336; N. Pigulewskaja, Byzanz auf den Wegen nach Indien: Berliner Byzantinistische Arbeiten 36 (1969) 72-78 and 213; G. Fiaccadori, Teofilo Indiano: Studi classici e orientali 33 (1983) 295-331; 34 (1984) 271-308; I. Shahîd, Byzantium and the Arabs in the Fourth Century, Washington, DC 1984, 86-104; ODB 3, 2067; G. Fernández, The Evangelizing Mission of Theophilus "the Indian" and the Ecclesiastical Policy of Constantius II: Klio 71 (1989) 361-366; BBKL 11, 1030-1033.

E. Prinzivalli

THEOPHYLACT SIMOCATTA (ca. 580–after 630). Of Egyptian origin, he studied at *Alexandria only to then transfer as a young man to *Constantinople, where perhaps he was at the service of the patriarch *Sergius. He is the author of a History in eight books, which remained incomplete, on the reign of the emperor Maurice (582–602), compiled around 630 without a specific plan and with many concessions to the anecdotal method. He also composed, in addition to 84 letters (many of which are fictitious), some Quaestiones physicae and a treatise De praedestinatione.

BBKL 11, 1033-1035; Krumbacher 247-251; H. Hunger, Die hochsprachliche profane Literatur der Byzantiner. I (Byzantinisches Handbuch 5, I), Munich 1978, 313-319. Historiae: C. de Boor, Theophylacti Simocattae Historiae, Leipzig 1887; P. Schreiner, Theophylaktos Simokates, Geschichte (Bibliothek der griechischen Literatur 20: Abteilung Byzantinistik), Stuttgart 1985; M. Whitby - M. Whitby, The History of Theophylact Simocatta: An English Translation with Introduction and Notes, Oxford 1986 [1988; 1997]; A.M. Taragna, Sul testo delle Historiae di Teofilatto Simocatta: 4.14.10, 5.4.11: Sileno 25 (1999) 345-349; Peter Schreiner, Theophylaktos Simokattes und das Perserbild der Byzantiner im 6. und 7. Jh., in XXI. Deutscher Orientalistentag vom 24. bis 29. März 1980 in Berlin. Ausgewählte Vorträge, ed. Fritz Steppat (ZDMG. Suppl. 5), Wiesbaden 1983, 301-306; M. Whitby, The Emperor Maurice and His Historian: Theophylact Simocatta on Persian and Balkan Warfare (Oxford historical monographs), Oxford 1988; M. Popoviç, Zur Lokalisierung des "Trajansweges" des Theophylaktos Simokattes: JOEByz 53 (2003) 83-95.

Letters: R. Hercher, Epistolographi graeci, Paris 1873, 763-786; I. Zanetto, Theophylacti Simocatae epistulae (Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana), Leipzig 1985; C.A. Ciancaglini, Le "Lettere persiane" nella storia di Teofilatto Simocatta, in La Persia e Bisanzio, Atti dei Convegni Lincei 201, Rome 2004, 633-664.

Quaestiones physicae: L. Massa Positano, Teofilatto Simocatta. Questioni naturali, Naples 1965.

De praedestinatione: C. Garton - L.G. Westerink, Theophylactus Simocates, On Predestined Terms of Life (Arethusa monographs 6), Buffalo 1978; B. Baldwin, Theophylact's Knowledge of Latin: Byzantion 47 (1977) 357-360; Th. Olajos, Les sources de Théophylacte Simocatta (Byzantina Neerlandica 10), Leiden-New York 1987.

S.J. Voicu

THEOPISTE, deacon (pseudo) (6th c.). Scholars have attributed to the deacon Theopiste a History of Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, which recalls the events connected to the Council of *Chalcedon and the subsequent exile of the Alexandrian patriarch. The text was probably written shortly after the patriarch's death, but the *Syriac translation that we possess is the fruit of a reworking of the text that can be traced back to the *monophysite milieu of *Palestine, and is therefore presumably datable to after 518. The preservation of some fragments in *Coptic bears witness to its diffusion even in an Egyptian context (BHO 258). The work, which has been regarded by some scholars as a "historical romance," does not therefore belong to Theopiste, the presumed deacon of patriarch *Dioscorus, but it would be included among that polemical literature that was an expression of the anti-Chalcedonian dissent that flourished in the 1st half of the 6th c.

CPG 5470; BHO 258; F.N. Nau, Histoire de Dioscore Patriarche d'Alexandrie écrite par son disciple Théopiste: Journal Asiatique 10,1 (1903) 5-108, 241-310; W.E. Crum, Coptic Texts Relating to Dioscorus of Alexandria: Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology 25 (1903) 267-276; T. Orlandi, La Patrologia copta, in A. Quaquarelli (ed.), Complementi interdisciplinari di Patrologia, Rome 1989, 493-495; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa 2/1, Brescia 1996, 78; Patrologia V, 352, 362 and 567.

C. Dell'Osso

THEORIA. In all of Greek thought, from the pre-Socratics until the Corpus Hermeticum and later to *Neoplatonism, the terms θεωρία ("contemplation") and θεωρεῖν ("to contemplate"), along with other analogous terms such as θέα, θεᾶσθαι, ὅρασις and ὁρᾶν, referred to the highest form of knowledge that the human mind was able to attain (see the article by R. Arnou cited in the bibl.). As early as the writings of *Plato, the notion of contemplation acquired primary importance (see R. Arnou's article and A.J. Festugière's book, cited in the bibl.; the most important passages from Plato are also collected in S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 165). But it was primarily *Aristotle who praised theoria: he regarded it as the highest end of man (Protr. fr. 6 Walzer [Aristotelis dialog. fragm., Florence 1934, 35, 13-41]). It was closely connected to his love for knowledge (Protr. fr. 2 Walzer), it is the most pleasurable and lofty thing that exists (Met. Λ1072b 24), and it produces pleasure and happiness (Eth. Nic. VII, 1152b 36-1153a 1; X, 1178b 28-32). In the entire *Platonic tradition—from Plato until *Philo of Alexandria, to *Middle Platonism and *Neoplatonism—theoria often appears associated to the terms taken from mystery language such as ἐποπτεία and ἐποπτεύειν, and it thus comes to acquire an esoteric stamp. The Greek Fathers fully accepted this understanding of theoria: like Plato, Philo, and the proponents of Middle Platonism and Neoplatonism, such authors as *Clement of Alexandria, *Origen, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Evagrius and ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite regarded theoria as contemplation—on the part of the human nous—of the transcendent realities or ideas which for them are all joined in the divine logos. They closely associate it to the terminology taken from the mystery language and therefore identified it with the superior esoteric gnōsis, which, in the writing of such "mystical" authors as Gregory of Nyssa and ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite, still remains distinct from the ἕνωσις with the chief principle, the experience that transcends any form of intellectual knowledge (even in Neoplatonism, the concept of theoria and ἕνωσις remained distinct. In the writings of Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and in ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite's Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, the term theoria also refers to the exegetical method that allows for the discovery of the spiritual meaning of Scripture (see J. Daniélou, L'être et le temps chez Grégoire de Nysse, 1, 9, 10; S. Lilla, Pseudo-Dionigi l'Areopagita, La gerarchia ecclesiastica, 10). Contemplation also performs an important role in the writings of St. *Augustine and *John Cassian (see the contribution of M. Olphe-Galliard in the bibl. below).

As E. Kihn (ThQ 62 [1880] 581-582) and esp. A. Vaccari have shown (Biblica 1 [1920] 4-36 [= Scritti di erudizione e di filologia, I, Rome 1952, 101-142]), the concept of theoria used in the Antiochene school seems closely connected to the type of scriptural *exegesis that firmly rejects the *allegorism practiced by the Alexandrian school, which operated according to Philo's example. *Diodore of Tarsus wrote a treatise on the differences between theōria and allēgoria, of which the preface for his commentary on Psalm 118 (which is preserved in the codex Paris gr. Coislin. 275 and ed. L. Mariés) functions as a summary (see Vaccari, Scritti di erudizione e di filologia, I,101-102, 110-111). A concise definition for the term theoria in the Antiochene sense was given by *Julian of Eclanum (PL 21, 971B; see Vaccari, Scritti di erudizione e di filologia, I,111-112). *Severian of Gabala and St. *John Chrysostom, among others, held to this type of theoria (see Vaccari, Scritti di erudizione e di filologia, 109-110). See also *allegory – typology; *exegesis, patristic).

R. Arnou, La contemplation chez les anciens philosophes du monde gréco-romain: DSp 2, 1716-1742; J. Daniélou, Mystique de la ténèbre chez Grégoire de Nysse: DSp 2, 1872-1885; J. Lemaître - R. Roques - M. Viller, Contemplation chez les grecs et autres orientaux chrétiens: DSp 2, 1762-1787; M. Olphe-Galliard, La contemplation dans la littérature chrétienne latine: DSp 2, 1911-1929; R. Roques, Contemplation, extase et ténèbre chez le pseudo-Denys: DSp 2, 1885-1911; E. Kihn, Über θεωρία und ἀλληγορία nach den verlorenen hermeneutischen Schriften der Antiochener: ThQ 62 (1880) 581-582; A. Vaccari, La "teoria esegetica" della scuola antiochena: Biblica 1 (1920) 4-36 (= Scritti di erudizione e di filologia, I, Rome 1952, 101-142); J. Kroll, Die Lehren des Hermes Trismegistos, Münster 1914, 350-354; A.J. Festugière, Contemplation et vie contemplative selon Platon, Paris 1936; W. Jaeger, Aristoteles, Berlin ²1955, 81ff.; Id., On the Origin and Cycle of the Philosophical Ideal of Life, Appendix II of the Eng. trans. of his Aristoteles, ed. R. Robinson, Oxford 1948, 430-431; W. Völker, Der wahre Gnostiker nach Clemens Alexandrinus, TU 57, Berlin 1952, 316-321, 403-411; E. Fascher, Epoptie: RAC 5, 973-983; J. Daniélou, L'être et le temps chez Grégoire de Nysse, Leiden 1970, 1-17; S. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria, Oxford 1971, 163-169; var. aus., Terminologia esegetica nell'antichità, Bari 1987; O. Gigon, La teoria e i suoi problemi in Platone e Aristotele, Naples 1987; DSp 16 (1994) 592-623 (Vie active, Vie contemplative); Th. Böhme, Theorie, in Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie 10 (1998) 1128-1134 (bibl.); S. Lilla, Pseudo-Dionigi l'Areopagita, La gerarchia ecclesiastica, Rome 2002, 10.

S. Lilla

THEOSEBIA. Sister of *Gregory of Nyssa, *Macrina and *Basil. *Gregory of Nazianzus in Letter 197 consoles his friend Gregory of Nyssa on the death of his σύζυγος Theosebia, who is sometimes assumed to have been Gregory's wife but in fact was his sister. Theosebia was a consecrated virgin, like her sister Macrina, to whose house she probably belonged, at least initially. It is true that Gregory was married, but not to Theosebia; indeed, in De virginitate he states that he is cut off by a gulf from "the glory of virginity," but his depiction theren of grief for the death of a young wife in childbirth suggests such an intense participation that it seems likely that he experienced it personally. If this be the case, Gregory's marriage must not have lasted long. In his Letter 11, Gregory of Nazianzus reproaches Gregory of Nyssa for preferring to be called a rhetor rather than a Christian, for relapsing little by little to the "lower life," and for making a "bad decision" in choosing the career of a rhetorician instead of pursuing the path to priesthood. Gregory of Nyssa's marriage must be located in this phase. But his wife was a different woman than Theosebia, whose death is lamented in Gregory of Nazianzus's Letter 197 to Gregory of Nyssa.

This is demonstrated by both this letter and Gregory of Nazianzus's Epigrams 161 and 164, where Theosebia is described as one of Emmelia's daughters—and therefore Gregory's sister—σύζυγος of a priest, the great Gregory. She is said to have been a "support of pious women" and to have died "at a seasonable age" (thus, not in childbirth, as I think is indicated also by Letter 197, where she is said to have escaped "the sad experiences of life" [τὰ δὲ λυπηρὰ διαφυγοῦσα]). Now, in Letter 197, too, Gregory of Nazianzus states that Theosebia was σύζυγος of Gregory when he was a priest, and at the same time he attests that she was his sister: τῆς ἁγίας ἀδελφῆς ὑμῶν καὶ μακαρίας. Here, too, he says that she died at a "seasonable age." All this suggests that Theosebia was Gregory's celibate sister who lived in close association with him at Nyssa: Gregory of Nazianzus indeed speaks of Gregory's life together with her (τὸ τοιαύτῃ συζῆσαι). This was first hypothesized by the Benedictine editors of PG 35,46-54 and 37,322 n. 54, who also considered her to be a deacon of the church of Nyssa. Silvas (100) regards it as "conceivable that she was the founder and presbytera of the 'choir of virgins' at Nyssa," which is described by Gregory in Letter 6.10.

In fact, in Gregory of Nazianzus's Epigram 164 she is praised as "the support of pious women," and, what is more, in his Letter 197 she is celebrated as "the glory of the church, the adornment of Christ, the advantage of our generation, the confidence and daring of women [τὴν γυναικῶν παρρησίαν], the fairest and most outstanding [εὐπρεπεστάτην καὶ διαφανεστάτην] amid such a splendor of siblings, Theosebia, the truly sacred [τὴν ὄντως ἱεράν] and truly fellow of a priest [ἱερέως σύζυγον; cf. Epigram 161: ἱερῆος σύζυγος], of equal honor and worthy of the great mysteries [ὁμότιμον καὶ τῶν μεγάλων μυστηρίων ἀξίαν]." It is notable that a priest and a bishop (who revered her and called her Θεοσεβίαν τὴν ἐμήν for "her life devoted to God," Ep. 197) said that Theosebia had an honor equal to that of a priest and participated in the celebration of the great liturgical mysteries, surely those of the Mass. That this was not an isolated case in the early church, where women διάκονοι and πρεσβύτεραι—and even one ἐπίσκοπα—are repeatedly attested, is demonstrated by several studies. A close comparison that I have drawn with a few women diakonoi in *Cappadocia at the end of the 4th c. confirms the supposition that Theosebia may have been a presbytera charged with liturgical functions in the celebration of the Mass and probably also of the Divine Office, the spiritual and material support of women in Nyssa, and the defense of orthodoxy. It is also probable that she was in charge of his brother's community during his exile.

J. Mayer, Monumenta de viduis diaconissis virginibusque tractantia, Bonn 1938; R. Gryson, Le ministère des femmes dans l'église ancienne, Gembloux 1972; G. Otranto, Note sul sacerdozio femminile nell'antichità, VetChr 19 (1982) 341-360; U. Eisen, Amsträgerinnen in frühen Christentum. Epigraphische und literarische Studien, Göttingen 1996; K. Madigan - C. Osiek, Ordained Women in the Early Church: A Documentary History, Baltimore-London 2005; A.M. Silvas, Gregory of Nyssa: The Letters [VCS 83], Leiden 2007; G. Macy, The Hidden History of Women's Ordination, Oxford 2008; I. Ramelli, Teosebia in ministerio Ecclesiae*: un esempio di* diakonia nella Cappadocia del tardo IV secolo?, in Diaconia, Diaconie. XXXVIII Incontro di Studiosi di Antichità Cristiane, Roma, Augustinianum, 8-10 May 2009 [SEA], Rome 2010.

Ilaria Ramelli

THEOSIS. See *DIVINIZATION

THEOSOPHY. This treatise is commonly known among those appointed to study the work as the Theosophy of Tübingen, from the city in whose university library the MS containing the fragment on the "Oracle of the Pagans" is preserved, which was published for the first time by Karl Buresch (1889). The original title, however, was simply Theosophy. It consists of four books and constitutes the appendix of a theological treatise written in seven books On the Orthodox Faith. Nevertheless, the complete treatise has been lost, clearly because of its *monophysite orientation, although incomplete fragments from the Theosophy have been preserved. Thanks to the pioneering work of Mras (1906) and Erbse (1941 and 1995), it has been possible for us to follow the research in the direction of a reconstitution, although partial and open to subsequent developments, of the original text of the Theosophy, which allows us today to evaluate its specific contributions even for the knowledge of patristic literature and theology, in addition to the religious and philosophical pagan traditions of *Late Antiquity.

The work should be dated around 502/503. Its author reveals clear millennialist and monophysite tendencies (his christological thought moves in the direction between *Cyril of Alexandria and Zeno's Henoticon). The author places the death of Christ in the year 5500 from the creation, that is, in the year 500 of the 6th and last millennium. This signified that the author was awaiting the end of the world for the year 507/508 (according to the Alexandrian *computus). At the same time the author shows that he was in possession of a vast knowledge of the Eastern pagan world. If one must, however, exclude definitively any relationship with the inaccessible figure of the *Manichean Aristocritus (the name proposed for the first time by Brinkmann), one could reasonably attribute the work, with noteworthy proximity, to a theologian such as Severus of Sozopolis, or even a person who lived in those same milieu and who shared those religious and intellectual experiences.

Developing the logical apologetics of such authors as *Lactantius, the ps.-Justin of the Collatio, the author of the De Trinitate (*Didymus the Blind) and Cyril of Alexandria, the author of the Theosophy proposes to demonstrate that there exists a substantial harmony (symphonia) between the religious and philosophical wisdom of the pagans (Greeks, Egyptians and Persians), who have been illuminated by God, and the truths contained in *Scripture, esp. the typically Christian doctrines, namely those of the *Trinity and the *incarnation. In completing this task, the author seems to desire to place himself explicitly against *Porphyry of Tyre, who, in the Philosophy of the Oracles, proposed to lead to "theosophy" whoever would receive the true philosophy that is found in harmony with the oracles of the gods. One should also note that the title also echoes the use that ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite had recently made of the word-key "theosophy." The work is therefore to be placed as an anthology or a *florilegium in which a systematic comparison is made of citations from pagan texts (or presented as such) with biblical passages.

The first book collects numerous oracles of the gods (Apollo, Serapis, Hermes and Artemis) and some valuable inscriptions from which the author establishes the argument that pagan Egyptian theology recognized such teachings as the virginal birth of the Logos-Son and the consubstantiality (homoousios*) of the Logos-Son with the Nous-Father. The second book contains the sentences of Greek wise men, that is, the philosophers (Orphaeus, Heraclitus, Diagoras, *Plato, *Aristotle, Plutarch, *Porphyry, Syrian etc.) and the poets (Sophocles, Euripides, Menander etc.), and passages from the revelations of Hermes Trismegistus (in part already known through *Cyril of Alexandria). The third book, whose impressive literal citation of Firmianus (*Lactantius) in Latin deserves to be noted, is devoted to the *Sibylline oracles, among which is the famous Oracle of *Baalbek, or the Tiburtine Sibyl. The fourth book contained citations taken from the Book of Istape, but unfortunately only Zoroaster's messianic prophecy has been preserved in *Syriac translation. The work concludes with the universal Chronicle that goes from *Adam to *Zeno, in which extensive passages from *Hippolytus's Chronicle and the Protevangelium of James* are transcribed. Fortunately, this Chronicle has survived even though incomplete and written in an appalling Latin, in a translation from the Merovingian age known as the Excerpta Latina Barbari or Barbarus Scaligeri (the latter deriving from the name of its first editor).

In order to demonstrate his thesis, the author does not hesitate to make recourse to true and proper propagandist forgeries produced in the 2nd half of the 5th c., as in the case, for example, of the Oracle of Apollo, which contains a confession of the monophysite faith, or the Oracle of Apollo on the consecration of the Parthenon to *Mary. Other famous forgeries such as the Testament of Orphaeus and the Sibylline Oracles circulated, however, as early as the 2nd c. The Theosophy offers important pieces of information concerning the reception of these pseudepigraphal texts in ancient Christianity. Zoroaster's messianic prophecy was found in the Christianized redaction of the Book of Istape, which likewise dates back to the 2nd c. But on the whole, the pagan material reproduced is of great documentary value and awaits systematic analysis and commentary.

P.F. Beatrice, Anonymi Monophysitae Theosophia: An Attempt at Reconstruction (VChrS 56), Leiden-Boston-Cologne 2001 (bibl.); Id., Forgery, Propaganda and Power in Christian Antiquity: Some Methodological Remarks: Alvarium. Festschrift C. Gnilka (JbAC-Erg. Bd. 33), Münster 2002, 39-51; Id., The Word "Homoousios" from Hellenism to Christianity: ChHist 71 (2002) 243-272; A. Busine, Paroles d'Apollon. Pratiques et traditions oraculaires dans l'Antiquité Tardive (IIe-VIe siècles) (RGRW 156), Leiden-Boston 2005.

P.F. Beatrice

THEOTECNUS of Caesarea, bishop. Bishop of *Caesarea in *Palestine (3rd c.). During his episcopate he met the centurion Marinus shortly before he underwent *martyrdom (Eus., HE 7,15,4: SC 41,189-190) and took part in the Council of *Antioch (264) by drafting, along with the other conciliar fathers, the formula of faith that *Paul of Samosata had to sign (Ep. Hymenaei Hierosolymitani, Theophili, Theotecni, Maximi, Bolani ad Paulum Samosatenum, in Eus., HE 7,28,1: SC 41,212).

CPG 1705; E. Schwartz, Eine fingierte Korrespondenz mit Paulus dem Samosatener: Sitzungsberichte der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften in Munich 3 (1927) 42-46; G. Bardy, La lettre des six évêques à Paul de Samosate: RSR 6 (1916) 17-33; Id., Paul de Samosate, Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 4, Louvain 1929[2], 9-34; F. Loofs, Paulus von Samosata: TU 44/5 (1924) 108-110, 265-283; H. De Riedmatten, Les Actes du procès de Paul de Samosate. Étude sur la christologie du IIIe au IVe siècle, Freiburg 1952, 121-134.

P. Marone

THEOTECNUS of Livia. Bishop of Livia in *Palestine (Tell er-Ram: in the eastern Jordan area near the Dead Sea) between the 6th and 7th c. One of his homilies on the assumption of *Mary (15 August) remains extant as one of the earliest explicit witnesses to his existence. The name of the feast is significant: Ἀνάληψις τῆς ἁγίας θεοτόκου. The homily explicitly and numerous times affirms that Mary was assumed into heaven body and soul, so that only for a brief time the former might remain separated from the latter, but remaining incorrupt. The author, although appealing to the traditions found in the apocrypha on the death and assumption of Mary, established the dogmatic foundation for affirming her assumption into heaven in her relationship to the mystery of the *incarnation: in fact Mary's dignity as the Mother of God, her perpetual virginity and exalted sanctity, demanded that her body be made exempt from corruption, and that it be assumed to heaven and reunited to the soul so that the Virgin might enjoy the glory of her Son. All the theological arguments used by Theotecnus in favor of the dogma of the assumption were reused by later Byzantine homilists.

CPG III, 7418; A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la très sainte Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du VI^e au X^e siècle. Études et documents, Paris 1955, 96-110, 271-291; Id., in Maria: Études sur la S. Vierge, ed. H. du Manoir, 5, Paris 1958, 936-938; Beck 400; Altaner 555; G. Söll, Storia dei dogmi mariani, Rome 1981, 192-196 and 429; Testi mariani del primo millennio, ed. A. Gharib, 2, Rome 1988, 80-97; Patrologia V, 288; BBKL 11, 1035-1037.

A. De Nicola

THEOTIMUS of Tomi (4th–5th c.). Bishop of *Tomi (modern-day Constanţa), in Scythia, between the end of the 4th c. and the first decades of the 5th. He was referred to as the "philosopher." Initially he was a pagan philosopher (Socr., HE 6,12; Soz., HE 7,16; 8,14), but shortly after his conversion he was ordained a bishop (in ca. 392). He had great success when working among the pagan tribes of the *Huns and the *Goths in spreading the worship of the Christian God, whom the barbarians called "the God of the Romans." *Jerome was also aware of some of his dialogues (Vir. ill. 131), but all of these works are now lost. He was a friend of *John Chrysostom and defended him against *Theophilus of Alexandria. In 403 Theotimus objected to the condemnation of *Origen. He died before the Council of *Ephesus (431), where his successor Timothy was present.

G. Ladocsi - S. Samulowitz

THEOTIMUS the Valentinian (2nd half of the 2nd c.). *Valentinian *gnostic who was active perhaps at *Rome. According to *Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 4), who mentions him alongside *Secundus the Gnostic and Mark the magician (*Mark the Gnostic), he was the author of a work titled On the Images of the Law, most likely on the *allegorical exegesis of the OT. It is possible that some texts that come from this work are cited by *Irenaeus in Adv. Haer. I, 17,1-18,3 as representative of Valentinian OT exegesis and are often attributed, however, to Mark the Gnostic, the disciple of *Valentinus at *Alexandria, who was then active at *Lyons, where Irenaeus knew him well and extensively documented his teachings, also including Sigé, the silence, as the feminine counterpart of the first divinity.

Because this aspect seems to be absent in chs. 17-18 of Irenaeus's book 2, it could also be the result of derivations from Theotimus's work. One finds an exposition there of how the creation was the work of the Demiurge through the Mother, according to the (Platonizing) model of the invisible realities: for example, the four elements were modeled on the primordial Tetrad and their operations on the *Ogdoad; the 12 zones of the world on the Duodecad, etc. Likewise dependent on Plato, the Demiurge created time to seek to imitate infinity and eternity; nevertheless, the work adds that because the truth escaped him, he followed the lie and therefore, in the fullness of time, his work will perish. All of this continues through ch. 17. Ch. 18 is more strictly exegetical and is more likely to derive from Theotimus. In Gen 1:1, God, the beginning, heaven and earth are identified with the Tetrad; the second Tetrad, derived from the first, is individuated in the abyss, in darkness, in the spirit and in the waters that the text of Genesis mentions immediately after. Similarly, the Decad, the Duodecad and the Triacontad are identified in the various realities created later. Even human beings were created in the image of the higher power, having in themselves in the end the faculties that proceed from the One and from which arise four other faculties on the model of the Tetrad: sight, hearing, smell and taste. The Ogdoad is reflected in the anthrōpos inasmuch as it has two eyes, two ears, two nostrils and two tastes, sweet and bitter. Similarly, the Decad, the Duodecad and the Triacontad are individuated in the human being. On the fourth day the Sun was formed, with reference to the Tetrad, which would be symbolized also by the curtains of *Moses's tabernacle, which was composed of flax, blue, purple and scarlet, and also the four rows of precious stones of the high priest, and generally speaking everything that was found in numbers of four in the OT. Some considered the anthrōpos male and female at the same time, created in the image and likeness of God, just as the spiritual human, before the human that was formed from the earth (a Philonian and then an Origenian idea). Moreover, the eight persons saved on Noah's ark in the flood would correspond to the salvific Ogdoad and to *David, who was the eighth of his brethren, and to circumcision on the eighth day, and so too the other things occurring in numbers of eight in the OT. The ten nations promised to *Abraham by God would symbolize the Decad, and thus many other things occurring in numbers of 10 in the OT. The Duodecad is omnipresent in the OT: the twelve tribes of Israel etc. And the Triacontad, the union of the preceding numbers, is seen in the height of thirty cubits of *Noah's ark and in other occurrences of the same number. All of this seems to be an allegorical reading of the Bible on the basis of numerology.

C. Colpe, Gnosis II (Gnostizismus): RAC 11 (1980) 538ff.; M.A. Williams, Rethinking "Gnosticism": An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category, Princeton, NJ 1996; C. Markschies, Die Gnosis, Munich 2001; K.L. King, What Is Gnosticism?, Cambridge, MA-London 2003; A. Marjanen (ed.), Was There a Gnostic Religion?, Göttingen 2005; K.L. King - R. Van der Broek, Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, I, ed. W.J. Hannegraaff et al., Leiden-Boston 2005, 412; LACL 691.

I. Ramelli

THEOTOKOS. Title given to *Mary inasmuch as she was the mother of God, the origin of which must be sought in the Alexandrian school. *Origen, in his Homilies on Luke, affirms the concept of Mary's divine maternity with analogous formulas (Hom. VII,6; VIII,4). According to *Philip of Side, *Pierius of Alexandria (281–ca. 300) delivered a speech concerning the Theotokos. *Peter Martyr (d. 311) knew of it and used the title. Certainly attested by *Alexander of Alexandria and Athanasius, the most certain evidence is given by the troparion Sub tuum praesidium, where the term was used in its current form. From the 4th c. onward, the writers and fathers of the church commonly used it as a specific title for Mary. *Nestorius objected to the term as improper, unbiblical and absent from the terminology used by the Council of *Nicaea, tainted by *paganism (because it presents Mary as a goddess) and argued that instead the term should be replaced with Christotokos. A definitive response to his objections were given by the Council of *Ephesus (431), which approved the legitimacy of the use of this term and gave it a precise meaning.

Philip of Side, Historia christiana, fragmenta, TU, 5/2, 171; Peter Martyr, Fragmenta: PG 18, 517; Alexander of Alexandria, Epistola I ad Alexandrum episcopum Constantinopolitanum I, 12: PG 18, 568; Athanasius, Contra Arianos, Oratio III, 14.29.33; Id., Vita Antonii 36; Id., De Incarnatione et Contra Arianos 22; H. Rahner, Hippolytus von Rom als Zeuge der Ausdruck Theotokos: ZKTh 59 (1935) 73-81; G. Giamberardini, Il "Sub tuum Praesidium" e il titolo Theotokos nella tradizione egiziana: Marianum 31 (1969) 350-358; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, London ²1975, 392-413; G. Söll, Storia dei dogmi mariani, Rome 1981, 90-91, 108-113, 152-164; A. Poós, La "Theotokos" ad Efeso, Calcedonia e nel Vaticano II, Rome 1981; Marienlexikon 6, 390-391; Theotokos. A Theol. Encycl. of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Dublin 1982, 342-343; S.J. Voicu, "Kyriotokos" e "Theotokos" nelle omelie di Severiano di Gabala: Theotokos 12 (2004) 329-335 (demonstrates that Severian did not use the term Theotokos).

E. Peretto

THERMAL BATHS (Thermae, balnea, balneae). In the first centuries of Christianity, esp. in the West, thermal baths were widespread and public; their use was an integral part of the culture. Over time, the voluntary abstention of Christians from them annoyed the pagans less. The practices of the ancient age would continue. There were two tendencies among Christians: abstaining from enervating hot baths and engaging in cold baths (in the N) practiced to sedate the flesh. Nevertheless during the first centuries there was no systematic prohibition of these baths. There was rigorism esp. in the milieu of Eastern asceticism (*Jerome, *Anthony) and in the West with *Fulgentius of Ruspe. The Western monastic rules, however, were more moderate (Aug., Ep. 211, 13; CSEL 57,367; Regula Benedicti 36). Fathers and councils did not condemn the baths per se, but they repressed the abuses found either in the multiplication of licentious baths or, even though separated by gender but still in common use, those that were exacerbated by refinements before and after the bath.

The condemnation issued by the Council of *Laodicea in 320 (Mansi 2,569), which was made more severe by the Council *in Trullo (can. 77 = the cleric was deposed, the layman separated from the congregation: Mansi 9,978), was accompanied by that of the Fathers (Clement of Alex., Paed. III, 5: PG 8,600; Cypr., De habitu virg. 19: PL 4,471-472; Jer., Adv. Iovin. 2,36: PL 23,349-350). Legislation issued by the emperor *Justinian in 528 agreed with this condemnation by considering it a grounds for divorce for the husband if his wife went to the baths among males libidinis causa, although a man who had forced a woman to the baths was subject to the death penalty (CJ V,17,11). Christians practiced baths of purification after sexual intercourse in marriage, before receiving the *Eucharist, on Sunday and before feast days. *John Chrysostom generally recognized the benefits of the baths (Ad pop. Ant. hom. XIV,6: PG 49,151-152); at times it is clearly acknowledged (Greg. the Great, Ep. XIII,1: PL 77,1254). There is a rich symbolism in the writings of the Fathers concerning the baths, with a special ecclesial meaning (John Chrysostom, In Ep. II ad Cor. hom. 15: PG 61,510) (see H. Dumaine, Bains, 98-100). At *Rome, through the interest of the popes (e.g., *Damasus [366–384] and *Symmachus [498–514]), and *Constantinople through the work of the emperors (e.g., *Constantine) and elsewhere, through the initiative of the bishops (e.g., at *Ravenna, bishop Victor), baths were constructed for Christians.

H. Dumaine, Bains: DACL 2, 72-177; J. Zellinger, Bad und Bäder in der altchristlischen Kirche, Munich 1928; L. Gougaud, Bains: DSp 1, 1197-1200; C. Testore, Bagno: EC 2, 686-688; H. Leclercq, Thermes: DACL 15, 2271-2272; PWK II, 2743ff.; R. Paribeni, Bagno, in Enc. Ital. Treccani 1930, 856-862 (Antichità classica); R. Gabetti, Bagno (nell'antichità), in Nova, l'Enciclopedia Utet, I, Turin 2001, 834-835.

O. Pasquato

THESSALONICA

I. City and Christianity - II. Archaeology.

I. City and Christianity. Thessalonica (modern-day Thessaloniki) was established in 316/315 BC by Cassander, who gave the city the name of his wife, the sister of Alexander the Great. The city's almost perfect geographical position brought about its rapid development, and immediately after the Roman conquest of *Macedonia (186 BC) it became the capital of the second of the fourth autonomous districts into which the entire territory was divided; the city later became the capital of the entire eparchy of Macedonia (146 BC) with the exceptional title of "free city." Thessalonica always excelled throughout the entire Roman period because of its excellent commercial and political position, increasingly earning recognition from *Rome with the title guardian of the temple (neōkoros)—in fact, it had the honor of housing the imperial temple—and later with the title of "Roman colony." During the era of the tetrarchy (AD 300), it reached the height of its prosperity as the seat of the Caesar *Galerius, who embellished it with many buildings. The language used during the Roman period remained Greek as attested by epigraphic documents. The religion, which in the beginning was solely Hellenic, slowly declined toward a syncretism with other foreign divinities, until the Christian religion emerged at the beginning of the 4th c. When, in AD 50, the apostle *Paul reached the city, he found the terrain suited for the preaching of the new faith. In subsequent centuries the city was marked as the center in which the leaders of the surrounding churches came together to experience the climate of a notable religiosity, as mentioned by the archbishop of the city Aetius at the Synod of *Sardica (343). Having come into contact with this environment, *Theodosius the Great (379–395) also decided to officially embrace Christianity, and here in 380 he promulgated the decree with which the decisions of the Council of *Nicaea were recognized and *Arianism condemned. When a sedition broke out at Thessalonica in 390, the emperor's repressive measures caused a massacre in the circus. *Ambrose then imposed a public penance on him.

Because Thessalonica was a center of an important road network and a point of encounter between the Greek East and the Latin West, it already received its first evangelization during the apostolic age. At the beginning of his second missionary journey, during the first months of the year 50, Paul, after having preached at *Philippi (Acts 16), where he had already met opposition from the Jews who had caused him "suffering and abuse" (1 Th 2:2), headed with Silas (Acts 16:25–17:4), who was also called "Silvanus," and *Timothy toward *Thessaly and, passing through Amphipolis and Apollinia, arrived at Thessalonica. There in the synagogue for three straight *Sabbaths he explained the Sacred *Scriptures, demonstrating that *Jesus was the Messiah. Some Jews believed and joined Paul and Silas; they were also joined by "a great many of the devout Greeks and not a few of the leading women" (Acts 17:4). The Jews, being envious, incited some people to remove Paul and Silas from the city, but they had already fled by night for Berea, to then go to *Athens, where Paul sent for Silas and Timothy (Acts 17:15; 18:5), who then returned to Thessalonica (1 Th 3:1).

At Thessalonica Paul had established the second Christian community in Europe, after Philippi. From Athens, Paul wrote the First Letter to the Thessalonians, after which, Timothy, who had been sent from Athens to Thessalonica, had communicated to him about the condition of the Christian community there, which had been persecuted by the Jews but was resolved in their faith. A few months afterward, it seems, Paul wrote the Second Letter to the Thessalonians. The Christian community developed thereafter (see the edict of *Antoninus Pius [138–161] mentioned by *Melito of Sardis in Eus., HE 4,26,16). During the *Diocletian persecution, in 304, the sisters *Agape, Chione and Irene were *martyred there (see P. Franchi de' Cavalieri, Il testo greco originale degli atti delle ss. Agape, Irene e Chione: ST 9, Vatican City 1902, 3-19), who are mentioned in the Hieronymian Martyrology for 1 April and in the Syriac Breviary for 2 April (Passio graeca, in BHG 2,34). Under the emperor Galerius (305–311), Agathopus and Theodulus were martyred, who are remembered on 4 April (Synaxarium Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, 583). The martyr *Demetrius was also venerated there (BHG 2,496-547; H. Delehaye, Les légendes grecques des saints militaires, Paris 1909, 107-108). David (ca. 535) and Theodora (ca. 893) were also saints from Thessalonica.

The episcopal lists are fragmentary so that as a result very few names are certain before the 4th c. The first bishop would have been Aristarchus the disciple of Paul. Bishop Demetrius, the patron of the city, died as a martyr in 290 or in 306 (AASS Octobr.

IV,50-209). The metropolitan bishop Alexander participated at the Council of *Nicaea (325) and the dedication of the basilica of the Holy Sepulcher at *Jerusalem (335) (see Eus., Vita Constant. IV,43,3). After 379, Macedonia, although united to the East, remained under the patriarchate of Rome; the metropolitans of Thessalonica from 382 to 389 were apostolic vicars for eastern Illyricum. After a council called at Capua in 391 under Pope *Siricius (384–399) had treated the questions raised by *Bonosus bishop of Naissus in Dacia Inferior, who denied *Mary's virginity and reiterated the trinitarian errors of *Photinus of Sirmium, the bishops of Illyricum more carefully reexamined Bonsosus's teachings: for this purpose *Anasius the archbishop of Thessalonica convoked and presided over a council that also addressed the validity of the ordinations performed by Bonosus, once he had been deposed by the Council of Capua. *Ambrose (Ep. 56), who was monitoring the council's progress and had deferred the judgment on Bonosus to Anisius, wrote to Bonosus, who was obliged to obey the council's decisions. In 518 another council was held at Thessalonica. From 649 onward Thessalonica entered into conflict with Rome (Hfl-Lecl III,208), so that as a result, in 732, the emperor *Leo III separated Illyria from Rome. Thessalonica, the homeland of Cyril and Methodius, from 820 onward was the center for the evangelization of the Slavs.

O. Tafrali, Thessalonique des origines jusqu'au XIVe siècle, Paris 1919; Fr. Tafel, De Thessalonica eiusque agro dissertatio geographica, Berlin 1939; on the first Council of Thessalonica, see Mansi 3, 689; Jaffé, nn. 261, 299 and 303; Palazzini 5, 966-967; C.W.R. Larson, Theodosius and Thessalonian Massacre Revisited yet Again: SP 10, 297-301; V. Parlato, Il vicariato di Tessalonica (IV-VII sec.): Studi Urbinati di Scienze Giur. 49-50 (Rimini 1980-82) 133-150; P. Nautin, La lettre de Félix III à André de Thessalonique et sa doctrine sur l'église et l'Empire: RHE 77 (1982) 5-34; A. Vecchio, La strage di Tessalonica. Nuove ricerche sulla data: 389 o 390?, in Humanitas classica e sapientia cristiana, Scritti offerti a R. Iacoangeli, ed. S. Felici, Rome 1992, 115-144; R.C. Ascough, The Thessalonian Christian Community as a Professional Voluntary Association: JBL 119 (2000) 311-328; C. von Brocke, Thessaloniki: Stadt des Kassander und Gemeinde des Paulus: eine frühe christliche Gemeinde in ihrer heidnischen Umwelt, Tübingen 2001; R. Börschel, Die Konstruktion einer christlichen Identität: Paulus und die Gemeinde von Thessalonich in ihrer hellenistisch-römischen Umwelt, Berlin 2001; L. Nasrallah, Empire and Apocalypse in Thessaloniki: Interpreting the Early Christian Rotunda: JECS 13 (2005) 464-508; Frühchristlicher Thessaloniki, ed. C. Breytenbach, Tübingen 2007.

E. Pelekanidou - C. Nardi

II. Archaeology. From the era of *Theodosius the Great, the first Christian buildings were constructed at Thessalonica and subsequently enlarged and lavishly decorated.

St. George (the so-called Rotunda). The Rotunda, as it is locally referred to because of its circular layout, being contemporaneous to Galerius's triumphal arch, dates to the end of the 3rd c. or to the 1st decades of the 4th. At the end of the 4th and toward the mid-5th c., it was transformed into a church with the addition of a vast circular corridor. The chief entrance was moved to the E side; the apse was added and decorated on the inside with splendid mosaics. Windows and rosettes show simple themes that are also found on the floor mosaics: in various positions and at irregular distances, birds, baskets full of fruit and isolated fruits portrayed in stark colors are found on a golden or silver background; even the frames are animated by animals, birds and fruit. The chief decoration is found in the vault of the dome, which is divided into two sections: the first, by architecture framing various saints; the second filling the remaining surface. In the architecture one finds exedrae that enclose the altars, and their forms recall the structure of the tomb of *Petra and the temple of Dionysius and Baalbek. On the bases and the plinths of these amazing constructions are the *martyrs in a posture of prayer depicted in their entirety and facing the viewer. The large mosaic compositions once set above this area have been lost; from what remains, however, it is possible to reconstruct their general schema: 22 figures filled the entire surface, which is today barren; at the top ran bands representing a heavenly arch; another band was decorated with blue stars on a golden background and an ornate wreath of leaves and fruits. At the center, supported by four angels, is Christ standing and in the act of blessing. The apse is decorated with a fresco of Christ's *ascension, which is divided into two areas: in the upper part, Christ is on a luminous aureole, flanked by two angels; in the lower part, the praying Virgin is between two angels, surrounded by the *apostles. The fresco dates to the 9th c.

Monì Latomou (Hosios David). The small church of Monì Latomou, known today by the name of "Hosios David," dates after the mid-5th c. The building, of which only the W part remains, was originally in the form of a Greek cross with a dome. The mosaic of the apse represents the vision of *Ezekiel: Christ, a young beardless man seated on a heavenly arch, is wrapped in a large and transparent aureole; at the four chief points are the *symbols of the evangelists who lift up the gospels; at the feet of Christ are the four rivers of Eden: Pishon, Gihon, Tigris and Euphrates, whose waters flow into the river Chebar, which unfolds solitary, blue and full of fish; in the middle of the waters, alongside the feet of Christ, the personification of the river, a bearded man with his back emerges from the water; in the left corner is Ezekiel, a prisoner in the land of the Chaldeans, on the banks of the River Chebar; in the right corner, inside a cave hewn in the rock, *Habakkuk is awaiting the word of God. The artist shows himself to be a master not only with respect to the colors and the general design of the work but also with respect to the heavy psychological effects of the forms. A strong expressive realism in the rendering of the storm and the climate of agitation characterizes Ezekiel's vision, while a quiet serenity and an attitude of deep meditation shine from the face and position of Habakkuk.

St. Demetrius. The most important monument of the city, connected to the national history of Greece, is the basilica of St. *Demetrius, which contains five naves with a transept and was established on the place of an oratory or a martyrium at the beginning of the 5th c. The eparch of Illyricum at that time, Leontius (412–413), after having been healed through the intervention of the saint, out of gratitude wanted to build a church that was worthy of him. The church, which was destroyed by a fire in the 1st half of the 7th c., was reconstructed almost immediately after and, in subsequent centuries, preserved its splendor despite its rearrangements and depredations by the *Saracens, Normans, Franks and Turks. When at the beginning of the 5th c. the large basilica emerged by work of Leontius, many parts of the old thermal baths, both because the architectural elements were indispensable and because these subterranean elements were closely connected to the imprisonment and martyrdom of St. Demetrius, were incorporated into the new edifice and esp. into the crypt. At the same time the old Roman constructions, with opportune completions and modifications, served as subfoundations of the apse, the transept and in general the entire E part of the basilica. The central nave, the narthex and a part of the altar were covered with polychrome marble. In the central nave, in addition to this decoration, an ornamentation in opus sectile depicted the various geometric and floral motifs. More precious marble decorated the trabelon, entirely covered with green fabric, hung in the lower part among small turquoise columns. One should note that the variety of the capitals is unique: all types of early Christian capitals are represented there, from the Theodosian to the wavy and stylized with leaves moved by the wind; the capitals of the pillars have a decoration of birds that drink from vases. The cancelli, which date from the 5th and the 9th c., also present a remarkable variety. The pictorial decoration does not follow a specific plan: at numerous points, to make place for the representations of the mosaics and the frescoes, slabs of the marble decoration were removed, although undesirable compositions or images were covered with marble. The mosaics date between the 5th and the 9th c. or at most the 10th c. The mosaic with the healing of the children, which is found on the W wall of the S nave, and an angel, which is all that is left of a representation from the W wall of the N nave, are from the 5th c. To the 7th c. belong the mosaics of the founders on the N façade of the pillar NE of the altar, the scene of St. Demetrius with the two children on the W façade of the pillar NE of the altar, the mosaic of St. Demetrius with a bishop on the W façade of the pillar SW of the apse, the portrayal of the saint with four clerics in the N sector of the tribelon, which is preserved in good condition, the mosaic of St. Demetrius, which is now protected in the chapel of the crypt (one of the most important because it pertains to the reconstruction of the church in the 7th c. and bears the name of the eparch who in that period governed Illyricum), and the mosaic of St. Sergius on the façade of the pillar SE of the altar. The mosaic of the Madonna with St. Theodore, which is found on the façade of the pillar NE of the apse, is from the end of the 9th or the beginning of the 10th c. Few fragments have been preserved to this date in good condition: the most noteworthy is found on the wall of the basilica, and it dates to the 7th c.

The Acheiropoieta. Built seemingly after the condemnation of Nestorius by the Third Ecumenical Council (431), the church took its name from an icon of the Madonna and Child, which was then miraculously transformed into a Madonna standing in prayer without a Child. Because some regarded this transformation as having occurred without the intervention of any painter, the icon was called Acheiropoieta, "made without human hands." The basilica with three naves divided by columns standing on wide stylobates has lost its marble that covered all the walls; nevertheless, it is one of the few early Christian churches that has preserved intact many architectural elements (columns, Theodosian capitals, frames etc.). The only mosaics that have survived are those that covered the inner borders of the arches of the columns. The decoration of the three arches of the tribelon against a golden background presents a large variety of colors, designs and forms. The mosaics of the Acheiropoieta are among the most important of the 5th c.; the presence of some motifs such as the lotus reveal a technique, as in the case of the mosaics of St. George, which was still under the influence of classical art.

1. General works: O. Tafrali, Topographie de Thessalonique, Paris 1913; Ch. Diehl - M. Le Tourneau - H. Saladin, Les monuments chrétiens de Salonique, Paris 1918; C. Pietramellara, Salonicco capitale dell'impero nel IV secolo, in L'imperatore Giustiniano. Storia e mito. Giornate di studio a Ravenna, 14-16 ottobre 1976, ed. G.G. Archi, Milan 1978, 273-304; G. Gounaris, L'archéologie chrétienne en Grèce de 1974 à 1985, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Int. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2687-2711, esp. 2702ff.

2. Rotunda (St. George): E. Dyggve, Recherches sur le palais impérial de Thessalonique, in Studia orientalia Ioanni Pedersen dicata, Köbenhavn 1953, 59ff.; H. Thorp, Quelques remarques sur les mosaïques de l'église Saint-Georges à Thessalonique, in Acta of the IXth Int. Byzant. Congr., Thessaloniki 1953, 489-498; St. Pelekanidis, Gli affreschi paleocristiani ed i più antichi mosaici parietali di Salonicco, Ravenna 1963; P. Cattani, La rotonda ed i mosaici di San Giorgio a Salonicco, Bologna 1972.

3. Hosios David (Monì Latomou): J. Papadopoulos, Une mosaïque byzantine de Salonique: CRAI 1927, 215-218; Ch. Diehl, Une mosaïque byzantine de Salonique: CRAI 1927, 256-261; P. Grumel, La mosaïque du "Dieu Sauveur" au monastère de Latomou à Salonique: EO 33 (1930) 157-175; C. Diehl, À propos de la mosaïque de Hosios David à Salonique: Byzantion 7 (1932) 333-338; St. Pelekanidis, Παλαιοχριστιανικά Μνημεῖα Θεσσαλονίκης, Ἀχειροποίητος, Μονή Λατόμου, Thessaloniki 1949.

4. St. Demetrius: G. and M. Sotiriou, Ἡ Βασιληκή τοῦ Ἁγίου Δημητρίου Θεσσαλονίκης, Athens 1952; St. Pelekanidis, Γραπτή παράδοση καὶ εἰκαστικέ. τέχνες γιά τὴν προσωπικότητα τοὺ Ἁγίου Δημητρίου, Thessaloniki 1970; C. Bakirtzis, Le culte de saint Démétrios, in Akten des XII Int. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, I, Münster 1995, 58-68.

5. Acheiropoieta*:* St. Pelekanidis, Παλαιοχριστιανικά Μνημεῖα Θεσσαλονίκης, Ἀχειροποίητος, Thessaloniki 1949; A. Xyngopoulos, Concerning Acheiropoietos Thessalonica: Μακεδονικά 2 (1941-52) 472ff.; J.-M. Spieser, Thessalonique et ses monuments du IV[e] au VI[e] siècle. Contribution à l'étude d'une ville paléochrétienne, Paris 1984; H. Torp, Thessalonique paléochrétienne. Une esquisse, in Aspects of Late Antiquity and Early Byzantium, Stockholm 1993, 113-132; EAM 8 (1997) 65-71; 10 (1999) 274-281; EAA2 5, 73-77; RBK 5 (1995) 982-1220.

E. Pelekanidou

THESSALY. When the Delphic Amphictyonic League was reconstructed during the Augustan era, the term Thessaly acquired a new political meaning. This term was meant to refer to the region that went from Thermopylae to Mt. Olympus, as far as Perrebia. Under the emperors *Hadrian (117–138) and *Antoninus Pius (138–161), Thessaly was annexed administratively to *Macedonia: both provinces were governed by one governor, although in special circumstances Thessaly had its own administrator and was called an "eparchy." In the MS known as Laterculus Veronensis, which provides an image of the empire at the time of *Diocletian, Thessaly makes up part of one of the 12 dioceses, namely that of the Moesia, and constitutes an eparchy with an autonomous administration. During this period the last remaining independent state was annexed, namely that of the Magneti, so that that eparchy of Thessaly might attain the maximum geographical reach. During that era, the borders of Thessaly were therefore Mt. Olympus to the N, in the area of Pirgetus; the valley of the River Titharesios (now Sarantàporos) to the W; the ridge of the Khasiá Mountains and the Pindus massif, separating Thessaly from *Epirus; the Spercheios valley to the S and the Aegean Sea to the E. Later, and more specifically around the mid-4th c. AD, as appears from the catalog referred to as the Breviarium, Macedonia became an independent diocese including the eparchies of Macedonia, Thessaly, *Achaia, the two Epiri etc. This administrative order appears in the Notitia dignitatum, where there is an affirmation that the diocese of Macedonia was composed of six eparchies, among which was Thessaly. During this period, Thessaly was covered by an archon (praeses) and belonged to the broadest administrative region of the Praefectura praetorio per Illyricum. In the 5th c., specifically in 417, Paul *Orosius, in his enumeration of the eparchies, included Thessaly after the entry for Macedonia: Macedonia habet ab Oriente Aegaeum mare, a Borea Thraciam . . . a meridie Achaiam. *Eunapius also reports that Macedonia and Thessaly were joined to *Thrace. Likewise, *Zosimus notes that the passageway that led from Thessaly to Nicopolis in Epirus crosses, along the N-W axis, the springs of the Peneios in the Pindus. The chief 6th-c. source is Herocles's Synekdēmos, a fundamental work of political geography for the years preceding AD 537, integrated from Procopius's writings and archaeological discoveries. According to Herocles's Synekdēmos, the eparchy of Thessaly, governed by a ἡγεμών, made up part of the Praefectura praetorio per Illyricum; the cities of Diocletianopolis and Caesarea belong to it. This means that Thessaly extended to the NW—in comparison to its extension at the time of Diocletian—given that Diocletianopolis was found near Lake Kastorià, and Caesarea was 16 km (= 9.9 mi) S of Kozani, according to the location established by A. Keramopoulos. In the 8th c. the statement "Thessaly and the Eparchy of Thessaly" occurs in many literary and historical works; the author of the Cosmography notes that Thessaly bordered Macedonia and otherwise uses the expression: Patria que dicitur Ellas Thessalie, thus geographically associating Hellas and Thessaly.

The literary sources as well as the archaeological finds known to us until now indicate that until the 4th c. Thessaly existed in conditions of prosperity. In AD 376 it was, however, subjected by the Scythians, as witnessed to by Eunapius. Its geographical position, although marginal to the political aims of the Byzantine Empire, was still such to feel the great turmoil that struck the Balkan Peninsula; its importance for maritime traffic threatened its fortune. The invasions of the Germanic tribes and the Huns in the first centuries of the Christian era led to a radical modification of the urban structure and the demographic order, upon which the impact of the new Christian religion was otherwise great, which by that time had become the official religion of the empire. The Slavic invasions of the 6th c. and then the Arab invasions brought about destructions, as stated explicitly by the Chronicle of the Foundation of Monemvasia: "In another invasion, all of Thessaly and Hellas were destroyed." The Slavic expansion in Thessaly is also mentioned in the Miracles of Saint Demetrius, where a description is given of the siege of *Thessalonica (7th c.). From the same source we also learned that, during the years 675–677, those besieged sought to purchase grain from the Belegezite Slavs of Thebae Phthiotides and Demetrias. From the early years of the Christian era until the 7th c., many cities flourished in the eparchy of Thessaly. Some of them were continually mentioned by the sources; others, however, were completely ignored by documents written after the 7th c. Some still preserve the ancient name, although others have changed it.

One of the most important cities of Thessaly, Larissa, still preserves both the ancient site and its original name. During the early Christian era, the city reached its greatest splendor; a chain of walls separated the acropolis from the lower quarters. The fortress on the acropolis was erected during the first years of the Christian era. Standing on the schematic reconstruction of the Tabula Peutingeriana, it must have possessed two doors. Nothing remains of the walls, and no remains of the foundations have as of yet been brought to light. In ancient times pieces of columns and other architectonic elements on the castle hill were discovered, but until 1978 no building had been found. During that year, remains of the Christian basilica were discovered with three naves of exceptional dimensions. Its dating is not yet known, but research has not yet been completed; an interesting inscription, however, has been recovered with the name of Achilleus, the first metropolitan of Larissa, which perhaps may relate to the foundation of the same basilica. During the course of the archaeological digs, two tombs of exceptional interest were also brought to light, one of which must have belonged to an important figure, given that it was found in the N sector of the temple within the area of the altar. Another important discovery was the cemetery, found alongside the basilica, which seems to have been used many times. We maintain, therefore, that the first chronological phase of the cemetery corresponds to the foundation of the sanctuary and that it was a series of tombs that functioned as a depositio ad sanctos. During the same period, the remains of another basilica were excavated, in the neighborhood of one of the central roads of the city. This likewise had large dimensions, greater than those of the basilica discovered on the hill of the fortress. It was a majestic edifice which, like the others that have been discovered up to this time, was located in the center of Larissa. The walls were decorated with frescoes and floors with mosaics containing geometric themes. In the surviving section of the narthex, the mosaic surface is also decorated with two peacocks facing each other with an amphora at the center. The decoration is perpendicular to the axis of the church and was exactly in front of the central entrance. The remaining portions of the basilica have not yet been discovered, and they are to be found perhaps under the ancient buildings that were alongside the central city road. The two buildings belonged, in our opinion, to the age of Achilleus, that is, the 1st half of the 4th c.; as we learn from the synaxaria, he adorned the city of Larissa with marvelous constructions that were rich with religious and decorative elements. Unfortunately, research on the city during the early Christian age is recent, and the discoveries that pertain to this period are meager. The information acquired thus far bears witness, however, that even this ancient Thessalian city was one of the most important centers of the Hellenic world even during the early Christian era.

Another Thessalian center of the same era is the city of Thebae Phthiotides, modern-day Néa Ankhíalos. Archaeological digs until now have brought to light many remains, mostly dating to the 5th–7th c. Classified third among the most important cities by Hierocles's Synekdēmos, Thebae was identified with the ancient Pirasus. George Sotirìou, its first discoverer, brought to light the remains of both sacred and secular buildings. Six complexes with a structure typical of the early Christian basilica have been identified: (1) basilica A, or the basilica of St. Demetrius, which is datable to the end of the 5th or the beginning of the 6th c.; (2) basilica B, called "of Elpidius," dates to the same period; (3) basilica C, the most daunting, called "of the archpriest Peter" because of an epigraph of restoration, is a complex developed in various constructions from various architectural periods that are chronologically classifiable between the 4th c. and the 1st years of the 5th; it was destroyed by a fire in the 7th c.; (4) the cemeterial basilica D, beginning of the 7th c. Two other basilicas were identified, but the excavation has not yet been finished. The site of a secular building, moreover, has been determined, but its identity has not, which contains the conspicuous remains of *thermal baths, a large street and an episcopal palace. The episcopal cathedral of Thebae Phthiotides was held by that ἐπίσκοπος Θηβῶν who signed the acts of the First Ecumenical Council of *Nicaea. The recovered monuments give the image of a rich city, whose inscriptions provide us information about its daily life. From these we come to know the profession and the place of origin of various individuals. The epigraph bears witness, moreover, to the great commercial activity that was bubbling in the mercantile port of Thebae Phthiotides. The discovered coins coming primarily from *Constantinople and *Nicomedia provide a clear idea of the active mercantile city's importance. Thebae, which had been destroyed in the 7th c. AD, starting from the 2nd half of that century was no longer mentioned in the sources: the cause of the destruction must have been a fire, as appears from the archaeological discoveries. The name of the city, however, survived the destruction at least until the 14th c. The archaeological research undertaken, although very clear, has unfortunately not yet been published. It is, therefore, not possible to attempt a conjectural reconstruction of the artistic and cultural climate of that period, despite the prodigious richness of the discoveries. Large floor surfaces hide under the numerous mosaic capitals and the other architectural elements; much information on the rediscovered pottery awaits publication. All of these are discoveries that can give an idea of the wealth and the splendor of this city.

Other cities of Thessaly are mentioned in Hierocles's Synekdēmos, centers that had a noteworthy consistency during this period. The sources mention Demetrias, Nèai Patria (modern-day Ipàti), Echìnos, Pharalus etc. However, archaeological research still has nothing significant to say, or it is only in its early stages. A major reason for the lack of evidence to illustrate the culture of the cities has been the sometimes total destruction of the cities. Naturally, the two chief centers, Larissa and Thebae Phthiotides, only constitute the most important part of the archaeological research; fragmentary pieces of information in our possession, also coming from other areas, attest to the existence of cities and centers inhabited in numerous other districts of Thessaly. In 9th-c. Thessaly the monastic movement arose at Meteora with the construction of the Skéte of the Madonna (Panagía) of Doupiani. Athanasius the Meteorite (14th c.) was very famous; the life of the saint was published in 1990 by D. Sofianos.

Fr. Stählin, Das hellenische Thessalien, Stuttgart 1924; G. Sotiriou, Αἱ χριστιανικαί Θῆβαι τῆς Θεσσαλίας: AE (1929) 1-158; Y. Bequignon, La vallée du Spercheios dès origines au IVe siècle, Études d'archéologie et de topographie, Paris 1937; E. Honigmann, Le Synekdèmos d'Hiéroklès et l'opuscule géographique de Georges de Chypre, Brussels 1939; G. Sotiriou, Ἀνασκαφαί ἐν Νέᾳ Ἀγχιάλῳ, in PAAH 1924, 1926, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1954, 1955, 1956; A. Avramea, Ἡ Βυζαντινή Θεσσαλία μέχρι τοῦ 1204, Συμβολή εἰς τήν ἱστορικήν γεωγραφία, Athens 1974; L. Deriziotis, Παλαιοχριστιανικόν ψηφιδωτόν δάπεδον εἰς τήν θέσιν "Παληά" τής πόλεως τοῦ Βόλου, in La Thessalie, Actes de la table-ronde, Lyon 1975, 293-298; H. Hunger, Tabula Imperii Byzantini (Hellas und Thessalia), Vienna 1976; P. Lazaridis, Ἀνασκαφαί Νέας Ἀγχιάλου, in PAAH 1959; 1960, pp. 60-66; 1961–1979; L. Deriziotis, Comunicazione sugli edifici protocristiani di Larissa, in X Congr. Int. della Società di Archeologia Cristiana, Thessaloniki 1980 (unpublished); Achilleo: DHGE 1, 312; BS 1, 157-158; A. Avraméa, Les villes et agglomérations urbaines de la Thessalie byzantine jusqu'en 1204, in La Thessalie. Actes de la table ronde, Lyon 1979, 281-291; I. Chassiotis, Θεσσαλική βιβλιογραφία. Πρώτη ἀπογραφή (1636-1962), Volos 1971; N. Nikonanos, Βυζαντινοί ναοί τῆς Θεσσαλίας ἀπό τό *10*ο αἰώνα ὥς τήν κατάκτηση τῆς περιοχῆς ἀπό τούς Τούρκους τό 1393. Συμβολή στή βυζαντινή ἀρχιτεκτονική, Athens 1979; K. Spanos, Ἐπιγραφές καὶ ἐνθυμήσεις ἀπὸ τὰ χωρία Στόμιο καὶ Καρίτσα τῆς Λάρισας (*4*ος μ.Χ. αἰώνας), Thessaloniki 1979; A. Glavinas, Ὁ ἅγιος Διονύσιος ὁ ἐν τῷ Ὀλύμπῳ, Thessaloniki 1981; L. Arseniou, Ἡ Θεσσαλία στήν Τουρκοκρατία, Athens 1984; N. Nikonanos, Meteora: A Complete Guide to the Monasteries and Their History, Athens 1987; D. Valais, Συμβολή στήν ἐκκλησιαστική ἱστορία τῆς Ἀγχιάλου κατά τόν *17*ο αἰώνα μέ βάση ἀνέκδοτα πατριαρχικά ἔγγραφα: Κληρονομία 26 (1994) 137-177; A. Papathanasiou, Μαγνησία καί τό Πήλιο στόν ὕστερο μεσαίωνα (1204-1423), Volos 1998; Chr. Motsiou, Οἱ ἅγιοι τῶν Μετεώρων, Larissa 2000; Chr. Ntamplias, Ἡ ἱστορία τῆς Θεσσαλίας τόν *13*ο αἰώνα, Thessaloniki 2000; Ch. Stergioulis, Οἱ ἅγιοι τῆς Θεσσαλίας. Ἁγιολογικά καί λειτουργικά χειρόγραφα καί κείμενα, Larissa 2001.

L. Deriziotis - F. Ioannidis

THEURGY. E.R. Dodds (Theurgy, 55) and H. Lewy (Chaldean, 461) have demonstrated that the term theurgy had two meanings in ancient philosophical texts, namely the "performance of divine operations" and "making man a god." According to *Iamblichus, theurgy is the art of "the performance of the 'divine' operations" (De myst. I,93, p. 33,9-10 des Places), "the sacred performance of the ineffable operations that are above every thought and fitting for God" (De myst. II,96,17-19, p. 96 des Places). According to the Byzantine monk Michael Psellus: "We become similar to God even according to the theurgic virtues, and this is the most perfect likeness . . . the ability to make man a god [theopoiein], to distance him from matter and to deliver him from the passions in such a way that he can 'in turn' make another person a god [theourgia]" (De omnif. doctr. ch. 71,5-11, pp. 45-46 Westerink); "the one who possesses the theurgic virtue . . . makes men gods" (De omnif. doctr., ch. 74,1-2, p. 47 Westerink). In these two passages, Psellus merely reproduces the Proclian and Iamblican concepts (something which Westerink did not note in the apparatus fontium of his edition of the De omnifaria doctrina): both for *Proclus and Iamblichus it was precisely the "theurgic virtues" to represent the highest level of human elevation (see Marinus, Vita Procli, chs. 26, pp. 30-32 Saffrey-Segonds).

As it appears from the Lexikon Suidas, the first person to officially receive the title theurgist was a certain Julian, a contemporary to the emperor *Marcus Aurelius and the author of a work titled Logia d'epòn, identical in all likelihood to the Chaldean Oracles (see Dodds, Theurgy, 55), numerous fragments of which have remained, which were first edited by W. Kroll (De oraculis chaldaicis, Breslau 1894) and more recently by E. des Places (Oracles chaldaïques, Paris 1971). It is very likely that Julian also composed a commentary on these Logia, a work possibly titled Theurgika: Proclus, *Marinus and *Damascius seem to have alluded to this text (see Dodds, Theurgy, 56). The term theurgist appears in the very text of the oracles: in fr. 153, des Places (p. 103) maintains that the "theurgists do not fall under the mass of humanity subjected to fate." The primary objective of theurgy is therefore the liberation of the human being from the iron laws of the material world, which is an indispensable premise of his "deification," and which is clearly affirmed, for example, in fr. 97 (p. 90 des Places).

Dodds (Theurgy, 56) emphasizes the fact that the Chaldean Oracles contained instructions for the cult of the sun and the fire and magical directions aiming to evoke specific spirits or divinities (in this manner, the function of theurgy corresponds to that of the medium of our era). It is impossible here to provide a detailed description of the various rituals and magical practices: on this point, we simply encourage the reader to consult Dodds's article (Theurgy, 61-69) and Lewy's book (Chaldean, 227-257, 467-471). This emphasis placed on magical practices, moreover, fully corresponds to the philosophical-religious tendencies of the 2nd c. AD: Apuleius in his sketch of the life of *Apollonius of Tyana passed down to us by Philostratus provides clear examples in this respect. The close connection between theurgic practices and magical papyri has been demonstrated by S. Eitrem (La théurgie, esp. 53-58).

A schema analogous to the one observed in the Chaldean Oracles can be found in the Poimandes, in which the soul's Himmelreise finishes with its deification: the human soul, with all the passions, having abandoned the impurities and evil inclinations in the seven lower heavens, ascends to the eighth heaven (ogdoatikē physis), becomes a divine power, enters God and becomes deified (Corpus Hermeticum I,25-26, pp. 15,15–16,13 Nock-Festugière; see also in this regard the work of E. des Places, La religion grecque, Paris 1969, 324, who rightly puts this motif in relation to theurgy).

The dominant philosophical movement of *Late Antiquity, that is, *Neoplatonism, represented by *Plotinus, remained substantially immune from the influences of theurgy in its initial phase. Dodds (Theurgy, 57-58, 60-61) rightly notes that Plotinus, despite the interpretation that certain modern scholars have given of him, was not a theurgist but a pure rationalist who shows no interest for theurgy and does not hide his disregard for the magical practices that were quite in vogue during his time. Only with *Porphyry of Tyre did theurgy enter the Neoplatonic tradition, to the point of becoming one of the most salient characteristics of *Neoplatonism of the 4th and the 5th c., namely the Neoplatonism of Iamblichus, Proclus and Damascius. The young *Porphyry, even before meeting Plotinus, nurtured a great interest for the "oracles," as shown by his work written during his youth, the De philosophia ex oraculis haurienda, in which he does not seem, however, to have been aware of the Chaldean Oracles (see Dodds, Theurgy, 58; des Places, Oracles chaldaïques, 18-19; fragments of this work were collected and edited by W. Wolff, Berlin 1856). Having toned down this belief during the period in which he was a disciple of Plotinus and whose influence he greatly underwent—the Letter to Anebo, which was heavily critical of magical practices and occultism—Porphyry's interest for "oracular wisdom" came back to life after the death of his master: he discovered the Chaldean Oracles, devoted a commentary to it and made a continual use of this work in his treatise titled De regressu animae (see Dodds, Theurgy, 58; des Places, Oracles chaldaïques, 18-19 and 23-24). In the De regressu animae, however, although reevaluating partially the role of theurgy, he does not show the unconditional admiration for it that shines through in the De philosophia ex oraculis haurienda, which was written several years earlier (see des Places, 247): Bidez, in fr. 2 of the De regressu animae, although on the one hand acknowledging that theurgy could contribute to the purification of the interior or "spiritual" part of the soul, on the other hand specifies that theurgy has no effect on the soul's conversion to God of its higher or "intellectual" part, and reaffirms his condemnation of the lowest magical practices (see the section dedicated to Porphyry in *Neoplatonism). As Dodds noted (Theurgy, 58), in this precise demarcation of the role of theurgy, Porphyry is still, even though partially, under the influence of Plotinus.

In the writings of Iamblichus, theurgy performed a role that was far superior to the one assigned to it by Porphyry: he not only regarded the Chaldean Oracles as somewhat of a sacred book and composed a commentary on it (see E. des Places, Jamblique, Les mystères d'Égypte, Paris 1966, 15; Dodds, Theurgy, 58), but he also wrote the De mysteriis Aegyptiorum under the name of Anebo—the recipient of the letter in which Porphyry had criticized magical practices—precisely in order to respond to Porphyry's charges. "It is not thought—Iamblichus says—that unites the theurgists with the gods. If this were the case, what would prevent the theoretical philosophers from possessing theurgic union with the gods? But this is not the case: it is the sacred performance of the ineffable works—superior to every thought and suitable to God—and the power of the ineffable symbols—which only the gods can think of—that produce the theurgic union" (De myst. I,11, 96,13-97,2, p. 96 des Places).

The emperor *Julian deeply underwent the influence of Iamblichus (on this point, see also the section dedicated to Iamblichus and Julian the Apostate in *Neoplatonism). In a letter (Ep. 12 ed. Bidez, L'empereur Julien, OEuvres complètes, I,2, Paris 1924, 118-119) he exhorted Priscus to "find everything that Iamblichus wrote about my namesake" (namely Iamblichus's commentary on Julian's Chaldean Oracles), and confesses: "I am crazy about Iamblichus with respect to philosophy and my namesake with respect to theosophy" (that is, theurgy; see Dodds, Theurgy, 59).

Iamblichus's example was also followed by the Athenian Neoplatonic school of the 5th c., and at the beginning of the 6th c., *Olympiodorus (In Platonis Phaedonem, 170) would mention Syrian, Iamblichus and Proclus among the students of theurgy, contrasting them to the pure philosophers, who were represented by Plotinus and Porphyry; and Michael Psellus recalls Proclus as the one who, along with Iamblichus, abandoned the Greek methods of reasoning in order to embrace the Chaldean teaching (on these two references, see des Places, Oracles chaldaïques, 24). As in the case of Porphyry and Iamblichus, Proclus likewise composed a Commentary on Chaldean Philosophy (the fragments have been collected by des Places in Oracles chaldaïques, 206-212). Psellus's judgment on Proclus is, however, only partly true; in reality, in Proclus's thought two components coexist without opposition: namely, the rationalist-philosophical teaching (one merely has to think of his Elements of Theology) and the "supra-rational" and the "mystico-religious," which does not hesitate to appeal to theurgy and its magical practices (even for Proclus the union with the supreme principle, above being and ikntelligence, cannot be achieved by human intelligence, which at best can reach the highest point in contemplating absolute being, but it is something that transcends its faculties; see *Neoplatonism). Dodds (Theurgy, 61) has called attention to a passage from the Platonic Theology (I, 25, I, 113, 6-10 Saffrey-Westerink) in which Proclus expresses his ideas on theurgy in the following manner: "Other things are finally saved by the theurgic power, which is better than every human wisdom and knowledge, inasmuch as it collects in itself the benefits of the divinatory art, the purifying powers that are proper to the performance of the rites and, in sum, all the effects of the divine possession." We have already had the opportunity to note that according to Marinus (Vita Procli 26, pp. 30-32 Saffrey-Segonds) both Iamblichus and Proclus saw in the "theurgic virtues" the highest virtues, those capable of producing in the soul the maximum level of deification. Marinus likewise (Vita Procli 28, pp. 33-34 Saffrey-Segonds) recalls Proclus's familiarity with theurgic practices and the related rites. Damascius, like his predecessors, regarded the Chaldean philosophy as the "most mystical" (Dub. et sol. 111, III, 108,19-20 Westerink) and did not hesitate to call such philosophers as *Orpheus and Plato, who had received their philosophy from divine revelation, "theurgists" (Dub. et sol. 111, III, 109,7-10 Westerink). He considered theurgy a "sacred practice" (Vita Is. 227; see Eitrem, La théurgie, 50).

PWK 24, 258-270; J. Bidez, Le philosophe Jamblique et son école: REG 32 (1919) 29-40; J. Bidez - F. Cumont, Les mages hellénisés, Paris 1938, I, 158-163; II, 251-263; O. Faller, Griechische Vergottung und christliche Vergöttlichung: Gregorianum 6 (1925) 405-435; F. Cumont, Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain, Paris 1929, 115.173–175.294, notes 87-89; S. Eitrem, La théurgie chez les néoplatoniciens et dans les papyrus magiques: SO 22 (1942) 49-79; E.R. Dodds, Theurgy and Its Relationship to Neoplatonism: JRS 37 (1947) 55-69 (in The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley-Los Angeles 1956, 283-311); A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, I: L'astrologie et les sciences occultes, Paris 1950, 283-308; Id., Contemplation philosophique et art théurgique chez Proclus, in Études de philosophie grecque, Paris 1971, 585ff.; Id., De la religion à la magie, in Études d'histoire et de philosophie, Paris 1971, 9-156; P. Boyancé, Théurgie et télestique néoplatoniciennes: RHR 147 (1955) 189-209; W. Theiler, Gott und Seele in kaiserzeitlichen Denken, in Recherches sur la trad. plat. (Entr. sur l'ant. class. III), Geneva 1955, 65-90 (= Forschungen zum Neuplatonismus, Berlin 1966, 104-123); H. Lewy, Chaldean Oracles and Theurgy, Le Caire 1956 (Paris

[2]1978); W. Beierwaltes, Proklos. Grundzüge seiner Metaphysik, Frankfurt a.M. 1965, 328, 385-390 (this last section pertains esp. to deification); A.A. Barb, La sopravvivenza delle arti magiche, in Il conflitto tra paganesimo e Cristianesimo nel IV secolo, ed. A. Momigliano, Turin 1968, 111ff.; E. des Places, Jamblique. Les mystères d'Égypte, Paris 1966; Id., La religion grecque, Paris 1969, 300-304, 324; Id., Oracles chaldaïques, Paris 1971; A. Louth, Pagan Theurgy and Christian Sacramentalism in Denys the Areopagite: JTS 37 (1986) 432-438; B. Nasemann, Theurgie und Philosophie in Jamblichs De mysteriis, Stuttgart 1991; G. Shaw, Theurgy and Soul: The Neoplatonism of Iamblichus, University Park, PA 1995; T. Stäcker, Die Stellung der Theurgie in der Lehre Jamblichs, Bern 1995; J.-B. Clerc, Homines Magici, Berlin 1995; Id., "Theurgica legibus prohibita": à propos de l'interdiction de la théurgie (Augustin, La cité de Dieu 10, 9, 1. 16, 2, Code théodosien 9, 16, 4): REAug 42 (1996) 57-64; C. Van Liefferinge, La théurgie: des "Oracles chaldaïques" à Proclus, Liège 1999; P.T. Struck, Pagan and Christian Theurgies: Iamblichus, Pseudo-Dionysius, Religion and Magic in Late Antiquity: Ancient World 32 (2001) 25-38.

S. Lilla

THIEF, GOOD. Mentioned once in the gospels (Lk 23:39-43, par.) and several times in the apocrypha: in the Arab Gospel (30), the Gospel of Nicodemus (10), the Visio Theophili and esp. in the History of Joseph of Arimathea. These works give him various names: Titus, Demas, Dismas. He is mentioned often by the church fathers (*Gregory of Nazianzus, *John Chrysostom, *Jacob of Sarug and others). The books of the apocrypha seek to resolve the question of how one thief was saved and the other not, and recount the story of both: Dismas was educated by Mary and, as a thief, took from the rich and gave to others, whereas the other (Dumachus) had always been evil. Both met the Holy Family in Egypt, the good thief expressing his piety toward them. In the History of Joseph of Arimathea the author dedicates a sizable part to the good thief (1; 3-5), who after his death appears, full of light, to Joseph and John. The cult of the good thief grew in the Middle Ages; he is in the calendar (23 March) and mentioned in the Martyrology of Usuard; various foundations were established under his name to help repentant prisoners.

CANT 78; BS 3, 595-600; AASS Martii III, 543 (ed. 1769); Gr. M. van Esbroeck, Une homélie inédite ephrémienne sur le Bon Larron en grec, géorgien et arabe: AB 101 (1983) 327-362 (texts); M.R. James, Latin Infancy Gospels, Cambridge 1929, 120-126; M. Geerard, Le bon larron. Un apocryphe inédit, in FS J.H. Frede, W. Thiele, ed. R. Gryson, Vetus Latina, 24,2, Freiburg 1993, 355-363 (text Latin).

M. Starowieyski

THOMAS, apostle. Thomas is spoken of in Mk 3:18 and parallel texts. In Jn 11:16, 20:24 and 21:2 he is identified as the "one called Didymus" ("the Twin"). The Hebrew root ta'am means "being double, twin." The Acta Thom. 1,1 and the legend of *Abgar (Eus., HE 1,13,11) refer to him as Judas Thomas. Jn 14:22 mentions "Judas, not Iscariot," and the Sinaitic *Syriac and Curatonian respectively read "Thomas" and "Judas Thomas." The beginning of the *Coptic Ev. Thom. refers to him as "Didymus Judas Thomas." The designation with the nickname "Thomas" turns out to be natural for distinguishing him from the other two Judases (Lk 6:16) in the group of the Twelve. His identity with Jude the brother of the Lord seems to be more of a later confusion than an early tradition. Thomas "the Twin" exerted a particular fascination over *gnostic speculation. The title "twin of the Lord" certainly did not imply consanguinity but intended to indicate the type of perfect gnostic. According to Pistis Sophia 42 and 53, *Philip, Thomas and *Matthew (or Matthias) are the authors of the three most accredited gospels in the influential gnostic circles. In the NHC II one finds the Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of Philip and the Book of Thomas the Contender. This latter work contains the secret words of the Savior to Judas Thomas, which are then passed down by Matthew. On the other hand, the Greek MSS of group A of the Gospel of Thomas (gospel of the infancy) report the "account of Thomas, the Israelite philosopher" on the infancy of the Lord, while the Coptic Gospel of Thomas is a broad collection of the Lord's sayings. The Jewish Christian who converted to gnosticism compiled a tradition of independent sayings like those of the synoptic gospels with the intention that they might have a propaedeutic character for initiation into gnosticism. Beginning with the Jewish-Christian logia (as in the case of log. 12, which reflected the primacy of *James in the community that spread this work) and drawing inspiration on the twins already created in this tradition, he composed others cautiously or openly gnostic, such as log. 13 (a rereading of *Peter's confession found in the canonical gospels). For the selection of Thomas as a gnostic prototype, his own local Christian tradition must have favored this choice, which already appealed to this apostle. The distinct references to the authority of James, Peter or Thomas represent developments of different churches in *Syria from the last decades of the 1st c. The Christians of *Edessa attributed their origin to the apostle Thomas's command to preach the gospel in the city. Putting aside the legend of Thaddaeus who was sent to Edessa by Thomas (Eus., HE 1,13,1-22; 2,1,6-7), one can trace the beginning of the Syriac church back to the Jewish Christians. When Syriac Jewish Christianity identified Thomas with Jude the brother of the Lord, regarding him as the "Twin" of James, the apostolic origin of this community remained under the Jewish Christians of the Transjordan, who appealed to the authority of James. In the gnostic rereading, Jude Thomas, the brother of the Lord, undoubtedly becomes his twin in the sense of one of his "alter egos" within the divine sphere. There remains an undercurrent like that of the *Valentinian eschatological speculation. The Gospel of Thomas represents the hinge of the two trajectories. On the one side, gnosticism results in *Manicheism, and on the other side, it results in a type of *encratism peculiar to Syriac Christianity. The Gospel of Thomas is datable between the Odes of Solomon (ca. 130) and the Acts of Thomas (ca. 235), which stresses sexual continence more strongly. The Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas must provide the historical context for the Book of Thomas the Contender (NHC II,7). This book, which presents the secret sayings revealed by the Lord to Jude Thomas (whom he calls the "brother of Thomas") and committed to writing by Matthew, explains in what sense one must understand what was said of the one who is his brother and true companion: a perfect disciple, a repository of the secret revelations. He expounds an ascetic teaching that is more evident in encratism than in gnosticism. In the tradition of the Thomas of Syriac asceticism, this book occupies an intermediary position between the Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas. Conversely, in the Apocalypse of Thomas (before the 5th c., highly regarded and probably reworked by the *Priscillianists and the Manicheans) the Savior describes to Thomas in parables how the events of the end of the world will be distributed in seven days. We should also mention the Psalms of Thomas, a Psalter attributed to Thomas, the disciple of Mani, composed between 250 and 275. The Acts of Thomas—the only one of the five ancient apocryphal acts that have come down to us complete, a work composed in Syriac at Edessa in the 1st half of the 3rd c.—has as its theme the mission of Thomas as far as the Indies (in reality, as far as Iran). *Origen (Eus., HE 3,1,1) and ps.-*Clement (Recogn. IX, 29) depict Thomas as the apostle of the Parthians. *Heracleon (Clem. Al., Strom. IV,71,3) recalls his natural death, speaking of Lk 12:8-11; nevertheless, in the Acta Thom. 164,168 and in the Manichean Lib. Ps., it is said that he was killed with a lance by some soldiers. Echoes of the Acta Thom. are found in the writings of *Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. 31-32). The Parthian king Gundofar, by means of the account in the Acta Thom., wound up becoming King Caspar in Western legend. The Opus imperfectum in Matthaeum* says that the *magi were baptized by Thomas; this theme was also developed in Zouqnîn's Syriac Monastic Chronicle (8th c.). In the Middle Ages, moreover, the legend of Thomas and the magi would culminate in that of Prester John.

Christianity penetrated the Indian subcontinent following two roads: to the S by means of the ocean, departing from *Egypt, beginning at the end of the 2nd c., thanks to the merchants and travelers who brought with them the gospel of Matthew (Eus., HE 5,10,2-3); to the N, from *Mesopotamia and Iran in a continual flux of "Thomas Christians." Once the maritime contacts between the N and the S of India had ceased, both regions attributed their evangelization to Thomas. The tomb of the apostle, which had been venerated for a long time at Edessa (Acta Thom. 170; Chronic. Edes. 38), was located on the coast of Malabar.

R.A. Lipsius - M. Bonnet, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, Leipzig 1903 (Darmstadt 1959); G. Bornkamm, Mythos und Legende in den apocryphen Thomas-Akten, Göttingen 1933; A.F.J. Klijn, The Acts of Thomas, Leiden 1962; J. Doresse, Les livres secrets des gnostiques d'Égypte, II, Paris 1959; Erbetta I, 253-288; II, 305-391 (Acts); C. Colpe, Die Thomaspsalmen als chronologischer Fixpunkt in der Geschichte der orientalischen Gnosis: JbAC 7 (1964) 77-93; H.H. Koester, Γνώμαι διάφοροι. The Origin and Nature of Diversification in the History of Early Christianity: HThR 58 (1965) 279-318; G. Garitte, Le martyre géorgien de l'apôtre Thomas: Muséon 83 (1970) 497-532; G. Garitte, La passion arménienne de S. Thomas l'apôtre et son model grec: Muséon 84 (1971) 191-195; F. Halkin, Une nouvelle recension grecque du martyre de S. Thomas l'apôtre: AB 89 (1971) 386; W.A. Bienert, Jesu Verwandschaft, in W. Schneemelcher, Neutestamentliche Apocryphen I, Tübingen [5]1987, 373-386; A. de Santos Otero, Thomasapokalypse, in Schneemelcher, II, Tübingen [5]1989, 675-679; H. Koester, Évangiles apocryphes et évangiles canoniques, in H. Koester - F. Bovon, Genèse de l'Écriture chrétienne, Turnhout 1991, 59-106; R. Kuntzmann, Le "Livre de Thomas" (NH II, 7), et la tradition de Thomas, in L. Painchaud - A. Pasquier, Les textes de Nag Hammadi et le problème de leur classification, Québec-Louvain 1995, 295-309; R. Trevijano, Santiago el Justo y Tomás el Mellizo (Evangelio de Tomás, log. 12 y 13), in Estudios sobre el Evangelio de Tomás, PT 2, Madrid 1997, 285-320; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'empire iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 79-110; G.W. Most, Doubting Thomas, Cambridge 2005.

R. Trevijano

THOMAS (apocryphal). The apostle Thomas, according to *Origen, carried out his mission among the Parthians (In Gen 3); a tradition ascribes to Thomas a mission in India, where, in Calamine, he underwent *martyrdom. His tomb is found in Mailapur; according to another tradition known already in the 4th c., his body was transferred to *Edessa, where there is an attestation to the presence of his sepulcher. In some texts Thomas is also connected to the history of Abgar. The texts concerning Thomas can be divided into two groups: (1) the Acts of Thomas and (2) the other texts.

1. The Acts of Thomas constitutes the only text preserved in its entirety among the five great acts written in the 2nd/3rd c.; they were probably redacted in *Edessa. The original language of the Acts seems to have been *Syriac, but one cannot exclude that some fragments were written in *Greek. There exist two versions of the text: Syriac, which underwent modifications, and Greek—a text closer to the original with *Encratite tendencies. The work is complex and has many levels. The text is composed with the addition of many poetic texts of great artistic value; it is divided into 13 acts (Gk. praxeis) and a martyrdom. The Acts of Thomas can be divided into three parts: an introduction, where an account is given of the trip undertaken by the slave Thomas to India, the miracles performed in India and last the passion of Thomas. The poetic fragments possess extraordinary beauty. Some examples of these are the following: the famous Hymn of the Pearl (chs. 108-113)—*Ephrem adopts the same theme with his Hymns of the Pearl—or rather the Ode of Sophia (ch. 6-7). Some fragments have an Encratite and *gnostic flavor to them; elsewhere, these elements are more attenuated. Many translations, paraphrases and abbreviations of the Acts of Thomas exist in all the languages of Christian antiquity, in the Latin of ps.-Abdias, book 9, which contains the life of Thomas. The Acts of Thomas were used by the Encratites, *Manicheans and the *Priscillianists and condemned many times by the fathers of the church and the *Decretum (ps.-)Gelasianum (5,2,3).

2. A center of Thomas's cult existed in Edessa: a martyrion of Thomas where the apostle's bones were transported, a place known by St. Ephrem and visited in 384 by *Egeria (17,1; 19,3). Scholars suppose that the apocryphal texts connected to Thomas were written at Edessa, as in the case of some gnostic texts coming from *Nag Hammadi which bear the name of Thomas: the Gospel of Thomas (Codex II), perhaps from the 2nd c., contains 114 logia of *Jesus in *Coptic (some fragments in Greek on the papyri of Oxyrhynchus [1, 655, 656]); a Book of Thomas the Contender (Codex II) and a Psalter of Thomas. Moreover, two recensions of the Latin Apocalypse of Thomas exist from the 5th c.; the original Greek, perhaps from the 3rd c., has been lost; the apocalypses, which were produced perhaps by Manichean or gnostic circles, were used by the Priscillianists. An Apocalypse of Thomas was condemned by the Decretum (ps.-)Gelasianum (5,2,2). In the Gospel of the Infancy (Paidika Kyriou), the name of Thomas (but not the apostle) was added late for unknown reasons. *Gregory of Tours wrote a work titled De miraculis s. Thomae apostoli.

An extensive homiletical literature connected to Thomas exists. There also remain various sermons in honor of Thomas that speak of Thomas: in Syriac, the sermons of Ephrem, *Jacob of Sarug and George of Alkosh; in Arabic, in the sermons of Elias of Nisibis; in Greek, ps.-*John Chrysostom and *Basil of Seleucia; in Latin, *Gregory the Great. The sermons often allude to the scenes of the Acts of Thomas.

Acts of Thomas: CANT 245-249; BHG 1800-1844; BHL 8136-8149; Lipsius 1, 225-347; Y. Tissot, ANWR II, 25,6, 4415-4439 (encratism); LCIK 8, 468-475; BS 12, 1969, 539-544. Acts: in Syriac: W. Wright: Apocryphal Acts, London 1871, 1, 172-333; 2, 146-298 (with Engl. trans.); Greek: Lisius - Bonnet 2, 99-291; P.H. Poirier, L'Hymne de la Perle des Actes de Thomas, Louvain-la-Neuve 1981; Lat.: M. Zelzer, Die alten lateinischen Thomasakten: TU 122 (1977) (with the Miracles of Thomas); Coptic: P.H. Poirier [and E. Lucchesi], La version copte de la Prédication et du Martyre de Thomas, Brussels 1984 (Coptic version); Concordance: M. Lipinski, Konkordanz zu den Thomasakten, Bonn 1988 (from the Greek). Translations: German: H.J.W. Drijvers, in Schneemelcher 2, 289-367; It.: Erbetta 2, 305-391; Moraldi 2, 303-428, 653-679; Fr.: A.J. Festugière, Cahiers d'Orientalisme 6, Geneva 1983, 45-117; P.H. Poirier - Y. Tissot, EApC I, 1323-1470; Eng.: Elliott 439-511; A.F.J. Klijn, The Acts of Thomas, Leiden 1962.

J. Halévy, Cantiques syriaques sur St. Thomas: RevSem 16 (1908) 85-94, 168-175; W. Strothmann, Die Thomasgeschichte des Jakob von Sarug: ZDMG suppl. 1, 2 (1969) 363-369; Drei Gedichte über den Apostel Thomas in Indien, ed. W. Strothmann, Wiesbaden 1976; E.N. Meščerskaja, Dejanija Iudy Fomy, kulturno-istoričeskaja obuslovennost rannesirijskoj legendy, Moskva 1990; H. Waldmann, Das Christentum in Indien und der Königsweg der Apostel in Edessa, Indien und Rom, Tübingen 1996; P.H. Poirier, Évangile de Thomas, Actes de Thomas, Livre de Thomas: Apocrypha 7 (1996) 9-26; P.H. Poirier, Les Actes de Thomas et le manichéisme: Apocrypha 9 (1998) 263-290; J. Turgach, Der Apostel Thomas in China: ZKG 108 (1997) 58-74; C. Dognini - I. Ramelli, Gli Apostoli in India nella patristica e nella letteratura sanscrita, Parma 2001; C. Jullien - F. Jullien, Apôtres des confins. Processus missionnaires chrétiens dans l'empire iranien, Bures-sur-Yvette 2002, 79-110; G. Fiaccadori, Tommaso in Etiopia: Studi Classici e Orientali 34 (1984) 298-307; L. Thomaz, A legenda de S. Tomé e a Expansão Portuguesa: Lusitania Sacra 3 (1991) 349-418; R. Uro, Thomas: Seeking the Historical Context of the Gospel of Thomas, London 2003 (bibl.); Thomasine Traditions in Antiquity: The Social and Cultural World of the Gospel of Thomas, ed. by J.M. Asgeirsson - A.D. DeConick - R. Uro, Leiden-Boston 2006.

Gospel of Thomas (Paidika): CANT 57; BHG 779p-pb, is found in all the collections of the apocryphal gospels, see esp. the important French translation of S. Voicu, EApC 191-204 and the article by the same author in Apocrypha 9 (1998) 1-95. A. Fuchs, Konkordanz zum Thomas-Evangelium, Linz 1978; A. de Santos Otero, Kirchenslavische Evangelium des Thomas, Berlin 1967; T. Rosén, The Slavonic Translation of the Apocryphal Infancy Gospel of Thomas, Uppsala 1997 (ed. of the text)

Acts of Thomas: CANT 19 and the other texts of Nag Hammadi (CPG 1181) are usually found in the collections of the NT apocrypha and in the editions and translations of the texts of Nag Hammadi and Gnostic texts.

Apocalypse of Thomas: CANT 326 in the collections of the apocrypha, among the apocryphal apocalypses.

M. Starowieyski

THOMAS of Edessa (d. before 544). *Nestorian author, to whom the catalog of Ebedjesu/ʿAbdišoʿ attributes several works, from which there only survives a treatise on the *Epiphany (unpublished) and one on the *Nativity. With respect to his life, we only know that he accompanied the future Nestorian patriarch Mar *Aba to *Constantinople, from which both were forced to flee for having refused to sign the condemnation of the *Three Chapters.

BBKL 11, 1383-1384; Ortiz de Urbina 127; S.J. Carr, Thomae Edesseni Tractatus de Nativitate Domini nostri Iesu Christi . . ., Rome 1898; W.F. Macomber, Six Explanations of the Liturgical Feasts by Cyrus of Edessa . . . II Translation, CSCO 356/syr. 156, Louvain 1974, viii-x, N.J. van der Vliet, Gleanings from Christian Northern Nubia: JJP 32 (2002) 175-192; D.A. Welsbry, The Medieval Kingdoms of Nubia: Pagans, Christians and Muslims Along the Middle Nile, London 2002; Th. Hainthaler, Thomas of Edessa, Causa de Nativitate: Some Considerations: PdO 31 (2006) 63-85.

S.J. Voicu

THOMAS of Germanicia (Euphrates) (d. ca. 541). *Monophysite bishop of Germanicia (Euphratesia), expelled from his episcopal see following the anti-monophysite persecution carried out by the emperor *Justin (520), he was one of the six Severian bishops called to *Constantinople by *Justinian to meet with their orthodox colleagues (533). A signatory and recipient of some letters that have come down to us only in *Syriac, Thomas in 535 with *Constantine of Laodicea (*Syria) and other ecclesiastical officials of the Eastern church took part in the drafting of the ecclesiastical canons. He died in exile at Samosata around 541 before the consecration of *Jacob Baradeus.

CPG 7071.66; 7108; 7123; F. Nau, Littérature canonique syriaque inédite: ROC 14 (1909) 113-115; S.P. Brock, Some New Letters of Patriarch Severos: SP 12 (1975) 20; R. Devreesse, Les anciens commentateurs grecs de l'Octateuque et des Rois (Studi e Testi 201), Vatican City 1959, 200 n. 72; E. Honigmann, Évêques et évêchés monophysites d'Asie antérieure au VI^e^ siècle, CSCO 127, Subsidia 2, Louvain 1951, 73-74.

P. Marone

THOMAS of Heraclea (d. after 616). Born at Ḥarqel (Heraclea), Thomas was a student in the monastery founded by John bar Aphtōnyā at Qennešrē, on the left bank of the Euphrates River, which was a center of both *Greek and *Syriac studies. For a certain amount of time he lived as a monk in the monastery of Tarʿil; he became a bishop of Mabbōg [Mabbug] and, because of his miaphysite faith, he was sent into exile by the emperor *Maurice (582–602). He then dwelt in *Egypt, in the monastery near *Alexandria, where he participated in the peace negotiations between the patriarchs of *Antioch and *Alexandria in 609/610. During the years 615–616, he made a new Syriac translation of the NT, the so-called Harklensis, in which he included 2 Pet, 2 and 3 Jn, which did not make up part of the scriptural *canon of the churches of the Syriac tradition.

Baumstark 188-189; BO II, 90-95; S. Brock, Syriac Studies: A Classified Bibliography (1960–1990), Kaslik 1996, 61; J. White, Sacrorum Evangeliorum, Actorum Apostolorum et Epistolarum tam catholicarum quam paulinarum Versio Syriaca Philoxeniana, 3 vols., Oxford 1778-1803 (sole complete ed.); B. Aland - A. Jückel, Das Neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung, Berlin, 1986– (text of the Peshitta and Harklensis); G. Kiraz, Comparative Edition of the Syriac Gospels, 4 vols., Leiden 1996 (text of the Vetus Syra, Peshitta and the Harklensis, with extensive intr. for the latter by A. Jückel on pp. xxxi-lxxxii); A. Vööbus, The Apocalypse in the Harklean Version: A Facsimile Edition of Ms Mardin Orth. 35 (CSCO 400), Louvain 1978; BBKL 11, 1387.

K. den Biesen

THOMAS of Marga (d. after 850). Author of a very important monastic history, the so-called Book of the Superiors, which constitutes our only source on his life (see, for example, I,40 and II,32). Born in 822 at Nehšōn in the diocese of Salāh, Thomas entered the *monastery of Bēt ʿAbē in the region of Margā, in *Adiabene, ca. 80 km (49.7 mi) E of Mossul. At a certain point he became the secretary of the *catholicos of the church of the East, Abraham II, who consecrated him bishop of Margā (not to be confused with his contemporary of the same name, Thomas the metropolitan of Bēt Garmai). When he finished his monastic history, after the death of Abraham II in 850, he still remained the bishop of Margā; we know nothing of the subsequent period and the date of his death.

A History of Some Saints is also attributed to him, a work written during his youth that has been preserved treating primarily the monastery of Rabban Cyprian in the region of Birtā; in all the MSS it constitutes the last book of the Book of the Superiors, but J.M. Fiey has demonstrated that it is an independent work written before the Book of the Superiors.

The Liber superiorum is dedicated primarily to the history of the monastery of Bēt ʿAbē in which Thomas was raised and which was established at the end of the 6th c. The work also discusses the monks who lived in all the area E and S of Mossul, and it constitutes, moreover, a rich source of information on the church of the East during that era. The *monasticism described by Thomas was clearly that of a laura, with numerous cells for the hermits and a *cenobium for the novices. The monastic life was the traditional form, carried out in solitude, silence and combat against the passions and a quest for continual prayer, and practiced with the usual idiorrhythmic style. In fact, a rule is never mentioned, and the role of the superiors was primarily that of a spiritual guide.

Brockelmann, 233-234; BO III/1, 463-501; DSp 15, 847-849; Duval, 206-207; E.A.W. Budge, Thomas of Marga, Book of Governors, London 1893 (text with trans.); P. Bedjan, Liber superiorum seu historia monastica auctore Thoma, episcopo Margensi, Paris-Leipzig 1901; J.-M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, I, Beyrouth 1965, 25-26, 236-248; J.-M. Fiey, Thomas de Marga. Notule de littérature syriaque: Muséon 78 (1965) 361-366; BBKL 11, 1400-1402.

K. den Biesen

THRACE. Ancient name of the E and SE region of the Balkan Peninsula. In the millennium before Christ, this territory was inhabited by the Thracians, a people divided into many tribes, who, according to Herodotus, were, after the Indians, the most numerous people on earth (Hist. V,3). From the geographical point of view, the territorial range of Thrace changed over the centuries, more than once with respect to its extension. Thrace's borders had the Danube to the N, the shore of the Euxine (Black) Sea to the E (that is, modern-day Černo More), the Aegean Sea and the Propontis (Sea of Marmara) to the S and SE, and the Rivers Utus (Vit) and Nestos (Mesta), which still preserve their old names, only partially changed, to the W and SW.

After conquering and organizing Macedonia as a province (148 BC), the Romans strove toward Thrace, but they had to fight for almost two centuries to overcome the resistance of the Thracians, conquer its territory and transform it around the year AD 46 into a Roman province, including the region to the S of Mt. Haemus (today Stara Planina), the Euxine Sea, the Propontis and the Aegean Sea, as far as the River Nestos. While in *Moesia, to the N, the Latin language and civilization ruled, Thrace underwent the influence of Hellenism in language and culture, being the border to the great Greek centers. Because after the beginning of the 1st c. AD it was not a border province, fewer Roman troops were stationed there, and the territory therefore was able to better preserve its ethnic character. The territory was only crossed by two large arterial roads: the Via Diagonalis (between *Singidunum; modern-day Belgrade; *Sardica, now Sophia; and *Byzantium, that is, *Constantinople) and the Via Egnatia, which began from Dyrrachium (Durazzo, Durrës) to reach Byzantium, passing through *Macedonia, *Thessaly and the Aegean Thrace. For many centuries, on the shores of the respective tract of the Euxine Sea and the Propontis were the ancient Greek colonies that had developed into opulent cities: Abdera, Amphipolis, Maronia, Perinthus and Byzantium on the Bosporus, which then became famous as the capital of the Roman Empire of the East with the name of Constantinople. Within Thrace, there formed from the ancient settlements of the Thracians several centers of particular importance: Beroë became Augusta Traiana (modern-day Stara Zagora, on a fertile plain), Pulpudeva gave way to Philippopolis (modern-day Plovdiv) and from Uscudama was born Hadrianopolis (Edrene, Odrin), an important statio on the Via Diagonalis.

Situated rather far from the N border of the limes danubianus, the cities, in addition to being fortified, were hardly touched by the "barbarian" invasions of the *Huns, *Goths, Avars etc., and thus they preserved their cultural richness and population more or less intact. Not even the population living out on the plains suffered much on account of the invasions, and there were rather rare cases in which the invaders who were not stopped at the border of the Danube were able to reach quite deeply within so as to reach the areas near the Aegean Sea and the Propontis. Among the invaders, the most daring were the Slavs, who, during the 1st half of the 6th c., came to the seashores, destroying such centers as the city of Topiros, at the estuary of the River Nestos in 549/550. One cannot, however, establish with precision the age in which damage and destruction were brought upon such cities as Amphipolis, at the mouth of the River Strymon, and *Philippi, an ancient early Christian center. However, exchanges between the ancient Thracian population and the Hellenic population which dwelt in this part of Thrace did not occur, it seems, brusquely, but rather gradually so that there was not an end of continuity with the new inhabitants who received among other things a noticeable number of ancient hydronyms and toponyms such as the name of the colony Deultum (today the village of Develt), the city of Anchialos (Bulgar Achelos, modern-day Pomorie) on the Black Sea, Messembria (modern-day Nesebŭr), Agathopolis (Achtopol), Nicopolis ad Nestum (Nevrokop in S Bulgaria), Astibus (Stip, in NE Macedonia), etc.; and the names of various rivers: Strymon (modern-day Struma), Nestus (now Mesta), Hebrus (Ibŭr near the source, then more commonly with the name Maritza), Tonzus (Tungia, flowing from the Hebrus), Syrmus (now Strjama, Strema), and the mountain of the Rhodopes (now Rodopi), etc.

Following *Diocletian's administrative reorganization, the diocese of Thrace was subdivided into six provinces, four of which already made part of Thrace: Europa, Rhodope, Thracia and Haemimontus, with two others: *Scythia and Moesia Inferior, according to the testimony of the Laterculus Veronensis and a piece of information confirmed also by other historical sources, for example, the Notitia dignitatum and by Hierocles's Synekdēmos. The diocese of Thrace made up part of the Praefectura per Orientem vicarius, and therefore what pertained to the "civil" affairs was found to depend on a vir spectabilis, while for the military affairs it was governed by a magister militum per Thracias, vir illustris. When *Constantine the Great in 330 officially transferred the capital of the empire from *Rome to Byzantium, Constantinople, Thrace ceased to be a periphery province of the empire and became the backdrop of the capital, thereby acquiring a special importance both from the strategic-military point of view, and the economic point of view, for the purchase of provisions. This privileged, so to speak, position of Thrace, however, wound up attracting more invaders who were willing to go beyond the Danube. And the situation became particularly critical over the course of the 4th then the 5th c., following the invasions of the Huns and the Goths. Having penetrated into the diocese of Thrace, the *Visigoths, who had allied themselves with the *Ostrogoths and the Huns, ruthlessly devastated the territory of Thrace. Once the war against the Persians had been forsaken, the emperor *Valens (364–378) gathered his army together in Thrace in order to oppose the Goths, but in the battle near Hadrianopolis (9 August 378) he was completely routed and even lost his life. The danger of the "Germanization" of the empire became esp. present when two military leaders of the Goths—Theodoric Strabo and *Theoderic Amaling (the Great)—who had received from the Constantinopolitan government the most famous military dignities, betrayed their oaths as federates and undertook to devastate the territory of Thrace. It was only in the last decades of the 5th c. that the territory was able to free itself from them: the first died in 481; the second was persuaded to leave the Balkan Peninsula in 488 and turned his eyes toward *Italy. Several decades later the territory of Thrace was forced to undergo the invasions of the Huns, during the 1st half of the 5th c. until the death of *Attila in the spring of 453, when his successors attempted to reconquer the Balkan lands. At the very end of the 5th c. and at the beginning of the following, the invasions of the Slavs began, who crossed the Danube en masse.

Christianity spread in Thrace already during the early centuries of the Christian era: Christian communities, grouped around some building of worship, formed in various centers. Setting aside for the moment the communities of Scythia Minor and those of Thrace in the area subject to the rule of the Roman Empire of the East, one must recall esp. the Christian centers and territory in which the Bulgarian state was located, which had arisen in 681. Information used to reconstruct the history of these Christian groups has come down to us from a few pieces of written, epigraphic and archaeological documentation. The remains of nearly 150 churches from the early Christian period, which date to the 4th–6th c. (Tchaneva-Detchevska, 2494 a map). Thus in the ancient city of Pautalia (modern-day Kjustendil, SW Bulgaria) and in its vicinity ancient Christian inscriptions in Greek and Latin from the 4th to 6th c. were discovered. Interestingly enough, among other things, a metrical inscription in beautiful Greek characters was found, somewhat damaged, the text of which reveals traces of the 4th-c. christological discussions. An important Christian center was the city of Messembria (on the Black Sea, Nesebŭr), which was of a Hellenic culture, where various Christian inscriptions were discovered, esp. from the 6th c., but also from later ages. From one of these inscriptions, which is unfortunately very damaged, one must conclude that in this maritime center Christianity spread through the work of people who had come from *Asia Minor. The cathedral church from the 2nd half of the 5th c., which has been preserved rather well, contained three aisles; on the outside, under the modern-day street, are important mosaics. In a Greek inscription found at the Aquae calidae (the region of Burgas, on the coast of the Black Sea, in E Bulgaria), datable to the 6th c., there is a mention of a bishop, a deacon, an oeconomos and a vicar, all of which are a testimony to its very developed ecclesiastical organization. In the ancient fortress of Deultum (today the village of Develt, on the coast of the Black Sea) and in the maritime city of Sozopolis there existed Christian communities, to which several sepulchral inscriptions written in the Greek language from the 5th to the 6th c. refer. Another Christian center was the ancient city of Augusta Traiana (a temple of Beroë, modern-day Stara Zagora), where Christian sepulchral inscriptions were found, probably from the 5th to the 6th c., as well as the different Christian tombs (Pillinger, Monumenti, 302).

At Philippopolis (now Plovdiv), metropolis of Thrace, Greek Christian inscriptions were discovered, one of which from perhaps the 4th c. contains *gnostic content: the author, *Tatian, came from *Asia through *Egypt; this confirms the hypothesis that religious movements that had come from the East were present in Thrace. In the archaeological digs carried out between 1983 and 1986 in the center of Plovdiv, a large Christian basilica with three aisles was discovered next to the ancient forum with rich mosaic ornamentation. In Hissar (N of Philippopolis), most likely to be identified with the ancient city of Diocletianopolis, reconstructed by *Diocletian between 295 and 305, Christian inscriptions written in Greek have come to light from the 5th–6th c., and massive remains are still preserved of a good nine churches; in one church, there is an inscription in honor of *Stephen the first martyr (Pillinger, Monumenti, 281-283). The most ancient basilica, number 4, from the 4th c., was constructed over a pagan temple (Madjarov, 2526). The episcopal see depended on Philippopolis; its bishop was present at the Council of *Ephesus (431) and that of *Chalcedon (451). At Zapara (not identified with certainty, but probably to be situated at Vrač Bulgaria; now Sandanski in the Valley of Struma) was the see for a bishop in the 6th c., given the testimony of a mosaic inscription. The inscription speaks of a certain John who had completed the church, which was begun by his predecessor. Sandanski is identified with Parthicopolis (Pillinger, Monumenti, 295-298). The Museum of Art and History of Varna, the ancient Odessos (Pillinger, Monumenti, 293 and 304-307) on the Black Sea possesses many early Christian objects. Odessos was an important Christian center. Remains of a church are found at Džanavar-tepe near Varna (Pillinger, Monumenti, 285ff.). From Storgosia (Pleven), not far from Romania, one finds a Latin inscription with the beginning words of Ps 42:4 (Pillinger, Monumenti, 299).

The foundation of the Bulgarian state in 681 also had an effect on the political and cultural situation of Thrace, which, not having been occupied by the Bulgarians, possibly remained under the rule of the Byzantine Empire. The political-administrative reform undertaken by *Heraclius (610–641), which was then completed by his successor Constantine IV (668–685), was owed to the situation that had emerged following the rise of the new state, potentially an opponent, despite the peace treaty that was reached in September of 681. The diocese of Thrace was transformed into a thema, that is, a political-military unit, under the command of a strategos who reunited the civil and military power: this was done in order to better ensure the defense before the threat of the new state. Pushing toward the S, the Slavs were able, however, to establish themselves in a more peaceful way, even in the S regions of SE Europe, thus changing the ethnic composition of a good part of the territories subject to the direct rule of Constantinople. In the most critical period of the "barbarian" invasions of the Huns or the Avars in the 5th and 6th c., it was precisely the representatives of the Christian clergy who organized the defense of some inhabited centers and who undertook peace talks with the enemies. Thus, during the 1st half of the 6th c., the bishop of the city of Margus (at the mouth of the River Morava), even though saving the city from the reprisal of the Huns, made the decision to open to the invaders the doors of the stronghold. During the 2nd half of the 6th c., in the emperor Maurice's fight (582–602) against the Slavs and the Avars, the inhabitants of the small city of Asemus, situated in the region toward the Danube, had organized, with the privilege of the emperor *Justin II (565–578), an army specifically for their defense. When the Constantinopolitan taxiarcha Guentzon attempted to enlist the city's troops in his army, he was unable to fulfill his wish on account of the resistance posed by the bishop of that place. The sanctuary dedicated to the martyr St. Alexander Romanus (see BHG, 48-49, martyred sub Maximiano) in the village of Druzipera (region of Hadrianopolis) was destroyed by the Avars before the end of the 6th c.

Tabula Imperii romani, Naissus, Dyrrhachion, Scupi, Serdica, Thessalonike, Ljubljana 1976; M.P. Soustal, Tabula Imperii Byzantini, Thrakien: (Thrakē, Rodopē und Haimimontos), Vienna 1991; PWK, s.v. Thrake (römisch) 25 (1936) 452-472; EAA 7, 837-839; KLP 5, 777-781; D. Concev, Hisarskite bani, Sofia 1937; V. Beševliev, Spätgriechische und spätlateinische Inschriften aus Bulgarien, Berlin 1964; K. Mijatev, Architektura v srednovekovna Bŭlgarija, Sofia 1965, 7-26; R.F. Hoddinott, Bulgaria in Antiquity: An Archaeological Introduction, London 1975; I. Dujčev, Testimonianze epigrafiche e archeologiche sul paleocristianesimo in Bulgaria: Atti dell'Accademia pontificia di archeologia 53/54 (1980-82) 181-205; J. Fitz, L'administration des provinces danubiennes sous le Bas-Empire romain, Brussels 1983; N. Tscanewa-Detschewska, Die frühchristliche Architektur in Bulgarien, in Actes du X[e] Congrès int. d'archéologie chrétienne, II, Vatican City 1984, 613-623; C. Poulter (ed.), Ancient Bulgaria, Nottingham 1983; R. Pillinger, Monumenti paleocristiani in Bulgaria: RivAC 61 (1985) 275-310; Spätantike und frühbyzantinische Kultur Bulgariens zwischen Orient und Okzident, ed. R. Pillinger, Vienna 1986; V. Giuzelev, Medieval Bulgaria, Byzantine Empire, Black Sea, Venice, Genoa, Villach 1988; N. Tscanewa-Detschewska, Les édifices cultuels sur le territoire bulgare pendant la période paléochrétienne à la lumière des nouvelles données, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès int. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2491-2509; J. Valeva, Les nécropoles paléochrétiennes de Bulgarie et les tombes peintes, in op. cit., 1243-1258; M. Madjarov, Diocletianopolis, ville paléochrétienne de Thrace, in op. cit., 2521-2519; E. Kessialova, Una nouvelle basilique à Philippopolis, in op. cit., 2539-2559; M. Madjarov, Early Christian Cult Buildings in the Province of Thrace (IV-V c.), in Akten des XII Intern. Kongresses f. christl. Archäologie, II, Münster 1995, 993-996; I. Djambov, L'édifice cultuel et sa nécropole. Nouvelles découvertes près de la ville de Sopot, in op. cit., 705-709. For the bishops and the dioceses: Fedalto 301-311; 1, 554-564; B. Gerov, Beiträge zur Geschichte der römischen Provinzen Moesien und Thrakien, Amsterdam 1997; C. Asdracha, Inscriptions chrétiennes et protobyzantines de la Thrace orientale et de l'île d'Imbros: (III[e]-VII[e] siècles): présentation et commentaire historique: Archaiologikon deltion 49-50 (1994-95) 279-356; 51-52 (1996-97) 333-386; 53 (1998) 455-521.

I. Dujčev

THRASEAS of Eumenia (2nd c.). Bishop of Eumenia in Asia Proconsularis who was put to death in the 3rd quarter of the 2nd c. Two ancient documents preserve his name: the controversy of the apologist *Apollonius against *Montanus mentions him as one of the martyrs of that time (Eus., HE 5,18,14); *Polycrates's letter, bishop of *Ephesus, to Pope *Victor, contains this information: "There is Thraseas of Eumenia, bishop and martyr, who lays at rest in Smyrna" and adds that Thraseas, like all the bishops of Asia, celebrated *Easter on 14 Nisan, that is, differently from the Roman and Alexandrian or Palestinian tradition (Eus., HE 5,24,4 and 6).

BS 12, 640.

G. Ladocsi

THREE CHAPTERS, Controversy of the. Within the framework of the attempts aiming to seek an agreement with the *monophysites, the emperor *Justinian published in ca. 544 an edict, only fragments of which remain, in which he condemned post mortem *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and *Ibas of Edessa (the Three Chapters), whom the monophysites hated inasmuch they were the inspirers and supporters of *Nestorius. He requested Rome's approval and, facing the equivocations of Pope *Vigilius, had him arrested and transported to *Constantinople, where the pope came at the beginning of 547. Vigilius had time and the opportunity to consult many members of the Western episcopate; he therefore gave much resistance to the pressures of his environment, so that on 11 April 548, he sent the Iudicatum to the patriarch *Menas of Constantinople, in which he condemned the Three Chapters and reaffirmed the validity of the Council of *Chalcedon. Similarly, only a few fragments from this document have survived. The reactions of the Western episcopate were very violent toward this piece of news, such that Vigilius subsequently retracted the document and requested the convocation of an ecumenical synod. While waiting for the gathering of this body, Vigilius had to undergo injustices of every type, but his Constitutum on 14 May 553, even though it condemned many doctrinal propositions extracted from the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, refused to condemn his memory, as well as that of Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Ibas of Edessa. But the council, which had begun a few days earlier at Constantinople, without the pope's participation, condemned the Three Chapters, and Vigilius confirmed the condemnation on 8 December 553.

The reactions of the West were negative, esp. in *Africa and N *Italy. And although in Africa *Justinian imposed the approval of the condemnation with force, the churches of N Italy separated themselves from communion with Rome. The *schism was supported for political reasons by the *Longobards (Lombards), who shortly thereafter invaded Italy, and despite the attempts to restore church unity by *Gregory the Great and other popes, it came to an end only toward the end of the 7th c. (ca. 689), following a council of bishops from the affected regions gathered at Pavia (Ticinum) by decision of King Cunipert, with the agreement of Pope *Sergius I.

Fliche-Martin, IV, 581-589; Storia del Cristianesimo, III, 395-404, 407-432; DTC 15, 1868-1924; EC 12, 456-460; R. Devreesse, Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste (ST 141), Vatican City 1948, 194-272; G. Chediath, La controverse des Trois Chapitres. Histoire de la controverse: Istina 43 (1998) 75-89.

M. Simonetti

TIBERIANUS. Spanish *Priscillianist from *Baetica. After being condemned, his goods were confiscated; he was then exiled to the Scilly Isles with *Istantius. *Jerome mentions him as the author of an apologetic document, composed to defend himself from the charge of heresy (Vir. ill. 123).

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: The Occult and the Charismatic in the Early Church, Oxford 1976, 47, 144-145; V. Burrus, The Making of a Heretic: Gender, Authority, and the Priscillianist Controversy, Berkeley-Los Angeles-London 1995, 27-78.

S. Zincone

TIBERIUS, emperor (42 BC–AD 37). Tiberius Claudius Nero, Roman emperor, governed from 14

to 37. He did not attempt to make new territorial conquests but had to face at *Rome a very difficult political situation, given the fact that revitalized ideological movements against the principality and the aristocratic Claudian family had arisen. After the failed conspiracy of the praetorian prefect Sejanus (31), Tiberius reigned with an iron fist, launching a politics of union and a leveling of the peoples of the empire, to the detriment of the Italians. He took measures against foreign religions: he expelled the Jews from Italy (Garzetti, 31) and prohibited Druidical rites. He refused to accept divine honors. *Jesus Christ lived and died under Tiberius; according to *Tertullian, the emperor was informed by the procurator of Judea, namely Pontius *Pilate, about the events that occurred at *Palestine and the conflict between the Christian community of *Jerusalem and official Judaism. Tiberius, likewise according to Tertullian (Apol. V, ff.), proposed to the Senate the consecratio of Christ and the legitimacy of his cult, but this proposal was rejected. The emperor Tiberius appeared extensively in early Christian apocryphal literature, in which he is presented in positive terms to the detriment to Pontius Pilate (see L. Moraldi, Gli apocrifi del NT, Turin 1971, II, 2013 = index).

A. Garzetti, L'impero da Tiberio agli Antonini, Bologna 1960; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Rome et l'intégration de l'Empire, Paris [7]2010; B. Levick, Tiberius the Politician, London-New York [2]1999; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001; M. Sordi - I. Ramelli, Il senatoconsulto del 35 contro i Cristiani in un frammento porfiriano: Aevum 78 (2004) 59-67.

L. Navarra

TIBURTINE SIBYL. The list of Sibyls formalized by Varro, which is cited by *Lactantius in the first book of the Divinae institutiones (I,6,6-12), concludes with the following claims: "The tenth is that of (Tibur) Tivoli, referred to as Albunea, who is worshiped as a goddess at Tivoli on the rivers of the Aniene River, in the course of which—it is said—her statue was discovered holding a book in hand. The Senate ordered that the oracles contained in this book be transferred to the Capitoline Hill."

In Varro's text, one perceives the antiquarian's desire, or that of his source, to supply a homogeneous framework to the disorderly traditional material regarding the oracular production circulating in the Mediterranean world from ancient times under the name of the Sibyl, the mythical itinerant prophetess, to whose inspired word Heraclitus had already referred as "a voice without smiles, decoration, perfumes, but which crosses through the centuries because of God's power" (fr. 92 DK in Plutarch, De Pyth. or. 6,397A). The personage, who was capable of openly prophesying under the influence of divine inspiration, without being subject to consultation, in fact, was at the same time portrayed as unique and multiple, refracting herself into numerous figures connected to specific locations such as the place of her birth or of her oracular manifestation. As is well known, in face of the mobile and variegated oracular Sibylline literature that freely circled in Greece and in the various Mediterranean regions, an official corpus of texts was established, the Sibylline Books, which was placed under the authority of the Senate and entrusted to the priestly college, which alone was able to consult and interpret their meaning during a serious state crisis, in order to proceed to the pertinent sacred ceremonies performed for reestablishing the pax deorum. This oracular collection was connected by tradition, for which Varro himself was made a spokesman in the aforementioned text of Lactantius (Div. Inst. VI,6,10-11), with the Cumaean Sibyl and with the Etruscan phase of the Roman royalty. The Tiburtine Sibyl also turned out to be connected to that heritage of texts, once the sortes contained in the book, of which she was the owner, and were presented as having been transferred by the Senate into the Capitolium, the most venerable of the Roman temples in its function as the home of the triad divinity established by Jupiter, Juno and Minerva, in the Sibylline Books.

As in the case of the other Sibyls, and esp. that of the Erythraean Sibyl, the Tiburtine Sibyl, who with her name also assumed the characteristics of a local divine figure, the Albunea nymph (see Virgil, En. VII, 79-95), was subjected to a process of "Judaization" and "Christianization" (see *Oracles), becoming the owner of an oracular composition with a clearly Christian character, known as the Tiburtine Oracle. The original text, which was composed in Greek, seems to be dated to the end of the 4th c. AD and witnessed a long history of additions and elaborations, both in the Greek original (see *Baalbek Oracle) and in the Latin translations that were made until the 14th c. and reflect the historical events and peculiar apocalyptic tendencies of a given time. The oracle's central nucleus is established by the Sibyl's convocation to Rome by order of the Senate, so that she may offer an explanation for a dream, which was shared by 100 senators, that pertained to the apparition of new suns. The prophetess interpreted the vision as a symbolic expression of the seven "generations" or rather the major phases of human history.

Among them, the fourth phase (or according to the other versions, the fifth) appears to be the central one, which constitutes a sort of "Sibylline gospel," inasmuch as it evokes the essential moments of the life of Jesus, from his birth to his death, which was caused by the hostility of the "priests of the Jews." The subsequent phases were characterized by events connected to various Roman emperors until the time of *Constantine, who is presented as the relentless destroyer of pagan temples and the protector of Christians. Mention is also made of the discovery of the cross of Christ by the pious *Helena, the emperor's mother, the founder of the new capital *Constantinople. Less explicit are the historical references of the subsequent "generations" which, after the original version, brought in the succession of the Latin versions that were made ad libitum, to the point of reaching events that occurred during the Middle Ages. Once again, through the complex history of the tradition of an oracular Sibylline composition, one can agree with the ancient philosopher who attributed to the prophetess's unadorned but efficacious voice the ability to penetrate without any limit into the temple to make heard the divine word.

P.J. Alexander, The Oracle of Baalbek: The Tiburtine Sibyl in Greek Dress, Dumbarton Oaks Studies 10, Washington, DC 1967; H.W. Parke, Sibyls and Sibylline Prophecy in Classical Antiquity, New York 1988, B. McGinn, Oracular Trasformations: The "Sibylla Tiburtina" in the Middle Age, in I. Chirassi Colombo - T. Seppilli (eds.), Sibille e linguaggi oracolari. Mito Storia Tradizione, Atti del Convegno Macerata-Norcia, settembre 1994, Pisa-Rome 1999, 603-644; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Profeti Oracoli Sibille. Rivelazione e salvezza nel mondo antico, Rome 2002.

G. Sfameni Gasparro

TIME. The God of the *Jews and the Christians reveals himself above all in history, and this history, in the divine plan, has powerful moments, decisive turns that must be observed in order to understand their meaning. Within this perspective, time has a fundamental importance inasmuch as the salvific acts pertaining to humanity, as a whole and individually, have taken place within it, as have the collective and individual responses of humankind. The patristic age kept in mind this dimension very well, which recurs with a variety of emphases and a wealth of images in Christian literature.

To briefly examine the most important features that have characterized the perception of time among Christians, it is opportune to make mention of the scholarly debate that occurred around the mid-20th c. in order to draw from it several points of reflection. Oscar Cullman's thesis is well known, according to which for early Christianity, as in the case of Judaism and Iranian religion, the symbolic expression of time was a line, although for Hellenism it was a circle. According to this vision, the center of history is not—as maintained by A. Schweitzer and M. Werner—in the *Parousia and therefore in the future, but in the past: Christ has come, proclaimed his message and died for the salvation of humankind, already inaugurating something new, in the expectation that with the final events everything will be perfected and the Spirit will take possession of the world of matter. This vision contrasts with that of Bultmann, for whom the imminent expectation of the end of the world belongs to mythology. The intense debate that followed revolved around three points: the effective presence of the "history of salvation" in the NT writings; the adequacy and the meaning of the representation of "linear" time in reference to the ancient Christian sources; the legitimacy of the conception of "cyclic" time attributed to Hellenism. Scholars have observed that one should not attribute the "cyclical" notion of time to all Greek thought: in fact, the great historians such as Herodotus, Thucydides and Polybius did not think of history in terms of cycles (Momigliano); therefore the mode of conceiving time was not unambiguous among the Greeks and one should not oversimplify the contrast between Greeks and Jews on this point. Some scholars have shifted the focus of the problem by maintaining that the true contrast within the ancient world was that between a doctrine that allowed for the generation and corruption of the cosmos and a doctrine that made the cosmos itself eternal, while others have dismissed the problem altogether (even Christianity, on the cosmological level, expressed a cyclical conception, as shown by the testimony of 2 Pet 3:5 [Mazzarino]). Scholars now emphasize the insufficiency of the symbol of the line to indicate the history of salvation, and they prefer to speak of a spiral line or a progressive or even a vertical line. (This model tends toward eternity and not temporal length.)

This admittedly quick glance at some of the positions of recent scholarship allows us to assess the complexity of the problem, witnessed also by the divergence of opinions that base themselves on differing interpretations of or on differing emphases within the ancient pagan and Christian sources.

In any case, it is perhaps possible to bring to light a few points pertaining to time that seem to have been shared by early ecclesiastical writers: for one thing, their clear detachment from the horizon of the archetypes and repetition, which was common to "traditional" societies; in the vision that they set forth, there is no return in a strict sense, even if the idea of periodization was dear to many of them. Moreover, the importance attributed to all three parts of which, according to human schemes, time is constituted: past, present and future; and along these, the individuation of a continual historical line, planned by God, of which the coming of Christ forms the center, and the end of which, however, is unknown: time is necessary to allow for the complete growth of the body of Christ, which must reach its perfect stature (see H.-I. Marrou, Teologia della storia, 39). Consequently, one understands the tension of the Christian life between the first and second coming of the Lord, the expectation, even the desire, of the last things, which in the majority of cases does not lead one to resignation and apathy but to full and passionate engagement in the world; the acute and vivid feeling of the irretrievable passing of time, a constant theme in patristic writings, leads one to make good use of it: because it is in time that human beings decide their destiny.

If from the perspective of the "long-term" one passes over to what could be defined as the "time of daily life," one must note that *Late Antiquity (just as the Middle Ages) was deeply marked by the inauguration of new rhythms: in the first place, the calendar year aimed to bring to life the memory of the great events of the life of Christ: his birth, Christmas, which was preceded by the period of Advent, until his resurrection, *Easter, which was preceded by *Lent, which was followed by the *ascension and *Pentecost. Moreover, each day was interspersed with the memory of the saints, whose lives were set forth as models for the faithful. Liturgical time was a circular time—and in that one feels the effect of a more ancient Greco-Roman vision (moreover, there were numerous pagan feasts that mutated into Christian feasts, which were often celebrated on the same days)—and nevertheless it did not recall the idea of the eternal return. Rather it was a commemorative cycle of the work of redemption completed by Christ once and for all. As early as the 5th c. in some churches (and the reference is to the Church of Rome) liturgical gatherings took place, accompanied by fasting, at the beginning of the four seasons. Another novelty of Late Antique Christian time was introduced by the week, which set aside six days for work and one day for rest, which was dedicated to the Lord. Christianity inherited this sevenfold rhythm from Judaism, which in turn drew this rhythm from the very account of the first book of the Bible on the creation of the world, according to which God worked during six days, only to then rest on the seventh. Upon this temporal sequence the life of society unfolded—but also the course of the "history of salvation," conceived in seven (or eight) ages—and it refashioned human activity. With the advancing of the years even the unfolding of the day received a different meaning: the "canonical" hours were introduced: Matins, Lauds, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, Compline and Nocturn. The last one is the most ancient part of the canonical hours, to which were gradually added the others, and they thus established the Officium divinum, in the form of public prayer recited in the name of the church or by all the people and by its members who were esp. committed to it, in primis by the ascetics and the monks and, subsequently, also by the secular clergy. For the most numerous multitude, namely that of the laity, the sound of the bells at the first glimmer of the morning, at midday and evening was a reminder of that prayer that others had made themselves available to complete. In this way, even time in its most humble dimension, which touches the life of all people, received a specifically and professedly Christian stamp.

O. Cullmann, Christus und die Zeit, Zürich 1946 (Eng. tr. Christ and Time, London ³1971); H.-I. Marrou, L'ambivalence du temps de l'histoire chez Saint Augustin, Montréal 1950; A. Luneau, L'histoire du salut chez les Pères de l'Église. La doctrine des âges du monde, Paris 1964; A. Momigliano, Time in Ancient Historiography: History and Theory 6 (1966) 1-23 (= Quarto contributo alla storia degli studi classici e del mondo antico, Rome 1969, 13-41); S. Mazzarino, Il pensiero storico classico, II, 2, Bari 1966, 412-461, note 555 on the perception of time in classical historiography; H.-I. Marrou, Théologie de l'histoire, Paris 1968 (It. trans. Milan 1969); var. aus., Le temps chrétien de la fin de l'Antiquité au Moyen Âge (IIIᵉ-XIIIᵉ siècle), ed. Ch. Pietri - G. Dagron - J. Le Goff, Paris 1984; P. Siniscalco, La concezione della storia nel cristianesimo antico, Aosta 1988, 155-176; Id., Un modulo storiografico fortunato: le età del mondo dall'epoca patristica al Medioevo, in var. aus., Il Battistero di Parma. Iconografia, iconologia, fonti letterarie, Milan 1999, 321-350; Id., Tempo e giubileo tra giudaismo e cristianesimo: Il Veltro 43 (1999) 93-103 (the last three articles are now in P. Siniscalco, Il senso della storia, Studi sulla storiografia cristiana antica, Soveria Mannelli 2003, respectively at pp. 7-29, 299-313 and 213-260; J. Le Goff, L'Occidente medievale e il tempo, in Id., I riti, il tempo, il riso. Cinque saggi di storia medievale, Ital. trans., Rome-Bari 2001, 115-133; P. Tzamalikos, Origen: Cosmology and Ontology of Time, Leiden 2006.

P. Siniscalco

TIMGAD. The ancient name of the city was Thamugadi. Created in 100 by request of *Trajan, his chessboard pattern covered an area of 60 hectares. It was situated at the crossroads that went from *Lambaesis to *Tebessa and from *Cirta (Constantine) to Aurès, on the highlands of Numidia. It only had thin wall fortifications, which were unable to provide resistance against the Moors, who had risen against the *Vandals at the beginning of the 6th c. They destroyed the city, which experienced only a partial rebirth under the rule of the Byzantines, before disappearing under the desert sand.

The following bishops of Timgad are known to us: (1) Novatus, who was present at the Council of Carthage of 256 (Sent. epp. 4); (2) Sextus, in 320 (Gesta apud Zenophilum); (3) *Optatus (388–398), *Gildo's second-in-command, champion of *Donatism and leader, who fell along with Gildo; (4) his successor *Gaudentius, who spoke in the name of the Donatists at the Conference of Carthage (411); (5) Faustinianus, his Catholic opponent; (6) Secundus, who was present at the Conference of Carthage (484).

P. Monceaux, who believes that there is a historical foundation to the Passio Mammarii (BHL 5205-5206), regards Lawrence, Faustinianus, Ziddinus, Crispinus and Leucius as *martyrs of Timgad in 259.

A *pagan cemetery is found on the road toward Lambaesis; a Christian cemetery, 250 meters (273.4 yds) from the walls; another likewise on the Aurès Road to the S side. Outside the walls in the W suburb one also finds two episcopal groups, a Catholic one to the N and a Donatist one to the S; on the road that leads S, outside the Byzantine fort, stands the chapel of the patrician Gregory (ca. 645). Inside the city some sanctuaries were built during the Byzantine era.

P. Monceaux, Timgad chrétien, Paris 1911-12; PWK 24, 1235-1236; DACL 15, 2313-2338; LTK 10, 197-198; P. Romanelli, Topografia e archeologia dell'Africa romana, Turin 1970 (see index); P.-A. Février, Urbanisation et urbanisme de l'Afrique romaine: ANRW II, 10, 321-396; G. Zimmer, Locus datus decreto decurionum: zur Statuenaufstellung zweier Forumsanlagen im römischen Afrika, Munich 1989; N. Davis, Ruined Cities Within Numidian and Carthaginian Territories, London 2001.

V. Saxer

TIMOTHY, Apollinarist (bishop of Berytus, ca. 381–399). In the subdivisions that formed among the disciples of *Apollinaris of Laodicea, Timothy bishop of Berytus (modern-day Beirut) appears to have been the head of the group that was at the opposite side of the spectrum from *Polemon. Timothy attempted to reach an agreement with the "Great Church": he did in fact sign the canons of the Council of *Constantinople of 381 (see Mansi 3,568C). Toward the end of *Constantius's reign (361) or at the beginning of that of *Valens (364), in any case before *Athanasius's death, he had gone to Rome at Athanasius's behest and had returned with an epistula canonica to "Bishop" Apollinaris (see Leontius, Fraud. 151: PG 86,1976). Around 373, in the middle of the Antiochene schism, Timothy sought as much as possible an identity that distinguished Apollinarianism from both the old and the new Nicenes: he declared anathemas against *Paulinus, *Epiphanius, *Diodore of Tarsus, and, gradually, against *Peter of Alexandria and *Basil of Caesarea (see Lietzmann, pp. 23, 27). In 377 he was already bishop of Berytus; he went a second time to *Rome by order of Apollinaris, with the objective of defending their group's interests at the council held that year (Leontius, Fraud. 151: PG 86,1976), which condemned Apollinarianism (Mansi 3,427).

*Leontius of Constantinople has preserved the following texts from Timothy's writings (Fraud. 138): an Ep. ad Homonium episcopum (Lietzmann, 277), in which Timothy distanced himself from the "*synousiasts," that is, those who were on the other side of the spectrum within the Apollinarian movement: there he affirms not only the consubstantiality of the incarnate Christ with the human nature but also the distinction of the Logos; the two fragments from the Catechesis are along the same lines (Lietzmann, fr. 181, pp. 278-279). We then have a fragment from the Historia ecclesiastica, which preserves the Ep. ad Iovianum, a work attributed by the Athanasian MSS to the bishop of *Alexandria (Lietzmann, fr. 182, pp. 279-283; see CPG II,2135). Finally, we possess an Ep. ad Prosdocium (Lietzmann, pp. 283-286), which is a true and proper confession of faith of this movement within Apollinarianism. It has been passed down among the writings of Pope *Julius (PL 8,954-959). Extant are the *Syriac and *Armenian versions and fragments in *Latin, Syriac and Armenian (see CPG 3726).

CPG II, 3723 Suppl. 205-206; DCB 4, 1029, 3726; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 5, 23, 27, 153-157; fragments 277-286; G. Voisin, L'apollinarisme. Étude historique littéraire et dogmatique sur le début des controverses christologiques au IVe siècle, Louvain 1901, 112-113; BBKL 12, 147-148.

E. Cavalcanti

TIMOTHY, apostle (apocryphal). With respect to Timothy the disciple of St. *Paul, we find pieces of information from the epistles of St. Paul (1 and 2 Tim) and the Acts of the Apostles. We possess some patristic commentaries on the two epistles to Timothy; in Greek: complete commentaries by *John Chrysostom (plus 2 homilies), *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, ps.-John of Damascus and authors whose work is fragmentary: *Severian of Gabala and Oecumenius (CPG 5, index, 145-146); in Latin: *Ambrosiaster, *Pelagius and the fragmentary work of *Hilary of Poitiers (CPL, index, 777). According to *Jerome, Timothy was St. Paul's translator (Epist. 120,11); after his death, he became the bishop of *Ephesus (Eus., HE 3,4,5). There exists a Martyrdom of Timothy, which is ascribed to *Polycrates the bishop of Ephesus, in which a description is instead offered for St. Paul and St. *John's activity in Ephesus. After the exile of the latter, Timothy presided over the church of Ephesus and was put to death during the pagan feast of Katagogia. The work was written after the Council of Chalcedon, defending the apostolicity of Ephesus against the growing claims of *Constantinople; the first witness to this work was *Photius (Cod. 254). Timothy's relics remained in Ephesus until 356; in that year they were transferred to *Constantinople and deposited in the Church of the Holy Apostles. They were probably stolen by the Crusaders in 1204 but were rediscovered in 1945 at Termoli. Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite dedicated two of his works to Timothy: De divinis nominibus and De mystica teologia; Timothy must have been present at *Mary's funeral (John of Damascus, II hom. in Dormit. 18).

CANT 295-297; BHG 1847-1848; BHL 8294-8295; BHO 1229 (Armenian passio); BS 12, 482-488; LCIK 8, 494-495; Lipsius 2, 2, 372-400. Vita greca: H. Usener, Bonn 1877; latina, ibid. 7-13; Symeon Metafrastes: PG 114, 761-773; PG 5, 1363-1366; H. Delehaye, Les Actes de S. Timothée, in Mélanges d'hagiographie grecque et latine (SH 42), Brussels 1966, 408-415; F.X. Plötzl, Die Mitarbeiter des Weltapostels Paulus, Regensburg 1911, 103-125; J. Keil, Zum Martyrium des heiligen Timotheus in Ephesos: Jahreshefte des Österr. archäolog. Institut 29 (1934) 82-92; R.W. Burgess, The Passio S. Artemii, Philostorgius, and the Dates of the Invention and Translation of the Relics of Sts Andrew and Luke: AB 121 (2003) 5-36.

M. Starowieyski

TIMOTHY, disciple of Paul. The most highly esteemed disciple and coworker of the apostle *Paul; he is named 17 times in the epistles, six times in the book of Acts and once in the epistle to the Hebrews (13:23). In the apocryphal acts, he barely appears. He was mentioned in the Acta Titi 6, the Acta Petri cum Sim. 4 and in the Apocal. Pauli 51. According to the Acta Petri 4, when *Simon Magus came to *Rome, the Christian community relied neither on Paul nor Timothy and *Barnabas, who were sent by Paul to *Macedonia. According to the Apocal. Pauli 51, after the divine wrath, Paul was transported to the Mount of Olives, where he found the apostles gathered together, to whom he recounts what he had seen and heard, and they enjoined him, along with *Mark and Timothy, to commit everything to writing. According to the Passio (BHG 1847; BHL 8294), a late text redacted during the period of the controversies on the antiquity of the various episcopal sees, Timothy preached and performed miracles at *Ephesus, where the pagans of that area killed him. *Eusebius (HE III,4,5) also received the traditions according to which Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus, and he was mentioned as such in the Council of *Chalcedon (Mansi 7,293). It could be the case that this tradition is based on 1 Tim 1:3. Nevertheless, *Polycrates of Ephesus appealed to the tradition of *John and does not even mention Timothy (Eus., HE 3,24,2-7). The circumcision of Timothy by Paul (Acts 16:3) created numerous theological and exegetical difficulties for the Fathers. The Fathers generally justified it as an adaptation to Jewish prejudice and an act done in view of being accepted by the *Jews (*Iren., Adv. haer. III,13,3; *Tertull., Adv. Marc. I,20,2-3; Praescr. 24,2; *Clem. of Alex., Strom. VI,124,1; *Orig., Comm. in Mt. 11,8). This point was also debated between *Augustine and *Jerome (Ep. 56,3-5; 112,4-17). Augustine maintained that during apostolic times it was absolutely legitimate for those who were born Jews, in their passage toward Christianity, to regard the paternae traditiones as customs that had been transmitted to them. The Jewish Christians, however, could continue to observe the laws in use for the rituals; this, however, was not the case for the pagans. According to Jerome, the law was no longer valid after the passio domini. It was not the apostles' prerogative to decide whether one should observe the law. In the passages where Scripture says that the apostles observed it, Jerome explains that this either pertained to fear they had of the Jews or the fact that they pretended to do so in order to gain the friendship of the Jews.

AASS Ianuar. 2, 562-569; BS 5, 2217-2217; EC 12, 107-108; BS 12, 482-488; R. Hennings, Der Briefwechsel zwischen Augustinus und Hieronymus und ihr Streit um der Kanon des Alten Testaments und die Auslegung von Gal 2,11-14, Leiden 1994, 121-130.

R. Trevijano

TIMOTHY and AQUILA, Dialogue of. A Christian text of a supposed public debate that occurred at *Alexandria at the time of Bishop *Cyril in the 1st half of the 5th c., between the Christian Timothy and the Jew Aquila. Timothy is not presented as the famous companion of *Paul, and Aquila is distinguished from the 2nd-c. biblical translator (they actually discuss this individual at one point). Two Greek recensions of the work exist: one brief (RB) and one long (RL); both are clearly from the end of the 6th c. and were adapted from a now-lost original dating to the beginning of that century; both recensions come from Alexandria. Even if the original partly reflected a possible debate from Cyril's time, the recensions could have elements from the works contra Iudaeos that were composed in Alexandria by a certain Cosmas and functioned as missionary tools when working with the *Jews of that area (John Moschus, Pratum spirituale 172). Both reflect, in many respects, an actual *Jewish-Christian debate.

The RL is the better known of the two texts. Its length is almost half of *Justin Martyr's Dialogue, which does not seem to have had any influence on it. Its way of citing biblical texts is interesting, which at times manifests a dependence, for the OT, on *Origen's Hexapla and for the gospels, perhaps a harmonizing tradition. Various biblical passages are combined with skill, interwoven and adapted among each other. For example, Aquila cites Mt 1:16 in such a way that *Joseph begets *Jesus (17:3). In the RL, Timothy is a laymen until Cyril ordains him a deacon and then a presbyter, before Aquila is baptized alone; although in the RB, Timothy, already a cleric from the very beginning, is invited by Cyril to debate with Aquila, and, at the end, many Jews and Greeks are baptized with Aquila. The RB, although just half the length of the other, contains material exclusive to it. Among other things, there is a discussion about the Antichrist from the tribe of Dan and a long speech made by Timothy on the ten days of the creation of the world and the seven heavens, which has a remarkable similarity to ancient and medieval Jewish speculations.

The work shares material with two other dialogues: namely, the Greek Dialogue of Athanasius and Zacchaeus, from the end of the 4th c., and the *Latin version of *Evagrius's The Debate Between Simon the Jew and Timothy the Christian. The shared material probably indicates that all three works used an ancient Jewish-Christian dialogic source; namely, the Disputation Between Jason and Papiscus from ca. 140, which existed in a Latin translation from the 1st half of the 3rd c. (see *Celsus). The RL has also been preserved in a medieval Slavic translation.

M. Taube, Une source inconnue de la chronographie russe: Le Dialogue de Timothée et Aquila: Revue des études slaves 63 (1991) 113-122; L. Lahey, Jewish Biblical Interpretation and Genuine Jewish-Christian Debate in The Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila: Journal of Jewish Studies 51 (2000) 281-296; Id., The Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila: Critical Greek Text and English Translation of the Short Recension with an Introduction Including a Source Critical Study (Ph.D. Diss., University of Cambridge, 2000), Tübingen 2007; W. Varner, Ancient Jewish-Christian Dialogues: Athanasius and Zacchaeus, Simon and Theophilus, Timothy and Aquila, Lewiston, NY 2004.

L. Lahey

TIMOTHY I, Nestorian (ca. 727–823). Born in 727 or 728 at Hazza (near *Arbela, in Iraq) and educated by the monk Abraham bar Dašandāt, he succeeded his uncle George in the episcopate of Beit Bagas, and in 779 he was able with a few maneuvers to be elected *catholicos, but it took two years to get himself recognized and to make peace with his opponents and adversaries. From that point onward until his death (823), he governed his church with relative tranquility. He enjoyed the friendship of the Abbasid caliphs and the protection of eminent persons of the court. Timothy was a learned man: in addition to *Syriac, he knew Greek and *Arabic and was not ignorant of Persian, the language of a considerable portion of his flock, and he had some knowledge of Hebrew. He loved books, copied them and had them copied, and he encouraged others to make translations. He had understood that in order for his church to be save from apostasy to Islam and *Jacobite *monophysitism, it had need of a well-educated clergy of irreproachable morals, led by good bishops and metropolitans. He therefore committed himself with zeal to the instruction and formation of the clergy and the selection of worthy pastors. Under his catholicate, the *Nestorian church reached its high point and sent missionaries to India, China, Tibet, *Persia and among the Turks. The following texts from Timothy's literary corpus have been lost: the treatise on astronomy, the book of questions and discussions with the Jacobite patriarch George of Be'eltam, and the commentary on *Gregory of Nazianzus. Of the nearly 200 Letters he wrote, 58 have survived. These are extremely important for understanding his life, work and times; there also remains an apology for Christianity delivered before the caliph (Questions and Answers Spoken During the Meeting Between Timothy and the Al Mahid, Emir of the Believers); *canonical texts (Provisions on Ecclesiastical Judgments and Inheritances; Synodical Tomes). In the apology, Timothy was able to defend with finesse the dogmas of Christianity (the *Trinity, the *incarnation of the Word etc.) without upsetting the emir or making concessions to Islam. The Letters often treat dogmatic questions. Timothy was a moderate Nestorian; he used christological formulas that were rejected by rigid Nestorians; he affirmed (almost as if he were a *monothelite) the unity of the operations in Christ (synergism); the goal of the incarnation is universal renewal; the human being is conceived according to *Aristotelian philosophy; the souls of the deceased live in a type of hibernation until the day of judgment; the necessity of grace; for the validity of *baptism, orthodox faith in the minister (priest) is required; the *Eucharist is the body of Christ; the church is a pentarchy, in which the Nestorian patriarch possesses the primacy.

Letters: CSCO 67. Apology: A. Mingana, Woodbrook Studies 2, Cambridge 1928, 1-62. Canonical Texts: E. Sachau, Syr. Rechtsbücher 2, Berlin 1908, 53-117; O. Braun, OC 2 (1902) 283-311; M. Jugie, Theol. dogm. christ. orient., V: Theol. dogm. nest. et monoph., Paris 1935; DTC 15, 1121-1139; EC 12, 111-112; LTK 10, 200-201; Duval 382; Ortiz de Urbina 215-216; BBKL 12, 151-154 (bibl.).

A. De Nicola

TIMOTHY I of Alexandria (d. ca. 385). Brother of *Peter II of Alexandria and priest in that city, he was consecrated bishop at the beginning of 381, upon the death of his brother, and held the post until ca. 385. He came late to the Council of *Constantinople (381) and successfully opposed both the election of *Gregory of Nazianzus as bishop of Constantinople and, without success, the third canon, which sanctioned Constantinople's second place of honor after *Rome, to the detriment of *Alexandria. He was very committed to promoting monastic life. From his writings, 18 canons pertaining to ecclesiastical discipline survive.

CPG 2520-2530; PG 33, 1296-1308; Joannou, II, 240-258; DCB 4, 1029-1030; Coptic Encyclopedia 7, 2263; LACL 694.

M. Simonetti

TIMOTHY II of Alexandria (Ailouros or Aelurus) (d. 477). Priest of *Alexandria at the time of *Dioscorus and nicknamed "the Cat " on account of his slenderness. He was present at the Council of *Ephesus with his bishop in 449. He remained faithful to Dioscorus even after he was deposed following the decisions of the Council of *Chalcedon (451) and organized the *monophysite opposition in *Egypt together with *Peter Mongus. When this opposition, upon the death of the pro-Chalcedonian emperor *Marcian (457), incited the murder of *Proterius, Dioscorus's Chalcedonian successor, by means of an enraged mob, Timothy, who had been consecrated bishop shortly before by monophysite proponents, consolidated his power and worked actively in favor of his party. But this activity and his doctrinal position against the decisions reached by the Council of Chalcedon and *Leo of Rome's Tome led the emperor *Leo I to expel him from Alexandria (460) and send him into exile first into Paphlagonia, then to Crimea (near the Ukraine). Only in 475, upon the advent of the promonophysite usurper *Basiliscus, was Timothy recalled. Received with honor at *Constantinople by the emperor, but not by the patriarch *Acacius, he held a promonophysite council at Ephesus and then returned to Alexandria, where he was once again established in his own episcopal see. The subsequent antimonophysite measures taken by the emperor *Zeno were not carried out in time to affect him because he died in 477.

His chief work was an extensive Refutation of the Council of Chalcedon, which has come down to us in a complete Armenian translation, which was then edited at Leipzig in 1908 without the addition of a translation into a modern language. Two other brief works, one against Chalcedon and the other against Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum, have come down to us in a *Syriac translation; the second is unpublished; passages from the first have been edited in PO 13, along with fragments of an Ecclesiastical History. Some of his letters have been published. The Homily on the Rock, composed in *Coptic, is spurious.

Timothy was a proponent of moderate monophysitism, of the type that was subsequently developed by *Severus of Antioch and which was esp. characterized by hostility toward the Council of Chalcedon and Leo's Tomus ad Flavianum, both of which were considered to be Nestorian in tendency. Following in the steps of *Cyril of Alexandria, he maintained that there is only the nature of the incarnate Logos, inasmuch as the humanity assumed by the Logos, void of its own specific *hypostasis and incapable of subsisting in and of itself, cannot be called a nature. This humanity, however, is complete and intact and united to the divine nature without alteration or confusion, so that Christ, by becoming incarnate and by becoming a human being according to the *economy, is consubstantial and akin to other human beings according to the flesh, although he is consubstantial with God according to nature. On the basis of this union, Timothy, as in the case of *Cyril of Alexandria, can affirm that the Logos, although remaining impassible in the divine nature, suffered on the cross thanks to the flesh that he assumed.

CPG 5475-5491; PO 13, 202-236; DCB 4, 1031-1033; F. Nau, Sur la christologie de Timothée Aelure: ROC 14 (1909) 99-103; J. Lebon, La christologie de Timothée Aelure: RHE 9 (1908) 677-702; Id., La christologie du monophysisme syrien, in CGG I, 425ff.; A.B. Schmidt, Die "Refutatio" des Timotheus Aelurus gegen das Konzil von Chalcedon. Ihre Bedeutung für die Bekenntnisentwicklung der armenischen Kirche Persiens im 6. Jahrhundert: Oriens Christianus 73 (1989) 149-165; P. Blaudeau, Timothée Aelure et la direction ecclésiale de l'empire post-chalcédonien: ReByz 54 (1996) 107-133; Patrologia V, 353-356; BBKL XII, 143-145; A. Boud'hors - R. Boutros, L'homélie sur l'Église du Rocher attribuée à Timothée Aelure (PO 49, 1), Turnhout 2001; Ph. Blaudeau, Alexandrie et Constantinople (451–491): de l'histoire à la géo-ecclésiologie, Rome 2006, passim.

M. Simonetti

TIMOTHY IV (III) of Alexandria (517–535). *Monophysite patriarch of *Alexandria, the anti-Chalcedonian successor of Dioscorus II. He was therefore opposed to Leo the Great's Tomus ad Flavianum and the Chalcedonian profession of faith (Evagrius, HE IV,4). As a friend of *Severus of Antioch, he apprehensively perceived that *Julian of Halicarnassus had a growing number of supporters (Liberatus, Breviarium 19). Nevertheless, from the primary sources one gathers that he was an opportunist: at times he favored Severus; at other times, Julian (De Sectis, V,4: PG 86,1232a). He supported the Christianization of *Egypt, appointing a bishop to Philae. Upon his death, a *schism broke out in the monophysite church of Alexandria between his successor *Theodosius and *Gaianus. The following have been preserved from Timothy's works: a complete homily in *Syriac and fragments of other homilies in Greek in *Cosmas Indicopleustes's Topographia.

CPG 7090-7100; Liberatus, Breviarium 19-20: PL 68, 1032-1038; J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923; S.P. Brock, A New Syriac Baptismal Ordo Attributed to Timothy of Alexandria: Muséon 83 (1970) 367-431 (6th-c. Antiochene text); W.H.C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge 1972; PWK 25, 1357-1358; P. Allen, Evagrius Scholasticus: The Church Historian, Leuven 1981, 176; Coptic Encycl. 7, 2268; Patrologia V, 358-359 (see index).

A. Di Berardino

TIMOTHY of Alexandria (5th c.). Archdeacon of *Alexandria in 412, he seems to have been the author of the original Greek text of the Historia monachorum in Aegypto or the Liber de vitis patrum. If this is the case, Timothy would be identified with one of the seven young monks, specifically the deacon, who went to visit the Egyptian monks and drafted in Greek the account of the visitation and the stories heard. *Sozomen attributes the composition of this account to Timothy the bishop of Alexandria (d. 385), but it seems more plausible that this work should be attributed to the archdeacon of the city with the same name. The Latin text of the Historia monachorum, for which *Rufinus is the author (see Ruf., HE 11,4, and Jer., Ep. 133), presents variants that depend both on the personal intervention of Rufinus and on the fact that he could make use of an original text that was different from the one that has survived in the MSS, which allow us to identify three Greek recensions (*see Historia monachorum).

Editions: PL 21, 387-462; E. Preuschen, Palladius und Rufinus, Giessen 1897, 1-131 (Greek text); A.J. Festugière, Historia monachorum in Aegypto, Brussels 1971 (Greek text in critical ed.). Studies: F.X. Murphy, Rufinus of Aquileia, Washington, DC 1945; A.J. Festugière, Le problème littéraire de l'Historia monachorum: Hermes 83 (1955) 257-284; Id., Les moines d'Orient, I, Culture ou sainteté, Paris 1961; Id., Les moines d'Orient, IV, 1: Enquête sur les moines d'Égypte, Paris 1964; BBLK 12, 145-147; P. Devos, Les nombres dans l' "Historia monachorum in Aegypto": AB 92 (1974) 97-108; Inchiesta sui monaci d'Egitto, intr., tr. and notes, ed. M. Paparozzi, Milan 1981; B. Ward, "Signs and Words": Miracles in the Desert Tradition, in E.A. Livingstone (ed.), Studia Patristica XVII/2, Oxford 1982, 539-542; J. Karayannopulos - G. Weiss, Quellenkunde zur Geschichte von Byzanz (324-1453), II, Wiesbaden 1982, 246.

M.G. Bianco

TIMOTHY of Antioch. One of the pseudonyms used by the presbyter *Leontius of Constantinople (6th c.). Timothy is known for having written the Sermo in crucem et in transfigurationem, a Lenten homily on the crucifixion and Transfiguration, attributed in the past to Timothy, a presbyter of *Jerusalem (Capelle) and recently reattributed to the homiletical activity of Leontius of Constantinople (Sachot).

CPG 7406; BHG 434h; PG 86, 256-265; B. Capelle, Les homélies liturgiques du prétendu Timothée de Jérusalem: EphemLiturg 63 (1949) 5-26; M. Sachot, Les homélies de Léonce, prêtre de Constantinople: RSR 51 (1977) 234-254; Id., L'homélie pseudo-chrysostomienne sur la Transfiguration CPG 4724, BHG 1975, Frankfurt a.M.-Bern 1981; C. Datema - P. Allen (eds.), Leontii Presbyteri Constantinopolitani Homiliae, CCG 17, Turnhout-Leuven 1987; Patrologia V, 318-319; S.J. Voicu, Dieci omelie di Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Studi sull'Oriente cristiano 5 (2001) 165-190.

P. Marone

TIMOTHY of Constantinople (6th–7th c.). Timothy is only known by the work that was attributed to him by the MS tradition: De iis qui ad ecclesiam accedunt or De receptione haereticorum, dedicated to the presbyter John. In addition to identifying him as the presbyter of the "Great Church" (Hagia Sophia), several MSS also refer to him as scaevophylax ("treasurer") of the Church of the Mother of God of Chalcopratia at *Constantinople, a title that other codices, however, attribute to the recipient of the short work, namely John.

In the aforementioned work, Timothy primarily distinguishes penitent heretics into three groups (taxeis) who are admitted into the Catholic Church: those who must receive *baptism; those who are anointed with oil; and finally, those who are only asked to renounce their own and all other forms of heresy. Moreover, in the treatment of the first category, he lists and briefly describes 26 heretical sects: from the tascodrugi (or ascitae* or ascodrugitae) to the Melchizedekians, focusing esp. on the *Manicheans. In the second category, however, are placed the following groups: the *Quartodecimans, the *Novatianists, the Sabbatians, the *Arians, the Macedonians or the pneumatomachi and *Apollinarians; last, in the third are placed the followers of *Meletius, the *Nestorians and *Eutyches. There then follows under the title "Brief Account" (Brevis narratio)—with the objective of demonstrating the various branches of the heresy of the *acephali or the *theopaschites—the list of the various *monophysite factions subdivided into two chief denominations: Theodosians (who were in turn divided into *agnoetae, Paulianists [*Paulinians], *tritheists, *Gaianites or Julianites [*aphthartodocetists], *Dioscorians etc.) and the Marcianites (*Messalians, Euchites, enthusiasts and *Eustathians).

The work closes with a brief treatise *On the Schisms of the So-Called Diacrinomeni (Haesitantes), listing the 12 sects of the anti-Chalcedonians, among which are found the various religious factions listed in order of precedence, with special attention to the various nuances of the severitae or the *Severians.

Timothy's work after the Second Council of *Constantinople (553) seems, however, to have been written before the appearance of *monothelitism. "There is no other source better than these pages that allows one to perceive the range of heterodox sects that were operative at the margins and, at times, in the heart of the Byzantine church around the year 600" (J. Pargoire, L'Église byzantine de 527 à 847, Paris [3]1923, 135).

CPG 7016; PG 86, 12-74; Beck 401-402; V. Beneševič, Syntagma XIV titulorum sine scholiis, Pietroburgo 1906, 707-738; J. Meyendorff, Le Christ dans la théologie byzantine, Paris 1969, 163-167; Patrologia V, 105.

D. Stiernon

TIMOTHY of Jerusalem (6th c.). Priest and homilist. It is not clear if he actually existed or if this was merely a pen name. In the MS tradition, he appears as an author of two homilies for the feast of the presentation: the Oratio in Symeonem, which has been preserved for us in *Greek and in a *Georgian version and the In occursum Domini, attested only in Georgian. On the basis of stylistic peculiarities that can be distinguished in the first (a sophisticated vocabulary, formulas characteristic for introducing biblical citations and other oratorical procedures) scholars determined to assign to Timothy of Jerusalem the authorship of four other homilies (Capelle). These are the sermon In Crucem et in Transfigurationem, attributed by the MSS to a "Timothy, priest of Antioch," and three ps.-Athanasian speeches now attributed to *Proclus of Constantinople (In nativitatem Praecursoris; in Elisabeth et in Deiparam; In censum sive descriptionem S. Mariae et in Iosephum; In caecum a nativitate). The first two of these speeches are still considered to be reworkings of *Amphilochius of Iconium's homilies, perhaps this work of Timothy of Jerusalem (Caro). Nevertheless, the diversity of attribution has caused scholars to discuss the author's identity. Recently it was maintained that these texts make up part of a vast homiletic collection that can be traced back to *Leontius of Constantinople; Timothy of Jerusalem would only be a pseudonym used by this person to spread his own work (Sachot). This thesis has not drawn much consensus, but there remain certain doubts on the extent of the corpus and the setting of the homilies, for which an Antiochene context was also proposed. Timothy of Jerusalem has also drawn the attention of theologians for a statement from the Oratio in Symeonem (PG 86, 245 CD), understood by some as the most ancient patristic testimony in favor of the bodily assumption of *Mary. The passage, however, is limited to affirming the immortality of the Virgin "until the present day" and her translation into heaven. B. Capelle has argued that three ps.-Athanasian homilies belong to the same preacher. M. Sachot, who is followed by S.J. Voicu, has demonstrated that the five homilies belong to the presbyter Leontius of Constantinople.

CPG 7405-7410; PG 86, 237-252, 256-265; EC 12, 111; M. Jugie, La mort et l'Assomption de la S. Vierge (ST 114), Vatican City 1944; B. Capelle, Les homélies liturgiques du prétendu Timothée de Jérusalem: EphLit 63 (1949) 5-26; R. Caro, La Homilética Mariana Griega en el Siglo V (Marian Library Studies 3), Dayton, OH 1971; M. Sachot, L'homélie pseudo-chrysostomienne sur la Transfiguration CPG 4724, BHG 1975, Frankfurt a.M.-Bern 1981; Testi mariani del primo millennio, II, ed. G. Gharib, Rome 1988, 43-49; K.-H. Uthemann, Timotheos von Jerusalem, in BBKL 12, 148-150; P. Allen, The Sixth-Century Greek Homily: A Re-Assessment, in The Preacher and the Audience: Studies in Early Christian and Byzantine Homiletics, Leiden 1998, 201-225; Patrologia V, 318-319; S.J. Voicu, Dieci omelie di Leonzio di Costantinopoli: Studi sull'Oriente cristiano 5 (2001) 165-190.

L. Perrone

TIMOTHY SALOFACIOLUS (d. 482). The patriarch of *Alexandria, an adherent to the faith of *Chalcedon; he was elected after the exile of *Timothy Ailouros (460). He was nicknamed "Salofaciolus" (i.e., white turban). Despite his conciliatory spirit, he always had trouble with the *monophysite opposition. He was the recipient of a letter from *Leo the Great (Ep. 171), who exhorted him to combat the *Nestorians and the *Eutychians. He was confined to a Pachomian monastery as soon as Timothy Ailouros, taking advantage of *Basiliscus's attempted usurpation, returned to his episcopal see in 475. The emperor Zeno accepted him on the condition that he accept the Chalcedonians and sign the Henoticon. Upon the death of Timothy Ailouros, the monophysites selected *Peter Mongus, but the emperor Zeno reinstated Salofaciolus. Despite the disturbances caused by Peter Mongus, Timothy ruled until his death in 482. Timothy's character made him well liked by all the Alexandrian people (Liberatus, Brev. 16).

DCB 4, 1033-1034; Fliche-Martin IV, 416; J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, Paris 1923; Coptic Encyclopedia 7, 2268-2269; Ph. Blaudeau, Alexandrie et Constantinople (451-491): de l'histoire à la géo-ecclésiologie, Rome 2006, passim.

E. Prinzivalli

TIPASSA

I. The City - II. Christianity - III. Hagiography - IV. Archaeology.

I. The City. In AD 39 *Caligula brought an end to the Roman protectorate over *Mauretania by assassinating King Juba at *Lyons and then proceeding to annex the ancient kingdom to the Roman Empire. Tipassa at that point became a Roman city; in 46 it became a municipium under Latin law, and around 145 a colony. The primitive city was created on a central promontory, which since antiquity was called "temple hill," where the remains of the forum, the capital, the curia and the judicial basilica are found, along with the lighthouse, from the modern era. During the mid-2nd c., it witnessed considerable growth, as attested by the theater, the amphitheater and the large wall fortification that circles the city between Kudiat Zarur to the E and Ras Knissia to the W, walls that were able to victoriously resist Firmus's siege (371–372). In 373, *Theodosius received there the submission of the Maziri, who had been lured into Firmus's revolt. Conquered by the *Vandals around 430 and demolished by them in 455, the city was reconquered by the *Byzantines, certainly at the same time as Caesarea (Cherchel) (534). After the 6th c., the city continued to experience hardship, as shown by the reuse at a later age of materials from earlier monuments. The city was then abandoned.

II. Christianity. It is the general conviction of scholars that at Tipassa Christians were present during the first three decades of the 3rd c. As evidence for this position, scholars have appealed to the inscription of Rasinia Secunda, AD 238 (CIL 8,20856), and others, all of which were made before the *peace of the church (CIL 8,20891-20894). In any case, it is certain that the community must have organized itself and created an episcopal hierarchy over the course of the 3rd c.: it is in fact the common opinion that the nine iusti priores, whose tombs were organized in the basilica of Alexander, were Alexander's predecessors (CIL 8,20903). We know, thanks to his epitaph, that Alexander himself was the city's bishop and that he built the basilica named for him (CIL 8,20915): it seems that he lived at the end of the 4th to the beginning of the 5th c. With respect to Renatus, whose epitaph was found ca. 1914 (Bulletin Soc. Ant. de France [1928] 121-124), we do not know whether he lived before or after Alexander. He was, however, buried in the basilica that is named after the latter, and he does not appear in the list of the nine iusti priores. As regards Potentius, who is spoken of in a letter written by *Leo the Great (PL 54,646-653), he was the pope's emissary for Mauretania; his status as bishop of the place seems to be apparent only from the inscription that he himself ordered to be placed in the basilica of St. Salsa in memory of the work he had carried out (CIL 8,20914). The last known bishop is Reparatus, who was present at the Conference of *Carthage (484); a note on the margin for the list of bishops who were present states concerning him: prbt (= peribat).

III. Hagiography. Other pieces of information about Tipassa come from literary and hagiographical texts. *Optatus of Milevis (Schism. don. 2,18-19) recounts some of the violent acts carried out against the Catholic population by two bishops who had come from *Numidia, bishops who were supported by the prefect Athenius: "The people of Catholic faith were dispersed with violence and massacred; they were expelled from their homes; men were mistreated; women were dragged away by force; some of the children were slaughtered; some expectant mothers were forced to have abortions." A century later, *Victor of Vita (Hist. pers. Afr. prov. 3,29-30) provides a picture of the persecution unleashed by the Vandals. In place of Reparatus, an *Arian bishop was sent from *Carthage to Tipassa. The large majority of the population set sail and found refuge in *Spain. For those who had remained, because they were unable to set sail, the count who had been sent on this mission by King *Huneric had their right hands and tongues removed: but despite this mutilation, they continued to speak. As a witness to this miracle, the African historian provides an example with a deacon of Tipassa named Reparatus, who had found refuge at *Constantinople and lived at the court of the emperor *Zeno. The Byzantine historians also speak about this event, but only Victor of Vita situates the miracle at Tipassa.

Finally, there exists the Passion of Salsa (BHL 7467). This 14-year-old girl, at a time when Christianity still had few adherents (rara fides), had tossed an idol depicting the protector dragon of the city into the ocean from the collis Templensis. Seen as sacrilegious, she was therefore lynched and flung down the cliff. Her body was miraculously found by some Gallic sailors, who had taken refuge in the port during a storm. They buried her on the cliffs to the E: the episode occurred in a period after the peace of the church.

IV. Archaeology. The burial of St. Salsa brings us to the very rich Christian archaeological heritage of Tipassa, which is found more specifically in the E necropolis of the city. Above Salsa's tomb at first was built a small funerary chapel, but perhaps it was placed in a preexisting chapel belonging to her family; the vestiges of a room for banquets remain and a funerary *mensa. Later, after 371–373, perhaps only around 450, to the side site was built a large basilica, around and within which were placed the tombs of the faithful. This cemetery, because of the organizing work for the basilica, seems to have still been in use in the 6th c. It has been entirely excavated and offers an exhaustive idea of an ancient Christian necropolis. At the N edge of the city, placed against the W wall, a small basilica from the end of the 5th c. was found, consecrated, as revealed by an inscription, to the apostles *Peter and *Paul. From the opposite side of the city, the W necropolis unfolds seamlessly with the Punic and pre-Roman necropolis. One can distinguish in it numerous Christian centers: (1) a large circular mausoleum (20 m [= 65.6 ft]), whose function remains unknown, but which resembles a martyrium; (2) the basilica of Alexander, flanked to the N and the S by two funerary enclosures; (3) the necropolis of Matares, with four enclosures, excavated in 1968–1972, over the course of an archaeological rescue dig. All the cemeteries of Tipassa have in common the following characteristics: funerary mensae for refrigeria*; hydraulic installations for allowing water to reach the mensae and the tombs; and enclosed spaces, of various sizes, intended for families or groups. In the internal NW corner of the city, on the Ras Knissia, the episcopal building stood at the cliff looking over the sea. It included a large basilica with five aisles with a jutting apse supported by two enormous buttresses, which also reinforced the cliff; a baptistery with a squared layout with a round pool; private baths; and, without a doubt, the bishop's dwelling. Nothing remains of the church's liturgical decoration. At the center of the city, the judicial basilica and the courtyard of the new temple were also transformed into a church probably in the 5th c.

PWK 12, 1413-1429; LTK 10, 202-203; DACL 15, 2338-2406; EC 12, 118-122; J. Christern, Basilika und Memoria der hl. Salsa in Tipasa: BAA 3 (1968) 193-257; S. Lancel - M. Bouchenaki, Tipasa de Maurétanie, Alger 1971; M. Bouchenaki, Fouilles de la nécropole occidentale de Tipasa, 1968-72, Alger 1975; H.I. Marrou, Une inscription chrétienne de Tipasa et le refrigerium: AntiAfric. 15 (1979) 261-269; S. Lancel, Tipasa de Maurétanie; histoire et archéologie: I. État des questions des origines préromaines à la fin du III^e siècle: ANRW II, 10,2 (1982) 739-786; M.M. Morciano, Tipasa d'Algeria: un esempio di pianificazione antica: L'Africa romana X/1 (1992) 403-418; S. Ferdi, Augustin: de retour en Afrique 388-430; repères archéologiques dans le patrimoine Algérien, Fribourg 2000; LTK[3] 10, 47-48.

V. Saxer

TÍRECHÁN. A disciple of Bishop Ultán (d. 657) and who in turn became a bishop of the Irish church between 670 and ca. 700, Tírechán is considered to be the author of the Adnotationes on the evangelizing mission of St. Patrick, which was then incorporated into the Book of Armagh (ca. 807), and with reference to the Irish saints who lived between 440 and 665 could have composed the Catalogus Sanctorum Hiberniae.

CPL 1105; J. Gwynn, The Book of Armagh, Dublin 1913, XLV-LXIII, 17-30, 453-454; L. Bieler, Patrician Texts in the Book of Armagh (Scriptores Latini Hiberniae 10), Dublin 1979, 124-162; J.B. Bury, Tírechán's Memoir of St. Patrick: English Historical Review 17 (1902) 235-267 and 700-704; K. Mulchrone, Tírechán and the Tripartite Life: Irish Ecclesiastical Record 79 (1953) 186-193; L. de Paor, The Aggrandisement of Armagh: Historical Studies 8 (1971) 95-110; J. Stevenson, Literacy in Ireland: The Evidence of the Patrick Dossier in the Book of Armagh, in The Uses of Literacy in Early Mediaeval Europe, ed. R. McKitterick, Cambridge 1990, 11-35.

P. Marone

TITULI PSALMORUM. In the Hebrew *Bible, many *psalms have a title, which is oftentimes obscure and which includes various elements—evidence of its belonging to an original collection, musical or liturgical rubrics, and the presumed occasion of composition. The Septuagint added other titles; the *Syriac version presents another series. The patristic commentators willingly turned their attention to these mysterious pieces of information (*Diodore of Tarsus and others, however, rejected their authority): these titles established the exegetical keys for their interpretation. *Gregory of Nyssa dedicated a relatively systematic treatise to them. To these titles that came from the Greek Bible, the Latin Psalters often added directions for Christian prayer, of the Vox Christi type. The Tituli are divided into six series, many of which are very ancient; the first was transmitted with considerable variants, which presuppose a living use. One can draw much data from them for the history of *liturgy and *piety.

All the commentaries on the Psalter; P. Salmon, Les Tituli Psalmorum des manuscrits latin, Rome 1959; W. Bloemendaal, The Headings of the Psalms in the East Syrian Church, Leiden 1960; Grégoire de Nysse, Sur les titres des psaumes (SC 466), ed. J. Reynard, Paris 2002.

J. Gribomont

TITULUS. This term, which belongs to classical and ecclesiastical terminology, has different meanings, which derive from τλάω, tuli ("to carry, to support"): (1) in everyday language, it referred to every particular that allows one to know nature, value, content, use or the owner of an object; (2) in Roman legal language, the titulus is an act that establishes a right or that makes known the reason for a condemnation. The gospel of John (19:19) shows how the Latin term was transferred, with this meaning, into the Greek language. Among the martyrs of *Lyons of 177, Attalus bore around his neck a placard with the words "Attalus the Christian" (Eus., HE 5,1,44). (3) In a book, the titulus is established by the title indicating the author and the content; in legal works, esp. the digests and the decretals, it also served to subdivide the book; (4) in social contexts, it refers to the duties, honors and the deeds of a noble or famous individual or a public personage: the totality of these signs constitutes the titles of the personage—for example, that of the emperors—as the inscriptions reveal; (5) in funerary archaeology, the titulus is identified with the inscription affixed to the place of burial, which identifies the one to whom the monument is assigned and the one by whom it was built. This use was present everywhere, but it was particularly frequent at *Rome and *Trier. The term titulus signifies in the first place the inscription itself (Diehl 1787, 1991, 2138B, 3581, 4742), but it can also refer, by metonymy, to the funerary monument (Diehl 177, 3500, 3574A, 3578, 3592A, 4169A). One can deduce the importance the use of these tituli acquired from the care that was placed in restoring them in cases of vandalism. The famous example of this type of restoration is given from the inscription of M.A.I. Severian of Caesarea (Cherchel) (Diehl 1583); in fact, these not only constitute a titulus of property, but they often also governed the honors to be given to the dead. (6) Finally, in Roman ecclesiastical language the titulus was a parochial church of the city, in which the religious service was attended to by one or more priests. Their origin dates to the time in which ecclesiastical property did not exist according to law, when places of worship were private property, whose name appeared on a table near the entryway. An inscription dated to 377 attests to the most ancient titulus we know of: Cinammius Opas lector tituli Fasciole (Diehl 1269). The Roman synods of 499 and 595 allow one to establish the list and the topographical repartition of the tituli for the 5th and the 6th c.; between these two dates, the tituli change names, assuming that of the saint; it often occurred that the early titulary was considered such. It is likely that the tituli were instituted in the 3rd c., but we are unable to identify with certainty those that date to that era.

LTK[3] 10, 54-56; LMA 8, 811-816; J.P. Kirsch, Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, Paderborn 1918; F. Lanzoni, I titoli presbiteriali di Roma antica nella storia e nella leggenda: RivAC 2 (1925) 195-257; R. Vielliard, Recherches sur les origines de la Rome chrétienne, Rome [2]1959, 19-55; J.F. Baldovin, The Urban Character of Christian Worship, Rome 1987, 105-118; F. Guidobaldi, L'inserimento delle Chiese Titolari di Roma nel tessuto urbano preesistente: Quaeritur, inventus colitur 1, Vatican City 1989, 381-396; V. Saxer, L'utilisation par la liturgie de l'espace urbain et suburbain. L'exemple de Rome dans l'Antiquité et le Haut Moyen Âge, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrétienne 2, Vatican City 1989, 917-1033; M. Jost, Die Patrozinien der Kirchen Roms während des ersten Jahrtausends: Hagiographica 8 (2001) 1-34; Christiana Loca 1, Rome 2000, 123-129; 2, Rome 2001, 186-203.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

TITUS. Coworker with the apostle *Paul, mentioned in the Pauline epistles (2 Cor 2:13; 8:6, 16, 23 and Gal 2:1-3). One of the Pastoral Epistles was sent to him (Tit). He is also mentioned in 2 Tim (4:10). Ecclesiastical tradition makes reference to Tit 1:5. *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 3,4,5) listed him among the bishops of *Crete. The following writers do the same: *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (PG 82,804C), *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. 20) and the Apostolic Constitutions* (VII,46,8). The Chronicon Paschale* goes so far as to identify him with one of the 72 disciples mentioned in Lk 10:1.

Titus does not appear in the Acts of the Apostles, but appears in those of the apocrypha. According to the Acts of Paul and Thecla 2-3, Onesiphorus recognized Paul in Iconium thanks to the "famous" description that Titus had made of him. In the account of the Martyr. Pauli 1, Luke, having come from

*Gaul, and Titus, from *Dalmatia (see 2 Tim 4:10), waited for Paul at *Rome. In ch. 6 (a section of the Acta Pauli), Titus administers the sacrament of baptism with *Luke, near the tomb of the apostle, to the prefect and the centurion whom Paul had evangelized while in prison. The Acta Titi, written in Greek, certainly used the Acta Pauli. The Epistle of Titus, a disciple of Paul, a text devoted to the state of chastity, has a concrete ascetic objective: the praise of the chaste life. The author makes extensive use of every type of apocryphal text, esp. the apocryphal acts and some apocalypses, and was inspired by earlier ascetical writings from ps.-Cyprian to the writings of *Jerome, ps.-Jerome and *Bachiarius. The recipients of this letter are the ascetics of each gender, who lived in celibacy but with a few deviations, among which was "spiritual marriage." For this phenomenon, one needs to search for his readers in the context of the *Priscillianist movement in the 5th-c. Hispanic ascetic circles.

As in the case of *Timothy, the Fathers addressed the problem of Titus's possible circumcision. The majority of commentators understood Gal 2:3 in the sense that Titus was uncircumcised, although *Jerome, *Pelagius and *Augustine followed *Irenaeus and *Tertullian in regarding him as circumcised.

Erbetta 3, 93-110; BS 12, 503-505; F. Halkin, La légende crétoise de saint Tite: AB 79 (1961) 241-246, A. de Santos Otero, Der Pseudo-Titus-Brief: Schneemelcher, II, Tübingen [5]1989, 50-70.

R. TREVIJANO

TITUS (apocryphal). There exists a letter of St. *Paul to Titus for which we have some patristic commentaries: in Greek the following are complete: *John Chrysostom (plus one homily), *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Theodoret of Cyrrhus and ps.-John of Damascus; fragmentary commentaries in Greek are found in *Origen, *Severian of Gabala and *Oecumenius (CPG, 5, index, p. 146); and in Latin we have *Jerome's commentary (CPL, index, p. 777). *Andrew of Crete wrote a *panegyric to Titus. In the literary corpus of ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, we find a letter to Titus (IX). According to *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 3,4,6), Titus was a bishop of Crete; according to *Jerome (Ad Titum) and ps.-Isidore (De vita et obitu Patrum 85), Titus remained a virgin until his death, and this is the likely reason for the attribution of the Epistle of Titus to him (Epistula Titi, discipuli Pauli de dispositione sanctimonii), a 5th-c. homily; the Latin text, written in a rather unusual language, is probably the original; the author speaks with enthusiasm about chastity and virginity: he addresses the virgines et spadones and condemns the abuses connected to the virgines subintroductae; he often cites Sacred *Scripture and the apocrypha. According to the Acts of Paul, Titus preached in *Dalmatia (14,1), according to ps.-Linus, he converted three soldiers, with *Luke's assistance (Mart. Pauli 19). There exists a Cretan legend (6th–10th c.), attributed to Zena (see Tit 3:13), recommended by St. Paul to Titus. According to this account, Titus was a Cretan in origin, a descendant of Mino and an individual who personally knew *Jesus; he was present with the 120 disciples during the descent of the *Holy Spirit and consecrated eight bishops of Crete; Titus had a sister, Euphemia, a virgin. Ps.-Dionysius the Areopagite wrote two letters to Titus on the death of Sts. *Peter and Paul and on *Mary's Transitus.

CANT 298; BHG 1850z-1852; BHL, 1202; BHO 1233 (Armenian passio); BS 12, 503-505; LCIK 8, 496; Lipsius 2, 2, 401-406; Vita: F. Halkin: ABol 79 (1961) 241-256 (2 recensions) = F. Halkin, Études d'épigraphie et d'hagiographie byzantine, London 1973, IX; R.I. Pervo, The Acts of Titus, a Preliminary Translation, Society of Biblical Literature 1996, Seminary Papers 455-482; M.R. James, The Acts of Titus and the Acts of Paul: JTS 6 (1905) 549-556; F.X. Plötzl, Die Mitarbeiter des Weltapostels Paulus, Regensburg 1911, 103-125. Lettera di Tito: CANT 307; PLS 2, 1960, 1522-1542.

Translations: Eng.: A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 53-74; It.: Erbetta 3, 93-103; Moraldi 3, 115-146; Pol.: Starowieyski, 3, 65-95, 358; Ger.: A. de Santos Otero, in Schneemelcher 2, 50-70. G. Sfameni Gasparro, ANRW 2, 25, 6, 1988, 4551-4664; G. Sfameni Gasparro, L'Epistula Titi e la tradizione dell'enkrateia, in Id., Agostino, tra etica e religione, Brescia 1999, 191-304.

M. STAROWIEYSKI

TITUS, emperor (AD 39–81). Titus Flavius Vespasian, Roman emperor from 79 to 81, son of *Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, as a general in service of his father, he finished the Jewish war with the conquest of *Jerusalem (70). Upon the death of Vespasian (79), he succeeded him, developing his politics of firm agreement with the Senate. His attentive interventions in Campania after the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius and at *Rome after a plague and a destructive fire in the year 80, along with cautious action for the improvement of the administration of justice, earned for him the epithet of amor et deliciae generis humani. He died of a fever in 81 at Sabina.

In the Flavian court, there were no expressions of anti-Christian sentiment. According to *Sulpicius Severus (Chron. II,30), however, Titus thought of eliminating Judaism and Christianity with the destruction of the temple of Jerusalem: but it is very difficult to substantiate this claim.

S.G.F. Brandon, The Fall of Jerusalem and the Christian Church, London 1951; H. Montefiore, Sulpicius Severus and Titus' Council of War: Historia 11 (1962) 156ff.; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; P. Jacques - J. Sheid, Roma e il suo impero, It. trans. Rome-Bari 1992; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001.

L. Navarra

TITUS of Bostra (d. ca. 378). A letter from the emperor *Julian (Ep. 52), dated to 1 August 362, sent to the population of *Bostra, the capital of the province of *Arabia, invites its citizens to expel from their city the bishop Titus, who—the emperor says—accused them of being rebellious and of not having reached excesses only because they were held back by the bishop and the clerics. This leads one to suspect that there were troubles and disturbances in the city of Bostra and appeals from the bishop to the emperor in support of that populace. In 363 Titus was among the signatories of the document that the synod of Antioch, which was convoked by *Meletius after *Jovian became emperor in an attempt to reconstruct a *Neonicene unity, drew up and sent to the emperor (Socr., HE III, 25). According to *Jerome, Titus died under the emperor *Valens, that is, before 378 (De vir. ill. 102).

Titus wrote a work in four books *Against the Manicheans after the death of Julian (26 June 363), to whom he makes allusion. This text survives complete only in the *Syriac version. From the original Greek there remain two books and one part of the third (chs. 1-29). Some fragments in Arabic have also been preserved. Only one fragment of a Commentary on Luke remains, through which one perceives that it was a series of homilies (Sickenberger, 140-245). Some fragments of this commentary are found in a *Coptic *catena on the gospels, and a fragment in an Arabic catena. Some fragments on Daniel could belong to the same commentary on Luke or to a homily (Sickenberger, 130-134, 246-248). The Syriac Florilegium Edessenum anonymum preserves four fragments of a sermon On Epiphany.

An Oratio in ramos palmarum (PG 18,1264-1277) has not been considered authentic, for which there exists a shorter *Georgian version of the Greek text, which has perhaps been interpolated. Considered equally spurious is a commentary on Lk 18:2 (the iniquitous judge and the insistent widow), a *cento derived from the commentaries of *Cyril of Alexandria, *John Chrysostom and *Isidore of Pelusium (Sickenberger, 137).

CPG II, 3575-3581 Suppl. 194-195; PG 18; PWK 25, 6, 1586-1591; DTC 15, 1143-1144; P. de Lagarde, Titi Bostreni contra Manichaeos libri IV syriace, Berlin 1859, ²1924; P. de Lagarde, Titi Bostreni quae ex opere contra Manichaeos edito in codice Hamburgensi seruata sunt graece, Berlin 1859; P. Nagel, Neues griechisches Material zu Titus von Bostra, in Studia Byzantina, Folge II, Berlin 1973, 285-350; J. Sickenberger, Titus von Bostra, Studien zu dessen Lukashomilien (TU 21,1), Leipzig 1901; I. Rucker, Florilegium Edessenum anonymum: Sitzungsberichte Bayer. Akad. der Wiss. 5 (1933) 82-87; W.W. Klein, Die Argumentation in den griechisch-christlichen Antimanichaica, Wiesbaden 1991; BBKL 12, 243-245.

E. Cavalcanti

TOBIT

I. In the Writings of the Fathers - II. Iconography.

I. In the Writings of the Fathers. The sapiential OT book of Tobit (in the Septuagint Τωβιτ, Τωβιθ = "Yahweh is good"), which relates the story of the two Tobits, the elder (Tobit) and the younger (Tobias), was considered inspired, canonical by the fathers of the church, although it was uncertain whether it was originally written in Hebrew. It is not included in the Hebrew canon, and it is regarded as apocryphal by Protestants. *Jerome writes that the book of Tobit, although not included in the (Hebrew) canon, is used by Christian authors, and for this reason he also cites it (Com. in Jonam, prol.: PL 25,1119). In fact, at the request of *Chromatius of Aquileia and *Heliodorus, he decided to translate the work into Latin. Now, the writings of the Fathers attest rather early to the popularity of this book in the Christian milieu: the letter of *Polycarp to the Philippians cites a passage from it (Tob 4:10 = Phil. 10,2); it is also mentioned by *Hermas (Praec. V,11,3). Tobit, who lived in the eastern diaspora, was a hero of fidelity to the law of God and the love of neighbor, the one who jeopardized his own life in order to fulfill divine precepts. Christians saw in Tobit the actualization of piety and charity, that is, the example of the virtues characteristic of true Christians: In this way, Tobit became the prototype of the Christian. Tobit's patience, who had become blind, assumed great importance for the Fathers. *Pontius compared St. *Cyprian to Tobit because of his magnanimity even toward the pagans during the plague at *Carthage (Vita Cypr. 10). Cyprian himself oftentimes made allusion to the book of Tobit (Test. ad Quir. III,1 and 6) or to the figure of Tobit, who after many righteous works and wonderful actions of mercy was put to the test with the loss of his vision (De bono pat. 18). Tobit served as an example of endurance, faith and strength in temptation (Liber de mort. 10: PL 4, 610); he was an example of someone always in prayer and practicing acts of righteousness, to which the angel

Raphael was also a witness (De orat. 33). Parents should behave like Tobit in the education of their children (De opere 20: PL 4,640). *Clement of Alexandria emphasized Tobit's continual fasting (Strom. VI,102) and the marriage of the young Tobias with Sarah, which occurred through the advice of the angel *Gabriel (Strom. I,123); Tobit therefore came to be considered the symbol of the soul guided by a guardian angel. Tobit's journey toward Ecbatana reflects the journey toward beatitude, toward God. *Optatus of Milevis (De schim. 3,2,1) connected to the sacrament of *baptism the fish caught in the Tigris River (Christ), with whose inner parts Tobit healed Sarah, a symbol of the church (Tob 6:2-9; 8:2ff.). This theme was adopted by *Quodvultdeus, who saw in the fish the symbol of the great Fish (Christ), who through the effect of his passion heals one from physical maladies but esp. from sin when there is repentance (Liber de prom. 2,90: SC 102,493), and Tobit prophesied Christ (Liber de prom., 2,89: SC 102,493). *Ambrose delivered two speeches on the book of Tobit (De Tobia), in which he lauded Tobit as "a righteous, hospitable and merciful man," a symbol of patience in enduring some difficulties, but esp. godly for devoting himself to the burial of the dead and generous in loaning money. Tobias mostly appears in the catacomb frescoes with fish, although—according to St. *Paulinus of Nola—the elder Tobit appears in the depiction in the atrium of the basilica of Nola (Carm. XXVII,25).

LTK[3] 10, 63-65; EC 12, 176-180; LCI 4, 320-326; J. Gamberoni, Die Auslegung des Buches Tobias in der griechischlateinischen Kirche der Antike und der Christenheit des Westens bis 1680, Mainz 1969; F. Vattioni, Studi e note sul libro di Tobia: Augustinianum 10 (1970) 241-284; F. Vattioni, Tobia nello Speculum e nella Bibbia di Alcalá: Augustinianum 15 (1975) 169-200 (bibl.); J. Doignon, Tobie et le poisson dans la littérature et l'iconographie occidentale (III[e]-V[e] siècle): RHR 190 (1976) 113-126; J. Doignon, "Un bâton de vieillesse," à propos de "Tobit" 5,23 et 10,4 ("Vulgate"): RHPhR 71 (1991) 33-37; TRE 33 (2002) 573-579; V.T.M. Skemp, The Vulgate of Tobit Compared with Other Ancient Witnesses, Atlanta 2000.

L. Vanyó - A. Di Berardino

II. Iconography. The Fathers often spoke of Tobit as a figure of the righteous person who suffers but is rewarded after misfortune. Polycarp and Hermas were the first to make reference to the book of Tobit (SC 10,188; 53,166). The figure of Tobit is connected to the symbol of the soul of the deceased person whom God protects by means of his angels from the attacks of the enemy on the journey toward eternity. His figure, however, was very rarely depicted in early Christian art. The most ancient representation of Tobit with the fish is found in cubicle III of Domitilla (Wp 135), from the mid-3rd c.; then follow those from the hypogeum of the Via Yser (Wp 164,2), the catacomb of Vigna Massimo (of the Jordani), where the angel appears, and on the Via Dino Compagni (Ferrua, Via Latina, XVIII) between 320 and 360. Tobit's encounter with the angel is also found in the so-called *sarcophagus of *Balaam, in the Museum of S. Sebastiano, from the 1st half of the 4th c. (Rep. 176), which, moreover, constitutes a unicum in the area of plastic art: here Tobit emerges from the water clothed in a colobium and with a petasos on his head. The scene refers to Tob 6:9. One should mention, last, the cover of the sarcophagus of the Mas-d'Aire (Ws 65,5), which shows Tobit in the act of removing the inner parts of the fish. The sarcophagus is dated to the 3rd c.

DACL 15, 2418-2420; EC 12, 180; LCI 4, 320-326; L. de Bruyne, Sarcofago cristiano con nuovi temi iconografici scoperto a S. Sebastiano sulla via Appia: RivAC 16 (1939) 262-263, fig. 7; U.M. Fasola, Le recenti scoperte nelle catacombe sotto Villa Savoia. Il coemeterium Jordanorum ad Alexandrum, in Actas VIII Congr. Int. Arq. Cristiana, Vatican City-Barcelona 1972, 263ff.; TIP 287-288.

A.M. Di Nino

TOLEDO

I. Christianity - II. Councils.

I. Christianity. Ancient Toletum was situated in Hispania Citerior and, after the division decreed by *Diocletian, it was transferred to the *Carthaginensis province. After having undergone the invasion of the Alans (411–418), it came under *Gothic rule. King Athanagild (551–568) chose it as his court residence, and with *Leovigild (568–586) it became the capital of the *Visigothic kingdom. With the conversion of *Recared and his entire people, which was announced in the III Council of Toledo (589), the city became the official see of all national, civil and ecclesiastical politics in the kingdom. When it fell under Muslim rule (712) and the capital was transferred to Cordoba, Toledo lost its political importance. Christianity must have arrived there relatively late, given the scarce importance of the city during the early centuries of the church's presence in Spain; nevertheless, it was found on the road that went from Saragossa (Caesaraugusta) to *Mérida (Emerita). The first document on this matter we find is in the acts of the Council of *Elvira (ca. 303), where Melantius signs as bishop of Toledo. Less reliable is the information about St. Leocadia, a martyr under Diocletian, and the data on St. Eugenius, the city's presumed 1st-c. bishop. During the *Priscillianist crisis, perhaps because of its location at the center of the territory, Toledo was the see of a council against this heretical sect (ca. 400), earning in this way prestige to the detriment of Cordoba, the civil metropolis; and already in the II Council of Toledo (527) its bishop *Montanus (522–531) appears as the metropolitan, and he is entrusted with the duty of organizing a future council. Two of Montanus's letters show him cognizant of his role as a metropolitan, although perhaps he regarded himself as such only for a part of the province—that is, for the region of Celtiberia and for Carpetania—as we might also infer from the signature of Bishop Euphemius at the III Council of Toledo (589). In any case, a synod of bishops from the province, upon the suggestion of King Gunderic, officially recognized Toledo as a metropolitan see of the Carthaginian province (610). Two factors converged on all this: Toledo was already a royal city, and Cartagena (Carthago Nova) had fallen under *Byzantine rule. In the VII Council of Toledo (646) the order was given that all the suffragan bishops spend a month each year with the metropolitan in order to establish a sort of permanent synod. The XII council (681), formally recognized the right of the metropolitan to consecrate all the bishops of the kingdom elected with the concurrence of the monarch. In this manner, Toledo reached the height of its prestige, a prestige that had been earned during the 7th c., thanks esp. to the work of its great bishops: *Eugenius (646–657), *Ildefonsus (657–667) and *Julian (680–690), men of great civil and religious authority and, additionally, cultured individuals who greatly contributed to the cultural splendor of the Visigothic church in that century, in which even the monarchs were cultured men. Even the monasteries, and in particular that of the Agali, contributed to this splendor, preparing future bishops and producing culture. Enormously important, then, was the fact that Toledo was inexorably connected to the vast series of provincial and national councils that constructed the symbiosis between church and state that characterized the entire Visigothic period.

Bishops: Melantius (ca. 303), Patrunus, Turibius, Quintus, Vincentius, Paulatus, Natalis, *Audentius (the entire 4th c.), Asturius (395–412), Isitius, Martin, Castinus, Campeius, Sintitius, Praumatus, Peter (entire 5th c.), Celsus, *Montanus (522–531), Julian, Bacaudas, Peter II, Euphemius (589), Exuperius, Adelphius, Conantius (these last two perhaps in a reversed order), *Aurasius (603–615), Eladius (615–633), *Justus (633–636), Eugenius (636–646), St. Eugenius II (646–13 November 657), St. Ildefonsus (657–23 January 667), Quiricus (667–680), St. Julian (680–6 March 690), *Sisibert (690–2 May 693), Felix (2 May 694–ca. 700), Guntheric (ca. 700–710), Sintheredus (d. 711), Urban, Sinieredus, Concordius and Cisila (745–754).

ES 5 and 6; D. Mansilla Reoyo, Geografía Ec de España I, Rome 1994, 149-152; 309-322; 346-355; J.F. Rivera, Encumbramiento de la sede toledana durante la dominación visigoda: Hispania Sacra 8 (1955) 1-32; J.F. Rivera, Los arzobispos de Toledo. Desde sus orígenes hasta fines del siglo XI, Toledo 1973; DHEE 4, 2264ff.

II. Councils. I Toledo (400, national). The date, although debated, should likely be considered authentic. 19 bishops were present, whose residences are not known, with the exception of that of Patrunus (probably *Mérida), that of Asturius (Toledo) and Lampius (*Barcelona). Most of its 20 disciplinary canons pertain to the life of the clergy and, in particular, the recruitment and ordination of clerics, to face the consequences of *Priscillianism. Pope *Innocent I sent a letter to those present (Ep. III: PL 20,486-493). In the *acts there appears a profession of faith, without a doubt later than the council, against all heretics and esp. against *Priscillianists.

447. The possible existence of this council, whose location is conventional, is derived from a letter sent by Pope *Leo the Great to the bishops of the Spanish provinces (*Baetica is not mentioned) to celebrate the general council. Currently there is no convincing evidence of the celebration of this council. With respect to the celebration of a provincial council in *Gallaecia (the same pope suggested this possibility), we only have circumstantial evidence.

II Toledo (531, provincial). Presided over by the bishop of Toledo *Montanus. 4 suffragan bishops and 1 in exile, Marcianus, signed the acts. At a later time, Bishops Nebridius and *Justus (respectively from Terrassa and Urgel) provided their signatures. The first 4 canons pertain to clerics, the 5th to consanguineous marriage. In certain MSS, one also finds added to the acts Montanus's two letters to the people of Palencia and their bishop Turibius. (In 580 an *Arian synod was convoked by Leovigild, to promote the religious unity of *Spain under the Arian faith.)

With the III Council of Toledo there began a series of Hispano-Visigothic Toledan councils, institutionalized in the IV Council of Toledo (633), some general from the entire kingdom and others provincial. These councils appear with particularly uniform characteristics, among which appear: (1) the sovereign's participation (who calls them, sets forth the themes to be treated by means of a royal tomus and confirms their canons, which by this means acquire the character of civil law); (2) the presence, starting from the 8th c., of *abbots and laymen, generally nobles, who at times also sign the acts, who appear as a manifestation of the courts of the kingdom; (3) the simultaneous treatment of civil and ecclesiastical questions; (4) their irregular celebration, which was determined by various ecclesial and political circumstances; (5) the different ordo of celebration, whether general or provincial, an ordo elaborated in its essential forms beginning from the fourth canon of the IV Council of Toledo and modified repeatedly with the passing of time.

III Toledo (589, general). This council was convoked by *Recared and presided over by Leander, who was also perhaps its promoter, for celebrating the Visigothic people's conversion to Catholicism. Present at this council were 61 (or 63) bishops (8 or 9 converted Arians) and 6 delegates, belonging to the entire Visigothic kingdom: Spain and Narbonese, France. After the king and queen had renounced Arianism and had professed their adherence to the Catholic faith, according to the style of the first 4 ecumenical councils, the Arian bishops did the same thing, and immediately after the presbyters, deacons and nobles. The second part of the council attended to themes proposed by the king. 23 disciplinary canons were promulgated, which brought the following innovations: bestowing the force of law to papal letters (can. 1); the singing of the creed in the religious solemnities (can. 2); the participation of judges and tax collectors at the councils, in order to be instructed by the bishops (can. 18); etc. Numerous canons treated matters connected to the life and discipline of the clergy and the patrimony of the church. A royal decree confirmed all the canons of this council, giving them the force of civil law. The closing homily was delivered by Leander. This council symbolized the political and religious unity of Spain and the beginning of the close collaboration between church and state, a phenomenon typical of that kingdom.

597, interprovincial. Three metropolitans were in attendance (*Mérida, *Narbonne and Toledo) and 12 bishops from different provinces. Its 2 canons treat the topic of priestly chastity and the administration of the churches. It is not included within formal series of Toledan councils.

610, provincial. 15 bishops signed and confirmed *Gundemar's decree proclaiming Toledo as the metropolitan see of the entire province of *Carthaginensis.

IV Toledo (633, general). Presided over by St. *Isidore. 6 metropolitans of the kingdom were present, and 56 bishops and 7 representatives of other bishops. It is the most important of all the Toledan councils for its decisions contained in its 75 canons, the first of which merits special attention (profession of faith with an extensive exposition of the doctrine of the Trinity and the filioque); the second (unification of the kingdom in the context of the liturgical celebrations and the rights); the third (institutionalization of the general councils): can. 75, essentially political in nature, was considered to be a foundational law for the Visigothic-Catholic monarchy (an element of connection between the two great social forces: the Gothic aristocracy and the episcopate).

V Toledo (636, general). *Eugenius of Toledo presided over this council. The majority of the 22 bishops present belonged to the province of Carthaginensis. The fact that 7 of its 9 canons speak of the king and his family, esp. of the succession, reveals King Chintila's purely political intent in convoking it.

VI Toledo (638, general). Selva, metropolitan of Narbonensis, signed first; after him, 48 bishops gave their signature (5 metropolitans) and 5 delegates. 19 canons pertaining primarily to politics (referring to the royal succession and its protection) and church matters were promulgated, with a majority of the latter. Can. 3 is of special interest because of its severity shown toward the Jews.

VII Toledo (646, general). Orontius, metropolitan of Mérida, presided over 30 bishops (four metropolitans) and 11 representatives. This council promulgated six canons on ecclesiastical discipline. Can. 6 instituted a type of permanent synod in Toledo, whose authority grew. The political importance of this council appears in can. 1, which threatened severe penalties against rebels and traitors.

VIII Toledo (653, general). Orontius of Mérida presided over it. 51 bishops signed (4 metropolitans), 8 episcopal vicars, 12 abbots (for the first time) and some noblemen, who for the first time signed the acts. 12 rather long canons were issued in response to the royal tomus.

IX Toledo (655, provincial). *Eugenius of Toledo presided over this council. 13 suffragan bishops of the province of Carthaginensis, 2 bishops from the province of *Tarraconensis, 1 episcopal vicar, 6 abbots, 2 Toledan clerics and 4 nobles signed the acts. 17 canons speak of the administration of ecclesiastical goods.

X Toledo (656, general). Eugenius of Toledo presided over this council. 16 other bishops (2 metropolitans) and 5 representatives were present. The representatives of the abbots and the noblemen, unlike the case of the two preceding councils, did not sign the acts. It promulgated 7 canons on ecclesiastical discipline. It was the first council to decide that throughout the kingdom the solemnity of the Mother of God would be celebrated on 18 December. It deposed Potamius of Braga, who had been accused of fornication, and replaced him with *Fructuosus of Dumium; it also annulled the will of Recimir of Dumium, to the detriment of the church.

XI Toledo (675, provincial). Quiricus presided over this council. 16 bishops, 2 deacons representing their own bishops and 8 abbots were present. It promulgated 16 canons on ecclesiastical discipline. The creed promulgated on this occasion remained famous, something which turns out to be the most important act sanctioned in a Toledan council.

XII Toledo (681, general). Julian of Seville presided over this council; the following officials were present: 35 bishops (4 metropolitans) and 3 delegates; 4 abbots and 16 noblemen also signed its acts. It was convoked by Ervigius in order to legalize his ascent to the throne after the bizarre deposition of Wamba. The council supported the king's wishes. Of its 13 canons, can. 9 is important because it confirms the monarch's anti-Jewish legislation and, esp., can. 6, in which the metropolitan of Toledo is granted the right to consecrate all the bishops of the kingdom. In this way, Toledo acquired the primacy over all the episcopal sees.

XIII Toledo (683, provincial). Julian of Toledo presided over this council. Among the signatories were 47 other bishops (4 metropolitans), 26 vicars of the same number of bishops, 8 abbots, 1 primicerius and 26 nobles. It promulgated 13 canons, 6 of which pertain to political life and the others to ecclesiastical life.

XIV Toledo (684, provincial). Julian of Toledo presided over this council. Among those present were 17 bishops and 2 vicars of other bishops. The following officials, moreover, signed the acts: 5 abbots, 1 archpriest and 8 delegates of other metropolitan cities in the kingdom. This council was celebrated in place of the general council requested by Pope Leo II, who was unable to convoke it. At this council, fulfilling the pope's desire, the acts of the III Council of Constantinople were confirmed, as well as the Apologeticum, which Julian sent to the pope. The decisions were collected in 12 canons.

XV Toledo (688, general). Julian of Toledo presided over this council. 60 bishops (5 metropolitans) and 5 delegates took part in the meetings. 8 abbots, 3 ecclesiastical officials and 17 nobles also signed the acts. Having addressed other political questions of that time, the council examined Julian's Apologeticum, in which Benedict II had found troublesome expressions. In the acts, which exhibit a certain animosity toward *Rome, the council confirmed its complete orthodoxy.

XVI Toledo (693, general). This council was presided over by Felix the bishop of *Seville, the first administrator of the Toledan see, appointed in order to replace *Sisbert of Toledo, who had been deposed because he was accused of a conspiracy. The following individuals were present: 58 bishops (5 metropolitans), 5 abbots, 3 delegates and 16 noblemen. It composed a creed and promulgated 11 canons pertaining to religious and civic matters, along the lines of what had been outline in the royal tomus, including the Jewish question.

XVII Toledo (694, general). The number of participants at this council remains unknown, but a majority of the kingdom's bishops took part. It promulgated 8 canons, 6 of which were on ecclesiastical discipline and the last 2 on the necessity of protecting the royal family, with the ensuing condemnation of the Jews, who according to the king were conspirators against the monarchy.

XVIII Toledo (probably from 703). We only know that there were 50 participants. One can conclude that it was a general council. This is the last Toledan council for which we have information, but perhaps it was not the last to be held in that city.

Palazzini 5, 317-328; R. d'Abadal, Els concils de Toledo: Dels visigots als catalans, Barcelona 1968; J. Vives, Concilios 19-33 (I); 42-52 (II); 107-145 (III); 186-324 (IV-X); 344-369 (XI); 380-474 (XII-XV); 482-537 (XVI-XVII); Martínez Díez, Hispana IV, 323-366 (I-II); V (III-X); Orlandís, Concilios, 80-97 (I); 114-120 (II); 197-226 (III); 261-368 (IV-X); 382-384 (XI); 402-465 (XII-XV); 478-507 (XVI-XVIII); El concilio III de Toledo. XIV Centenario (589-1989), Toledo 1991 (Actas del Congreso conmemorativo); A. Weckwerth, Das erste Konzil von Toledo, Münster 2004.

P. de Luis

TOMI or TOMIS (Constanţa, Romania). Tomi emerged as a colony of Miletus, on the shore of the Black Sea, in what is now Dobrudja, capital of the respective province and see of the bishop of *Scythia Minor. Thanks to the contacts with the already Christianized centers of the Aegean, it received Christianity from the very earliest centuries. The martyrologies record for Tomi the greatest number of Christian martyrs of Scythia Minor (more than 60), almost all from the persecution of *Diocletian from the years 303–304. A fragmentary epigraph in Greek mentions a "martyr and bishop," probably from the persecution of *Licinius between 320 and 323, whose name has remained unknown. Starting from the 4th c., the bishops of Tomi seem to have been passionate defenders of orthodoxy, and they rigorously preserved relations with the leading centers of the Christian world.

During the years 368–369, Bishop Bretanius (Betranius) enthusiastically opposed the emperor *Valens, who, when passing through Tomi, attempted to impose the *Arian heresy on it. The Christian community must have grown after 312 given the existence of an important Christian necropolis, which confirms the presence of Christianity for a very long period of time previous.

Although the superimposition of the modern city of Constanţa over the ancient city has impeded systematic archaeological digs, various incidental discoveries and several investigations undertaken for safeguarding the site have brought to light more early Christian monuments than in any other center of Scythia Minor. Among the most important monuments are the nearly 50 epigraphs in Greek that provide valuable pieces of information on the ecclesiastical organization and the life of the Christian community during the 4th–6th c. A cornelian gem, now in the British Museum, on which was inscribed the image of Christ on the cross, flanked by the 12 apostles with the word ΙΧΘΥΣ written above, was erroneously dated to the 2nd and 3rd c.; such a dating, however, is opposed by the fact that the image of Christ on the cross was an iconographic theme avoided by the Christians until the 4th–5th c. A block of limestone in the shape of a table with two solid legs and the upper surface decorated with a relief border, bearing on the front surface a Greek epigraph with the name of "blessed Timothy," perhaps the bishop of the same name who participated at the Third Ecumenical Council of *Ephesus (431). A large and well-known silver-gilt paten, now housed in the State Hermitage Museum at St. Petersburg, bears a Latin epigraph with the name of the bishop Paternus (491–520). An inscription in Latin is the only text from Scythia Minor that makes mention of a priest (presbyter); another mentions a subdeacon (ὑποδιάκονος); a third, a "lector of the whole universal church," although a fourth an "administrator [πραγματευτής] of the church of St. John." Other funerary epigraphs bear the names of some superior civil officers or simple foot soldiers; in certain instances the ethnic origin or the place of birth of the deceased person is indicated, although on others biblical or liturgical texts are cited.

Early Christian places of worship of the city of Tomi, razed to the ground, at times even to their foundations, were identified and brought to light after 1960, following a vast urbanizing and building program called for by the city of Constanţa. Meager remains of two basilicas—including one (probably the city's 5th-6th-c. cathedral) almost 50 m (164 ft) long—were discovered in the W sector of the ancient city. Two others were discovered in the area of the port and two others, still unpublished, near the point of the peninsula of Tomi. Noteworthy is the fact that five of the six basilicas discovered have crypts for relics under the altar, among which the Great Basilica of the W sector of the city is considered the largest cruciform structure for early Christian worship. Recently on the Karl Marx Road a building shaped on the model of the basilica was discovered, which had been damaged by the excavations, whose crypt has been studied. It is odd, however, that even until now traces of the baptistery have not been found in the perimeter of the bishop of Tomi's residence. For the pictorial decoration of the basilicas, one should note the preservation of fragments from a fresco in a geometric and floral shape preserved on the walls and on the vaulted ceiling of the crypt of the basilica identified under Constanţa's Lyceum no. 2 at the upper end of the ancient port. Although belonging to worship buildings, one should recall the two floor mosaics that offer an image of this type of flooring at Tomi between the 5th and the 6th c. The numerous pieces of architectural sculpture, esp. the capitals, provide scholars an attestation to the activity of the local workshops; likewise rich are the imported furnishings as well as native ones, including metal, glass and esp. ceramic objects.

Em. Popescu, Inscripţiile greceşti şi latine din secolele IV-XIII descoperite in România, Bucuresti 1976; I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; I. Barnea, Christian Art in Romania, I, Bucarest 1979; A.V. Rădulescu, Le Monument Triomphal d'Adamclisi, Constantza 1982; A. Rădulescu - V. Lungu, Le christianisme en Scythie mineure à la lumière des dernières découvertes archéologiques, in Actes du XI[e] Congrès Int. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 2561-2615, esp. 2565-2578; A. Barnea, Une province chrétienne sous Justinien: La Scythie mineure, in Acta XIII Congressus Intern. Arch. christianae, II, Vatican City 1998, 807-822, esp. 818.

I. Barnea

TOMUS AD FLAVIANUM. Appealed to first by *Eutyches and then by *Flavian of Constantinople, *Leo I, during the month of June 499, took a position in the christological controversy that had broken out in the East, elaborating, with the help of *Prosper of Aquitaine, his secretary, a dogmatic letter (Ep. 28), called the Tomus ad Flavianum. Integrating long citations from his sermons, he presented his *Christology, which was centered on the two natures in one sole person. Because the Roman delegation was unable to transmit this document to the members of the Synod of *Ephesus (August 449)—indeed they withdrew in protest to the condemnation of Flavian—Leo, in the following year, entrusted his Tome, strengthened by a patristic *florilegium, to another delegation that, after the death of *Theodosius II, was well-received at *Constantinople. The Tome was translated into Greek and accepted by a synod (October 450). Finally, at the Council of *Chalcedon (October 451), it was recognized as being in accord with the teaching of *Cyril of Alexandria and in part used for the composition of the Creed of Chalcedon. After the council, the so-called *monophysites rejected it along with the Creed of Chalcedon, stigmatizing Leo as a *Nestorian, esp. because of the Tome's formula agit utraque forma cum alterius communione quod proprium est (Silva-Tarouca n. 94). Among the most bitter opponents, one should mention *Timothy Ailouros (d. 475) and other patriarchs of Alexandria, *Severus of Antioch (d. 538) (see C. imp. grammat. III,38: CSCO 102,175-176) and *John Philoponus (d. 575). The supporters of Chalcedon's decisions, however, defended the Tome; they even supported their position on it. For this approach, see the example of *John Scythopolis (1st half of the 7th c.), *Leontius of Byzantium (d. ca. 543), *Ephrem of Antioch (d. 545), *Anastasius I of Antioch (d. 599), who also composed an Apologia tomi Leonis (CPG 6952), and *Eulogius of Alexandria (d. 607). Although still contested subsequently by the *monophysites, the Tome, as a witness to Latin Christology, entered the dogmatic heritage both of the Byzantine and esp. the Latin church. In modern research, however, it is often too highly regarded. Some not only exaggerate its influence on the Council of Chalcedon, but they also overshadow both the anti-Eutychian and the anti-Nestorian Christology that Leo developed after 451, esp. in Ep. 124, which was the foundation of the Tomus ad Leonem (Ep. 165).

Editions: PL 54, 755-782; C. Silva-Tarouca, Rome 1932; ACO II/2, 1, 24-33. Studies: A. Grillmeier, Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I-II/1-4, Freiburg 1979-2002 (bibl.); H. Arens, Die christologische Sprache Leos des Grossen. Analyse des Tomus an den Patriarchen Flavian, Freiburg 1982; L. Casula, La cristologia di s. Leone Magno, Milan 2000 (bibl.).

B. Studer

TONANTIUS (Ferreolus) (5th c.). An aristocratic Gallic friend of *Sidonius Apollinaris, through whom we have come to know about him. Prefect of *Gaul (Sid., Epp. I,7; VII,12: PL 58,458, 581), Tonatnius is mentioned in Sidonius's Carm. 24,35 (PL 58,746), praised along with his mother (Ep. II,9: PL 58,485) and the recipient of some hendecasyllables (Epp. IX,13; IX,15: PL 58,629-633, 635). He should not be confused with the similarly named bishop of Cartagena mentioned by *Capreolus (5th c.; CPL 398-399; PL 53,849).

PWK 6, 2221-2222 (s.v. Ferreolus); PLRE 2, 1123; J. Harris, Sidonius Apollinaris and the Fall of Rome AD 407–485 (see index); F.-M. Kaufman, Studien zu Sidonius Apollinaris, Frankfurt 1995, esp. p. 352.

E. Romero Pose

TONSURE. Τριχοκουρία, in the Greek church, was the ritual haircut for children, on the seventh day after *baptism. It was made in the form of a cross in order to signify the descent of God's blessing on the head of the newly baptized. The haircut, moreover, signified their first offering to God (Goar, Euchol., 306).

At the time of *Gregory the Great there were present in the papal court some cubicularii tonsurati (Ewald - Hartmann [eds.], Reg. epist. 5,57; vol. I,363). These were clerics who received the tonsure in imitation of the monks, for whom it was a symbol of complete consecration to God. The Gregorian Hadrianum sacramentary contains a prayer Ad clericum faciendum which speaks of "Ad deponendam comam capitis sui propter amorem Christi" (Deshusses, Le Sacram. Grégorien, I, 417). The same prayer mentions the habitus religionis of the clerics, which the *Holy Spirit has caused them always to wear. Already at this ancient stage, therefore, the clerical status began to assimilate monastic elements.

While the monks, and later the clerics, wore the tonsure, other Christians, at least until the 5th c., kept their hair relatively long. One can observe this in the catacombs, where the men are depicted without a tonsure, but without long hair. *Jerome himself noted: "Perspicue demonstratur nec rasis capitibus, sicut sacerdotes cultoresque Isidis atque Sarapidis nos esse debere, nec rursum comam dimittere, quod proprium luxuriosum est, barbarorumque et militantium" (In Ezech. 13,44: PL 25,437).

J. Goar (ed.), Euchologion sive Rituale Graecorum, Venezia 1730 (repr. Graz 1960); T. Schuster, Liber Sacramentorum, magnificent and updated ed. by C. D'Amato, Casale Monf. 1967; J. Deshusses, Le Sacramentaire Grégorien, Fribourg (Switz.) 1971 (Spicil. Friburg. 16); L. Trichet, La tonsure, Paris 1990; M. Nin, Monastic Profession in the East: Handbook for Liturgical Studies 4 (2000) 308, 311.

A. Chupungco

TOPOGRAPHY, CHRISTIAN. In the 1970s the first systematic studies of Christian topography began. Their purpose was to reconstruct the process of the "Christianization of space," which, starting from the 4th c., more or less, pertained to all the urban centers in which a Christian community was organized. A seminal moment was the founding (1974) of the research group gathered by N. Duval, P.-A. Février and Ch. Pietri for the project titled "Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule, des origine au milieu du VIII[e] siècle," a systematic study of all the episcopal centers of *Gaul, which through 2007 comprises fifteen volumes (Topographie chrétienne . . . , I-XV, 1986-2007). This project has served as the point of reference for other milestones that are no less significant, such as the VI Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana in *Italy (Pesaro-Ancona 1983: Testini 1985; Mansuelli 1985; Cantino Wataghin 1985) and, at the international level, the XI Congresso Internazionale di Archeologia Cristiana (Lione 1986: XI CIAC, 1989), which has made the chief topic of its research early Christian topography, namely in episcopal centers. Contributions to this effort subsequently multiplied, along with the broadening of the investigation into various areas of the late Roman world, in particular its western part.

Research on the distribution of the places of Christian worship in the Late Antique city, their relationship to the urban context and their influence on the developments of this urban context and on the Early Middle Ages has developed themes focused on the ancient city and its transformations over the centuries. These themes became manifest starting from the end of the 1950s (Bognetti 1959; Hubert 1959; Cagiano 1974).

This new research has been accompanied by innovations in the method of investigation, involving a rigorously critical rereading of the sources—sources which included information gleaned from archaeological digs, documents, and various literary and hagiographical texts. This critical rereading of the sources occurred within the framework of an integration of all the available documentation and a careful reexamination of traditions, which were often both consolidated with and the product of hypotheses—hypotheses which, in turn, were no longer taken as self-evident, even though over time they had ascended to the level of presumed certainties. Typical examples of these sorts of hypotheses are the affirmations in favor of the cemeterial origins of the first places of Christian worship, namely those structures that in the Early Middle Ages would be identified as cathedrals (see again Violante and Fonseca 1966). Another example of this type of hypothesis is the claim that there is a direct relationship between churches and former places of pagan worship, which were replaced by Christian buildings in a general process of exauguration (i.e., the process of unhallowing a building or objects used for worship), following the recognition of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman state (380, Edict of Thessalonica) (Mâle 1950).

At the same time, extensive new excavations, which were planned and carried out with appropriate stratigraphical methodologies (Geneva, Grenoble, Lyon, Turin, Barcelona, numerous Roman titular churches), and renewed analyses of archaeological areas already begun in the past (in Italy: *Milan, *Verona and *Aquileia) have allowed scholars to acquire a mass of data that, although often fragmentary and at times problematic, has supplied new and valuable points of reference. Moreover, the framework of knowledge is in rapid transition because of the multiplication of archaeological investigations, as well as the continuous development of those that have already been undertaken in past decades.

With the current state of our knowledge, it seems clear that the foundations of Christian topography were established with the advent of the Constantinian Age and the beginning of a new religious policy on the part of the empire (313), when worship buildings assumed a precise architectural identity—in response to the fundamental demands of religious life and programs with a more or less explicit agenda—in those contexts in which episcopal authority was firmly established. In the initial phases, the celebration of the breaking of bread (fractio panis) took place in private homes, made available from time to time by individual believers (Acts of the Apostles; Paul's Epistles). Beginning in the 3rd c., the Christian community, where it was firmly established and endowed to some extent with an organizational structure, developed permanent gathering centers where liturgical celebrations were reported to have taken place. Still, these domus ecclesiae lack the structural particularities that allow scholars to identify them with precision. The domus ecclesiae did not have a direct bearing on the urban panorama, nor did they prefigure the location of the churches subsequently built. The theory that many Roman titular churches, whose existence is supported with documentary evidence in the 4th-5th c., were preceded by the domus ecclesiae of the 3rd c. (Kirsch 1918) was in time (Pietri 1976 and 1978; Guidobaldi 1989) supplanted by a more careful evaluation of the relationship of the churches themselves to the densely constructed urban web and the dynamics of their founding (see below). This type of evaluation ruled out any possibility of a direct connection between the Roman titular churches and the domus ecclesiae.

The investigations carried out thus far exhibit a consistent pattern of Christian topography, that is, of the layout of worship buildings in the Late Antique city. This pattern developed on two complementary poles at the functional level, and the poles were topographically distinct. The first pole was the ecclesia mater of the community (the ecclesia mater was destined to be used for the weekly liturgy, community gatherings around the bishop on the occasion of major feast days, esp. those gatherings pertaining to *Easter, preparation for baptism and the reconciliation of penitents). The ecclesia mater has been conventionally called by scholars "the episcopal church" or more simply as "the cathedral" (despite the term being somewhat anachronistic). Because of their functions, the baptistery, the episcopal domus, spaces that were intended for assistance of the poor and administration, and possibly living areas for the clergy were all connected to the ecclesia mater. This church would quickly develop into complex episcopal groups, with the original building being turned into a monument with the addition of further spaces for worship. A frequent case of this phenomenon, not entirely clarified in its functional dynamics, is that of the "double basilicas" (Duval, Caillet 1996). The second pole was represented by churches dedicated to the cult of the martyrs and/or funerary rites—the two functions tightly integrated from the moment that the practice of being buried near venerated tombs (depositio ad sanctos) turned the martyrial churches into the fulcrum of the cemeterial areas that were being greatly exploited for the aforementioned purposes. The first pole (the ecclesia mater), consistent with its functions, maintained a privileged relationship with the inhabitants of the city and could, therefore, be generically identified as "urban." The second (churches dedicated to martyrs and/or funerary rites), however, were suburban, that is, they were located outside the perimeter of the city where the pagan and Christian funerary areas were located. Within these areas were the tombs of the martyrs. These churches were located outside the perimeter of the city out of respect for Roman law and its practices that excluded burials in urbe.

This schema took shape in *Rome as early as the Constantinian Age with the establishment of the Lateran Basilica by the empire (basilica costantiniana, basilica Salvatoris, then St. John Lateran's Basilica, which was finished around 324), which today still serves as the city's cathedral. Moreover, it took shape with the foundation of the memorial martyrium on the tomb of St. *Peter, the basilica Apostolorum (subsequently the basilica of St. Sebastian) on the Via Appia, in the area near the catcombs (ad catacumbas), which since the 3rd c. was connected to the memory of Peter and Paul; also contributing to this schema was the foundation of the funerary churches on the Via Labicana (Sts. Peter and Marcellinus) and the Via Nomentana (St. Agnes), connected to two imperial mausoleums (Tor Pignattara and St. Costanza). The same pattern is then found in the rather vast geographical horizon from Milan to Aquileia, from Aosta to Geneva and Lyons, from *Paris to Tarragona and Grenoble, from Barcelona and Mérida at Arles, Tours, Verona and Brescia, to mention only the best-known cases (Cantino Wataghin, Gurt, Guyon 1996; Cantino Wataghin 2005; Guyon 2006). This framework does not always appear the same in every instance of its occurrence. Some cities seem to present a placement of a given ecclesia within the cemeterial context, with these two entities usually having two separate functions. The Sardinian diocesan centers, for example, with the exception of Tharros (Giuntella, Pani Ermini 1989; but so too Concordia and Modena: Cantino Wataghin, Guyon), provide a case in point. These centers exhibit locations that are framed within the context of specific developments of the urban settlement and the local Christian community. Such centers, however, do not invalidate the primary pattern of reference—a "pattern" which is not the usual result elsewhere—but were in essence, as mentioned above, functional factors for the specific demands of the worshiping community in that place.

The times in which Christian topography took shape were different from one location to the next. Nor should one find it puzzling that, independent of legislation, Christianization was at times an ongoing process and not a fait accompli. Furthermore, it should not be surprising that the communities found themselves confronted, on the one hand, with the pagan world and its traditions and, on the other hand, with the problem of the material consolidation of its own organizational structures. A determinative factor, even though insufficient per se, was, however, represented by the presence of the bishop. In other words, the foundation of the ecclesia mater occurred within a progression that followed, in its outline, the time frame of the founding of the dioceses. The foundation of the cemeterial/martyrial churches, however, was subject to greater variables. One often finds that it was only in the 5th-6th c., with the strengthening of the cult of the martyrs and the increase of the economic resources at the disposition of the churches, that the memorial basilicas were established. Such basilicas frequently took the place of more modest memorials, thereby completing the schema of the local Christian topography.

Beyond the double polarity referred to above, Christianization does not present uniform outlines. The location of the episcopal church in the urban context does not correspond to norms or predictable patterns; the only consistent piece of data is the building's placement within the city walls, that is, when walls were in fact present. The episcopal church could often be found close to such walls (*Rome, Brescia, Barcelona, Tours, Turin, Grenoble, *Trier and *Arles). Sometimes the episcopal church could be found in a more central area (Aosta, Tarragona) or somewhere in between (Milan). The different possibilities of placement need not be attributable to any factors other than the specific contingencies of a particular area. According to a traditional reading, the location of the cathedral in proximity to some of the walls would not imply an intentional marginalization in relation to an urban core, which might otherwise carry with it a heavy connotation of pagan associations. Rome is a prime example in this regard because the position of the Lateran Basilica would reflect *Constantine's scruple not to annoy the senatorial aristocracy, who, for the most part, were opposed to Christianity (Krautheimer 1987). In reality, the grounds for this choice of placement seem rather to have been of a more practical order: primarily the scarce availability of land that could be set apart in the central areas of the cities—in Rome no less than elsewhere—at a time when their civic structures were still fully functioning. Moreover, one also needs to consider, on the one hand, that the monumental character of these Christian buildings—the Lateran Basilica being the first and foremost among such monuments—rendered them an imposing presence in the urban landscape. On the other hand, one also needs to consider that the de facto reduced extension of Christian buildings into the middle of Roman cities renders moot and improper the use and even more so the contraposition of such terms as "central" or "peripheral." The placement of the cathedral, rather, occurred through the bringing together of a number of different forces: the time and manner of its being founded; the social and economic makeup of the community, including its size, the community's role and specifically the role of its bishop in the complex civil structure; and the quality of the urban building itself. The planting of worship buildings initially was substantially pragmatic; only later was it accompanied by an ideological perspective that in time led to the reappropriation of pagan temples for Christian use or to the Christian occupation of central public areas (Caillet 1996). The cathedrals that had been initially situated on the periphery were later transferred only by chance to such central public areas (Aix-en-Provence; Arles) (Gauthier 1999). In any case, given the reconstructions and the subsequent modifications to Christian buildings through the centuries, the movement of the ecclesia remained a relatively rare occurrence in comparison to the usual continuity of the early Christian building.

Even the establishment and, therefore, the placement of the martyrial and cemeterial churches was subject to variables that could not be reduced to consistent procedures, except in very general terms. The tombs of the martyrs and, therefore, the venerated saints and, therefore, the funerary areas that protected them were the privileged point of reference; this, moreover, did not exclude other choices where the objects of the cult were movable relics. The Constantinian establishments of Rome undoubtedly delineated a rather systematic "Christian occupation" of suburban space. An organic project also appears possible at Milan, where the construction of the churches that marked the city's suburbs along the chief major roads outside the city (basilica apostolorum/St. Nazarus; basilica ambrosiana/St. *Ambrose; St. Dionysius; most likely St. *Simplicianus), was the fruit of Ambrose's initiative (bishop from 374 to 397). This layout also allows for a symbolic interpretation as churches from that time began to be built in the shape of a cross. The literary sources reveal a precise correspondence to this architectural phenomenon in the frequent evocation of the role of the saints as a defense for the city, saints who were otherwise, or even more so efficaciously, a bulwark of the city's walls.

Thus, by the 6th c., in the period under examination, in the metropolises or capitals of the Late Antique world (in the West: Rome, *Ravenna and *Carthage; in the East: *Alexandria, *Antioch and *Constantinople) places of worship multiplied even within the city with the establishment of "parochial" churches, objects of devotion and monasteries. This multiplication occurred in response to the demands of a large community which was spread out over rather vast spaces, as well as in response to particular conditions under the political, social, economic, cultural and religious landscape. One such condition could be the presence of *Arian communities following the settlement of Gothic groups and later the *Longobards (Lombards). The phenomenon concerning the multiplication of churches, as far as we can tell at the moment, was not systematically recurrent elsewhere, even though we must reserve judgment on whether this phenomenon was due to necessity, in view of the limits of the available archaeological and textual documentation (Cantino Wataghin, Gurt, Guyon 1996): the ecclesia seems, rather, to have remained the sole place for urban worship, a fact that can find explanation in the dimensions and the modest means of the majority of the episcopal centers; an additional factor was the shrinking population underway from the 5th c. on, if not already from the 4th c.

In the face of these realities, to the Lateran Basilica are to be added memorial churches such as S. *Maria Maggiore (432-440) and S. Stefano Rotondo (consecrated by Pope *Simplicius: 468-483); some 29 tituli (i.e., titular churches, decentralized sees of the ecclesiastical administration and the pastoral activity of the city, normally endowed with churches, comparable to parishes) are attested by the signatures of the *presbyters participating at the synod of 499 (the number was reduced to 25 tituli in 595, most likely following a reorganization of the city's ecclesiastical geography), which were founded starting from the Constantinian Age. Among the two attestations, a change is recorded in the naming of the tituli, which in the second make reference to titular saints (St. Martin at Monti; St. *Chrysogonus; St. *Clement; St. Eusebius; St. Lawrence in Lucina; St. Vitale, Sts. John and Paul, etc.), while in the first, the same are indicated with proper names (titulus Aequitii, Crysogoni, Clementis, Eusebii, Lucinae, Vestinae, Pammachi). In some cases, these can be identified with the faithful (occasionally known from other sources such as *Pamachius who is also mentioned by St. *Jerome, for the construction of a hospice for pilgrims at Porto), to whom is owed the establishment of the titulus, that is, the gift to the church of the resources necessary for the building's construction and maintenance.

At Rome as elsewhere, private donations played an important role in providing physical facilities for the church's basic needs (liturgical, pastoral and administrative); imperial donations were limited to a small, though noticeable, number of cases. Donations of movable and immovable property were made in growing measure as a result of the increase in conversions and the choice of renouncing the world in favor of the ascetic life by the members of the aristocracy. The inscriptions on the floor mosaics of the churches from the area of Aquileia and more generally from the upper Adriatic attest, on the other hand, to the contribution of common laypeople to portions, at times modest, of the expenses paid for the building's construction (Caillet 1993). Houses account for a significant portion of the donations, as the literary sources and the archaeological evidence demonstrate. Even outside Rome the number of churches that arose in areas occupied previously by residential buildings was rather high (Turin, Luni, Parenzo, Milan, Vicenza, Florence, Lucca and Teramo), even though there are many cases of churches being built upon what were once public buildings—buildings that were made available by the authorities (baths, warehouses, civic basilicas, the Lateran Basilica replaced what was formerly the castra nova equitum singularium, that is, the barracks of the Imperial Guard who were freed from their service by the Emperor *Constantine). At Trier the cathedral stands upon a worship building at the edges of the forum. From this perspective, we can see a rather strong element of randomness when mapping out the process of Christian topography, although not ruling out that there was a semblance of design and planning by the church as well: even the gift of a building from a government official could be sought out. It was often possible that church officials had a choice between various options, with considerations of a building's usability and aesthetics usually winning out.

With the establishment of Christian churches, a process of "reuse" was begun that radically transformed the landscape of the ancient city, both urban and suburban, and the modes of the use of spaces (Cantino Wataghin 1999). Christian worship buildings were designed with new factors that contributed to a complex aggregation: on the one hand, as individual landmarks in the urban network, and, on the other, as nodes of a web, whose network was established by the devotional itineraries suggested by the articulations of the liturgical calendar. Independent of the stational liturgy, the community under the guidance of the bishop was found at specific dates in preestablished places for certain celebrations, whether these were anniversaries of the martyrs or vigils for the major feast days. It was upon such Christian topography, outlined above between the 4th and 6th c., that urban developments unfolded in the transition from Antiquity to the Middle Ages.

J.P. Kirsch, Die römischen Titelkirchen im Altertum, Paderborn 1918; J. Hubert, Évolution de la topographie et de l'aspect des villes de Gaule de V^e au X^e siècle, in La città nell'Alto Medioevo, VI Settimana CISAM, Spoleto 1959, 529-557; G.P. Bognetti, Problemi di metodo e oggetti di studio nella storia delle città italiane dell'Alto Medioevo, ibid., 59-87; C. Violante - C.D. Fonseca, Ubicazione e dedicazione delle cattedrali dalle origini al periodo romanico nelle città dell'Italia centro-settentrionale, in Il romanico pistoiese nei suoi rapporti con l'arte romanica dell'Occidente, I Conv. Int. di Studi Medievali di Storia dell'Arte (Pistoia 1964), Pistoia 1966, 303-346; M. Cagiano de Azevedo, Aspetti urbanistici delle città altomedievali, in XXI Settimana CISAM, Spoleto 1974, 641-677; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, Rome 1976; Ch. Pietri, Recherches sur les domus ecclesiae: REAug 24 (1978) 3-21; G. Cantino Wataghin, Appunti per una topografia cristiana: i centri episcopali piemontesi, in Atti VI Congr. naz. di Archeologia Cristiana (Pesaro-Ancona 19-23 settembre 1983), Florence 1985, 91-112; R. Krautheimer, Three Christian Capitals: Topography and Politics, Berkeley 1987; J.-Ch. Picard, Le souvenir des évêques. Sépultures, listes épiscopales et culte des évêques en Italie du Nord des origines au X^{e} siècle, École Française de Rome 1988; F. Guidobaldi, L'inserimento delle chiese titolari di Roma nel tessuto urbano preesistente: osservazioni e implicazioni, in Quaeritur inventus colitur, Miscellanea in onore di Padre Umberto Maria Fasola, B., Vatican City 1989 (Studi di antichità cristiana 40), I, 383-396; P. Testini - G. Cantino Wataghin - L. Pani Ermini, La cattedrale in Italia, in Actes du XI Congrès Int. d'Archéologie Chrétienne (Lyon - Vienna - Grenoble - Genève - Aoste 21-28 septembre 1986), Vatican City 1989; 5-229; L. Reekmans, L'implantation monumentale chrétienne dans le paysage urbain de Rome de 300 à 850, ibid., 861-915; V. Saxer, L'utilisation par la liturgie de l'espace urbain et suburbain: l'exemple de Rome dans l'Antiquité et le Haut Moyen Âge, ibid., 917-1033; G. Cantino Wataghin, Urbanistica tardoantica e topografia cristiana: termini di un problema, in Felix temporis reparatio, Atti del convegno "Milano capitale dell'impero romano" (Milano 8-11 marzo 1990), ed. G. Sena Chiesa - E.A. Arslan, Milan 1992, 171-192; J. Guyon - B. Boissavit-Camus - V. Souilhac, Topographie chrétienne des agglomérations du Sud-Ouest, in Villes et agglomérations urbaines antiques du Sud-Ouest de la Gaule: histoire et archéologie, Bordeaux 1992, 391-430; J.-P. Caillet, L'évergétisme monumental chrétien en Italie et à ses marges, d'après l'épigraphie des pavements de mosaïques, Rome 1993; A. Chavasse, La liturgie de la ville de Rome du V^{e} au VIII^{e} siècle. Une liturgie conditionnée par l'organisation de la vie in Urbe et Extra Muros, Rome 1993; Ph. Pergola, "Civitas" episcopale tardoantica e sede diocesana altomedievale: continuità o mutamento?, in Materiali per una topografia urbana. "Status quaestionis" e nuove acquisizioni, in V Conv. sull'Archeologia Tardoromana e Medievale in Sardegna (Cagliari-Cuglieri 1988), Oristano 1995, 193-200; G. Cantino Wataghin - J.M. Gurt Esparraguera - J. Guyon, Topografia della "civitas christiana" tra IV e VI sec., in Early Medieval Towns in West Mediterranean, Atti del Convegno (Ravello 1994), ed. O. Banti, Mantova 1996, 17-43; N. Duval - J.-P. Caillet (ed.), Les "églises doubles" et les "familles d'églises": AntTard 4 (1996) 7-234; M.Y. Perrin, Le nouveau style missionnaire: la conquête de l'espace et du temps, in Histoire du Christianisme, III, Les Églises d'Orient et d'Occident, ed. L. Pietri, Paris 1998, 585-621; F. Guidobaldi, Spazio urbano e organizzazione ecclesiastica a Roma nel VI e VII secolo, in Acta XIII Congressus Internationalis Archaeologiae Christianae, Split-Poreč 25.IX–1.X.1994, II, Vatican City 1998, 29-54; N. Gauthier, La Topographie chrétienne entre idéologie et pragmatisme, in The Idea and Ideal of the Town Between Late Antiquity and the Early Middle Ages, ed. G.P. Brogiolo - B. Ward Perkins, Leiden-Boston-Cologne 1999, 195-209; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Strutture funerarie e edifici di culto paleocristiani di Roma dal IV al VI secolo, Vatican City 2001; J. Hillner, Le chiese paleocristiane di Roma e l'occupazione degli spazi pubblici, in Ecclesiae urbis, Atti del Congr. int. di studi sulle chiese di Roma (IV-X secolo), ed. F. Guidobaldi - A. Guiglia Guidobaldi, Rome 2002, 321-329; A. Cerrito, Oratori e edifici di culto minori di Roma tra il IV secolo e i primi decenni del V, ibid., 397-418; G. Cantino Wataghin, Christian Topography in the Late Antique Town: Recent Research and Open Questions, in Theory and Practice in Late Antique Archaeology, ed. L. Lavan - W. Bowden, Leiden-Boston 2003, 224-253; J. Guyon, La topographie chrétienne des villes de la Gaule, in Die Stadt in der Spätantike - Niedergang oder Wandel?, ed. J.-U. Krause - Ch. Witschel (Historia Einzelschriften), Stuttgart 2006, 105-128; Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule, des origines au milieu du VIII^{e} siècle, I-XV, Paris 1986-2007.

G. Cantino Wataghin

TOTILA (ca. 510–552). *Ostrogothic king, successor of Eraric, he ruled from 541 to 552. His extraordinary military qualities were conjoined with a sense of justice toward the Italian populations oppressed by *Byzantine taxation. Coming from the *Gothic aristocracy, he did not follow the same political culture that had characterized the Amaling family and deliberately distanced himself from Roman intellectual life. Once *Belisarius left *Italy, Totila advanced to conquer S Italy. Once the Byzantine general had returned, he was forced to engage in arduous battles for the capture of *Rome (548). When Belisarius had departed in the direction of *Constantinople, General *Narses was sent to fight against Totila. He defeated Totila at Tegina, where the latter lost his life (552).

H.N. Roisl, PWK 14, 799-809; A. Mundö, Sur la date de la visite de T. à saint Benoît: RB 59 (1949) 203-206; G. Sigismondi, La battaglia tra Narsete e T. nel 552 d.C. in Procopio: Boll. Deputazione di storia patria Umbria 65 (1968) 5-68; Z.V. Udalcova, La campagne de Narsès et l'écrasement de T.: CCAB 17 (1971) 557-564; Id., L'Italie et Byzance au VI^{e} siècle: CCAB 18 (1971) 547-555; P.A. Cusak, Some Literary Antecedents of the Totila Encounter in the Second Dialogue of Pope Gregory I: SP 12 (1975) 87-90; B. Steidle, Der Gottesmann Benedikt und der Ostgotenkönig T. zu Papst Gregor, Dial. 2,14-15: Erbe und Auftrag 56 (1980) 359-370; H.N. Roisl, T. und die Schlacht bei den Busta Gallorum, Ende Juni / Anfang Julie 552: Jahrbuch der öst. Byz. 30 (1981) 25-50; F. Marazzi, Dall'impero d'Occidente ai regni germanici, in var. aus., Storia medievale, Rome 1998, 98-103; J. Moorhead, Totila the Revolutionary: Historia 49 (2000) 382-386; E. Chrysos, Vernichtungskriege des 6. Jahrhunderts, in H.-H. Kortüm (ed.), Krieg im Mittelalter, Berlin 2001, 46-58; G. Pilara, La città di Roma fra Chiesa e Impero durante il conflitto gotico-bizantino, Rome 2006.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

TOULOUSE. The city of Toulouse (probably an Indo-European name), which received the title of the colony Palladia from the emperor *Domitian, experienced great fortune already before the advent of Christianity. The first Christian signs that have survived from the city are the names of the bishops, five of whom are known: *Saturninus, who was martyred under the emperor *Decius in 250; Hilary, *Rhodanius and Silvius in the 4th c.; and *Exuperius from the 5th. Christianization occurred gradually during the 4th and 5th c., as becomes evident in the growing number of such Christian buildings as necropolises and Christian basilicas, which have been discovered in the last decade outside the walls. The most important event during this period was the construction of the basilica dedicated to the martyr Saturninus (Saint-Sernin), begun by Silvius and brought to completion by Exuperius and consecrated by the latter on 1 November 402. (The Passio S. Saturnini and the Mass for the translation of the saint, which have been preserved through the Liber mosarabicus sacramentorum, were made shortly after.) In Toulouse, the capital of the *Arian *Visigothic kings, Arians, *Catholics and Jews lived together in large number. *Jerome's epistolary correspondence introduces to us the following related to Toulouse: (1) a deacon and monk Sisinnius from Toulouse, who was sent in 402 and 406 to the East by Exuperius to carry alms to the monks of *Palestine and *Egypt and a voluminous epistolary correspondence to Jerome (Ep. 102, 105, 109 and 119); (2) the monks Minervius and Alexander, two former lawyers and close relatives to whom Jerome dedicated his Commentary on Malachi (Prol. CCL 76 A, p. 902) and wrote the letter 119, in which he responds to their exegetical difficulties; (3) the priest Riparius, whom we find in the civitas of Toulouse, but close to the region of Comminges, who reported to Jerome the propaganda carried out by *Vigilantius (Ep. 109), sending him in 406, through Sissinius, the writings of Vigilantius which had been gathered by Riparius and his confrère Desiderius. It seems that the city became Christian at the beginning of the 5th c., given that the *pagan temple constructed on the "Capitol" during the imperial era was demolished around 400. A Christian church was built on this site only in 567.

M. Labrousse, Toulouse antique des origines à l'établissement des Wisigoths, Paris 1968 (Bibl. des Écoles franç. d'Athènes et de Rome 212); H. Crouzel, Saint Jérôme et ses amis toulousains: BLE 73 (1972) 125-146; Id., Saint Exupère, évêque de Toulouse, et trois membres de son clergé selon les témoignages anciens: Mém. de l'Acad. des Sciences, Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres de Toulouse 8,16 (1987) 177-193; J.-M. Pailler, Domitien et la Cité de Pallas. Un tournant dans l'histoire de Toulouse antique: Pallas 34 (1988) 99-109; A.M. Jiménez Garnica, La coexistencia con los judíos en el reino de Tolosa: Gerión 12 (1994) 270-278; P. Moret, Le nom de Toulouse: Pallas 44 (1996) 7-23; J.-Ch. Arramond - J.-L. Bondartchouk, La destruction du temple du forum de Toulouse à la fin du IVe s.: Aquitania 14 (1996) 31-33; Qu. Cazes, Les nécropoles et les églises funéraires de Toulouse à la fin de l'Antiquité: Aquitania 14 (1996) 149-151; Qu. Cazes, Toulouse à la fin de l'Antiquité: RivAC 73,1 (1997) 278-280.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

TOURS
I. Christianity - II. Council.

I. Christianity. Tours was the ancient Caesarodunum, the capital of the civitas of the Turoni. In the Late Empire it became the civitas Turonorum, promoted in the 2nd half of the 4th c. to the capital of the province of Lugdunensis III; then in the 6th c. it became the Urbs Turonica. A late tradition collected by *Gregory of Tours attributes the founding of the Turonic church to Gatianus, one of the seven missionaries sent around 250, in order to evangelize *Gaul. The historical sources, however, ignore Gatianus and present as the first bishop of Tours an individual who appears in the second place in Gregory's episcopal list: Litorius (337/338–370). The Turonic church emerged from obscurity with the successor of Litorius, *Martin (372–397): with his evangelizing activity, the fervor of his charity and his "virtues" as a thaumaturge, he gave a distinct thrust to the Christianity of Tours. Highly praised in the work of his biographer, *Sulpicius Severus, Martin's person and work served as an enduring model for all Christians enamored of asceticism. In Tours itself, after the long and mediocre episcopate of Bricius (397–442), who strove to overshadow his two illustrious predecessors, the bishops began to claim for their own church, which had become a metropolitan of an ecclesiastical province, the spiritual inheritance transmitted by Martin. Eustochius (442–458/459), *Perpetuus (458/459–488/489)—the most famous—then Volusianus (488/489–495/496) and Verus (495/496–507) worked to officially place Tours under Martin's patronage: in a large basilica, erected over his tomb, from that time onward two annual feasts were celebrated in his memory (11 November: depositio; 4 July: ordination). Strong in this protection, the community of Tours, when stripped from the Roman Empire and falling under the rule of the *Visigothic *Arians (471–507), remained closely connected to its *Nicene faith. Then, when the political situation allowed for it, it gave a sign of resistance to the occupier, establishing relations with the still-pagan *Franks, who had settled in the N of Loire, and, relying on their king *Clovis's conversion to *Catholicism, Volusianus and Verus called on the latter as a deliverer: both men were repaid for this initiative with a sentence of exile. It was their successor, *Licinius (507–519), who received Clovis at Tours, in 508, who in the meantime was baptized, after the recent triumph over the Visigoths. The Frankish king, putting on the purple tunic and the diadem sent by the Eastern emperor *Anastasius in the basilica of Martin, did homage to Martin for his victory. But Clovis's successors, desiring to protect a city so precious, arrogated to themselves the right of appointing the prelates of Tours. Martin's see then experienced a long dark period, under the short-sighted leadership of old and compliant bishops: Theodore and Proculus (519–521), Dinifius (521–522), Ommatius (522–526), Leo (526), Francilio (526–529), Injuriosus (529–546), Baudinus (546–552) and Gunthar (552–555). But Eufronius (556–573) and esp. *Gregory the bishop-historian were able to restore to the church its independence and prestige. During Gregory's time, despite the wars and natural disasters, Tours shined with its most lively splendor, appearing as Martin's city par excellence. The organization of pilgrimages contributed to the success of this initiative, which was begun by Perpetuus and brought to completion by Gregory. By making known, through their writings or those of the contemporary poets, the ongoing miracles of Martin at his tomb, the bishops attracted an increasing number of pilgrims. The city at the end of the 6th c. became the largest center of pilgrimage in Gaul.

In this period, Martin's memory visibly adds to the topography of Tours; remodeled according to the scheme of a spiritual geography, Tours also appears from this point of view as the Urbs Martini. To the E, within the walls of the ancient castrum, tower the buildings of the episcopal complex, esp. the ecclesia prima, the first cathedral, built by Litorius and reconstructed by Gregory. Sanctified by the relics of the martyrs of Agaunum (from which derives the patronage of St. *Mauricius attested to since the 8th c.), it is presented esp. as the venerable sanctuary in which Martin was consecrated to the episcopate and where several "paintings" recall the most famous miracles performed by the confessor while he was still alive. To the E of the castrum, an early funerary basilica, erected by Litorius (St. Lidoire), was eclipsed by St. Martin's basilica, built by Perpetuus. To this vast sanctuary, adorned with "paintings," with their legends celebrating the posthumous power of the thaumaturge, flocked the multitude of the devoted, namely the faithful from Tours and pilgrims. Numerous sanctuaries were built in the shadow of St. Martin, in the atrium of the basilica (subsequently two baptisteries) or in a radius of some hundreds of meters (basilica of Sts. Peter and Paul; the monastery of St. Venantius). Thus before the ancient castrum, a new urban center began to form that later would adopt the significant name of Martinopolis. Already between these two poles of the life of Tours appeared the first rings of a web that would subsequently reunite, esp. with the construction, at the time of Gregory, of the monastic basilica dedicated to St. *Julian of Brioude. Finally, on the right bank of the Loire, the monastery, once founded by Martin, became the Maius Monasterium (Marmoutier), the largest monastic complex of Tours and the third pole of its Martinian geography. After Gregory's death and before the Carolingian Renaissance, Tours, through a lack of sufficiently numerous testimonies, returned to obscurity. Its bishops, for the most part, are only names transmitted to us by a signature at the bottom of a document or a conciliar act. The following bishops came after Pelagius, the successor of Gregory, in the 7th c.: Leupacarius (before 609–before 614), Egiric (616), Gwalac, Sigilaic, Leubald, Medigisilus (before 627–after 638), Latinus (650), Caregiselus, Rigobert (654), Papolenus, Chrodobert (before 668–after 672), Bertus (before 680–after 688), Peladius, Ebarcius (696/698); we also know of the following bishops who worked in the city of Tours in the 1st half of the 8th c.: Ibbo (ca. 710), Gumtramnus, Dido, Ragambert, Audbert, Ostald and Eusebius (757–762).

Duchesne, Fastes II, 283-312; var. aus., Mémorial de l'année martinienne, Paris 1962; Histoire religieuse de la Touraine (under the direction of S. Oury), Tours 1975; L. Pietri, La ville de Tours du IV^e au VI^e s.: naissance d'une cité chrétienne, Rome 1983; N. Gauthier, L'évêque Martin et la ville de Tours: RHEF 82 (1996) 249-262.

L. Pietri

II. Council. Many bishops from the province of Tours and the neighboring provinces (Bourges [Bituriga], Le Mans [Cenomannis]) gathered on 18 November 461 for the feast of St. Martin, and during the occasion they promulgated 13 disciplinary canons pertaining to the duties of the clergy (chastity, sobriety, permanence and selflessness), consecrated virgins and penitents.

CCL 148, 142-149; Hfl-Lecl II, 898ff.; Palazzini 5, 371.

Ch. Munier

TRACTATUS. Tractare-tractatus. Tractare is a verb that through time had a large gamut of meanings. In secular language, it meant "treating something verbally" or "through writing," to give an "oral" or "written" exposition and, in a figurative sense, "speaking of," and even "studying a text," "to research," "to examine" and "to reflect." Within the writings of Christian authors, starting from *Tertullian, the term meant "to discuss"; the expression sermone tractare meant "to express with the word." In the writings of *Cyprian, the verb tractare indicates "to exercise the ministry of the word," "to preach" in an absolute sense, and is not very far from docere (see Cypr., Ep. 55,14,1). This meaning is also found in the Acta Mariani et Iacobi, and in the writings of *Optatus of Milevis, *Paulinus of Nola (see Vita Ambrosii 17,18,23), *Augustine and other authors. In the Sacramentarium gregorianum, the verb tractare means "to celebrate the *Eucharist." But one should not forget that even in the writings of Christian authors the verb tractare continued to mean "to speak." The term tractatus follows, at least partially, the verb in its most common meaning, although acquiring new meanings along its journey in Christian language. In fact, in Tertullian's writings it was also applied to trinitarian language as "a treatment aimed at shedding light on the unity of the three persons"; in the writings of Cyprian, it acquired the sense of "episcopal gathering," "counsel" and "council." Much more frequently, however, tractatus, following the course taken by the verb, signified "homily," "sermon"—this is the case in the writings of *Ambrose and Augustine—or even, at times, "catechetical preaching" (see Ambr., De sacr. 3,2,15); but, inasmuch as the source of teaching is Sacred *Scripture, tractatus came to mean "scriptural commentary," "exegetical treatise" (one thinks of, for example, the Tractatus in Cantica Cantocorum or the Tractatus in Sacram Scripturam written by *Gregory of Elvira), and tractator divinarum Scripturarum designates one as a "commentator of the holy books" (just as the phrase tractare indicates the explanation of a biblical passage) and not rarely does it refer to the explanation or the commentary on the sacred text heard during the lectio in the 1st half of the liturgical synaxis (see Ambr., Ep. 20,4; De off. I,99-101). Moreover, it is necessary to recall that often the "exegetical commentary" emerges as a preparation for homiletical activity or is its result.

G. Bardy, Tractatus, tractare: RecSR 33 (1946) 211-235; Ch. Mohrmann, Praedicare-Tractare-Sermo. Essai sur la terminologie de la prédication paléochrétienne: La MaisonD. 39 (1954) 97-107 (repr. in Études sur le latin des Chrétiens, II, Rome 1961, 63-72), A.F. Memoli, Originalità, fortuna e arte di un nuovo genere letterario: il sermone latino cristiano, in Studi sulla prosa d'arte negli scrittori cristiani, Naples 1979, 56-78, F.J. Tovar Paz, Tractatus, sermones atque homiliae: el cultivo del género literario del discurso homilético en la Hispania tardoantigua y visigótica, Cáceres 1994.

P. Siniscalco

TRACTATUS CONTRA ARIANOS. This is the name usually assigned to a long passage from an anti-*Arian work written by an anonymous author included within the famous codex Vindobonensis 2160, containing part of *Hilary of Poitiers's De Trinitate. The unknown author sets forth several difficulties to the Arians that arise from believing that the Son is a creature and a different substance from the Father. The fragment seems to be a document written before the end of the 4th c.

CPL 748a; CPPM II, 1427; PLS 1, 1544-1548; H.S. Sedlmayer, Der Tractatus contra Arianos in der Wiener Hilarius-Handschrift: SAW 146, 2 (1903) 1-18; G. Morin, ibid. 18-21; Id., Deux fragments d'un Traité contre les Ariens attribués parfois à St. Hilaire: RBen 20 (1903) 125-131; C. Martini, Ambrosiaster, Rome 1944, 189-194; Id., Sei frammenti del De fide trinitatis di Pelagio: Ricerche Rel. 20 (1949) 35-64.

M. Simonetti

TRADITIO LEGIS ET CLAVIUM (iconography). The scenes of the traditio legis and the traditio clavium are placed within the repertoire of the thematic solutions that have as a basic schema the ternary composition of Christ-*Peter-*Paul. The representation of the traditio legis, the act of entrusting the law to one of the chief apostles, most frequently Peter, does not find precise correspondence in the scriptural tradition, although developing, through semantic enhancement, the OT theme of the giving of the law to *Moses; it is exhibited in the panorama of Christian iconography around the mid-4th c. as a completely new formulation revealing meanings, whose numerous attestations in the figurative arts conform, for the most part, to a fixed schematic elaboration, with few variants of great importance. The figure of Christ constitutes the center of the composition, and on his sides, in an often heavily pyramidal articulation, are the two apostles, generally Peter to the left and Paul to the right: Christ, with or without a beard, clothed in a tunic and a pallium like Peter and Paul, is depicted seated on the throne or rather, more often, standing on the mount of paradise from which emerges four rivers. He has his right hand lifted up in the act of speaking and with the left holds the border of an open volumen, on which, at times, was transcribed the expression Dominus legem dat and which is received by Peter with hands veiled by his pallium. For the apostle almost always carries, resting on his shoulder, a processional or monogrammatic cross, a sign of his triumph over death through *martyrdom. On the opposite side, Paul, by his ever well-defined physiognomy, completes with his right hand the gesture of acclamatio, a demonstration of reverence and wonder, while with his left he clasps a scroll or holds the edge of the pallium. The setting of the scene in an extraterrestrial habitat is emphasized by the presence of two date palms on the sides of the composition; on the branches of the first palm on the shoulder of the apostle Paul is the *phoenix, the mythical bird that strengthens the symbolic role performed by the trees. For the completion of the scene, almost systematically, in the lower register, the eschatological theme of the *Agnus Dei is developed, which evokes the expiatory sacrifice, the Paschal victim, depicted in the axial position with respect to the figure of Christ on the mount of paradise with the two groups of angels on his sides in various numbers (one, two, three or six), a zoomorphic reinterpretation of the apostolic college, which emerges from the two ecclesiae of Bethlehem and Jerusalem, placed, in the tectonic organization of the scene, in correspondence to the two palms.

The thematic choice of the traditio legis characterizes figurative handmade objects of a different typology created for the decoration of the buildings, and for products pertaining to funerary plastic art, and objects that could be framed within the so-called minor arts. Representations on mosaics have been preserved in the mausoleum of *Constantia at *Rome, which was constructed in the final years of the 1st half of the 4th c., esp. in the S apse, where the anomalies with respect to the scheme delineated (the lack of the Agnus Dei under the feet of Christ and the phoenix on the palm, the presence of the three rivers from the mount of paradise, a unique "virga," most likely the remains of a cross, in Peter's left hand, and perhaps even the fourfold number of lambs) are probably to be ascribed to the extensive tampering during repeated restorations (Stanley). Mosaics of the traditio legis can also be found in the baptistery of the cathedral of *Naples (Maier), which is from a time shortly thereafter. Here the scene, containing gaps to the left, displays a slope of the pavilion vault and is developed in a simplified but solemn design, with Christ standing on the globe, an element that emphasizes the universality of the event, in the act of offering the scroll unfolded to a deferent and cross-bearing Peter. An image of the traditio legis also decorates, in a stucco version, a niche of the *Ravenna baptistery of the Orthodox, decorated by Bishop Neo (451–475), with the three figures organized according to a pyramidal layout that adapts itself perfectly to the surface condition by the underlying tympanum. Christ is depicted there as beardless and seated on his throne. He bears in his left hand a processional cross and grants to Peter with his right the scroll, while on the left Paul is in the act of acclamation. In a painting, an image of the traditio legis adorns an arcosolium of the catacomb ad decimum of Grottaferrata (Rome), which is also datable to the end of the 4th c. This work presents some variants for the most widely used schema: Christ proceeds on a carpet of clouds and presents, at the sides of his head, the apostolic letters alpha and omega, although on the other side, the divine hand bears the conqueror's crown. In a room of the underground complex of *Priscilla at Rome, there is perhaps an analogous representation to one at Naples, with Christ standing on a globe, which is documented by a drawing made from memory by Wilpert before its collapse, while a later version, presumably of the late 6th c., was drawn in the Neapolitan catacomb of San Gennaro (Ciavolino).

A particular spreading of the theme should be identified in the repertory of *sarcophagi produced in the final decades of the 4th c. and at the beginning of the subsequent century by Roman and Gallic workshops, which can be attributed essentially to the typologies "for the columns" or "for the city gates," in which the succession of niches often invited artists to develop scenes containing the entire apostolic college which participated in the act of acclamation. The first group are the specimens which are universally recognized as the oldest preserved formulations of the traditio legis; the Lateran 174 (Repertorium I,677), dated around the year 360, reveals a clear thematic development of the scheme that had already been experimented with, namely the one with Christ on the throne sitting among the apostles. In fact, a beardless Christ is depicted as seated with his right hand bent and with his feet on the personification of Heaven, a nexus that seems to constitute a unicum in the extant repertory. On a fragment from the Metropolitan Museum of New York, which is to be dated around 370, the Lord is standing and wearing a beard on the mount of paradise, but lacking are the palms for the completion of the scene, which do, however, appear in the virtually contemporaneous sarcophagus from the catacomb of S. Sebastiano in Rome (Repertorium I,1,200), in which the image is also enriched by other formative elements, the Agnus Dei bearing the image of the cross to the left of Christ and the phoenix on the palm parallel to Paul. To the group of sarcophagi "at the doors of the city" belong exemplars of great importance such as that of St. *Ambrose at Milan, the Borghese sarcophagus of the Louvre Museum, Flavius Gorgonius at the Museo Diocesano di Ancona, and the chapel of St. Metrias in the Cathedral of San Salvatore at Aix-en-Provence (Sansoni), which could be dated within the two last decades of the 4th c. and the 1st years of the 5th, which apply the complete canonical model, placing, it has been said, the three chief individuals before the apostolic college. At Christ's feet the new element, evidently tied to the wealthiest customer base for these handmade objects, is made up of the presence of two deceased donors in proskynēsis (Gk. "adoration, worship"). To the same chronological horizon of the sarcophagi also belongs the well-known engraved slab of the Anagni coming from the Roman catacomb of the Jordani and attributed to ca. 390, on which the rendering of the theme repeats the complete schema of all its elements, with the special detail that the three rivers, instead of four, cross the mountain on which the Agnus Dei is standing.

Numerous examples of representations of the traditio legis also come from the minor arts, on products of inscribed glass or gold leaf, metal (medallions of devotion and esp. small bronze statues) and ivory, sometimes fully restoring the compositional complexity such as the images to be seen (1) on the cover of the ivory casket of Samagher (Fink), (2) on the small marble box found in church of S. Giovanni Battista at Ravenna (Bartoccini), (3) on a circular fragmentary array found at Trier (Binsfeld) or (4) on a gilded glass at the Vatican Museum (Testini, L'iconografia degli apostoli, Catalogo n. 196; on this object there is a division by a line into two sectors: the upper one with Christ between Peter and Paul, the lower one with the Agnus Dei on the mountain between the lambs and the ecclesiae, with the legends IERUSALE-IORDANES-BECLE clearly recalling a large-scale apsidal decoration). More often this is seen through simplified formulations adapted to the reduced surfaces of the objects.

An extensive debate is connected to the interpretation of the theme with respect to the definition of the complex ideology which is its basis, in which deeper ecclesiological meanings, theological and institutional objectives, and evident eschatological values converge: more than a simple iconographic tradition of the idea of Petrine primacy, the traditio legis suggests and develops, through a heavily symbolic language loaded with apocalyptic evocations, the concept of divine sovereignty, the mandatum entrusted by Christ to the church, represented esp. by Peter, the depository of the teaching and the guarantee of its unquestionable legislative value. The lex, to be understood here, therefore, as suggested by Wilpert, as the "sum of the precepts and articles of faith in Christ" (Wilpert, I,47), introduces to the journey of salvation the advent of the new world, the *parousia of Christ. Thus on the lantern found at Rome on the Caelian Hill and preserved at Florence, a gift from Valerius Severus Eutropius for his baptism, according to de Rossi, in the absence of the representation with the traditio legis, the role of recalling is assigned to the inscription Dominus legem dat Valerio Severi Eutropi vivas, which reinforces the image of the orans within the mystical ship, an *allegory of the church. Moreover, one should keep in mind that precisely such a strong potential of ideological suggestions inherent within the iconographic formulation found an immediate connection with the lofty patronage that characterized many of the works pertaining to the scenes of the traditio legis, esp. the sarcophagi belonging to prestigious administrators within the senatorial aristocracy which were placed in privilieged contexts, as at Rome, in the structures of St. Peter's, St. Paul's and the catacomb of St. Sebastian.

Under the profile of the formal articulation of the language of the signs and the attributes, the sign of the traditio legis draws in toto on the courtly and ceremonial iconography of the court. Christ is depicted as standing as an emperor who fulfills the act of the adlocutio or seated on a throne. Peter takes the law with veiled hands, as was the duty of receiving from the sacred person of a sovereign. Paul evokes the gestural expressiveness that was specific to the senators in the ceremony of the acclamatio. All these are elements of a secular ritual, nourished by theocratic perspectives, widely documented in the repertory of late imperial figurative art. Thus, for example, the relief with the largitio from the Arch of *Constantine, constantly flanked by the image of the traditio legis and in the various scenes of the investiture or the commissioning of duties, among which the traditio legis on the missorium of *Theodosius I, with the emperor between *Honorius and *Arcadius, who entrusts a scroll to a dignitary, constitutes a significant testimony.

The natural place of the first formulations of the traditio legis must be considered, therefore, as Constantinian and post-Constantinian Rome, in which the political and ideological scene reveals deep interferences in the institutional order of the church owed on the one hand to heresies (*Arianism had esp. won an important boost from *Constantius II's victory over Magnentius in 553), and on the other to the reorganization of *paganism through work of *Julian the Apostate, phenomena in relation to which the papacy brings to maturity that program of the gradual consolidation of the Roman church's power which culminated in the Decree of *Thessalonica (380). Within this framework, the debated reading on the scroll of the mosaic of the mausoleum of *Constantia with the variant Dominus pacem dat ("the Lord grants peace") can appear significant. This is an expression that bears, according to Testini (La lapide di Anagni, 731), legends of the coins made by the emperors from the 2nd half of the 4th c., but that is somehow individually repeated in a much later work. In Farfa Abbey the pictorial cycle attributed to the 11th c. (Markthaler, 80) in fact includes a scene of the traditio legis, within which the inscription on the scroll D(omi)n(u)s lege(m) dad [sic] is extended with the addition of the biblical passage from Jn 14:27 pac(em) mea(m) do vo(bis) ("my peace I give unto you").

Wilpert's hypothesis posited that the traditio legis was placed in a baptisterial context (47 and 175; the scholar had supposed that a scene of the traditio legis decorated the Lateran baptistery)—a hypothesis adopted by some (Thérel) but opposed by many. De Francovich supposed another sort of liturgical room. For the origin of the theme one must most likely go back to a funerary and martyrial context. For many scholars (Kollwitz, Schumacher) the first formulation of the traditio legis, the essential model for the reiteration and the development of the theme, decorated the apse of the Constantinian basilica (Ruysschaert). Others (Sotomayor, Testini, Recio Veganzones and Bisconti) have preferred to attribute the formative process of the image to the image workshops for sarcophagi, where the ternary compositive schema Christ-Peter-Paul had already found extensive experimentation and application in handmade objects with scenes of the "passion" produced in the preceding decades.

Developed, therefore, in a Roman milieu, the theme of the traditio legis was widespread throughout the West (from Tunisia comes an interesting sarcophagus, information on which has been published by Bejaoui), entering as well, though to a lesser extent, the figurative repertory of the Eastern workshops, as evidenced, for example, by a silver reliquary from the Archaeological Museum of Thessaloniki discovered at Nea Herakleia (Buschhausen, n. B12). To these workshops, one generally attributes the genesis of a varied formulation of the traditio legis, with the entrusting of the law to Paul, who, at the right hand of Christ seated on a throne, collects a closed scroll with his veiled hands. Such a thematic explanation, certainly later by several decades to the traditio legis containing the image of the apostle Peter, is present on some sarcophagi from Ravenna, those of the twelve apostles in the basilica of S. Apollinare in Classe, which is dated around 440, and Liberius from the church of St. Francis (De Francovich), in addition to the presence of the traditio legis on smaller objects such as the bronze situla discovered near the basilica of S. Marco at Rome and now in the Vatican Museum (Testini, L'iconografia degli apostoli, Catalogo n. 70), and a table with a trim decorated with many figures (Pani Ermini), all artifacts traceable to workshops under the influence of Constantinople. These objects, rather than expressing a desire to oppose Rome—an anachronistic idea for the era of the production of such works within the 5th c. and an idea that was presupposed in the past—seem to reflect devotional movements directed toward emphasis on the figure of Paul.

A particular case in the repertory of the scenes of the traditio legis is represented by the Ravenna sarcophagus of S. Maria in Porto: the personage who receives the law with hands veiled, in fact, is identified with Paul in the upper part and Peter in the lower, according to Testini (L'apostolo Paolo) through a voluntary typological mixing of the two apostles, which inserted a simultaneous traditio legis, which was, on account of its thematic meaning, analogous to the one on a fresco discovered in 1689 at the bottom of the Caelian Hill and attributed to Pope Formosus (891–896), with the conferring of the law to Peter and Paul (de Rossi, Utensili cristiani).

The same constituent model of the traditio legis was also adopted through the iconographic definition of the scene of the bestowal of the keys to Peter, which translates the passage from Mt 16:19: Tibi dabo claves regni coelorum ("I shall grant to you the keys of the kingdom of heaven"), with Christ depicted in the act of extending one or two keys and the apostle who reverently receives them, with hands veiled or holding a receptacle, the flag of the ianitor aethereus, as he is called by the poet Blossius Aemilius *Dracontius (PL 60,857). The connection with the theme of the transmission of the law, which is completed by the traditio clavium and empowers the symbolic message, is well evident from the association of the two images on the most ancient monuments. Thus in the Mausoleum of Constantia, where the N apsidiole bears the representation on a mosaic, which has been very compromised by acts of restoration, of Christ seated on a globe between palms with a scroll in his left hand, and who with his right hand extends to Peter perhaps one key (the subsequent integrations have reduced a singular triangular element; for a different interpretation of the same image, see Théral), and the sarcophagus Repertorium I,200 from St. Sebastian and in that of Gregory V from the Vatican Basilica (Repertorium I,676), both datable to the last third of the 4th c. Likewise in the Ravenna sarcophagus of the twelve apostles, the presence of Peter with the attribute of the key alongside the cross intends to express a device that empowers the basic image of the bestowal to Paul, valuing, through the symbol of investiture, the figure of the apostle. Conversely, a synthetic reference to the traditio legis must be identified in the depiction of a sarcophagus from Civita Castellana (Ranucci Rossi), where at the feet of Christ, who places the key in a receptacle held out by Peter, are two volumina that recall the incisiveness of the magisterium through the apostle, the legal head of the church and the guarantor of the process of salvation.

Therefore, even in its autonomous formation, the traditio clavium is attested to almost entirely in funerary contexts, esp. on sarcophagi, which can be traced to Roman and Gallic manufacturers and datable within the 5th c., but also in painting, as revealed by the frescoes preserved in the small basilica of Sts. Felix and Adauctus at Commodilla, which is attributed to the 2nd half of the 7th c. (Deckers - Mietke - Weiland). In the minor arts a silver amulet preserved at the British Museum (Testini, L'iconografia degli apostoli, Catalogo n. 55), a work from the 5th/6th c. repeats the simple constituent schema of the plastic art: Christ, young and standing, is faced by Peter, who receives with veiled hands a large key; nevertheless, the development of the theme, from the 5th c., is marked by the reduction of the original binary articulation to the sole image of Peter the key bearer, which was widespread esp. in the decoration of the ivory diptychs and small objects.

G.B. de Rossi, Utensili cristiani scoperti a Porto: BACr I, 6 (1868) 42-43; Id., Le medaglie di devozione dei primi sei o sette secoli della chiesa: BACr I, 7 (1869) 43-45; Id., Notizie. Roma e Modena. Medaglie di devozione: BACr II, 2 (1871) 150-151; Id., Nuove scoperte nel cimitero di Priscilla er le escavazioni fatte nell'a. 1887: BACr IV, 5 (1887) 23-29, pl. VII; J. Wilpert, Le pitture delle catacombe romane, Rome 1903; P. Markthaler, Sulle recenti scoperte nell'abbazia imperiale di Farfa: RivAC 5 (1928) 37-88; R. Bartoccini, Notizie. La capsella marmorea di Ravenna: RivAC 7 (1930) 299-302; J. Kollwitz, Christus als Lehrer und die Gesetzesübergabe an Petrus in der konstantinischen K. Roms: Römische Quartalschrift 44 (1936) 45-66; G. Greselin, Frammenti inediti di sarcofagi antichi del Regio Museo di Aquileia: RivAC 14 (1937) 227-241; L. de Bruyne, Notizie. Frammento di sarcofago con resti di una "traditio legis" scoperto a San Sebastiano sulla via Appia: RivAC 16 (1939) 337-345; G. De Francovich, Studi sulla scultura ravennate, I. I sarcofagi: Felix Ravenna 77-78 (1958) 5-171; W.N. Schumacher, "Dominus legem dat": Römische Quartalschrift 54 (1959) 1-39; W.N. Schumacher, Eine römische Apsiskomposition: Römische Quartalschrift 54 (1959) 137-202; C. Davis-Weyer, Das Traditio-Legis-Bild und seine Nachfolge: Münchner Jahrbuch der bildenden Kunst 12 (1961) 7-45; M. Sotomayor, Über die Herkunft der "traditio legis": Römische Quartalschrift 56 (1961) 215-230; Y.-M.-J. Congar, Le thème du "don de la loi" dans l'art paléochrétien: NRTh 94 (1962) 915-933; M. Sotomayor, S. Pedro en la iconografia paleocristiana, Granada 1962; P. Vallin, "Dominus pacem dat." À propos du mausolée de Constantina à Rome: RecSR 51 (1963) 579-592; J.L. Maier, Le baptistère de Naples et ses mosaïques. Étude historique et iconographique, Fribourg 1964, 108-120, pl. VIII; G. Bovini, Un frammento inedito di sarcofago paleocristiano con resti della scena della "traditio legis" nel Museo Civico di Rimini, in Miscellanea di studi dedicati a E. Várady, Modena 1966, 1-7; F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. I. Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967; J. Ruysschaert, L'inscription absidale primitive de S.-Pierre. Texte et contextes: Rend. PARA 40 (1967-68) 171-190; P. Testini, Gli apostoli Pietro e Paolo nella più antica iconografia cristiana, in Studi petriani, ed. S. Garofalo et al., Rome 1968, 103-130; G. Montanari, I dodici Apostoli nei monumenti ravennati. Traditio legis e collegialità, in Atti dei convegni di Cesena e Ravenna (1966-1967), I, Cesena 1969, 337-369; F. Nikolasch, Zur Deutung der "Dominus-legem-dat"-Szene: Römische Quartalschrift 64 (1969) 35-73; R. Sansoni, I sarcofagi paleocristiani a porte di città, Bologna 1969; P. Testini, L'apostolo Paolo nell'iconografia cristiana fino al VI secolo, in Studi paolini, Rome 1969, 69-72; P. Testini, L'iconografia degli apostoli Pietro e Paolo nelle cosiddette "arti minori," in Saecularia Petri et Pauli. Conferenze per il centenario del martirio degli apostoli Pietro e Paolo tenute nel Pontificio Istituto di Archeologia Cristiana, Vatican City 1969, 241-323; H. Buschhausen, Die spätrömischen Metalscrinia und frühchristlichen Reliquiare. I Teil: Katalog, Vienna 1971; P. Franke, "Traditio legis" und Petrusprimat. Eine Entgegung auf Franz Nikolasch: VChr 26 (1972) 263-271; J. Poeschke, s.v. Schlüsselübergabe an Petrus: LCI 4, 82-85; W.N. Schumacher, s.v. Traditio legis: LCI 4, 347-351; P. Borraccino, I sarcofagi paleocristiani di Marsiglia, Bologna 1973, 59-65; K. Berger, Der traditiongeschichtliche Ursprung der traditio legis: VChr 27 (1973) 104-122; Y. Christe, Victoria - Imperium - Iudicium. Un schème antique du pouvoir dans l'art paléochrétien et médiéval: RivAC 49 (1973) 87-109; M.-L. Thérel, Les symboles de l' "ecclesia" dans la création iconographique de l'art chrétien du III^e au VI^e siècle, Rome 1973, 75-101; P. Testini, La lapide di Anagni con la "traditio legis." Nota sull'origine del tema: RivAC 25-26 (1973–74) 718-740; Y. Christe, Apocalypse et "traditio legis": Römische Quartalschrift 71 (1976) 42-55; J. Fink, Das Petrusreliquiar von Samagher: Römische Quartalschrift 71 (1976) 22-41; Ch. Pietri, Roma christiana. Recherches sur l'Église de Rome, son organisation, sa politique, son idéologie de Miltiade à Sixte III (311-440), Rome 1976, 1414-1445; L. Pani Ermini, Una mensa paleocristiana con bordo istoriato: Rivista dell'Istituto Nazionale di Archeologia e Storia dell'Arte 1 (1978) 89-117; F. Bisconti, Lastra incisa inedita della catacomba di Priscilla (con note di revisione critica sul metodo di individuazione della fenice nell'arte paleocristiana): RivAC 57 (1981) 60-61; A. Recio Veganzones, Las pinturas de la catacumba "ad decimum" de Grottaferrata: RivAC 59 (1983) 363-409; A. Recio Veganzones, Sarcófago paleocristiano y parte de otro pagano en la fachada de la basílica de la abadía de Farfa: RivAC 61 (1985) 77-112; R. Sörries, Das Bild des Christus-Rex in der Sarkophagplastik des vierten Jahrhunderts, in Studien fur frühchristilichen Kunst II (ed. G. Koch), Wiesbaden 1986, 139-159; W. Binsfeld, Eine frühchristiliche Darstellung in Trier: Trierer Zeitschrift 50 (1987) 293-299; D.J. Stanley, The Apse Mosaics at Santa Costanza: Observations on Restorations and Antique Mosaics: Mitteilungen des Deutschen Archäologischen Instituts. Römische Abteilung 94 (1987) 29-42; G. Cantino Wataghin, La trasmissione del potere: traditio imperii, traditio legis, in Civiltà dei Romani. Un linguaggio comune, ed. S. Settis, Milan 1993, 62-75; J. Deckers - G. Mietke - A. Weiland, Die Katakombe "Commodilla." Repertorium der Malereien. Mit einen Beitrag zu Geschichte und Topographie von C. Carletti, Vatican City 1994, 50-57, Farbtaf. 3a; F. Bisconti, s.v. Paolo and s.v. Pietro: EAM 9, 152-156, 393-397; C. Ranucci Rossi, Gesti ed atteggiamenti nella plastica paleocristiana: note sul sarcofago di Civita Castellana: RivAC 74 (1998) 297-310; M.B. Rassmussen, Traditio legis?: CArch 44 (1999) 5-37; L. Spera, s.v. Traditio legis et clavium: TIP 288-293; M.B. Rassmussen, Traditio legis - Bedeutung und Kontext: Acta Hyperborea 8 (2001) 21-52; F. Bejaoui, Le sarcophage de Lemta, in Akten des Symposiums "Frühchristliche Sarkophage" (Marburg, 30.VI–4.VII.1999), Mainz 2002, 13-27; F. Bisconti, Variazioni sul tema della Traditio legis. Vecchie e nuove acquisizioni: VetChr 40 (2003) 251-270; N. Ciavolino, Scavi e scoperte di archeologia cristiana in Campania dal 1983 al 1993, in Atti del VII Congr. Naz. di Arch. Cristiana (Cassino, 20–24 settembre 1993), Cassino 2003, 657-659; E. Canetri, Nota sulla ricostruzione del sarcofago della 'Traditio Legis' nel Museo di S. Sebastiano a Roma, in Sarcofagi tardoantichi, paleocristiani e altomedievali, ed. F. Bisconti e H. Brandenburg, Vatican City 2004, 185-199; B. Snelders, The Traditio Legis on Early Christian Sarcophagi: Antiquité tardive 13 (2005) 321-333; L. Hodne, The "Double Apostolate" as an Image of the Church: A Study of Early Medieval Apse Mosaic in Rome: Acta ad Archeol. et Artium Hist. Pert. 20 (2006) 143-162.

L. Spera

TRADITION. Faced with the question of tradition in the ancient church, we must first recall that the *canon of the NT was not formed until the end of the 2nd c. If we set aside the OT, which by this point had already received its definitive canonical form and therefore did not pose a problem of tradition, but only interpretation, there was therefore, during this long interval of 200 years, no "*Scripture" alongside "tradition," but instead the totality of the preaching and teaching that referred to *Jesus and the *apostles constituted "tradition," παράδοσις.

We therefore seek to trace the steps in the evolution of this idea during this era. From the chronological point of view, the Pauline come first. O. Cullmann brought forth convincing arguments that in the writings of the apostle Paul a twofold conception of tradition is found: on the one hand, inasmuch as he was a theologian who received his training in the school of the rabbis, he faithfully transmitted the tradition that he himself had received; on the other hand, inasmuch as he was an apostle who had received his mission from the Risen Lord, he considered himself vested with the power of transmitting this tradition with the authority of the living Lord himself (see 1 Cor 11:23-24; 15:1-4). The Lord Jesus is therefore not just the object but also the acting subject of the preaching. Now, it is precisely because of the apostle's awareness of his own authority, conferred by the *Holy Spirit, that Paul tends to distinguish clearly between the tradition received and its explanation and application, which can and must change according to concrete circumstances (see 1 Cor 7:10-12:25, 40). L. Goppelt has esp. insisted on this "hierarchy" of the traditions in the apostle's writings.

During the "pseudepigraphal" period that followed and that went from ca. AD 60 to 120, the canonical gospels were drafted just as the so-called deuteropauline and Catholic Epistles were. These writings are characterized by the same desire to speak in the name of the apostolic authority that faithfully transmitted the tradition, but they do not hesitate to apply it freely and sovereignly, according to the needs of preaching and exhortation. In relation to what we see in the Pauline writings, it is evident that the meaning of the hierarchy of the traditions, and hence some of the differences of value that we must attribute to them, tends to disappear; it is significant that the Pastoral Epistles, for example, only speak of the "deposit" that must be preserved as such (see 1 Tim 6:20), and we often find by this point the stereotypical formula that the tradition must be maintained "without adding or taking anything away."

In the 2nd c. the church passed through a real crisis of tradition. The generation of the apostles and their disciples, of prophets and charismatic teachers had disappeared; Christian communities were dispersed into different provinces of the empire, without being interconnected by a central court of appeals. During this precarious situation, they began to emphasize the apostolic *succession of the bishops that would guarantee the authenticity of the tradition (see 1 Clem. 42-44), and they had recourse to such recognized authorities as the apostle Paul (see Polycarp, Phil. 3,2) and the presbyters (Papias, in Eus., HE 3,39,3-4), as well as the "rule of faith" (regula fidei*) (see Arist., Apol. 15,2). Nevertheless, in face of the *gnostic movement, which was spreading rapidly and universally at this time, even if under different forms, with a clear bent toward dissolving the tradition, the Great Church, to avoid its foundations being called into question, had to find a more coherent and solid position.

It is not our objective to outline here the concept of tradition as it appears in the various gnostic schools. It suffices to say that the gnostics were not content with simply interpreting the common apostolic tradition in their own way, but they referred to a vast treasure of esoteric apostolic tradition. The gnostic writings also insist on a form of "apostolic succession" (see Ptolemy, Epistle to Flora, in Epiph., Pan. 33,7,9). *Irenaeus, *Tertullian and *Clement of Alexandria intervened at that time—each one in his own way and in a specific place—to energetically prevent gnosticism's peaceful infiltration into the church. Thanks to these theologians, the tide of gnosticism was blocked, and the church received the doctrinal pillars on which it would then be built. It is worth examining more closely the respective positions of these three Fathers on this topic.

For Irenaeus of Lyons the canon of the writings of the NT, which had recently been formed in response to *Marcion, became the chief weapon in his battle against gnosticism. But he was aware that this weapon, by itself, was not enough. He had to provide proof, moreover, that this canon of the church contained the complete and authentic apostolic tradition and also that this tradition was correctly interpreted in the church. The first proof was supplied, in Irenaeus's eyes, by the uninterrupted succession of the bishops in the apostolic churches (see Adv. haer. III, praef.; 1,1; 2,1-4,1); the second proof is given by the fact that there is a perfect concordance between the "rule of faith" of the apostolic churches and their interpretation of Scripture. Irenaeus also affirmed that the bishops have received the charisma veritatis (Adv. haer. IV,26,2), but scholarly opinion is divided concerning the precise implications of this concept.

In his De praescriptione haereticorum, *Tertullian apparently follows the path outlined by Irenaeus, but his thought is more legal in orientation, more marked by formal logic with respect to that of his predecessor: according to Tertullian, in fact, the transmission of tradition is done within the churches that are connected to each other by relations of kinship; this transmission thus corresponds to the administration of an inheritance left by a founder, an administration that is only entrusted to the legitimate descendants, members of the family. The heretics are, on every count, usurpers; their claims can be rejected by means of praescriptiones (see Praescr. 19-21).

Lastly, *Clement of Alexandria strove to render innocuous the attraction that gnosticism exerted over certain Christians, showing that the sources of the "true gnosis" are found within the heart of traditional Christianity and that there would never be sufficient progress on the arduous path that leads to perfection; Clement thus hoped to encourage the best Christians to undertake this path (see Strom. VI,7,61,1-3; 15,124,3-5; 131,4-5; VII,16,103,5; 104,1-2). The Great Church, moreover, also has its "secret" apostolic tradition that is unknown to the mass of believers but was transmitted by a master to a pupil (Strom. I,1,11,3-12,1; Hypotyposeis, in Eus., HE 2,1,4).

With these responses, differing in detail but converging at their core, gnosticism was by that time considered as heresy. But not all the difficulties were thus solved. On another level, it was precisely during this era that there emerged another discussion. In fact, despite the value of the Scriptures, interpreted according to the norms of the rule of faith and in continuity with the apostolic origins due to the uninterrupted succession of bishops, there remained some "gray areas" that could not be filled by a simple recourse to the already established tradition. What must one think, esp., of the liturgical and disciplinary tradition of the church? Does this have the same value as the doctrinal tradition? Tertullian himself, whom we saw at work as a convinced heresiologist, once he became a Montanist, spoke for the first time of "traditions" in the plural, and meant by that some liturgical and disciplinary customs of the church that have no biblical foundation; these customs are connected to the ecclesiastical consuetudo and can be explained rationally (Cor. 3-4). To the same era are joined a series of liturgical formularies and disciplinary rules in a book known by the revealing title of Apostolic Tradition*.

Now, we must emphasize that the church was still aware of the fact that this customary practice was not to be confused with the kerygmatic and doctrinal tradition, which alone was normative.

Two episodes from that age provide us sufficiently clear information on this matter: the first, on the one hand, was with respect to the controversy on the date of Easter at the end of the 2nd c. (see Eus., HE 5,24,2-6.13), and on the other, the controversy concerning the baptism of the heretics in the mid-3rd c. (see Cypr., Ep. 71-75). In these two cases, the bishop of *Rome—in the first case *Victor, in the second case *Stephen I—sought to impose on other churches the customary practice of their own church; in the two cases, however, the attempt was unsuccessful. First Irenaeus, then *Cyprian, *Firmilian and *Dionysius of Alexandria (in Eus., HE 7,3-4) argue that the bishop of Rome transgressed the limits of his competency by threatening to excommunicate sister churches that followed another tradition that was just as well established as that of the Church of Rome. The church from the end of the 2nd and the 3rd c. still tolerated a certain pluralism in liturgical and disciplinary matters. Nevertheless, it was not only in the sphere of ecclesiastical customs that there remained a "gray area" but also in the area of doctrine; it was here that personal theological research found a broad area of exercise and one which the theological schools developed. After humble and traditional beginnings in 2nd-c. apologetics (see Just., 1 Apol. 6,2; 10,1; 66,1), this theology first developed at *Alexandria. *Origen began his systematic investigation On First Principles, stating that he wanted precisely to study the questions that the "rule of faith" (regula fidei) had left open (see De princ. I, praef. 2-3; 7-8; 10). As long as the fruits of this theological search remained the private affair of a teacher and the circle of his students, the plurality of opinions posed no difficulty; but when these opinions reached the broader public, finding a large audience and also inciting opposition, it was necessary to find a general and common solution for the questions that had been raised. The church would find itself faced with this difficulty over the course of the following two centuries.

In effect, the division of the church provoked by the trinitarian debates at the beginning of the 4th c.

took on dimensions such that a new court of appeals had to be created for decisions in areas pertaining to dogmatics and discipline. This court of appeals was the ecumenical council. The particular circumstances that, following the conversion of the emperor, transformed the church of the martyrs into an institution supported by the state made it possible for the pre-Constantinian model of the provincial synod to manifest itself within the universal church. The emperor himself convoked the council, participated in the deliberations and enforced the application of the conciliar decisions. One cannot overestimate the importance of the First Ecumenical Council of *Nicaea. It was, in fact, a theological event of first importance, but it also marked a turn in the evolution of the concept of tradition and church. What made this event important was neither the number of bishops present nor the relevance of imperial protection, but rather the notable fact afterward: for the first time, and in full awareness of the implications of its act, a council formulated a doctrine that went beyond the limits of the tradition received in the church, whose exclusive norm until that time had been the testimony of the Scriptures and its interpretation that was in keeping with the rule of faith: now, however, a council had adopted the term ὁμοούσιος (homoousios) in the creed, a term that had no scriptural basis and that, moreover, was rather compromised by its prehistory. The disputes surrounding this crucial problem would last throughout the entire 4th c.: on the one hand, one found the *Arians and their sympathizers, who made themselves out to be the "traditionalists," and, on the other, *Athanasius and his friends, who carried out the role of the "progressives"; the latter group had to provide proof against the former that, in this particular case, a term that was nontraditional matched the "spirit" of the tradition better than did the traditional theological language (see Athan., Ep. ad Afros 6).

It is fascinating to see that during the same era patristic proof made its appearance in the Christian tradition. The Fathers—esp. the fathers of Nicaea—now constituted a new authority to which one must subject oneself. Their definition of the dogma of the *Trinity created a new tradition that was juxtaposed to the ancient one inasmuch as it was its correct interpretation and elucidation. Moreover, the bishops were no longer solely the guarantors and the administrators of the apostolic heritage (e.g., when facing heretical falsifications), but they were enabled—inasmuch as they were a conciliar assembly—to create a new tradition in the name of the apostolic spirit.

Athanasius decidedly made this his point of view and defended it on several occasions. But it was esp. *Basil the Great who reflected this new concept of tradition in his definition of the doctrine of the *Holy Spirit, which would find its dogmatic formulation of the Council of *Constantinople in 381. In his work On the Holy Spirit, Basil appealed to the liturgical customs of his church, customs derived from the trinitarian baptismal formula, in order to make the case for the homoousia of the Holy Spirit with the *Father and the Son. The lex orandi became the lex credendi: Basil strove, it is true, to demonstrate the ancient origins of the lex orandi, but at the end of the day, he began from the axiom of the "*apostolicity" of everything that the church, in its living reality animated by the Spirit, represented and confessed, and thought that it would be wrong to abolish that principle. As one can see, the nonwritten traditions that were regarded as adiaphora in the 3rd c. now received the consecration of the apostolicity and became constituent.

The Greek fathers after Basil of Caesarea frequently referred to 2 Th 2:15 to provide biblical justification for tradition in its twofold written and oral form (see, e.g., John Chrysostom, In Ep. II ad Thess. hom. 4,2; John of Damascus, De fide orth. IV,16). It is truly puzzling that the Eastern churches did not subsequently develop their tradition, despite the fundamental affirmation—expressed esp. by *Gregory of Nazianzus (Oratio 31,26-27)—that an evolution of dogma is possible. In the West, the Council of Trent would not fail to cite St. Basil, which would cause the Protestant Reformers to object to this placement of "Tradition" and "traditions" on an equal plane (see H. Beintker).

In the West, the evolution followed yet another course, in conformity to the taste of the Latin spirit for the clear and established order. On the one hand, we find here some texts that bear witness to the same regard for conciliar decisions as for the tradition of the Fathers. In particular, St. *Augustine—just as Basil of Caesarea before him—willingly attributed an apostolic origin to the ecclesiastical traditions universally spread in the church of his time (see Bapt. II,7,12; V,17,23; 23,31; De Genesi ad litt. I,10,20). On the other hand, the Fathers reflected on the criteria that allowed one to accept tradition in a critical way: what is it that allows one to distinguish authentic and acceptable tradition from inauthentic and unacceptable tradition? *Vincent of Lérins had the credit of having raised, in his Commonitorium, in dialogue with the Augustinian inheritance, the systematic bases that determined the concept of tradition in the West. Vincent placed Scripture above tradition without equivocation (Comm. 2,1-2). Now, the correct interpretation of Scripture is not without problems and the church must have recourse to tradition (Comm. 2,2). Nevertheless, tradition is presented under different forms: all its aspects are not of the same value. It was in this context that Vincent articulated his definition that became famous: Id teneamus, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est ("Let us hold onto what has been believed everywhere, always and by all," Comm., 2,3). It is important for understanding this definition that these three criteria of universitas, antiquitas and consensio not be placed on the same level. When the present situation of the church does not allow a debated question to be resolved by the majority of the churches in a definite sense (ubique), one must have recourse to tradition (semper); within the tradition, however, are the conciliar decisions (ab omnibus), which account for more than the isolated voices of the Fathers. It is evident that recourse to tradition cannot be the solution to all problems. Vincent admitted, for this reason, the possibility of a doctrinal evolution in the church (Comm., 23,28). It is interesting to note the role that he, in this context, attributed to the councils (Comm., 23,32). The definition of the function and authority of tradition proposed by Vincent of Lérins can still provide a valuable service in ecumenical dialogue.

DTC 15, 1252-1350; D. van den Eynde, Les Normes de l'Enseignement Chrétien dans la littérature patristique des trois premiers siècles, Gembloux-Paris 1933; O. Cullmann, La Tradition. Problème exégétique, historique et théologique, Neuchâtel-Paris 1953 ([2]1968); E. Flesseman van Leer, Tradition and Scripture in the Early Church, Assen 1954; R.P.C. Hanson, Origen's Doctrine of Tradition, London 1954; H.E.W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth: A Study in the Relations Between Orthodoxy and Heresy in the Early Church, London 1954; L. Goppelt, Tradition nach Paulus: Kerygma und Dogma 4 (1958) 213-233; J.N. Bakhuizen van den Brink, Traditio im theologischen Sinne: VChr 13 (1959) 65-85; M. Kremser, Die Bedeutung des Vincenz von Lerinum für die römischkatholische Wertung der Tradition (Tesi), Hamburg 1959; Y. Congar, La Tradition et les traditions. Essai historique, Paris 1960 (Eng. trans. London 1966); H. Holstein, La tradition dans l'Église, Paris 1960; H. Beintker, Die evangelische Lehre von der Heiligen Schrift und von der Tradition, Lüneburg 1961; G.G. Blum, Tradition und Sukzession. Studien zum Normbegriff des Apostolischen von Paulus bis Irenäus, Berlin-Hamburg 1963; H. v. Campenhausen, Kirchliches Amt und geistliche Vollmacht, Tübingen [2]1963; R.P.C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church, London 1962, Philadelphia 1963; H. v. Campenhausen, Schrift und Tradition, Zürich 1963; B. Studer, Träger der Vermittlung: MySal I, Einsiedeln 1965, 545-605 (It. trans. Brescia 1968, vol. II, 69-144); J. Beumer, La Tradition orale, Paris 1967 (Ger. orig. 1962); G.G. Blum, Offenbarung und Überlieferung. Die dogmatische Konstitution Dei Verbum des II. Vaticanums im Lichte altkirchlicher und moderner Theologie, Göttingen 1971; J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, I, Chicago-London 1971; T.B. Bauer, Das Verständnis der Tradition in der Patristik: Kairos 20 (1978) 193-208; R.E. Person, The Mode of Theological Decision Making at the Early Ecumenical Councils, Basel 1978; H.J. Sieben, Die Konzilsidee der Alten Kirche, Paderborn . . . 1979; var. aus., La Tradition Apostolique régulatrice de la communauté ecclésiale aux premiers siècles: L'Année canonique 23 (1979); W. Rordorf - A. Schneider, L'évolution du concept de tradition dans l'Église ancienne, Bern 1982; G. Gassmann, Tradition: Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon 4 (1996), 925-930 (bibl.); J.-G. Boeghlin, La question de la Tradition dans la théologie catholique contemporaine, Paris 1998; P. Grelot, Regole e Tradizione del cristianesimo primitivo, Casale Monf. 1998.

W. Rordorf

TRADITOR (Traitor). The substantive traditor was rarely used in classical Latin, contrary to the frequent use of the verb tradere. It generally refers to a person who handed something over. It primarily describes a negative characteristic, referring to someone who goes against the trust shown to him by one or more persons and expresses in this case the meaning similar to that of proditor. The term is used, among other ways, by *Tacitus in the following sense: Quin potius interfecto traditore fortunam virtutemque suam malo omine exsolverent ("How much better by slaying the traitor, to set free our valour and our fortune from these evil auspices!"– Hist. 4,24); by Anneus Florus: Ordinataque erat in duodecim tabulis tota iustitia, cum tamen traditor fasces regio quodam furore retinebat ("All justice had been laid out on twelve tablets when, however, a traitor retained the fasces in the lawless spirit of the kings," 1,17). Latin Christians used the term traditor also because the idea itself of "betrayal" was present both in the classical Greek literature (Herodotus, Histories 8,30; Sophocles, Philoctetes 94; Plato, Laws 9) and in Sacred *Scripture. In the OT the concept of "betrayal" was expressed, for example, in 1 Macc 12:42-13:23; 16,15-16; 2 Sam 3:27; in the NT the traitor by antonomasia was *Judas Iscariot (Lk 6:16). In the Bible the Jews are also traitors who put Christ to death and before him the prophets (Acts 7:51-53), just as those who hand their friend over to persecutors (2 Tim 3:4). In ancient Christian literature, apostates (Origen, In Io. 28,23) and those who denounce their parents are described in this way (Hermas, Vis. 2,2,2). The very term traditor appears very early on in Latin Christian literature, as one can perceive from this passage written by *Tertullian: Iudam quoque aliquamdiu cum electis deputatum usque ad loculorum officium, etsi iam fraudatorem, traditorem tamen nondum, postea diabolus intravit ("Judas likewise was for a long time reckoned among the elect and was even appointed to the office of their treasurer; he was not yet the traitor, although he was become fraudulent; but afterwards the devil entered into him," De an. 11,5). Moreover, the Latin term traditor indicated—following the footsteps of classical Latin, also, without the negative connotation—the person who taught and passed down the elements of a subject. The term was used in this sense of teaching alicuius materiae, for example, by *Arnobius: Neque enim traditor alicuius esse scientiae potis est, ut non eius quod tradit praecepta habeat cognita ("For neither is one capable of being a teacher of any science who does not know precepts of the subject he teaches," Adv. nat. 3,22), and Tertullian, who describes the traditor as a teacher of a tradition: Hanc nunc expostula, salvo traditionis respectu, quocumque traditore censetur (De cor. 4,7).

In the context of the persecutions ordered by the emperor *Diocletian, the term traditor assumed a technical meaning in Roman *Africa, inasmuch as it referred to the one who had handed over the books of the Sacred *Scriptures to the Roman authorities. Starting from February 303, Diocletian ordered, among other things, to seek out and burn the sacred books (Lactantius, De mort. persec. 13; *Eus., HE 8,2,4-5). This edict was applied in Africa with special zeal. The fact of having handed over the sacred books and the liturgical furnishings (traditio) was considered a very grave offense in the church. A verbal record of a very careful investigation carried out at Cirta has been preserved (Gesta apud Zenophilum: CSEL 26,186), which describes how the search and the consignment of the books was carried out. In Africa several clerics did not offer any resistance; others (e.g., *Mensurius at *Carthage) handed over heretical works; others, however, refused to do so and suffered the consequences. At the end of the persecution some Christians who had rigorist leanings refused to enter communion with those who had given in and thus created a schism (the *Donatists; pars Donati) and accused the others of being traditores. The ordinations conferred by the bishop-traditores came to be seen as invalid by the Donatists (Aug., Bapt. 7,2). They considered themselves to be the heirs of the church of the martyrs and the saints, the only church of Christ, while they accused the Catholic church of being the church of the traditores, that is, of those who had handed over the Scriptures: "The Donatists insult us by calling us traditores" (Aug., Bapt. 7,2,3). "It was not permissible," therefore, "that in the church of God there be martyrs and traitors" (Acta Saturnini 2: ST 65, 50). The term recalled the traditio of Jesus by Judas Iscariot: "Judas handed over Christ in his flesh; you, taken up by spiritual madness, have handed over the gospel to the sacrilegious flames. Judas handed over the Lawgiver to the infidels; you have handed over the Law of God to human beings or, so to speak, its remains, in order to be destroyed" (Aug., Contra litt. Petiliani 2,8,17; Bapt. 7,25,48). The traditio was regarded as a denial of the Word of God and a voluntary placement of oneself outside the church. The Donatists regarded all Catholics as traditores, inasmuch as they had inherited such a crimen through contamination. The debates on this issue continued for more than a century; the Catholics showed that even among the first Donatists there were traditores and that Mensurius was not a traditor; but they attempted to do so in vain. For the Donatists the sacraments (baptism, ordination) administered by the traditores, or by those who had remained in union with them (there is a physical contamination in the transmission of evil), were invalid. The traditores drew on the water of baptism not from the "living stream" of Christ but from "dry cisterns" (Jer 2:13; see Aug., Adversus donatistas 4,9,1; 7,2,3). The Donatist church enjoyed widespread diffusion in Africa: 270 Donatist bishops gathered at Carthage in 336 (see Aug., Ep. 93,10,43: CSEL 34,486); and 310 bishops at Bagai in 394 (see Aug., Contra Cresconium III,52,58: CSEL 52,463). Only in the conference of 411 at Carthage were the conditions for overcoming the African schism laid down in principle.

BA 31, 839-842; 32, 705-706; C. Lepelley, Augustin et la cité romano-africaine, in Jean Chrysostome et Augustin, Actes du Colloque de Chantilly, ed. Ch. Kannengiesser, Paris 1975, 13-39; B. Kriegbaum, Kirche der Traditoren oder Kirche der Märtyrer? Die Vorgeschichte des Donatismus, Innsbruck-Vienna 1986; Y. Duval, Chrétiens d'Afrique à l'aube de la paix constantinienne: les premiers échos de la grande persécution, Paris 2000; E. Zocca, Dai Santi al Santo: un percorso storico-culturale intorno all'idea di santità (Africa romana, secc. 2.-5.), Rome 2003.

W. Turek

TRADUCIANISM. In Antiquity traducianism was set forth as one of the solutions to the problem of the soul's origin: (1) originated from matter which is destroyed at the end of each cyclic conflagration (*Stoicism); (2) created before the birth of each human being and therefore preexistent to its fall in the body (*Platonism); (3) created simultaneously with the body (Christian creationism) or transmitted through generation simultaneously with the body (traducianism both of the material and the spiritual nature, also called in modern times "generationism"). In the writings of Christian authors before the 5th c., esp. *Tertullian (De anima) for the West and *Apollinaris (ps.-Athan., C. Apoll. 2,8: PG 26, 1143) and *Gregory of Nyssa (De hom. opif. 29) for the East, traducianism was connected to the conception of the "corporeal substance" of the soul, even if such corporality was different from what commonly falls under the experience of the senses. Traducianism drew attention in the 5th c., and esp. in the West, following the controversy with *Pelagianism over original *sin and its transmission to each of *Adam's descendants. For the Pelagians (esp. *Julian of Eclanum), acknowledging the transmission of original sin involved the acceptance of the thesis of the traducianism of the soul, in opposition to the established Christian doctrine of creationism. The circle of the Roman Origenists, connected to powerful families of that time, over which Pelagius was head, had already produced *Rufinus's Liber de fide, an antitraducianist work. Those who believed in original sin were called, acc. to the testimony of *Augustine (Op. imp. c. Iul. I,6), "traducianists." The following authors extensively discussed this question at that time: *Jerome (Ep. 126; C. Rufinum 2,8; 13, 28,30), an anonymous author in his dialogue De origine animarum (PL 30,270) and Augustine (Ep. 166 and 190; De gen. ad litt. chs. 6; 7; 10, 11-26; De origine animae = Ep. 176 and 177; De anima et eius origine 1, 16,26; 4, 11,2). Augustine, though rejecting traducianism of the material soul, maintained that it was possible to accept spiritual traducianism alongside creationism (Retr. I,1,3; II,45 and 56), because in each case, faith in the transmission of original sin was not compromised (Op. imp. c. Iul. 11,168). This possibility was also accepted by Augustine's disciples, for example, *Fulgentius of Ruspe (De vera praedest. 3,28) up to *Gregory the Great (Ep. 9,52).

DTC 15, 1350-1365; CE 14, 230; Patrologia IV, 244-245; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Dialogus sub nomine Hieronymi, in Paideia Christiana, Studi in onore di M. Naldini, Rome 1994, 115-130; bibl. s.v. anima; M. Di Marco, La polemica sull'anima tra "Fausto di Riez" e Claudiano Mamerto, Rome 1995 (SEA 51).

V. Grossi

TRAJAN, emperor (53–117). Marcus Ulpius Trajan, Roman emperor from 98 to 117, native of Hispania *Baetica, a brave military commander, famous esp. for his conquest of *Dacia (described in the reliefs of Trajan's column) and for the great public works that he undertook in *Rome (markets, forum and the Basilica Ulpia). There were serious financial difficulties during his rule. He died at Selinous in *Cilicia in 117, after a military campaign against the Parthians. He possessed the title Optimus princeps. Pliny the Younger wrote a famous Panegyric in his honor.

Under Trajan there was a new persecution of the Christians, who were guilty of superstitio illicita: among the victims were *Simeon of Jerusalem and *Ignatius of Antioch. The proconsul of *Bithynia and Pontus, Pliny the Younger, who was responsible for sentencing numerous Christians to death, asked the emperor in 112 (Ep. X, 96) for instructions on this point: Trajan, with a rescript, posited that there was no need to officially seek out the followers of the new religion, but if they were denounced and if they acknowledged the charge, they had to be punished, but never after anonymous accusations. *Tertullian (Apol. II,8) criticized the ambiguity in the emperor's wish not to seek out Christians inasmuch as they were innocent, ordering at the same time to punish them as guilty if denounced. Trajan's rescript served for a long time to oppose Christianity, but the state's formal renunciation of every persecutory initiative (conquirendi non sunt) favored, in a certain way, the existence of Christians in the empire. Trajan did not really regard Christians as a political threat and therefore, as much as possible, sought to tolerate or ignore them.

A. Garzetti, L'impero da Tiberio agli Antonini, Bologna 1960; G. Lanata, Gli atti dei martiri come documenti processuali, Milan 1973, 58ff.; R. McMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire: A.D. 100–400, New Haven, CT 1984; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; Trajano Emperador de Roma, ed. J. González, Rome 2000; BBKL 12, 394-410.

L. Navarra

TRANSITUS MARIAE. A group of apocryphal Marian texts. In patristic, early medieval, *Byzantine and Eastern literature, there exists a group of more than 80 texts pertaining to *Mary's last days (Dormition, Assumption). These are contained in *Greek, *Coptic, *Latin, *Syriac, *Arabic, *Ethiopian, *Armenian, *Georgian, *Irish and *Paleoslavonic texts, which are generally referred to with the Latin title Transitus Mariae ("passage, transfer"), but which bear other names such as the Latin Dormitio Mariae and the Greek Koimēsis Marias etc.

These texts and their translations into various languages were gradually published during the 19th and 20th c.: the most important editors are as follows: for the Greek texts: Tischendorf, Jugie and Wenger; for the Latin texts, Tischendorf, Wilmart, Capelle, Wenger and Haibach-Reinisch; for the Syriac texts: Wright and Smith Lewis; for the Arabic texts: Enger; for the Coptic texts: Revillout, Budge, Evelyn White, Chaine and Arras; for the Ethiopian texts, Arras and Chaine; for the Armenian texts, Vetter and van Esbroeck; for the Georgian texts, van Esbroeck; and for the Irish texts, Donahue. As in the case of the apocryphal acts, these texts are often attributed to various famous individuals such as *John the Evangelist, *Joseph of Arimathea, *Melito of Sardis, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Theophilus of Alexandria, *Evodius bishop of Rome and others.

These texts were liturgical, that is, they were intended to be read or recited during the liturgy of the feast of the *Assumption of Mary, the most important of the Marian feasts, which was introduced by the emperor Maurice (582–602; but this Marian feast could be the most ancient). The texts could be divided into "narratives" (that is, readings for the Marian feast with a specific emphasis on the description of Mary's transitus) and "homilies" (where the descriptive and encomiastic elements coexist), just as the trilogies of the homilies on the Assumption by *Germanus of Constantinople, *John of Damascus and *Andrew of Crete. There exists, moreover, other homilies in the following languages: Greek (e.g., those of *John of Thessalonica), Latin (e.g., *Cosmas Vestitor), Syriac (e.g., *Jacob of Sarug and John of Birtha), Ethiopian (e.g., ps.-Cyril of Jerusalem and *Cyriacus of al-Bahnasa), Arabic (e.g., Cyril of Alexandria) and Coptic (e.g., ps.-Evodius).

All these texts appear related: they speak of Mary's dormition (avoiding the word "death") and her assumption. This schema of the transitus is almost the same in all the texts: an announcement to Mary concerning her "passing" from this world; the arrival of the apostles and their gathering around the Virgin; Christ's arrival, who brings with himself Mary's soul and carries her into heaven; Jewish insults during Mary's solemn funeral rites; punishment of one of these mockers and followed by the miraculous healing of the same individual; the interment of Mary's body in the tomb of Gethsemane; the translation of her body into paradise. In some texts it is the apostles themselves who carry Mary's body into paradise; in others, Mary appears with St. *Thomas. At times the text of the transitus is connected to that of the Apocalypse of Mary. Although this schema is generally the same, the theological tendencies, which were generally expressed in the last chapters of the work, are often different.

Scholars generally accept the existence of an archetype of the transitus, which was most likely originally written in Greek; the Ethiopian and the Syriac texts are probably the closest to the original. There remains, however, the problem of the dating of the first transitus. It is common opinion today that the most ancient texts dates to a period between the end of the 4th c. and the 2nd half of the 5th. The possibility that some texts go back even to the 2nd–3rd c. was proposed by B. Bagatti and E. Testa; the dating of the texts, however, are assigned to the 4th c. by J. Gribomont.

The theme of the transitus had great success, and the text was very popular in ancient literature, esp. Byzantine and Eastern; it immediately entered the great collections of legends and had a deep influence on Byzantine painting and on that of the countries under its influence (Orthodox iconography): in all the Eastern churches, there exists at least one image of the Dormition of Mary.

Lists of the Transitus*:* CANT 100-177 (100A-100F various solutions for the relationship between the texts; and the solution proposed by Aranda Pérez 33-36); more complete in G. Aranda Pérez, Dormición de la Virgen relatos de la tradición copta, Madrid 1995, 285-292. BHG 1055-1057a; BHL 5349-5355; BHO.

Translations: Fr.: S.C. Mimouni - S. Voicu, La tradition grecque de la Dormition et de l'Assomption de Marie, Paris 2003; It.: Erbetta 1/2, 409-649 (the most complete collection); Moraldi 3, 163-282; Craveri, 449-474; Polish: Starowieyski 1/2, 777-834; Sp.: Santos Otero, 568-651; Aranda Pérez (Coptic texts).

Studies: M. Jugie, La Mort et l'Assomption de la S. Vierge, Vatican City 1944; B. Capelle, La fête de la Vierge Marie à Jérusalem au V^e^ s.: Muséon 56 (1943) 1-33; A. van Lantschoot, L'Assomption de la Sainte Vierge chez les Coptes: Gregorianum 27 (1946) 493-526; H. Lausberg, Zur literarischen Gestaltung des "Transitus Beatae Mariae": Historisches Jahrbuch 72 (1953) 25-49; A. Wenger, L'Assomption de la T. S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine, du VI^e^ au X^e^ s., Paris 1955; E. Cothenet, Marie dans les récits apocryphes de l'Assomption, in Maria 6, 1961, 137-141; L. Cignelli, Il prototipo giudeo-cristiano degli apocrifi assunzionisti, in Studia Hierosolymitana, FS B. Bagatti, Jerusalem 1976, 259-277; E. Testa, Lo sviluppo della "Dormitio Mariae" nella letteratura, nella teologia e nell'archeologia: Marianum 44 (1982) 316-389; Id., L'origine e lo sviluppo della "Dormitio Mariae": Augustinianum 23 (1983) 249-262; F. Manns, Le récit de la Dormition de Marie (Vat. grec. 1982). Contribution à l'étude de l'exégèse chrétienne, Jérusalem 1989; S. Mimouni, Dormition et Assomption de Marie. Histoire des traditions anciennes, Paris 1995 (important bibl.); M. van Esbroeck, Aux origines de la Dormition de la Vierge, Aldershot 1995 (collection of articles); M. Clayton, The Apocryphal Gospels of Mary in Anglo-Saxon England, Cambridge 1998; M. Clayton, The Transitus Mariae: The Tradition and Its Origin: Apocrypha 10 (1999) 74-98.

Iconography: J. Duhr, L'évolution iconographique de l'Assomption: NRTh 68 (1946) 671-683; Id., La Dormition de Marie dans l'art chrétien, ibid. 72 (1950) 134-157; B. Bagatti, L'iconografia della Koimesis o Dormitio Mariae: Liber Annuus 25 (1975) 225-253.

M. Starowieyski

TRANSLATIO IMPERII. Since early Christian times a historiographical model has allowed people to understand historical events in a relatively unitary way: that of the translatio imperii. Greek in origin, according to some scholars (Trieber), or Eastern, according to others (Swain), it refers to the passage of the political and military hegemony from one people to another. The model features widely among pagan historians (one simply has to think of Dionysius of Halicarnassus Ant. Rom. I,2,2ff., 3,3; Appian, Hist. Rom. praef. 9-10; or Pompeius Trogus, in Justin, Hist. Philippicarum Epit. 41,1,1ff.; 43,1,1-2), and among the Jews, chs. 2 and 7 of the OT book of Daniel are a confirmation. Even in this respect, one should note that after the Mithridatic Wars and after the Roman conquests in the East, the theory of the empires and their "passing" became a weapon of anti-Roman propaganda, as attested by such writings as the so-called Oracle of Hystapes, the Sibylline Oracles or the Psalms of Solomon. In this way, discourse opens up on both the Jewish and Christian apocalyptic and on the earliest Christian literature and the place that the book of Daniel held there. It seems well-established that in ancient Christianity the introduction of the theory spoken of here derives in the first place from exegesis on the book of Daniel and that on the other hand his visions—setting aside the interpretations of a moral and "nonpolitical" character—in reference to *Rome give rise to different outcomes, so that from an ideological perspective, Rome and the kingdom of God are almost identified, and from an eschatological perspective, the two entities are set each against other and considered incompatible. One should also consult, among other things, the statements of *Jerome (Comm. in Dan. 2,38ff.) and *Orosius (Hist. adv. Paganos 2,1,1ff.). Jerome drew his inspiration precisely at the point where one reads in the book of Daniel (2:21) that God veils the mystery of Nebuchadnezzar's dream and the prophet thanks the Lord who mutat tempora et aetates; transfert regna atque constituit; dat sapientiam sapientibus [. . .]. See also Sir 10:8: "A kingdom is translated from one people to another, because of injustices and wrongs and injuries, and various types of deceits" (Regnum a gente in gentem transfertur propter iniustitias et iniurias et contumelias et diversos dolos). Orosius, for his part, united the theme of the translatio with that of the four kingdoms (see below), for which Babylon was placed at the beginning and Rome at the end among the earthly powers. At the foundation stands the idea that God is the Lord of history and the idea that virtus and moral purity are the cause of the prosperity of the kingdoms and the empires. The theory of the translatio was considered by authors both in its chronological aspect (in every period one sole "kingdom" takes the place of another and stands as a guide for the "civilized world") and in the spatial world (it follows, according to many interpreters, a movement that goes from E to W; there are not lacking, however, variants of this schema, with the "kingdoms" corresponding to the four cardinal points). During the first centuries of the Common Era, Rome was commonly regarded as the heir of the earlier empires (Babylon, Media, Persia, Macedonia and Carthage): its exaltation is mitigated, esp. by Jewish and Christian authors, who emphasize its fragility and announce its approaching end. Thus an interpretive model of universal history sets forth a transhistorical goal, affirming, beyond the human kingdoms that are bound to disappear, the coming of the definitive kingdom of God. The theory of the translatio would continue to be adopted and have considerable support in both the Middle Ages—esp. through the Chronicles—and in subsequent ages. In the 12th and subsequent centuries, several historians would see in the coronation of Charlemagne the translatio from the Romans to the Germans. From the 13th c. onward, Roman curial theology would provoke disagreements and controversies between the pope and the emperor.

C. Trieber, Die Idee der vier Weltreiche: Hermes 27 (1892) 321-344; J.W. Swain, The Theory of the Four Monarchies: Opposition History Under the Roman Empire: CPh 35 (1940) 1-21; W. Baumgartner, Zu den vier Reichen von Daniel 2: ThZ 1 (1945) 17-22; P.A. van den Baan, Die Kirchliche Lehre der Translatio Imperii Romani: Analecta Gregoriana 78, Rome 1956; W. Goez, Translatio Imperii. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Geschichtsdenkens und der politischen Theorien in Mittelalter und in der frühen Neuzeit, Tübingen 1958, 4-36 (for the period that interests us here); B. Gatz, Weltalter, goldene Zeit und sinnverwandte Vorstellungen, Hildesheim 1967, 106-107 and passim. On Daniel's prophecy (chs. 2 and 7) see the contributions offered by M. Delcor (on Jewish and Christian apocalypticism), F. Lucrezi (on book 3 of the Sibylline Oracles), M. Simonetti (on patristic exegesis in the 2nd and 3rd c.), M. Pavan (on the Latin writers after Constantine) and G. Podskalsky (on the writers of the Eastern Roman Empire), in Popoli e Spazio romano tra diritto e profezia, "Da Roma alla Terza Roma," Studi III, Naples 1986, respectively on pp. 11, 25, 37, 291 and 309; H. Thomas, Julius Caesar und die Deutschen, in Die Salier und das Reich, ed. St. Weinfurter, III, Sigmaringen 1991, 245-278; H. Thomas, LMA 8, 944-946, s.v. Translatio imperii; M. Ditsche, LTK 10, 170-171, s.v. Translationstheorie.

P. Siniscalco

TRANSLATIO STUDII. With this expression, scholars refer to the passing of the cultural hegemony from one place to another. This theory maintains that the centers of high formation, study, culture and learning transfer from one city or people to another. There exists a parallelism between the notion of translatio imperii* and that of traditio studii, since the second in a certain way is a necessary restraint on the image conveyed by the first, which represents political power and rule. The idea is already present in the writings of *Cassiodorus and *Isidore of Seville; it became clearer during the Carolingian era: one thinks of the work of Notker Balbu-lus from the title Gesta Karoli Magni. But this also reappears in subsequent ages. The idea of the translatio studii becomes, in short, an interpretive model of history (as is the case with the translatio imperii), adopted from a long interval of time: in the 17th c., for example, Voltaire—in the introduction to the Le siècle de Louis XIV, 1751—with the intention of demonstrating that the sciences, like empires, transfer through various provinces, in a movement from the East and from Greece that leads toward the West, first to the Rome of Augustus, then to the Florence of the Medici and finally to the Paris of Cardinal Richelieu and King Louis XIV.

A.G. Jongkees, Translatio studii: les avatars d'un thème médiéval, in Miscell. Mediev., ed. J.F. Niermeyer, Groningen 1967, 41-51; P. Siniscalco, in Popoli e spazio romano tra diritto e profezia, "Da Roma alla Terza Roma," Studi III, Naples 1986, XXIff.; J. Verger, LMA X, 946-947, s.v. Translatio studii.

P. Siniscalco

TRANSLATIONS, PATRISTIC. Alongside the versions of *Scripture, liturgical and hagiographical texts, patristic translations had a foundational role in the inception of theological reflection in various linguistic contexts. But, in addition to their influence on the intellectual life of the Christian communities, the patristic translations are valuable on the specifically philological level, because they were often taken from models independent of (or more ancient than) those that have been passed down in a direct MS tradition, when works are no longer extant or recensions have been lost in their original language.

The patristic translations pertain, in greater or lesser measure, to almost all the linguistic areas in which Christianity spread from Antiquity until the High and Late Middle Ages. The following presents, in alphabetical order, an overview of the translations; this information should be read in conjunction with the entries dedicated to the body of Christian literature contained in each of these respective languages.

Arabic. Starting from the 7th c., during the Islamic age, scholars began to translate numerous works, first from *Syriac (in a *Nestorian or *monophysite context), then, almost immediately, from *Greek (among the *Melkites), from the *Coptic (in *Egypt) and from the Palestinian Aramaic (in *Palestine). The language used for these translations presents particularities that distinguish it from the Arabic of the Qur'an and is called "Christian Arabic." Starting from the 8th c., scholars translated from the Arabic into other languages: in *Georgian and *Armenian in the Near East and in *Latin and in Spanish in the Iberian Peninsula; in the 13th c., scholars began to make translations in *Ethiopian.

G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, I, Die Übersetzungen (ST 118), Vatican City 1944; J. Blau, A Grammar of Christian Arabic, I-III (CSCO 267, 276, 279 / Subs. 27-29), Lovanii 1966-73; Symposium Graeco-Arabicum: Akten des zweiten Symposium Graeco-Arabicum, Ruhr-Universität Bochum, 3.-5. März 1987: mit einer Synopse des Symposium Graeco-Arabicum I, Wassenaar, 19.-21. Februar 1985, ed. G. Endress et al., Amsterdam 1989; Aristoteles semitico-latinus, Amsterdam 1975ff. (13 vols. appeared as of 2003); M. Van Esbroek, Incidence des versions arabes chrétiennes pour la restitution des textes perdus, in Traduction et traducteurs au Moyen Âge, Paris 1989, 133-143.

Aramaic (Palestinian or Christian). During the first millennium, in the Palestinian Melkite context, some translations were made from Greek; some of these texts were then translated into Arabic.

A. Desreumaux, Les oeuvres de la littérature apocryphe chrétienne en araméen christo-palestinien: Bulletin de l'AELAC 9 (1999) 9-14; Ch. Müller-Kessler - M. Sokoloff, A Corpus of Christian Palestinian Aramaic (5 vols. appeared as of 1999), Groningen 1996ff.; C.A. Ciancaglini, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in siriaco e aramaico, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1009-1022.

Armenian. From the beginning of the 5th c. until the Late Middle Ages numerous translations followed from the Syriac and the Greek; from the 7th c., translations were also made from Arabic. For the most ancient period a distinction is made between the "golden age" (1st half of the 5th c.) and then the "Hellenophile Age" (6th c.?), which was characterized by literalist tendencies, which were at times extreme. Many ancient Georgian translations were carried out on Armenian texts. Many lost works in Greek are preserved in Armenian: books 4-5 of *Irenaeus of Lyons's Adversus haereses and the Epideixis, some treatises attributed to *Philo of Alexandria, the homilies of *Eusebius of Emesa, *Hesychius of Jerusalem and *Severian of Gabala, *Timothy (II) Ailuros's apology against the Council of *Chalcedon, as well as hermetic fragments and, esp., the ancient lectionaries of Jerusalem dating back to the 5th c. The Armenian also preserves works lost in the original Syriac: many texts belong to *Ephrem (the commentaries on Genesis, the Diatessaron, the Acts of the Apostles, the Pauline epistles, various hymns).

J.-P. Mahé, L'Arménie et les Pères de l'Église: histoire et modes d'emploi, in J.-C. Fredouille - R.-M. Roberge, La documentation patristique, Laval-Paris 1995, 158-179; V. Calzolari Bouvier - J. D. Kaestli - B. Outtier, Apocryphes arméniens: transmission, traduction, création, iconographie, Lausanne 1999; R. Ajello, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in armeno, in I Greci, Storia, Cul- tura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 973-983.

Coptic. The first translations from Greek were made at the same time as the creation of the alphabet (3rd c.): these were texts of Asian origin, such as *Melito of Sardis's De anima et corpore and Melito's De pascha, and the ps.-Basilian homily De templo Salomonis. During the 4th–5th c. the writings of many famous patristic authors were translated into Sahidic, esp. those of Alexandrian origin. In the 7th c., after the Islamic invasion, translations were made from Coptic into Arabic. Of utmost importance are some lost works in Greek such as the festal letters of *Athanasius, and the *gnostic texts of *Nag Hammadi and those of the *Manicheans from Medinet Habu.

T. Orlandi, Traduzioni dal greco al copto: quali e perché: Autori classici in lingue del Vicino e Medio Oriente, in Atti del III, IV e V Seminario sul tema: "Recupero di testi classici attraverso ricezioni in lingue del Vicino e Medio Oriente" . . . 1984-1986, ed. G. Fiaccadori, Rome 1990, 93-104; P. Marrassini, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in copto ed etiopico, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 985-1008; A. Camplani, Sulla trasmissione dei testi gnostici in copto: L'Egitto cristiano. Aspetti e problemi in età tardo-antica (SEA 56), Rome 1996, 121-175; M.N. Swason, Recent Developments in Copto-Arabic Studies, 1996-2000, in Coptic Studies on the Threshold of a New Millennium, ed. M. Immerzeel - J. van der Vliet, Leuven 2004, 239-268.

Ethiopian. After the conversion of the kingdom of *Aksum (4th c.) and until the 6th c., many works were translated from the Greek. Among these, one should note the Qērellos, that is, a particular recension of the acts of the Council of *Ephesus (431). After a long period of silence, in the 13th c., scholars began to make translations from Arabic. The sole complete form of the early Christian Apocalypse of Peter dates back to this period.

G. Lusini, Appunti sulla patristica greca di tradizione etiopica: Studi classici e orientali 38 (1988) 469-493; P. Marrassini, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in copto ed etiopico, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 985-1008; P. Piovanelli, Les aventures des apocryphes en Éthiopie: Apocrypha 4 (1993) 197-224; M. Kropp, Arabisch-äthiopische Übersetzungstechnik am Beispiel der Zena Ayhud (Yosippon) und des Tarikä Wäldä-ʿAmid: Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft 136 (1986) 314-346; A. Bausi, San Clemente e le tradizioni clementine nella letteratura etiopica canonico-liturgica, in Studi su Clemente Romano, ed. Ph. Luisier, Rome 2003, 12-55.

Georgian. As early as the 5th c., translations were made from Armenian, Greek and Syriac texts: then, in the 8th c., even from Arabic. Finally, in the 10th c., in the monastery of Iviron on Mount Athos, they returned to translating from Greek. Of special importance are some lost works of *Hippolytus and the ancient lectionaries of *Jerusalem, which were translated between the 2nd half of the 5th and the 8th c.

G. Shurgaia, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in georgiano, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1053-1070; M. Tarchnischvili, Le grand lectionnaire de l'Église de Jérusalem (Ve-VIIIe siècle), I-II (CSCO 188-189, 204-205 / Iber. 9-10, 13-14), Louvain 1959-60.

Gothic. The most important nonbiblical translation is the Skeireins (ca. 400), which preserves the lost commentary of *Theodore of Heraclea on the gospel of *John.

R. Del Pezzo Costabile, La Skeireins: testo, traduzione, glossario, Naples 1973; K. Schäferdiek, Die Fragmente der "Skeireins" und der Johanneskommentar des Theodor von Herakleia, in Schwellenzeit: Beiträge zur Geschichte des Christentums in Spätantike und Frühmittelalter, ed. W.A. Löhr - H.Ch. Brennecke (Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte 64), Berlin 1996, 69-87.

Greek. Translations were made from Latin already in the 3rd c. (acts of the *Scillitan martyrs of *Perpetua and Felicity; Epistle 70 of *Cyprian of Carthage); then *Jerome (De viris illustribus and the Vitae Patrum), as well as the Dialogus and *Gregory the Great's Regula pastoralis, translated by his successor Pope *Zachariah. *Augustine would only be translated in the 13th c. at *Constantinople. There are few translations from Armenian (*Agathangelos and the Narratio de rebus Armeniae), from Georgian (*Barlaam and Joseph) and from Syriac (*Bardesanes, *Ephrem and hagiographical works).

E. Dekkers, Les traductions grecques des écrits patristiques latins: SE 5 (1953) 193-233; D.Z. Nikitas, Traduzioni greche di opere latine, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1035-1051; G. Rigotti, I Padri latini a Bisanzio: traduzioni di Agostino nel secolo XIV, in Tradizioni patristiche nell'umanesimo, ed. M. Cortesi e C. Leonardi, Florence 2000, 273-282; D. Bianconi, Le traduzioni in greco di testi latini, in Lo spazio letterario del medioevo. 3. Le culture circostanti. I. La cultura bizantina, ed. G. Cavallo, Rome 2004, 519-568; R. Gounelle, Traductions de textes hagiographiques et apocryphes latins en grec: Apocrypha 16 (2005) 35-74.

Irish. As early as the 7th c. several NT apocryphal texts were translated, which, however, were often rewritten.

M. McNamara, The Apocrypha in the Irish Church, Dublin 1984.

Nubian. The translations of several hagiographic and patristic texts date back to the 8th–9th c., from Greek, Coptic and perhaps Arabic models.

Pahlavi. Already before the 7th c. there existed translations from Syriac, primarily of scientific or *Manichean texts.

A.M. Piemontese, Percorsi di testi narrativi greci in versione persiana, Atti del convegno Vettori e percorsi tematici nel Mediterraneo romanzo . . ., ed. F. Beggiato - S. Marinetti (Medioevo Romanzo e Orientale. Colloqui 6), Soveria Mannelli 2002, 135-143 (the Passion of St. Parthenope).

Paleoslavonic. Translations have been made from Greek since the 9th c. (the mission of Cyril and Methodius); later also from Latin in W Slavia (Croatia).

F.J. Thomson, Towards a Typology of Errors in Slavonic Translations: Christianity Among the Slavs: The Heritage of Saints Cyril and Methodius, ed. E.G. Farrugia - R.F. Taft - G.K. Piovesana (OCA 231), Rome 1988, 351-380; A. de Santos Otero, Die Handschriftliche Überlieferung der altslavischen Apokryphen, I (PTS 20), Berlin-New York 1978; H. Kølln, Westkirchliches in altkirchenslavischer Literatur aus Grossmähren und Böhmen (Historiskfilosofiske meddelelser 87), Copenhagen 2003.

Sogdian. Before the 9th c., Christian, Manichean and Buddhist texts found at Turpan in Chinese Turkestan were translated from the Syriac.

Syriac. Among the translated works from Greek since the 3rd c. onward, many have been lost or have been reduced to fragments in their direct transmission (*Aristides's Apologia, *Eusebius of Caesarea's Theophania, *Epiphanius of Salamis's De mensuris et ponderibus, etc.), esp. of condemned authors (e.g., *Evagrius, *Nestorius, *Theodore of Mopsuestia, *Severus of Antioch). The Syriac is the source of many Armenian, Georgian, Arabic and Sogdian translations.

S. Brock, Towards a History of Syriac Translation Technique, in R. Lavenant (ed.), III Symposium Syriacum, 1980. Les contacts du monde syriaque avec les autres cultures (Goslar, 7-11 septembre 1980) (OCA 221), Rome 1983, 1-14 [= Id., Studies in Syriac Christianity: History, Literature and Theology, London 1992, num. X]; C.A. Ciancaglini, Traduzioni e citazioni dal greco in siriaco e aramaico, in I Greci, Storia, Cultura, Arte, Società. 3: I Greci oltre la Grecia, ed. S. Settis, Turin 2001, 1009-1022; S. Brock, Du grec en syriaque: l'art de la traduction chez les syriaques, in Les syriaques transmetteurs de civilisations: l'expérience du Bilad el-Sham à l'époque omeyyade, Antelias-Paris 2005, 11-34; Id., Syriac Sources and Resources for Byzantinists, in Proceedings of the 21st International Congress of Byzantine Studies, London, I, Aldershot 2006, 193-210.

Other languages. Translations of patristic texts exist in many other European medieval languages; others have left traces in Sanskrit, Uyghur and Chinese Buddhist texts.

The opposite path was followed by the romance of *Barlaam and Joseph, which reports the Sanskrit traditions on the birth of the Buddha, transmitted through Sogdian and Arabic, used in the Georgian redaction of Euthymius the Hagiorite (ca. 1000), which in turn was the model of the Greek translation, from which the versions in the medieval European languages derived through the Latin.

T.N. Hall, Herod's Burning of the Jewish Genealogies, in Gydinga Saga in the Second Old Norwegian Epiphany Homily: Mediaeval Studies 61 (1999) 173-204; O. Hjelde, Norsk preken i det 12. århundre: Studier i gammel norsk homiliebok [Norwegian homilies of the twelfth century. Studies on the ancient Norwegian book of homilies], Oslo 1990; S.N.C. Lieu, Manichaeism in Central Asia and China (Nag Hammadi and Manichaean studies 45), Leiden 1998, 42-54; J.D.M. Derrett, The Picnic, The Buddha, and St. Matthew: Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society s. III, 14 (2004) 73-79; J.H. Walker, An Argument from the Chinese for the Antiochene Origin of the Didache: SP 8, 44-50; G.R. Woodward - H. Mattingly, Barlaam and Ioasaph, with an English translation. Introduction by D.M. Lang (LCL 34), Cambridge, MA-London 1983, XXXII-XXXV.

S.J. Voicu

TRAVEL – MEANS of COMMUNICATION. The Romans since the earliest times of their history showed that they were aware of the importance of communication and esp. roads. Under the principate, the road system, which had already developed during the era of the Republic, subsequently broadened, making provisions for the construction and maintenance of roads, esp. in the provinces. In the 2nd c. AD the web of communication and traffic reached its maximum level of extension and efficiency.

It is impossible to concretely reconstruct the means and times of travel carried out in *Late Antiquity. At that time many movements occurred by sea, at least from spring to autumn (in the early days of November to March the sea was regarded as "closed," and few put themselves at the risk of a winter navigation if they were not forced to do so). By sea, therefore, with good weather and moderate winds, one could travel nearly 70 km (43.5 mi) per day: a ship arrived in three days from Pozzuoli (Lat. Puteoli) to the mouth of the Tiber River, stopping by Gaeta (Lat. Caieta) and Anzio (Lat. Antium) along the way. But, with a favorable wind, one was able to cover a greater distance in less time, as proven by the case of the apostle *Paul, who in a day or less reached Pozzuoli from Reggio (Lat. Rhegium) (see Acts 28:13). A daily trip of 100 km (62.1 mi), and even greater distances, was not unusual. Navigation by river, however, was slower. Scholars know that in *Gaul there existed a web of navigable canals and rivers that covered the entire territory; to cross it from the mouth of the Seine River to the delta of the Rhone required nearly 30 days, with an average of 33 km (20.5 mi) every 24 hours. There were very few countries, however, that could avail themselves in a systematic way of this type of navigation, which presupposed specific topographical and technological factors. By land, the speed of movements and transportation depended on the means used. By horse, if one could acquire a fresh horse at various stations along the route, one could at best reach 300 km (186.4 mi) a day, as was the case with *Tiberius, when from Ticinum—modern-day Pavia—he went toward *Germany, accompanied only by one messenger, in order to visit his ailing son Drusus. But covering 150-200 km (93-124 mi) over a 24-hour span, by continually changing horses, signified that one was already moving with great speed. Usually travelers used wagons and made stops in order to rest for the night, in taverns or hotels which were interspersed along this system of communication. In this way, they took three to six times longer, but making progress at around 50 km (31 mi) a day: from Brindisi (Lat. Brundisium) to Rome, for example, a traveler needed about 10 days; from *Byzantium to *Alexandria, *Egypt, around 40 days; through a trip by land and sea one came to Rome from Byzantium in approximately 24 days. The person, however, who went by foot pedibus calcantibus was able to reach by night, if not the same mansio in which those who traveled by wagon, a mansio not too far from it: by walking one could usually cover a distance of about 30-40 km (18.6-24.9 mi) a day. But naturally the effort needed for long journeys required that days of walking be interspersed with days of rest (see, e.g., Itin. Egeriae 6,1 and passim).

A very extensive web of communication (at the time of the emperor Diocletian, it constituted a good 372 roads for a total of 78,000 km [48,467 mi]), the reasonable time to travel them, and the assistance and organization that supported wayfarers all allowed for excellent mobility to a considerable number of individuals: officials, artists, professors, students, scientists and even large crowds, who moved for religious or secular reasons and were drawn by sanctuaries or solemnities, feasts or shows. But among those who drew the greatest benefit from this system, one should certainly mention merchants, who not only sailed the Mediterranean but even forged beyond the West, that is, beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and to the East, to India and *China, according to the witness of written documents and archaeological discoveries.

What has been said holds on a broader scale, as is evident, because, along the centuries of Late Antiquity, according to the favorable political, military and social conditions, other, more critical factors intermixed, which immediately had repercussions on the system of communication and the concrete possibilities of moving from one place to another in the oikoumenē. This conglomerate of external conditions undoubtedly facilitated the spread of *evangelization and Christian mission that stretched throughout the Roman Empire and which surpassed its limits esp. toward the East. Of great interest for the history of early Christian topography are the Itineraria; this was a specific literary genre made up of travel diaries and guides; so too the purely geographical descriptions also proved to be useful such as the Tabula Peutingeriana or the work of the Chronograph of Ravenna. Among the Itineraria one must distinguish the ones pertaining to the Holy Land and those pertaining to Rome. The first describe the land and sea routes taken by the authors themselves or by third parties toward *Jerusalem and places in *Palestine and the Near East: one simply has to think of the Itinerarium Burdigalense (333), the Itinerarium Egeriae (383), the Breviarius de Hierosolyma (1st decades of the 6th c.), the De situ Terrae Sanctae (middle of the 6th c.) attributed to a certain Theodosius, the Itinerarium Antonini Placentini (570), to which are added others until the High Middle Ages and beyond. Among the second, that is, those who provide information on the journey toward Rome or the monuments of Rome, one should consult the Itinerarium of John the Priest (under the pontificate of *Gregory the Great [590–604]), the Itinerarium of Malmesbury (648–682), the Itinerarium of Einsiedeln (dating to the age of Charlemagne) and others as well. See *Itineraries; *Pilgrimages.

Critical edition of the major Itineraries in CCL 175-176, ed. by Fr. Glorie, 1965; L. Friedländer, Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms in der Zeit von Augustus bis zum Ausgang der Antonine, I, Leipzig [10]1922, 318ff.; D. Gorce, Les voyages, l'hospitalité et le port des lettres dans le monde chrétien du IVᵉ et Vᵉ siècles, Paris 1925; M.P. Charlesworth, The Trade-Routes and Commerce of the Roman Empire, Cambridge [2]1926; V. von Hagen, The Roads That Led to Rome, Cleveland-New York 1967; G. Radke: PWK, suppl. 13, 1417ff., s.v. Viae publicae Romanae (It. trans. Bologna 1981); P. Siniscalco, Le vie di commercio e la diffusione del cristianesimo, in var. aus., Mondo classico e cristianesimo, Rome 1982, 17-28; P. Siniscalco, Viaggi e viaggiatori nei primi secoli della nostra era, in Vie di comunicazione e incontri di culture dall'Antichità al Medioevo tra Oriente e Occidente, ed. M. Vacchina, Trento 1994, 21-35; R. Fellmann, Réseaux routiers et échanges à travers les cols alpins occidentaux, ibid., 81-92; P. Di Paola, Viaggi, trasporto e istituzioni. Studi sul cursus publicus, Messina 1999; S. Medas, De rebus nauticis. L'arte della navigazione nel mondo antico, Rome 2004; Travel, Communication and Geography in Late Antiquity: Sacred and Profane, ed. L. Ellis - F.L. Kidner, Ashgate 2004; C. Regnier, Paul de Tarse en Méditerranée: Recherche autour de la navigation dans l'Antiquité (Ac 27-28,16), Paris 2006.

P. Siniscalco

TRIER
I. Christianity - II. Council.

I. Christianity. The ancient Colonia Augusta, capital of the Treviri, then the civitas Treverorum (4th c.), the seat of the prefecture of the praetorian, the capital of the diocese of *Gaul and of the Belgica Prima province; Urbs Treverica, Treverus (7th c.). The Christian origins of this city are not well known; the episcopal list, which Duchesne regards as a reliable document, mentions three bishops before *Agricius, a signatory at the Council of *Arles in 314. The first church prelate, Eucharius, may have occupied the see during the last quarter of the 3rd c. He is not attested, however, before the 5th c., when bishop Cyril dedicated to him a memoria along with Valerius, the second bishop on the list (Gauthier, Évangélisation, 11-16). Maternus, mentioned third on the list, is actually attested to for Cologne: his presence in the catalog of Trier is perhaps owed to the introduction of his relics. The Vita Eucharii, Valerii et Materni (BHL 2655), which was redacted in the 10th c., is of no historical value.

The Christian history of Trier begins in the 4th c., precisely when the city, which for a century had become an imperial residence, witnessed new structural and demographic developments. Hence the growing role within ecclesiastical politics of its bishops close to power and the remarkable advances in conversions, attested by epigraphy (Gauthier, Recueil, I,59; Gauthier, Évangélisation, 84-86). After Agricius (314), *Maximinus (335–before 351), who knew *Athanasius during his exile at Trier (335), performed an effective role in the negotiations that preceded the Council of *Sardica (343); his predecessor *Paulinus, who also opposed the *Arianizing politics of the emperor *Constantius II, was expelled from his episcopal see for having refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, at the Council of *Arles (353), and died in exile (358). Succeeding a little-known Bonosius (d. 375), Britto, who had connections with *Ithacius, the Spanish bishop and enemy of *Priscillian, seems to have been indirectly involved in Priscillian's trial and was exposed, until his death, to the hostility of an entire party of bishops who condemned the emperor *Maximus's intervention. After the plundering of the city (an event recalled by *Salvian), Trier experienced a period of tumults that ended at the end of the 5th c. with the Frankish annexation. Little is known of the bishops Maurice, Legontius (perhaps, according to Ewig [Trier, 40], mentioned in a letter of Pope *Leo), Severus, a disciple of *Lupus of Troyes, who evangelized the Alamanni, Cyril, known from one of his funerary poems (Gauthier, Recueil, I,59), and Iamblichus, who had to leave Trier and died at Chalon-sur-Saône. Afterward there were bishops who were entirely unknown: Emerus (?), Marus, Volusianus, Miletus and Modestus, attested in the Hieronymian Martyrology (19 September), and last Apricolus, mentioned by *Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum VI,3). The 6th c. was dominated by two metropolitans: *Nicetius (525–566/569), a monk who owed his episcopate to King Theodoric I, king of Austrasia, and Magneric, his successor (d. after 587). Both men were great builders: Nicetius restored the episcopal complex and erected a castellum at Mediolanus; Magneric built St. Martin's. Nicetius, moreover, an ascetical figure, celebrated as the protector of the weak, having been contested by the Frankish aristocracy, enjoyed a prestige that authorized him to write to the emperor *Justinian a letter of rebuke on the condemnation of the "*Three Chapters" in a letter to Chlothsind, wife of the *Longobard (Lombard) king Alboin, an *Arian, exhorting Clovis's granddaughter to imitate *Clotilde (CPL 1063). For the 7th c., the episcopal list mentions Guntheric, Sabaudus (Council of Paris 614), Modoald, who is less obscure (Council of Clichy, 627), propagator, according to the Gesta Treverorum (9th c.), of *monasticism, Numerian (643/647), Basinus and Leothwine, who was succeeded by his son Milo (723/751), also titular of the see of *Reims. The epigraphic testimony (esp. for the 4th and the 5th c.: see Recueil, pl. VII), and esp. the monumental development, exhibits the splendor and then the decline of Trier: inside the walls, the episcopal complex appears as one of the most important of the 4th c., with two basilicas (St. Peter's and, to the S, St. Mary: see Kempf; and Oswald, 340-341), a baptistery and the monasterium S. Mariae (Modoald's?); outside the walls, in the cemeterial area to the N, Felix built a memoria of Eucharius for his predecessor Paulinus, to which was added, before the 6th c., the basilica dedicated to St. Maximinus; to the NW, St. Martin; and to the S of the memoria of Eucharius (St. Mathias's) founded by Cyril in the 5th c. (Cüppers), without counting some foundations of an uncertain date attested by later texts (Gesta Treverorum from the 11th c., ecclesia S. Symphoriani, S. Crucis).

Duchesne, Fastes III, 33-39; E. Ewig, Trier in Merowingerreich. Civitas, Stadt, Bistum, Trier 1954; Th.K. Kempf, Untersuchungen und Beobachtungen am Trierer Dom 1961-1963: Germania 42 (1964) 126-141; H. Cüppers, Das Gräberfeld von St. Matthias . . ., in W. Reusch, Frühchristliche Zeugnisse, Trier 1965, 165-174 and TZ 32 (1969) 269ff.; F. Oswald, Vorromanische Kirchenbauten, Munich 1971, III, 340-350; N. Gauthier, Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule, I, Paris 1975, 1-237; N. Gauthier, L'évangélisation des pays de la Moselle, Paris 1980 (bibl.); N.

Gauthier, Trèves, in Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII[e] siècle. I. Province ecclésiastique de Trèves (Belgica Prima), Paris 1986, 13-32.

Ch. Pietri - M. Ghilardi

II. Council. Despite the reservations expressed by *Ambrose of Milan, *Martin of Tours, *Hyginus of Cordoba and many other Western bishops, many Gallic bishops who had gathered at Trier approved of the conduct of *Ithacius of Ossonuba (or Ossobona?) during the case of *Priscillian and urged the emperor *Maximus to take new measures against the partisans of the same group. They provided Felix as the successor to Britto of Trier. Hence, the name of the Felician "schism" assigned to this division of the episcopate.

CCL 148, 47-48; SC 241, 117-123; Palazzini 5, 407.

Ch. Munier

TRIFOLIUS, presbyter (6th c.). As a presbyter of the church of *Rome, probably before 519, Trifolius sent to Senator Faustus (see PLRE II,454-455 n. 9), who had evidently made the request, a report on the *Acacian schism (Ep. Trifolii presbyteri ad beatum Faustum senatorem), in which, on the basis of the authority of the Council of *Chalcedon (451), he judged as dubious the *theopaschite formula Unus de Trinitate passus est, recognized by the Scythian monks who were led by *John Maxentius. According to Trifolius, the idea of a direct suffering of the divine nature, which could be implied in that formula, might give rise to heretical interpretations.

CPL 655; PL 63, 533-536; E. Schwartz, Publizistische Sammlungen zum acacianischen Schisma 59: ABAW 10 (1934) 115-117; CCL 85A, 137-138; J.A. McGuckin, The "Theopaschite Confession" (Text and Historical Context): A Study in the Cyrilline Re-interpretation of Chalcedon: Journal of Ecclesiastical History 35 (1984) 239-255; F. Carcione, La controversia tra Ormisda e i monaci sciti sulla formula "Unus de Trinitate passus est carne": calcedonismo integralista e calcedonismo integrato a confronto, in Atti del Convegno su Papa Ormisda (514-523). Magistero, cura pastorale ed impegno ecumenico, ed. C. Noce, Frosinone 1993, 57ff.; C. Sotinel, Le rôle des expertises dans les débats théologiques du VI[e] siècle: SP 34 (2001) 242-246; PCBE 2, 2213-2214.

P. Marone

TRINITATE FIDEI CATHOLICAE, De. This *Priscillianist work was discovered by Turner in the MS of Laon (France) from the Carolingian era and was published by G. Morin in 1913. The author is unknown, who could be Priscillian, Istantius or some anonymous Priscillianist. His trinitarian theology is the ancient type marked by *monarchianism. The author is not concerned about the distinction between the three divine persons: he acknowledges and justifies it. The Son is the first in time, although the *Holy Spirit is "proffered" in tempore and begins his existence with the outpouring of the Word on human beings. There exists a priority, which does not include a distinction, that would equal a separation, as in the material domain.

CPL 788; PLS 2, 1487-1507; G. Morin, Un traité priscillianiste inédit sur la Trinité: RBen 26 (1909) 255-280 = G. Morin, Études, textes, découvertes, Maredsous 1913, 151-205; G. Mercati, Opere minori, ST 78, Vatican City 1937, 502-510; A. Orbe, Doctrina trinitaria del anónimo priscilianista "De Trinitate fidei catholicae": Gregorianum 49 (1968) 510-562; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila: the Occult and the Charismatic in The Early Church, Oxford 1976, 100-102.

A. Di Berardino

TRINITATE, De, (ps.-)Athanasius. This is a collection of various documents pertaining to the doctrine of the Trinity, mistakenly attributed to *Athanasius. Books 9-12 are entirely independent of the first group, formed more homogeneously from books 1-8. These, in turn, have come down to us in a double redaction; the first, more brief and ancient (1-7), the other later and more worked out (1-8). There still remains the uncertainty of its author, place of origin and historical era. The position that attributes this work to *Eusebius of Vercelli lacks reliable arguments. The work reveals the author's primary intention in insisting on the unity of the trinitarian mystery (1-2). With book 3, the author passes on to the mystery of the *incarnation, with the relevant allusion to the two natures in Christ. Books 4-6 refute heretical movements, esp. those that deny the divinity of the *Holy Spirit. Book 7 returns to the trinitarian mystery. Moreover, the entire treatise expresses very advanced trinitarian teaching. The chief basis remains the baptismal formula of Mt 28:19. The *Christology insists esp. on the reality of the human nature, expressed in the formula homo adsumptus (III,16-18). The certainty with which the author tends to prove the divinity of the third person is quite impressive. This aspect of the treatise leads more recent scholars to date the work from 380 onward. A characteristic of the work is the appearance of the so-called Johannine comma (1 Jn 4:7) (Trin. I,43): the presence of the passage seems to indicate the treatise's belonging to the Spanish milieu of the last decades of the 4th c.

PL 62, 237ff.: CCL 9 (Bulhart) 1-99. It. trans.: L. Dattrino, Ps. Atanasio. La Trinità, Rome 1980; M. Simonetti, Studi sul "De Trinitate" ps. atanasiano: NuovoDid 3 (1949) 57ff.; M. Simonetti, Qualche osservazione sul De Trinitate attribuito ad Eusebio di Vercelli: RCCM 5 (1963) 386ff.; L. Dattrino, Il De Trinitate ps. atanasiano, Rome 1976; L. Dattrino, Il De Trinitate ps. atanasiano, opera di catechesi?: Lateranum n.s. 44 (1978) 425-448; Id., Nuovi studi sul De Trinitate Pseudoatanasiano, Rome 1991.

L. Dattrino

TRINITY

I. Premises - II. The Ante-Nicene period - III. The Nicene dogma and its universal reception - IV. The inheritance of the Fathers.

I. Premises. There is no doubt that Christians, from the very beginning, were very different from other believers, Jews and non-Jews, inasmuch as they admitted converts to the community of Jesus Christ, baptizing them in the name of the *Father, the Son and the *Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19; Didache 7; Justin, 1 Apol. 61; Acts of Thomas, 121; ps.-Clem., Hom. XI 26,2; Apostolic Tradition 21). The origin of this form of initiation, established by Christ's command, has not yet been clarified (with respect to this point, one should keep in mind the exegetical decisions on the apostolic origins of the trinitarian faith). Nevertheless, two things are certain: on the one hand, baptismal faith has its roots in the Easter experience of the early communities, an experience established on the prophetic experience of Jesus, who felt himself so united to the Father to speak in his name and die according to his will for the salvation of humankind, an experience prepared by the faith of Israel in the one God, the creator of all things and the savior of the righteous, and supported by the hope in the coming of the Messiah and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, this baptismal faith, which was based on the experience of the spiritual presence of Jesus of Nazareth, who had been confirmed by God in the resurrection as Christ and Lord, represented a decisive influence for the entire evolution of trinitarian dogma and theology. As the norma normans (see baptismal creeds; regula fidei*; the structure of the synodal creeds) has above all determined three aspects: it caused Father-Son-Spirit terminology to prevail; it indicated the order of these three guarantors of Christian baptism; and it suggested that all three exist equally in the divine sphere.

The baptismal creed, in fact, was continually reinterpreted during the entire patristic era such that orthodoxy was evaluated in relation to it. The horizon of this reinterpretation was also continually changed. During the first period, which was concluded by the Council of *Nicaea (325), this horizon was primarily *apocalyptic, *soteriological and *gnostic. During the second period, however (325–381), which was dominated by the discussions concerning the Nicene faith, the context was creational and politico-dogmatic. In a sort of epilogue, finally, the reinterpretation of the baptismal faith was made under the influence of the christological discussions and under the preoccupation, more than ever, of preserving intact the faith of the Fathers. For an evaluation of this entire doctrinal evolution, it is not enough, however, to consider the general formulation of Christian theology. One must also keep in mind other factors of the evolution which are partly common to the various stages and often connected to each other: the development of Christian exegesis, the development of the liturgy, esp. of Christian initiation which also included the anamnesis of the Paschal mystery (Sunday feast of *Easter), the development of Christian spirituality, with the charismatic experiences of conversion, *martyrdom and the synodal and nonsynodal unity of the communities, the development of the theological language catalyzed esp. by the transitioin from the Semitic culture to the Greco-Roman one and, finally, the external development of the communities conditioned by their growth and political circumstances. Moreover, one must also keep in mind some of the difficulties of a hermeneutic which had to make clear distinctions between the experience of faith and its expression, realities that mutually permeate each other, and one must carefully consider the influences of the first formulas over the later ones and the interpretation of the former in light of the latter (see Studer, Dio, 16ff.).

II. The Ante-Nicene period. The evolution of the trinitarian teaching during the first three centuries was characterized primarily by the transition in which the baptismal faith passed from the apocalyptic to the Hellenistic context. Before 150, the apocalyptic horizon that had established the framework in which the first Christians confessed and understood the baptismal faith still remained present, more or less so in different regions. They therefore regarded Christ and the Spirit, through whom God accomplished his purpose of salvation, chiefly under the aspect of the revelation in which was manifested the correspondence between what took place in the church and what existed in heaven (see the exegesis of Is 6, the theme of the two paracletes, the heavenly church and the earthly church, as developed in the Ascension of Isaiah, the Shepherd of Hermas and in other writings of this sort). There always prevailed, therefore, the economic consideration that insisted on functionality, the salvific role of the Son and the Spirit, who led believers from this world to the Father. Nevertheless, there was not lacking a certain sensibility for the preexistence of Christ as shown by the title supplied to him: Name–Law–Light–Beginning (see Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes, I,195-226), titles which in Judaism connoted the heavenly origin and, therefore, in that specifically apocalyptic climate were easily referred to the Risen Christ. Moreover, there were no doubts concerning the divine origin of the Spirit, which was often called "prophetic," and which, however, was considered more a messianic gift than a giver of grace (see Martín, Espíritu Santo; Dünzl, Pneuma).

Soon after, however, one perceives a shift in theological approach. The following factors indicate this change: a greater interest in the divinity of *Jesus, who by that time was more frequently called "God" (see Ignatius; 2 Clem. 1), the reinterpretation of the messianic titles of the Son of God and the Son of Man (see Studer, Dio, 35), and the new anthropological nuances in *pneumatology (see Dünzl, Pneuma). From the mid-2nd c. onward, however, the influence of *Hellenism which had already provoked those aforementioned events became considerable. This appears in what is called the "soteriological horizon." *Justin Martyr and other Greek apologists were concerned with the salvation of all human beings, even those who had lived before the coming of Christ (see 1 Apol. 46; Ep. ad Diogn. 9). Responding to the question of why Christ came so late (cur tam sero?), they developed the biblical concept of the Logos of God, which was always present at all times in the history of the world. Because this soteriological universalism required the preexistence of Christ, they had recourse to texts from Genesis (1:1) and the Wisdom books (Prov 8:22ff.), with the consequence that the idea of the Word was even more deeply connected to the idea of the creation, which we find in the apocalyptic horizon of the NT (Jn 1:1-4; Col 1:15; Heb 1:1-3). Just as the apologists, even for apologetic reasons, reread the biblical theme of the Word with God in the context of *Middle Platonism, the profession of faith in the Trinity (τρίας, which occurred for the first time in the writings of *Theophilus of Antioch) clearly took on metaphysical nuances. It was understood in the Greek context of being (οὐσία), participation and divine immutability (see Daniélou, II,297-353). This transition to a more philosophical consideration was favored, moreover, by the necessity of explaining the invocation of Christ, practiced primarily by the martyrs (see the literature pertaining to the Passiones; see also J. Lebreton, Trinità II; Pelikan, Emergence, 1,173ff.). The problem of universal salvation was exacerbated in the gnostic context (see *gnosticism; *soteriology). On the one hand, there was the need to explain the origin of evil (even of persecution), without compromising human freedom or the unity of God the Creator. On the other hand, at issue was the resurrection and the salvation of the whole person. To this challenge, set even more clearly within a Hellenistic framework, the theologians of the Great Church initially responded defensively. Against the gnostic speculations on the emanations, they insisted on the mystery of God (Iren., Adv. haer. III,19,2). They likewise insisted on the realism of the incarnation, although leaving open the question how the true death of Jesus could be harmonized with the fact of his divinity. Because these antignostic discussions included an even greater evaluation of the apostolic writings, we see at the same time a much wider recovery of the trinitarian perspectives of *Paul and *John (see Studer, Dio, 94ff., with Iren., Adv. haer. IV,20, and other texts). Because, on the other hand, the antignostic reaction, reinforced by certain Jewish movements, led to a strong unitarian tendency, it was necessary to defend the real distinction between the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Such writers as the author of the Contra Noetum, *Tertullian and *Novatian did so by basing their claims primarily on the traditional Testimonia of the Bible (see Uribarri, Trinidad). Though able to formulate well, even with technical terms (esp. persona), the distinction of the divine persons (distributio), they were less successful in expressing the substantial unity in the distinction, unable to overcome a certain subordinationist tendency (ontological gradation of the persons in the overly close connection of the origin of the Son and the Spirit with the *creation).

The positions adopted, which were caused more or less directly by the gnostic movement of the 2nd c., could not remain strictly negative, nor at the level of the speculations on the origin of the Son and the Holy Spirit. In fact, almost simultaneous with Tertullian and Hippolytus, Origen worked out his Christian gnosis (see Studer, Dio, 116-130; Studer, Incarnazione; Pazzini, Figlio). In this cosmic-soteriological framework, adopting the true aspirations of the gnostics, he seems at first to emphasize completely the mediation of the Logos between the only God and the multiple world. In fact, adhering closely to the regula fidei, he does not simply replace the soul, that is, the world, with the Holy Spirit, but clearly puts the Spirit on the side of the Trinity, which is incorporeal and worthy of worship, distinct from all creatures (Princ. I,6,4; II,2,2; Com. Io. VI,33,166), although leaving aside the question of the Spirit's origin (see Princ. pr. 4, and also I,3,1 on the ignorance of the philosophers). He also does not fail to seek an explanation for the unity of the three hypostases (Com. Io. II,10,75), insisting on the principality of the Father, the principle (ἀρχή) of all principles (Com. Rom. 7,13; Dial. Eracl. 3). Nevertheless, neither is he able to distinguish sufficiently between the eternal generation of the Son and the temporal creation of rational beings, not to mention that he does not dare to take a position on the procession of the Holy Spirit (see Princ. pr. 4). He therefore left to posterity a trinitarian theology that clarified the actual distinction between the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, against every modalist simplification, but which does not formulate with the necessary clarity either the equality or the eternal union of the three divine persons. Neither did his aporiae find an immediate solution after him (see *Dionysius of Alexandria), but they instead led to the *Arian crisis. Moreover, it is worthy of note that the primary scope of Origen's De Principiis was to make Christ, the truth of God, better known (see Princ. pr. 1). It is likewise interesting that Origen developed his trinitarian thought partly by addressing liturgical concerns. He in fact raised the question of baptism in the name of the Holy Spirit (see Princ. I,3,5) and prayer directed toward Christ (Dial. Heracl.).

III. The Nicene dogma and its universal reception. Because the major theologians of the 3rd c., despite their tireless efforts, were unable to find either a formula in which unity and distinction of the divine persons were counterbalanced or, even less so, to explain the unique divinity of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, it should not surprise us to find, at the beginning of the 4th c., two opposed movements in trinitarian theology, namely the "pluralistic" and the "unitarian." A clashing of these two movements with the passing of time was inevitable. But it was not immediately a head-on collision. Instead, the crisis broke out in the heart of the first movement, defended primarily by the disciples of Origen, such that one can speak of an Origenian crisis, that is, a crisis of Origen's Logos-Christology (see Studer, Dio, 148-155). In fact, for reasons difficult to delineate, *Arius, an Alexandrian presbyter, radicalized the Origenian positions concerning the principality of the Father in such a way that the Son had to appear as a creature and that his origin seemed to be confused with that of creatures. In a new situation in which the biblical doctrine on the creatio ex nihilo had obviously made the theologians more sensible to the temporality of the creation, Arius's teaching, namely that Christ was the first creature, could not be left unchallenged by others (see Ricken, Nikaia als Krisis).

In any case, his bishop *Alexander, who likewise was an heir of Origenian theology, brought his incorrigible presbyter to trial. In fact, to break his resistance, which by that time was supported by many affluent friends such as *Eusebius of Caesarea, the bishop of Alexandria allied himself, despite his Origenian preferences, with the bishops of the unitarian movement. Thus, soon after the Council of Nicaea, which had been convoked in 325 by Constantine, the two movements met face to face. It was no longer a question about Christ, the only-begotten Son or the first creature, points that had been debated since the synod of the 318 Fathers, but increasingly also a question of one or three hypostases.

The Council of Nicaea itself, clearly appealing to the baptismal profession of faith, decreed in favor of the divinity of Christ, insisting on his filiation (see the Creed [DS 125]: "only begotten, generated, not created, through whom all things were made"), expressing it in the same creed with technical terms ("from the ousia of the Father," "consubstantial, i.e., one in being with the Father"; see Stead, Homoousios). The use of these terms, however, was not yet precise inasmuch as the words οὐσία and ὑπόστασις were used interchangeably (see the anathemas: DS 126). The problem of the nature of the Holy Spirit was not even touched. Moreover, not even the dogma on the Son, who was not created but generated, remained sufficiently circumscribed. These open questions could not remain unanswered. The bishops and theologians, therefore, with more or less complicity with civil authorities, engaged in an exacerbated controversy concerning the true understanding of Christian orthodoxy, the basis by that time not only for the communion of the churches but also the unity of the Roman Empire. It would be false, however, to see in these doctrinal debates only disagreements between political and ecclesiastical factions. Spiritual beliefs such as the divine adoption of believers and their union with Christ, true God and true man, were at stake.

The post-Nicene fight with respect to the true faith was waged at the beginning primarily on the level of ecclesiastical politics. Nevertheless, we should note that a controversy broke out very early between Eusebius of Caesarea and *Marcellus of Ancyra (see Strutwolf, Trinität). Eusebius, although still regarded today, whether incorrectly or not, as a pro-Arian, had the merit of defending theology, the immanent Trinity, as is said today, against the insufficient opinions of Marcellus (see C. Marc. II, 2: PG 24, 797A) and argued with all clarity that the trinitarian faith goes back to *Jesus himself (see C. Marc. I,1: PG 24,716B). After Constantine's death (337), discussions were also carried out at the level of the synodal search for a confession of faith that could unite both the defenders and the opponents of the Nicene Creed (see esp. DS 139-140). From ca. 350 onward, the discussions took a more strictly theological character. Under the leadership of *Aetius and *Eunomius, the Arian positions of an earlier time were radicalized to the point that almost led to a rapprochement of less intransigent theologians, namely the Nicenes, led esp. by Athanasius, and the so-called *homoiousians, under the leadership of *Basil of Ancyra. The reconciliation of the more moderate parties, moreover, took place at the Council of Alexandria (362), which admitted both the formula of the three hypostases and that of the one ousia (see Simonetti, Crisi ariana, 367-368). On the basis of this agreement, *Basil of Caesarea and the other Cappadocians worked out a logical distinction between the hypostases and the ousia which allowed them to come to the formula of the one ousia and the three hypostases (not before 375; see Sesboüé, Basile; Drecoll, Basilius). The formula certainly expresses well that the reception of the Nicene faith reached a via media between Arius and Sabellius, between the two positions that exaggerated both the distinctions of the three persons and the divine unity. Whether it is fitting to use the term Neonicenism, the via media of which *Gregory of Nazianzus explicitly spoke, is another question altogether. However, the formula commonly accepted was not so successful from the theological aspect. It does not correspond well either to Basil's teaching on the Father-archē or *Augustine's teaching on the Father, whom he regarded as the beginning without beginning. During those same years the Cappadocians again took up the question of the Holy Spirit, which had already been posed by Athanasius, around 360, and already addressed even by Eusebius of Caesarea and *Cyril of Jerusalem. Seeking to remain as faithful as possible to the baptismal profession of faith, Basil demonstrated, in the end, in his magisterial work De Spiritu sancto (375), that the third person truly makes up part of the Trinity, being substantially distinct from all spirits and the giver of all life and worthy of the same adoration given to the Father and the Son. Under the leadership of *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Gregory of Nyssa, the reinterpretation of the baptismal profession of faith was officially accepted by the Council of *Constantinople (381) (DS 150). During the same period, although not directly involved in the synod, *Damasus of Rome and *Ambrose of Milan, primarily combating the "Western Arians," also led the Western churches to accept Nicene orthodoxy, as it had formed after 360, including the teaching on the divinity of the Holy Spirit in the explicit exclusion of the Sabellian doctrinal positions of Marcellus of Ancyra (see Tomus Damasi: DS 152-180, as well as C. Markschies, Ambrosius, with references to the De Fide and the De Spiritu sancto). The same also holds for the Eastern churches that were established outside the Roman Empire, although their reception of the Nicene faith bears less traces of Greek philosophical culture (see Studer, Dio, 230ff.). Thus, toward the end of the 4th c., all the Christian churches, with the exception of the Gothic communities, appeared unanimous in the baptismal profession of faith, as it was reinterpreted by the Council of Nicaea and Constantinople and as the religious basis of the political unity of the Roman Empire (see the decree of the three emperors: Mirbt n. 310).

IV. The inheritance of the Fathers. Over the course of the discussions concerning the Nicene faith, in addition to the concept of orthodoxy, the common faith of all the Catholic churches and the basis of the political unity of the empire, the idea of the authority of the Fathers was formed (see *argumentation). The first step in this direction was already made by Eusebius of Caesarea. From the time of Athanasius onward, recourse was made to the decisions of the council fathers of Nicaea, and slowly the same authority was attributed to all bishops and even theologians who were regarded as witnesses to the true faith. Within this framework, trinitarian theology itself became primarily a theology of the Fathers (see Studer, in Storia della Teologia I, 583-598). Witnesses to this in the East were the trinitarian writings of *Cyril of Alexandria (see Boulnois, Trinità), the numerous treatises on theology and economy and finally the most famous expression of the theology of the Fathers, *John of Damascus's Expositio fidei (see Studer, in Patrologia V,233-242). In the West, Augustine, in his De Trinitate, primarily intended to retrieve the entire patristic patrimony on this subject (see Trin. I,4,7; already in the Fid. symb. 1,1). He was followed by others, esp. *Fulgentius of Ruspe.

This fidelity to the doctrinal inheritance of the Fathers, however, was not lacking in a certain creativity. First of all, esp. in the East, a subsequent development occurred in the christological horizon of later patristic theology. It is true that the christological controversies that dated back to 360 are nothing more than a logical consequence of the discussions on the trinitarian faith. Theologians esp.

tried to harmonize the theology used for the mystery of the Trinity (οὐσία-ὑπόστασις) with that of Christology. But all these attempts to formulate the faith in the true humanity of Jesus and in the true unity of Christ, God and Man, by means of an already recognized trinitarian terminology could not but have repercussions on trinitarian theology itself (see Studer, Dio, 322-332). Accepting, in fact, the christological adage unus ex Trinitate passus est*, the Byzantine and Latin theologians definitively excluded any *patripassianism. Discussing the meaning of the one hypostasis of Christ, which had been defined by the Council of *Chalcedon (451), *Leontius of Byzantium and other Greek theologians completed Basil's concept of ὑπόστασις χαρακτηριστική with the definition of the hypostasis as the καθ' ἑαυτὸ εἶναι. Suited for the explanation of the hypostatic union, this definition, in which the hypostasis was included as the subject of the individual properties and at the same time as subsistence, created difficulties, however, with respect to the Trinity. One had to avoid speaking of three subsistent beings, that is, tritheism. Evidence of this can be perceived primarily in the controversies with respect to *John Philoponus (see Hainthaler, Jesus Christus, II/3). Theologians, therefore, equated the threefold καθ' ἑαυτὸ εἶναι, inasmuch as it was the common being, with the divine essence.

All these subsequent developments, completed under the influence of the *Aristotelianism of Neoplatonist Alexandrians, were not ignored in the West. In a christological and philosophical context very similar to the evolution of trinitarian theology, Boethius contributed greatly to the evolution of trinitarian theology, both with his definition of person as naturae rationalis individua substantia and his adage est relatio quae multiplicat trinitatem (see Schurr).

No less original during this later period was the contribution of Augustine, esp. in his treatise De Trinitate, his most theological work. Developing this document in a spirit of rigorous investigation (see Trin. IX,1,1: quaerere faciem Dei; Trin. XV,1,1-2: exercere lectorem; quaerere semper), he laid the doctrinal foundations of Western trinitarian doctrine. In the first four books, he demonstrates with care that the Catholic faith (Nicene), concerning the aequalitas and the unitas of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, corresponds to the message of Sacred Scripture. He therefore refutes the false or insufficient interpretations of biblical texts concerning the theophanies and missions of the Son and the Spirit. He thus comes to emphasize the incarnation of the Son of God, a temporal manifestation of the eternal Trinity (see Studer, Teologia). Books V-VII are intended to clarify in what sense the affirmations, whether dogmatic or biblical (e.g., 1 Cor 1:24), are to be applied to the Trinitas quae est unus Deus. The second part of the work (Trin. IX-XV), introduced by book VIII, constitutes a dialectic leap toward the analogies of the trinitarian life that are found in the human soul. With the analogy of love abandoned, Augustine therefore passed through the perception of the senses and the imagination of the memory, knowledge and faith to the image of God. To this highest step, the believer does not stop to remember himself, to knowing and to love himself. He seeks rather to grow in the memory, knowledge and love of the Trinitas quae est unus Deus (Trin. XV,20,39). The result of this search for reality through similarities is, however, rather negative (see Trin. XV,22,43). The believer does nothing else than understand what he ought by believing (diligere) his God (Trin. VIII,5,8), that is, to put everything behind and to extend love and hope toward the Trinitas quae est unus Deus (Trin. IX,1,1, with Phil 3:13; XII,7,10). In the later reception of the De Trinitate, a portion of theologians were content with some dogmatic expressions. They esp. made reference to the Augustinian doctrine on the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. The authors of the creed Quicumque, Alcuin and the Protestant Reformers took this approach. Some attributed great importance to the so-called psychological theory (see Schmaus). Unfortunately, until recent decades, few have sought to stand up for the great "potential" of Augustine's most theological work and thereby refute the unjust criticisms against it. Augustine's trinitarian thought deserves to be studied more inasmuch as his very biblical teachings concerning the essential missions and the personal properties of the divine persons are to be seen esp. in the way in which he presents the incarnation as the summa gratia, which allows Christians to seek God's face, to love in faith the Trinitas quae est unus Deus.

1. For the biography: for earlier studies, see V. Venanzi, Dogma e linguaggio trinitario nei Padri della Chiesa. Un panorama bibliografico: AugR 13 (1973) 425-453; for the studies published after 1973, see the bibl. of the general presentations.

2. General presentations: G.L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought, London [2]1952; J. Pelikan, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition, I, Chicago 1971; J.N.D. Kelly, Il pensiero cristiano delle origini, Bologna 1972; A. Grillmeier (T. Hainthaler), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, I u. II/1-4, Freiburg 1979-2001; B. Studer, Der Glaube an Gott und die Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf 1985; F. Courth, Trinität in der Schrift und Patristik: HDG II/1a, Freiburg 1988 (bibl.); A. Di Berardino (ed.), Storia della Teologia, Casale Monf. 1993; N. Ciola, Teologia trinitaria: storia, metodo, propettive, Bologna 1996; B.

Studer, Mysterium Caritatis. Studien zur Exegese und zur Trinitätslehre in der Alten Kirche, Rome 1999; L.F. Ladaria, Il Dio vivo e vero: il mistero della Trinità, Casale Monf. ^{2}2002; A.M. Ritter, Trinität, I. Alte Kirche: TRE 34 (2002) 91-99 (bibl.); B. Studer, Ortodossia classica: dottrine trinitarie e cristologiche, in Cristianesimo. Grande Atlante, III, ed. G. Ruggieri, Turin 2006, 1016-1044; 1354-1355.

3. Pre-Nicene Period: J. Lebreton, Histoire du dogme de la Trinité, II, De s. Clément à s. Irénée, Paris 1928; A. Orbe, Estudios Valentinianos, 6 vols., Rome 1956-66; J. Daniélou, Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée, 3 vols., Paris 1958, 1961, 1978; F. Ricken, Nikaia als Krisis des altchristlichen Platonismus: Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969) 321-341; J.P. Martín, El Espíritu Santo en los orígenes del cristianismo, Zürich 1971; A. Benoît - C. Munier, Le baptême dans l'église ancienne, Berna 1994; B. Uríbarri, La emergencia de la Trinidad inmanente: Hipólito y Tertuliano, Madrid 1999; F. Dünzl, Pneuma: Funktionen des theologischen Begriffs in frühchristlicher Literatur, Münster 2000; D. Pazzini, Figlio: Origene. Dizionario (2000), 161-168; B. Studer, Incarnazione: ibid., 225-229.

4. Nicene Period: E. Boularand, L'hérésie d'Arius et la "foi" de Nicée, Paris 1972; M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel quarto secolo, Rome 1975 (in the bibl., see earlier studies of the same author); A.M. Ritter, Arianismus: TRE 3 (1978) 692-719; A.M. Ritter, Konstantinopel: TRE 19 (1990) 518-524. C. Stead, Homoousios: RAC 16 (1992) 364-433; J. Ulrich, Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, Berlin 1994; C. Markschies, Ambrosius von Mailand und die Trinitätstheologie, Tübingen 1995; V. Drecoll, Die Entwicklung der Trinitätslehre des Basilius von Cäsarea: sein Weg vom Homöousianer zum Neonizäner, Göttingen 1996; B. Sesboüé, Saint Basile et la Trinité: un acte théologique au IV^{e} siècle: le rôle de Basile de Césarée dans l'élaboration de la doctrine du langage trinitaire, Paris 1998; H. Strutwolf, Die Trinitätslehre und Christologie des Euseb von Caesarea: eine dogmengeschichtliche Untersuchung seiner Platonismusrezeption und Wirkungsgeschichte, Göttingen 1999; O. Kösters, Die Trinitätslehre des Epiphanius von Salamis: ein Kommentar zum "Ancoratus," Göttingen 2003.

5. Later Patristic Authors: V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der skytischen Kontroversen, Paderborn 1935; S. Otto, Person und Subistenz. Die philosophische Anthropologie des Leontius von Byzanz, Munich 1968; L. Scipioni, Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan 1974; M.B. Boulnois, Le paradoxe trinitarie chez Cyrille d'Alexandrie. Herméneutique, analyses philologiques et argumentation théologique, Paris 1994; A. Di Berardino (ed.), Patrologia V, Genova 2000.

6. Augustine: M. Schmaus, Die psychologische Trinitätslehre der hl. Augustinus, Münster 1927, ^{2}1967; L. Maier, Les missions divines selon s. Augustin, Fribourg 1960; A. Schindler, Wort und Analogie in Augustins Trinitätslehre, Tübingen 1965; B. Studer, Gratia Christi – Gratia Dei bei Augustinus von Hippo, Rome 1993; B. Studer, La teologia trinitaria in Agostino d'Ippona, SEA 46, Rome 1994, 161-177 (against the thesis of De Régnon); B. Studer, Zur Pneumatologie des Augustinus von Hippo: AugR 35 (1995) 568-583; M.R. Barnes, Exegesis and Polemic in Augustine's De Trinitate: AugStud 30 (1999) 43-59; R. Williams, Trinitate, De: Augustine (1999) 845-851; R. Kany, Opus laboriosum. Bilanz, Kritik und Weiterführung der Forschung des neunzehnten und zwanzigsten Jahrhundert zu Augustins "De Trinitate" (Diss.), Bochum 2002 (extensive bibl.); G. Strzelczyk, Communicatio idiomatum = lo scambio delle proprietà: storia, status quaestionis e prospettive, Rome 2004; B. Studer, Augustinus, De Trinitate. Eine Einführung, Düsseldorf 2005; Id., Durch Geschichte zum Glauben, Rome 2006 (with studies on Augustine).

B. Studer

TRISAGION. The Trisagion—"Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy on us"—seems to have been introduced in the Eastern liturgies after 450. *John of Damascus claims that it was revealed to St. *Proclus (De fide orth. III,10: PG 94,1021). It was first recited before the readings, with the exception of the Egyptian liturgy, where it was placed before the gospel. Both *Antioch and *Constantinople had a fixed formula, against the attempts of modification through the addition of the phrase ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς. The *Egyptian liturgies, however, esp. the *Jacobite Abyssinians, have a formula that assimilates elements of the creed.

The Trisagion was introduced in the *Gallican liturgies before the readings, as in the *Byzantine liturgy, and before the gospel, as in the Egyptian liturgies. The Expositio brevis antiquae liturgiae gallicanae simply refers to it as Aius and explains why it is sung both in Greek and Latin. The Hispanic liturgy, however, which only recited it in the solemn feasts, uses the Latin exclusively, with an edition similar to the Egyptian ones. The Roman liturgy did not receive the Trisagion until the 11th c. and only for the adoration of the cross on Good Friday (Ordo Romanus 31). The Trisagion did not reach *Rome directly from the East, but through the Gallican liturgies.

J. Quasten (ed.), Expositio brevis antiquae liturgiae gallicanae, Münster 1934; J. Quasten, Oriental Influence in the Gallican Liturgy: Traditio 1 (1943) 55-78; J. Mateos, La célébration de la parole dans la liturgie byzantine: OCA 191 (1971) 91-126; S. Brock, The Thrice-Holy Hymn in the Liturgy: Sobornost 7 (1985) 24-34; S. Parenti, The Eucharistic Liturgy in the East: The Various Orders of Celebration: Handbook for Liturgical Studies 3 (1999) 63-64; E. Lodi, The Oriental Anaphoras: Handbook for Liturgical Studies 3 (1999) 84-85; G. Woolfenden, "Trisagion": New Westminster Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship, London 2002, 459.

A. Chupungco

TRITHEISM. During the patristic era, the accusation of defending tritheism (τριθεΐα) or of being a tritheist (τριθεΐτης) was made at different theological movements and for various reasons (Lampe 1408; Isid., Etym. 8,5,68). *Dionysius of Rome would rebuke certain anti-*Sabellians of dividing the monarchy into three hypostases and of speaking, therefore, of three gods (DS 112). The Eunomians and *Macedonians accused the Cappadocians of tritheism because they acknowledged the divinity of the Son and the *Holy Spirit and were unable to safeguard the sole ousia of God (Ep. 38 attributed to *Basil of Caesarea; Greg. Nyss., Tres dii; Greg. Naz., Or. 31,13). Later, this criticism was also leveled against the *Nestorians (Leontius of Jerusalem, Adv. Nest. 2,6: PG 86/1,1544C-1549C) and with greater justification against *John Philoponus (Leontius Scholasticus Sect. 5,6: PG 86/1,1232D-1233B), because they overly confused nature and hypostasis.

Not only on the patristic front (first phase of the controversy) but also on the philosophical, the tritheist controversy revolved around John Philoponus, who flourished between 520 and 570. This famous commentator on Aristotle's writings took from the *monophysite tradition the identification between nature and hypostasis. He applied it in the sense of *Aristotelian realism to the trinitarian doctrine. He therefore equated to the three hypostases three natures, which he regarded as distinct among each other but consubstantial. He attributed, however, to the common nature (κοινόν) only a logical existence and regarded it as the genus "God," of which the hypostases are the concrete exemplars. For this reason his opponents accused him of tritheism. The following group of theologians raised this accusation when they gathered in 567 at Constantinople: Peter, patriarch of Antioch (d. 591), *Damian of Alexandria (d. 607), and esp. *Eutychius of Constantinople (d. 582) in the De differentia naturae et hypostaseos (CPG 6940) and *Anastasius of Antioch (d. 599) in the C. Io. Phil. "Diaetem" (CPG 6956). In the end, however, it was more of a verbal tritheism. Behind the misunderstanding one finds an overly rigid fidelity toward the trinitarian terminology of the Cappadocians and esp. a problematic use of then-contemporary philosophical terminology. Nonetheless, more research might determine whether Philoponus's position was to speak of a God in three persons in response to those who put the divinity before the Trinity.

M. Simonetti, Giovanni Filopono: NDPAC 2238-2240; A. Grillmeier (T. Hainthaler), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche, II/4, Freiburg 1990, 109-149, esp. 134-141: G. e il triteismo; op. cit., II, 3, Freiburg 2002, 279-291: La controversia triteita e la cristologia siriaca; B.R. Suchla, Joh. Philoponus: LACL[2] (1999) 397-398. (bibl.); G. Greshake, Tritheismus: LTK[3] 10, 263.

B. Studer

TRIUMPHUS CHRISTI HEROICUS. The first known attestation to the Triumphus Christi heroicus is the edition by Th. Poelmann following the text by Juvencus (Basel 1537) and with the marginal note: in exemplari auctoris nomen non erat adscriptum (see p. 122). Poelmann does not indicate the exemplar used for the transcription of the Triumphus. It is likely (but not surely) a MS of Juvencus himself; at present we might only pronounce in favor of a cautious non liquet, which, nonetheless, cannot validate the attribution of the work to the humanistic age.

In 1541 Bartolomeus Westheimer edited a second version of Triumphus Christi heroicus, once more in Basel, which shows its debt toward Poelmann's edition—which should be considered definitively better. The poem, by an unknown author, has been handed down like many other short, anonymous poems of the same tenor, i.e., added to or passed on, by MS tradition, within the corpus of authenticated works of famous authors. Ps.-Juvencus, as we might call the author, is likely to be a Christian militant of the 4th or 5th c. who proves to be a cultivated poet, with a good knowledge of secular texts, perfectly assimilated, as well as of the Holy Scriptures and the apocryphal gospels. Brought up in the schools of the empire, imbued with classical rhetoric, he can rightly be ascribed within the literary group of Christian authors who thought the "imitation-emulation" technique to be useful to the diffusion of Christian poetry—and who selectively and intelligently used it. The original aspect of his poetry lies in the daring poetic procedures, in a new rhythm of composition and the use of neologisms (see agnifer, line 54), in a new way of making up words (see sordifluus, line 101), in Graecisms (see plasma, line 58, and syngrapha, line 99) and in rare but significant terms (see elinguis, line 99). A concise linguistic analysis—which here is impossible—would highlight significant consonances with Iuvencus's poetical lexicon.

Under several aspects, the poem bares the features of a homily in verses, similar to those marking the rhythmic prose in Melito and in many other unknown authors from the 2nd c. onward (worthy of note is the Holy Saturday homily by ps.-Epiphanius, preserved in PG 43,440-464); furthermore, the poem is imbued with an eschatological suspense which unravels throughout a series of descriptions placed within an ascending climax. Celebrating the triumph of Christ over the underworld, evil and human sin, the poem can be divided into two parts. In the first (lines 1-78), the poet describes Christ's descent into the underworld to set free the souls of the just. At the gate of hell, Christ shows himself covered in sores and blood. Satan (who in the poem keeps the mythological name of Pluto) utters a desperate cry and, with vigorous words, calls to arms the hellish army. In a surreal silence barricades are put up and the siege is prepared. Christ appears in his full light (lines 19-20: ecce autem Christus per tetra silentia rupit / lumine sidereo, claraque in luce refulsit). The entire army of darkness, frightened, runs away. The blessed and the saints run in crowds: *Adam, *Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, *Joseph, *Moses, Aaron, *Joshua, Judas Maccabeus and *John the Baptist all gather around the liberator; at the head of the redeemed is the king of the line of Jesse, who, as their interpreter, starts singing to the Lamb the blessing hymn: salve, Erebi victor, domitor salve inclite mortis, / destructor scelerum, salve, o fortissime vindex / amissae vitae, salve, o spes una salutis, / aspice plasma tuum, sancte, et venerande Creator, / et post tot gemitus nos duc ad regna polorum (lines 55-59). This passage is strongly influenced by the Gospel of Nicodemus, which is quite faithfully paraphrased. In the second part (lines 79-108), the cross of Christ is celebrated as an instrument of redemption, of victory and of salvation; together with the cross, Christ our king is also celebrated, whose royalty is the revealed truth in the Old and the in New Testaments. The final lines express the poet's deep emotion as he sees the cross, from whose branches hang the enemy spoils for the redemption of humankind. The poet, drawing inspiration from the optimism of the Christian faith, ends his poem glorifying Christum, cuius victoria nostra est (line 107).

Th. Poelmann, Iuvenci Evangelicae Historiae libri IV, Basil 1537 [?]; B. Westheimer, Sedulli Paschale opus, Basilmerus 1541; F. Arevalo, Iuvenci Historiae Evangelicae libri IV, 1792; P.L. XIX (*proll.*19), coll. 385-388; A. Salzano, Agli inizi della poesia cristiana latina. Autori anonimi dei secoli IV-V, Salerno 2007 (pp. 126-151).

Aniello Salzano

TROJANUS of Saintes (d. before 533). An individual of great authority and highly esteemed by his fellow citizens, he was the bishop of Saintes (the Roman Mediolanum Santonum in Aquitaine) after 511, and he died before 533. He was highly regarded also by *Gregory of Tours, who sings his praises (see Liber in gloria confessorum 58). His feast day is on 30 November.

He sent one of his letters to Bishop Eumerius of Nantes, who was present at the Council of Orléans of 533, in which he treats a case of conscience: if one doubts whether one was baptized as a child, he should be baptized again.

Editions: see CPL 1074; PL 67, 995; Gundlach, MHG, Ep 3, (Hannover 1892) 437 = CCL 157 (1957) 489. Studies: BS 12, 678-679 (bibl.); Patrologia IV, 287.

M. Maritano

TROPAEUM TRAIANI (Adamclisi, district of Constanța, Romania). A city founded by the emperor *Trajan in proximity to the triumphal monument of the same emperor (dedicated to Mars Ultor, during the years 107/108), rebuilt from the foundations by *Constantine the Great and *Licinius (313–316), restored under *Anastasius and *Justinian, abandoned and fallen into ruin after the year 600: archaeological digs, undertaken from 1891 to 1909 under the direction of Gr. Tocilescu, revealed five Christian basilicas from the 4th to the 6th c., four of which were inside the walls, the fifth in the cemetery placed on the slope of the hills N of the city.

The "simple" basilica (A), discovered ca. 50 m (164 ft) from the E door and to the N of the Via Principalis, well proportioned (30 x 17.6 m [98 ft x 57 ft]), has three aisles, a tripartite narthex, a semicircular apse to the E, an atrium to the W discovered with the crypt underneath the presbytery (2.70 x 2.3 m [8.8 x 7.5 ft]; height ca. 2.50 m [8.2 ft], barrel vault) in 1971–1973. Attached to the S side is a construction with five rooms; to the N, one finds other room additions. The dating of this structure goes back to the era of the emperor *Anastasius (491–518).

The transept or T-shaped basilica (D), the only one of this type from *Scythia Minor, opposite the "simple" basilica and to the S of the Via Principalis, has an internal length of 33.8 m (110.89 ft): in the apse, a semicircular synthronon; between this and the wall of the apse lies a small gallery for walking (deambulatorium); in front of the synthronos most likely placed under a ciborium, an altar, with a small crypt for relics; a narthex divided into three rooms in correspondence to the nave of the basilica; toward the W, connected with two steps, an atrium with a triportico and a small internal courtyard (8 x 6 m [26.2 x 19.6 ft]) containing a brick floor. This construction dates to the 6th c.

The "marble" basilica (B), called thus on account of the great quantity of marble used in its construction or because of a remodeling carried out during the Justinian age (527–565), presents, to the W, a triportico atrium connected to the narthex, situated 0.6 m (1.9 ft) above the level of the atrium, by two entrances placed in correspondence to the entrances to the N and S. A third entryway, situated on the short (S) side of the narthex, was preceded by a beautiful propylon. Three stone steps connected the narthex to the nave, which was on a higher level. The presbytery, under which no crypt was found, extended under the central nave as far as the enclosure of the cancelli, the foundations of which have been found. A small and elegant baptistery stood to the S of the atrium.

To the S of the main road and ca. 30 m (98.4 ft) from the great W gate of the city were found the ruins of the "cistern" basilica (C) so-called because it rose above a Roman cistern from the 2nd–3rd c. The dimensions of the basilica were 19.7 x 6.8 m [64.6 x 22.3ft.]; toward the extreme E, under the presbytery, a small crypt for relics was constructed later (6th c.). A platform paved with stone slabs, discovered to the W of the basilica, was probably the internal area of the atrium.

I. Barnea, Les monuments paléochrétiens de Roumanie, Vatican City 1977; I. Barnea, Christian Art in Romania, 1, Bucharest 1979; N. Duval, Revue archéologique, 2, Paris 1980, 333-336; A.V. Rădulescu, Le Monument Triomphal d'Adamclisi, Constantza 1982; EAA² 5, 862-864; A. Barnea, Une province chrétienne sous Justinien: La Scythie mineure, in Acta XIII Congressus Intern. Archaeologiae christianae, II, Vatican City 1998, 807-822, esp. 819-820.

I. Barnea

TROPHIES of DAMASCUS. The Trophies of Damascus is an anonymous anti-Jewish dialogue in Greek—which presents a relatively coherent and homogeneous structure—and was composed of a prologue and four διαλέξεις, that correspond to the space of four days. On the basis of the evidence internal to the text, the work is to be dated to the 7th c. (661 or 681), although provenance in Syria would be required if only because of the title. There is no information about its author; Bardy hypothesized that the author could have been a monk who was active during the time of the iconoclastic controversy. The title of the document indicates its objective, namely, to proclaim the victory of the Christian protagonist over the Jewish antagonists. The dispute occurred in the presence of spectators among whom were included, in addition to Jews and Christians, pagans, *Saracens, *Samaritans and heretics. Various Jews intervene in the debate: initially only one, whose name is not identified, who then declares that he has been defeated and is no longer able to continue the discussion. He has himself replaced by men more learned in the law, who are presented as wise men and animated by a great zeal in the search for the truth. Despite their ability, they too are reduced to silence and replaced, in turn, by some Jews from *Cappadocia, who do not show themselves to be any better. The work concludes with the Christian's victory, a commonplace in these types of documents, and the Jews' admission of their error. In addition to setting forth the christological and christocentric exegesis with a repertory of traditional biblical loci, it is characterized by a justification of the veneration of the cross and images. In reference to the question of images, the Trophies of Damascus contains themes in common, esp., with the Dialogue of Papiscus and Philo, the writings of *Stephen of Bostra, *Jerome of Jerusalem, *Leontius of Neapolis and *John of Damascus, who connected the veneration of the cross and icons to the themes of the commemoration, glorification and encouragement to imitation. The biblical citations were used to demonstrate that in the OT there are recurring instances, with a positive meaning, of the construction of images and the use of artifacts in a religious sense. By means of these objects, veneration was given to the persons represented and not to the matter out of which they were made. To this end, the Trophies of Damascus expands the scriptural dossier of the iconophile literature, because they make reference to passages from the OT rarely used before to also demonstrate the typological prefiguration of the cross of Christ, on whose work the author reflects at length several times. Although within a literary tradition which in the course of the centuries reused the same polemical arguments, the work presents some points of convergence with the Dialogue of Papiscus and Philo, which are at times very close to the verbal template, suggesting a close connection between the two documents, most likely due to the use of a common source.

With respect to the discussion on the Messiah and the conditions of peace which would have had to occur upon his advent as foretold by the *Prophets, the Jew in the work affirms that he does not believe that the Messiah has come because many Christians have been imprisoned and numerous wars have been waged against them. As Bardy believes, this brings to mind the campaigns against the Arabs, who in 632 conquered *Jerusalem and in 635 *Damascus. Following the invasions of the Persians and the Arabs, to the traditional argument of the Christians that the Jews had been dispersed for centuries and deprived of a leader while the Roman and Christian empire extended over the entire earth, the Jews in fact can object that the Roman and Christian peace has come to an end, the empire has lost many cities and provinces, and the reunification of the Jewish people is no longer impossible.

CPG 7797. Edition: G. Bardy (ed.), Les Trophées de Damas. Controverse judéo-chrétienne du VIIᵉ siècle, texte grec édité et traduit, (PO 15/2), Paris 1920.

Studies: M. Waegeman, Les traités Adversus Judaeos. Aspects des relations Judéo-chrétiennes dans le monde grec: Byzantion 56 (1986) 295-313; V. Déroche, La polémique antijudaïque au VIᵉ et au VIIᵉ siècle. Un mémento inédit, les Képhalaia: Travaux et Mémoires 11 (1991) 275-311; H.G. Thümmel, Die Frühgeschichte der ostkirchlichen Bilderlehre. Texte und Untersuchungen zur Zeit vor dem Bilderstreit, Berlin 1992; Av. Cameron, The Jews in Seventh-Century Palestine: Scripta Classica Israelica 13 (1994) 75-93; Av. Cameron, The Trophies of Damascus: The Church, the Temple and Sacred Space, in Le temple lieu de conflit, Actes du colloque de Cartigny 1991 (Les cahiers du CEPOA 7), Leuven 1994, 203-212; D.M. Olster, Roman Defeat, Christian Response and the Literary Construction of the Jew, Philadelphia 1994; A. Külzer, Disputationes Graecae contra Iudaeos. Untersuchungen zur byzantinischen antijüdischen Dialogliteratur und ihrem Judenbild, Stuttgart-Leipzig 1999; P. Andrist, Pour un répertoire des manuscrits de polémique antijudaïque: Byzantion 70 (2000) 270-306; Av. Cameron, Blaming the Jews: The Seventh-Century Invasions of Palestine in Context: Travaux et Mémoires 14 (2002) 57-78; I. Aulisa, "Papisci et Philonis Iudaeorum cum monacho colloquium": note per una ricostruzione del confronto tra giudei e cristiani in epoca altomedievale: VetChr 40 (2003) 17-41; I. Aulisa - C. Schiano, Dialogo di Papisco e Filone giudei con un monaco, Bari 2005.

I. Aulisa

TROPHIMUS of Arles (3rd c.). Probably the bishop of Arles around or at the mid-3rd c., or rather, before it. Pope *Innocent I claimed for *Rome the evangelization of the West: *Italy, *Gaul, *Spain, *Africa and Sicily (PL 20,552). The inhabitants of *Arles with *Patroclus reiterated this claim (412–426), affirming that their bishop, Trophimus, had been sent to Arles precisely from Rome, an affirmation that Pope *Zosimus adopted for his own advantage (417–418). In 450, 19 bishops of the province of Arles reaffirmed the antiquity and, in a letter to Pope *Leo I, made Trophimus out to be a disciple of the apostle *Peter, and the teacher of the three other Gallic bishops. The apostolic legends began in this way. *Gregory of Tours placed Trophimus in the 3rd c. at the time of the emperor *Decius (249–251), making him out to be a companion of six other missionaries sent by Rome, among whom were Catianus of Tours, *Saturninus of Toulouse and *Dionysius of Paris, but he did not give his endorsement to the claims of Arles (Hist. Franc. 1,30). His Vita has little historical value.

BHL 8318b-8319; BS 12, 665-672; LMA 8, 1044-1045; BBKL 22, 1362-1363.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

TROPICI. *Athanasius used this title to refer to a group of people (Serap. 1,10) on account of their method of interpreting *Scripture (according to τρόποι, "figures"), when he refuted their teaching, writing to *Serapion, bishop of Thmuis, when the latter had brought this teaching to his attention. The Tropici, who were active in *Egypt, maintained the nondivinity of the *Holy Spirit on the basis of Amos 4:13 (see Didymus, De Spir. sanc. I,14-15); Zech 1:9 and 1 Tim 5:21—otherwise the Spirit would also have been a Son—and therefore his creatureliness, though as an angel superior over the others. In respect to the doctrine concerning the Son, they had moved from *Arianism to orthodoxy (Serap. 1,1). The hypothesis has been forwarded that the Tropici are to be identified with the pneumatomachi* who were mentioned by *Hilary of Poitiers (Trin. XII,55-56).

A. Laminski, Der Heilige Geist als Geist Christi und Geist der Gläubigen, Leipzig 1969, 30-35; Simonetti 365-366; Atanasio. Lettere a Serapione. Lo Spirito santo, ed. E. Cattaneo, Rome 1986.

F. Cocchini

TROPOLOGY. The term tropology was initially used by ancient authors as a synonym for allēgoria, to indicate the hermeneutical process that allowed one to discover the hidden meaning of a text that was hidden under the literal meaning. The verbs ainissomai and tropologeō are used as synonyms of allēgoreo, just as the substantives ainigma, symbolon and tropologia have the same meaning of allēgoria. The verb tropologeō is found for the first time in the Letter of ps.-Aristeas (§ 150), although the corresponding substantive is used as a synonym of typos by *Justin Martyr to indicate the deep sense of the law, the prefiguration of Christ and the church (Dial. Triph. 57,2; 114,2; 129,2). *Origen, who in the treatise on hermeneutics contained in Book IV of the treatise On the First Principles sets forth a tripartition of the meanings of Scripture (literal-moral-spiritual sense) corresponding to the three parts which, according to the Pauline anthropological schema, make up the human being (incipientes-progredientes-perfecti), continued to use the terms allēgoria and tropologia indistinguishably to indicate the technical procedure that brings to light the spiritual meaning of Scripture. The spiritual meaning and its specifically Christian content is defined by Origen with the term anagōgē, although it is possible to also find the interchangeable terms allēgoria (more precisely indicating the technical procedure to reach such a meaning) and tropologia. Other authors used the term in the same way, such as *Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nyssa who, however, at times, in polemical disputes with an overly allegorizing exegesis gave a negative connotation to the word (see, e.g., the negative meaning given to tropikos by Basil in Hexaem. 2,5 and 3,9, or the statement of having avoided the tropikē allēgoria by Gregory of Nyssa in Hexaem.: PG 44, 121d). As a matter of fact, Gregory of Nyssa seems to have preferred the terms theōria, dianoia, ainigma, and anagōgē to tropologia. It is in the context of the Antiochene school, moreover, that one finds recorded the first true and proper distinction between the terms tropologia and allēgoria: *Diodore of Tarsus, in fact, in the preface to Psalm 118 (CCG 6 LXXII) recognizes in tropologia every type of figurative discourse, although in the second only that type of account whose literal meaning is denied.

The term tropologia was used by *Jerome primarily in the original form of a synonym of allēgoria; but, for example, in Ep. 120,12, it is inserted, in the tripartition of the senses of Scripture prevailing since Origen's time, at the level of the moral interpretation, according to a schema that would continue until the Middle Ages. *John Cassian (Coll. 14,8) introduced a fourfold partition in the meaning of Scripture: he distinguishes in fact the historica interpretatio from the spiritalis intelligentia, which is articulated on three levels. There is the tropologia, that is, moral exegesis, the allēgoria, which one can understand as the typological sense, and the anagōgē, which is the highest spiritual sense, geared toward deciphering the most lofty and sublime mysteries.

M. Simonetti, Lettera e/o allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; A. Quacquarelli, Esegesi biblica e patristica fra tardoantico e altomedioevo (Quaderni di VetChr 23), Bari 1991; D. Barthélemy, Découvrir l'écriture, Paris 2000; R.D. Anderson, Glossary of Greek Rhetorical Terms Connected Methods of Argumentation, Figures and Tropes from Anaximenes to Quintilian, Leuven 2000.

C. Noce

TRULLO (Quinisext), Council in. The two ecumenical councils, the fifth (553) and the sixth (680–681), did not draft disciplinary canons, but only dogmatic decisions, as is stated in the letter to the emperor *Justinian II written by the council fathers. The emperor convoked a council to be held in *Constantinople in 692 (or perhaps in 691) in the dome-shaped hall (trullo) where the preceding council was held. Hence the wording in Trullo, which has no specific but only historical resonances; but the other title (Synodos) Penthektē or (Concilium) Quinisextum (that is, fifth/sixth), a Greek neologism of the 12th c., places it in the line of the enumeration of the ecumenical councils, as a supplement of the fifth (553) and the sixth (680–681). In this case, it would have been an ecumenical council that took place without the participation of the Western bishops. The bishops present or represented were 220, 183 of which belonged to the patriarchate of Constantinople, 10 to Illyricum, along with some Armenian bishops and patriarchs of *Jerusalem, *Alexandria and *Antioch. Present at the council was Basil of Gortina (Crete) from the Western patriarchate, who regarded himself as the pontifical delegate. The emperor laid out the program of the council, which was not to address doctrinal questions, but ecclesiastical discipline, and in fact published 102 canons, many of which were rather long for the canonical literary genre. This council represents a noteworthy effort of unification of the Greek canonical legislation; it sought to impose uniformity at the expense of legitimate local differences. After a profession of faith (can. 1), the second canon confirmed the preceding councils (ecumenical and local), which were all Eastern, with the exception of those African canons, the canonical epistles of the Greek fathers and a passage from the writings of *Cyprian. The emperor's objective was to make laws for all of Christianity: the majority of the canons repeat or correct preceding norms; the new ones condemn some practices that became prevalent in the patriarchate of Constantinople or others in disagreement with the Constantinopolitan tradition (e.g., the Roman clergy are prohibited from fasting on Saturday [can. 55]; the Armenians were prohibited from eating eggs and cheese on Saturday and on Sundays during the Lenten period [can. 56]). Can. 13 criticizes the Roman tradition on ecclesiastical celibacy; can. 36 mentions can. 28 of the Council of *Chalcedon on the patriarchal see, as the second Rome. It decrees a law on clerics, monks and marriage, but also on aspects of social life (shows, holidays), on *paganism and Jews. The council allowed presbyters to marry before ordination, although bishops cannot live with their own wives. It prohibits the representation of Christ as a lamb. The emperor sent canons to *Rome to obtain Pope *Sergius's signature, which was to be placed after his own. Sergius refused because he regarded some canons as contrary to ecclesiastical tradition (LP I,373). Justinian II then decided to use force, but the attempt failed due to the opposition of the army of *Ravenna and the Pentapolis of Marche (LP I,373-374). The imperial emissary who had come to arrest the pope was spared from lynching by the pope himself. In the conciliar text there was also space for the signature of the bishop of *Ravenna and the two bishops of Illyricum (*Thessalonica and *Corinth, who are dependent on Rome). The ecumenical character of the Council of Trullo remains a debated question: although it is fully accepted in the *Byzantine world, the canons in their totality were never approved by the Roman see. After the Second Council of *Nicaea (787), the canons are regarded as issued by the Sixth Ecumenical Council; some were cited in Gratian's Decretum. They are still in full effect in the Byzantine Church.

CPG 9443-9444; Hfl-Lecl 3, 560-578; Mansi 11, 921-1006; Joannou, I, 1, 101-111; DTC 13, 1581-1597 (see Tables 1, 732f.); I canoni dei concili della Chiesa antica, I, I concili greci, ed. A. Di Berardino, Rome 2006, 91-182 (Greek text and Ital. trans.), R.M.T. Cholij, Married Clergy and Ecclesiastical Continence in Light of the Council of Trullo (691): AHC 19 (1987) 71-230; 241-299; H. Ohme, Das Concilium Quinisextum und seine Bischofsliste. Studien zum Konstantinopoler Konzil von 692, Berlin-New York 1990; Holy Cross Conference: The Council "in Trullo"; Basis for Ecclesiastical Reform?, A Conference Commemorating the 1300th Anniversary of the Penthekte Ecumenical Council "in Trullo," Brookline, MA 1995; H. Ohme, Das concilium Quinisextum. Neue Einsichten zu einem umstrittenen Konzil: OCP 58 (1992) 367-400; G. Nedungatt - M. Featherstone, The Council in Trullo Revisited, Rome 1995; A.C. Calivas, The Penthekte Synod and Liturgical Reform: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 40 (1995) 125-147; M. van Esbroeck, Armenien und die Penthektè: AHC 24 (1992) 78-94; H. Ohme, The Causes of the Conflict about the Quinisext Council: New Perspectives on a Disputed Council: The Greek Orthodox Theological Review 40 (1995) 17-43; EPapi 1, 633-637.

A. Di Berardino

TRUTH

I. A complex concept - II. The historical developments of the concept of veritas - III. The search for the truth.

I. A complex concept. It is not easy to circumscribe the use that Christian authors made of the term truth (ἀλήθεια, veritas). The term was used with very many different meanings. The extent of the complexity of the issue appears clearly from *Augustine's De Trinitate (see Studer, Veritas Dei; Cipriani, Rivelazione). In the opus laboriosum the author often opposes truth to lie and error. He uses the word in the context of daily life and school. Those who study philosophy aspire to the knowledge of the truth. Those who are engaged in the study of the Sacred *Scriptures do likewise. Christians hold onto the Catholic truth that is preached in the orthodox church. Both on the level of philosophy and that of theology, the concept of truth is compared with that of faith. Veritas is understood as a deepening or perfection of fides. Last, truth has a christological meaning, Christ, the Word of God, is the truth. He bears this name in formulas of citations (Veritas ait). He is called "truth" in various biblical texts as in the case of passages often cited from Jn 1:14 and Jn 14:6.

The variety of meanings that Augustine attests is likewise found in the writings of other Christian authors such as *Tertullian (see Claesson, Index), *Clement of Alexandria (see BKV2 20,404-405), *Origen (see Studer, Liebe zur Wahrheit), *Athanasius (see Mueller, Lexicon) and *Gregory of Nyssa (see Lexicon Gregorianum I, 175ff.). The case of the exegetical terminology used by *Ambrose is interesting (see Hahn, Gesetz). He was aware of the different meanings contained in the term veritas (see Sp.S. III, 11,73: plurimae veritates). He distinguished veritas from mendacium. Beginning primarily from the antithesis between veritas and species, which was common in the Platonic tradition, he applied it to various fields. Presupposing and even defending the unity of the two Testaments, he opposed in exegesis veritas to figura, typus, umbra (see Exp. Ps. 118,35-39; the theme depended on Origen's thought: see Studer, Liebe zur Wahrheit). Furthermore, reflecting on the end of time, Ambrose speaks of umbra, imago and veritas (Exp. Ps. 38,25). With reference to biblical texts where one finds spiritus veritatis (Jn 16:13), he uses the term veritas, esp. in the sense of reality, in its trinitarian and christological teachings (Fid. I,17,108; Incarn. 2,13). Similar to the exegetical use is the sacramental use of the term (see Sacr. I, 5,15). Ambrose, moreover, opposes the verba philosophorum to the veritas piscatorum (Incarn. 9,89) and speaks of the veritas evangelii (Ep. II, 7,21), and the regula veritatis (Exaem. II,1,3) and the veritas ecclesiae (Jac. II,7,33; for the term "truth" in the writings of Origen [Greek and Latin], see Studer, Liebe zur Wahrheit).

Considering closely the use that Christian authors made of the term veritas, one becomes aware on the one hand of the interference of the Hebrew term emeth, which signifies credibility, import and fidelity, with both the Greek term alētheia and the Latin veritas. The tension between emeth and alētheia/veritas appears esp. in the texts often cited and commented on from Jn 1:14 and 1:17, where one reads "grace and truth." Origen (Co. Io. 6,37ff.; Princ. pr. 1, Latin text; C. Cels. 6,70) and Augustine provide suggestive examples (Trin. XIII,19,24). One should add that the biblical pair hesed and emeth was also translated with misericordia and veritas (see Hilary, Exp. Ps. 56,4; Exp. Ps. 35,2 and 18; Exp. Ps. 118,20,30). With respect to the Greek-Latin authors, they understood by the term truth something real, certainly coming close to the biblical language. However, for these authors, truth often connotes an intellectual meaning: a reality that is revealed, taught and learned. They, therefore, often perceived the biblical message in the new light of Hellenistic and imperial culture.

II. The historical developments of the concept of veritas. The documents composed in the 1st half of the 2nd c. still heavily reflect some of the influences of the OT Scriptures. This esp. holds for the *Didache (5,2; 11,10), the First Epistle of Clement (see 16,6; 31,2; 35,5; 60,2), the Epistle of *Barnabas (20,2) and the Shepherd of *Hermas (see Mand. III,1-4), writings marked by a Jewish-Christian stamp. Characteristics of this mark are the statement that true believers walk in "fear and truth" (1 Clem. 19,1; 2 Phil. 2,1; Mand. XII,3) and the enumeration of truth among the Christian virtues (1 Clem. 35,2; Mand. IX,15—see 1 Sam 12:24). This was, however, the beginning of a new reflection on truth. The first Christian authors connect the truth to Christ, just as John did in his gospel (see Didache 16,6; Polycarp, Phil. 2, 5,2). Following the lead of the Pastoral Epistles (see 1 Tim 2:15) and the first epistle of John (see 1 Jn 5:6), *Ignatius of Antioch understood by the term truth the true doctrine of the church (Eph 6,2; Smirn. 5,1; Polyc. 3,2). The author of the Shepherd of Hermas, although insisting on faith (Mand. XI,43,4; Sim. VIII,9), makes it clear that faith is insufficient, and that exegetical and theological work is necessary, an investigation of the truth (in the Scriptures) and the divinity (see Vis. III,3,5; Mand. X,40,4-6). In fact, the Second Epistle of Clement was already announcing the ideal of the *gnostics who desire to know the "Father of the truth" (see 3,1; 12,3; 20,5).

The aspirations to the knowledge of the truth emerged with the Greek apologists who, being the first to compare the truth of the gospel with Hellenistic philosophy, developed the theology of the Logos. The most eminent among them, *Justin Martyr, declares already at the beginning of his Apologia: "Reason demands that those who are truly philosophers and godly have regard for the truth alone, setting aside the opinions of the ancients if they be in error" (1 Apol. 2,1; see Dial. 2,2). He also admits that seeds of the truth are found among the philosophers (1 Apol. 44,10; see Athenag., Leg. 7; 23-24: truth in the writings of Plato). By staying closely tied to the Bible, however, Justin cites biblical texts that speak of truth (Dial. 24,2; 38,3; 73,4; 123,8); he refers to truth in the Scriptures (Dial. 110,6; 129,2) and in the words of *Jesus (Dial. 139,5; see 39,5) and distinguishes it from faith (Dial. 131,2). In fact, he presents Christ as the Word and truth (1 Apol. 68,1) and as Word of truth and wisdom of God (Dial. 139,5).

The search for the truth was also exhibited more intensely in 2nd-c. gnosticism. The adherents to these marginal Christian groups were concerned with knowing the origin and end of the world and humankind. The gnosis through which human beings are saved from every fear and death is in the end truth. The depth of the union between gnosis and truth appears in a document that seems to belong to the *Valentinian tradition and which is presented as the Gospel of Truth (see LACL 257, with Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. III,11,9). The Valentinians also enumerated the truths among the Aeons (see Iren., Adv. Haer. I,14,3 and passim; Tertull., Praescr. 33,18). The claims of the gnostics provoked a reaction from the church. Attentive to their interest for the truth as belonging to the Aeons, and even borrowing from them the intimate relationship between gnosis and truth, *Irenaeus devotes much space to the truth that is preached, believed and lived in the church (see Adv. Haer. IV,6,6-7; Epid. 98). In contradistinction to the teachings that are diverse and full of contradictions, the truth is unique; it forms one sole body (Adv. Haer. I, pr. 1-2; I,8,1; I,31,4; Epid. 1). Preached everywhere (Adv. Haer. I,10,2), it pertains to the one God and his Son (see Adv. Haer. I,22,1; IV,2,2; IV,6,7). Transmitted by the Son of God to the *apostles (Adv. Haer. III, pr.) and preserved in the church (Adv. Haer. 3,1–4,1), the truth constitutes the rule according to which one can evaluate the heresies (Adv. Haer. I,22,1); one must interpret the Sacred *Scriptures and respond to the questions connected to it (Adv. Haer. I,9,4; II,27,1; 28,1; IV,26,5). Although calling the Father (see Adv. Haer. II,13,9; III,13,2) or the *Holy Spirit (Adv. Haer. III,24,1) "truth," Irenaeus primarily identifies the truth with Christ (cf. Adv. Haer. III,5,1; IV,7,3 with Jn 14:6. See the gnostic position in Adv. Haer. I,21,3). Against gnostic *Docetism he also emphasized the truth (reality) of the incarnation (Adv. Haer. V,1,2). *Tertullian combated the Valentinians as well as *Marcion, reducing these heresies to Greek philosophies (Praescr. 7). To make his arguments effective, he developed the principles of the true gnosis in his treatise De praescriptione haereticorum (see 12,1: Apud haereticos . . . omnia extranea et adversaria nostrae veritatis; 13,1: regula fidei; 19,3: where the veritas disciplinae et fidei christianae, there is also the veritas of the Scriptures, the veritas of the interpretations and Christian traditions, see also Marc. I,3,1).

Seeking to reconcile the gospel message with Hellenistic culture, the most eminent authors of Alexandria, Clement and Origen, valued the gnostic ideal more positively than did Irenaeus and Tertullian. They made use of philosophical traditions to develop the true gnosis. Clement, who recognized the connection between gnosis and truth (see Paedag. I, 1,1), discusses in the Stromata, his chief work, as the title says, "the gnostic notes according to the true philosophy." According to him, Christianity is not only the true philosophy, but the very truth of philosophy (see Méhat, Clément, 112ff.). He therefore opposes the sole truth to the dispersion of truths by the philosophers and, therefore, the conflicting opinions of the gnostics. Origen, for his part, in his treatise De Principiis, which largely represents a response to the gnostics, places Christ-Truth in the center of his theological thought (see below).

Tertullian, Origen and even *Novatian not only had to face the opinions of progressive Christian thinkers who lived outside the church, but they also had to deal with the fundamentalist faithful who within the Christian communities defended ideas that were too restrictive on the unity of God. Tertullian combated so-called *monarchianism in his treatise Adversus Praxean. Instead of overly identifying the *Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, one should rather be instructed by the Holy Spirit, who leads to all the truth, that is, in faith in the oikonomia which orders the unity in the *Trinity (Prax. 2). Origen distinguishes between the errors that need to be excluded, that is, those of the gnostics, and the others that are found with in the Christian communities and turn out to be less serious (see Vogt, Kirchenverständnis, 290-298, with FrTit 33 and 35). Although the adherents of the first group are completely alienated from the truth, the others are opposed to Christ, who is the truth. In a dialogue with Heraclides in which Origen combats monarchianism, he focuses his discussion on the truth which is found in the Bible (Dial. 11). His general principle is interesting, which maintains that the Christian believes only in the truth in conformity to the ecclesiastical and apostolic *tradition (Prin. I, praef. 2; see Studer, Liebe zur Wahrheit, I,3: ecclesiastical truth). Novatian, for his part, as in the case of Irenaeus, opposes truth to heresy (Trin. 9,47; 11,58). Beginning his discourse on the Father and the Son, he begins from the regula fidei* (Trin. 1,1; 9,46). Faith itself must be complete; otherwise the rule of truth is compromised (Trin. 11,61). The truth of the faith must not hesitate where the authority of the Bible has never wavered (Trin. 12,62). Last, Novatian maintained that the authority of the OT does not waver because it is supported by the NT and that the power (potestas) of the NT is not impeded when the truth is rooted in the OT (Trin. 16,97).

The means of opposing truth to heresy, the rule of the sole truth, established on the true tradition of the church, to the dispersion of heretical opinions could be referred to as the dogmatic use of the truth (see Studer, Schola, 215-216). This approach to the Sacred Scriptures was also reinforced in the doctrinal controversies starting from the Council of *Nicaea (325). The concept of truth does not cease to appear in the methodological reflections, as the discussion between Basil of Caesarea and *Eunomius shows (see the index in SC 305,320). Two new aspects, however, were imposed. On the one hand, the regula fidei was not supported solely on the authority of the Scriptures and the truth of the ecclesiastical teaching but also on the authority of the synodal fathers and the fathers of the church (see *argumentation). Moreover, the union between veritas and auctoritas, begun by Tertullian, acquired ever-increasingly precise connotations (Ring, Auctoritas). On the other hand, the exegesis of the Bible did not so much serve to find the truth therein. The preachers and the theology instead sought to confirm the ecclesiastical truth by means of biblical passages. They also distinguished the statements about the divinity from those on the humanity of Christ. With respect to the content of dogmatic research, the identification of the truth with God and Christ becomes more important. To impose the divinity of Christ, the Council of Nicaea confessed that the Son of God is true God from true God: veritas ex veritate (see Ambrose, Fid. I,17,108-117). The title of truth, which is attributed to Christ, therefore becomes one of the fathers' favorite names. They first sought to refer to the Johannine texts which represent Christ as the truth (Jn 1:14 and 18; 14:6) (see, for example, Hilary, Trin. 3,4; Gregory of Nyssa, HCant II [5,3] FChr 16/3, 596ff.; Ambrose, Fid. III,7,51; IV,10,118). Instead, on the christological level, where the two natures of Christ are discussed, veritas in the sense of reality, opposed to fantasy, serves to emphasize that Christ became truly human, the genuine brother of all human beings (see, for example, Ambrose, Incarn. 2,13; 5,37). Moreover, I would say, it is noteworthy that the philosophical use is not absent in this theology, which is marked by the veritas fidei. Thus Gregory of Nyssa, in his Catechetical Discourse, speaks of the truth that one reaches by means of (logical) argumentation (Or. cat. pr. 25-28; 3,14-20). Similarly, introducing the mystery of the incarnation, he defines the truth as the sure apprehension of real being, whereas error is an illusion in reference to a being that does not exist (Vit. Moys. 23; see also John of Damascus, C. Manich. 1).

Just as *Paul's speech on the Areopagus attests, Christians from the beginning perceived themselves to be challenged by Hellenistic paganism. The encounter took broader dimensions in the mid-2nd c. (see above). From 200 onward, until the 5th c., apologies written by eminent authors and less famous writers followed (see Fiedrowicz, Apologie). In this field, it is fitting to distinguish two approaches: the first of a religious character and the other of an intellectual character. The two are also found united, as attested to esp. by *Lactantius, who dedicated the fourth book of his Institutiones to the true wisdom and the true religion (see Instit. IV,2,5; 3,4-8). Tertullian and Novatian had already spoken of veritas dei et devotio (Apol. 30,7) and fides una, veritas una atque eadem religio (Trin. 1,51). Origen, as he states toward the end of his treatise Contra Celsum, wished to emphasize the spirit of the true God, piety toward him and the truth of sound doctrine (C. Cels. 8,76). *Eusebius intended to speak of the philosophy and piety of the Jews (Praep. VIII,1,1). Ambrose mentioned the devotionis et fidei certamen and the studium veritatis (Ep. IV, 11,23). Last, Augustine was convinced: aliam esse philosophiam, id est sapientiae studium, et aliam religionem (Vera rel. 5,8; see Civ. X, 32,1). The interest, however, for true worship (eusebeia, pietas) prevails at times (see Fiedrowicz, Apologie, 240-243). Tertullian notes the vera religio veri Dei (Apolog. 24,2). Seeking to convert a Manichean friend, Augustine wrote the treatise De vera religione, in the beginning of which he combats paganism (see 2,2) and anticipates, therefore, the first books of the De civitate Dei, in which he discusses true worship (see Civ. Dei VI,4; X,32,1). Just as the true religion depends on the knowledge of the true God, it is not surprising that the authors insist more heavily on the true philosophy (Fiedrowicz, Apologie, 291-300). From the moment that Christians had to face Hellenistic philosophy, they emphasized that Christianity was the true philosophy. *Tatian states: "Our philosophy is the most ancient" (Tatian, Or. 3,1; see Justin Martyr, 2 Apol. 15,3; Dial. 8). On this line the later apologists demonstrate the superiority of Christianity by referring to barbarian philosophy, that is, the original philosophy, and by insisting on the anteriority of *Moses with respect to *Plato (see Opelt-Speyer, 269-271, with texts from Orig., C. Cels. 6,7; Eus., Praep. X and XI,10,14-15; Cyril Alex., C. Iul. I: PG 70,513 BC and passim; Theodoret, Affect. II, see PG 83,785B). The most eminent witness and chief source from the later apologies was Clement of Alexandria (see Str. I,66-73). He opposes Christian truth that comes from God or Christ, who is the truth (see Jn 14:6), to philosophy that constitutes the search for truth and the essence of things (Str. I,32,4; I,99,1; see II,12,1: Logos is truth). In fact, he defines the true gnostic rule as the perception of truth by means of the truth (see Jn 14:6) (Str. V,1,4). In this sense, Eusebius praises Christ himself as the greatest philosopher (Dem. III,6,6; see 2,6). The apologists, therefore, saw in the Christian religion the true love of wisdom. Borrowing from Cicero, according to whom the studium veritatis leads to beatitude (see Acad. I,2,5-6), Augustine himself saw in Christianity the verissima philosophia, not without emphasizing, however, that this was never possible without the appearance of the divine intellect (Acad. III, 9,42; see Civ. Dei X, 32,1: Studer, Schola, 166-170).

The discussions of true worship and true wisdom were carried out not only on the rhetorical and philosophical levels but also on the historiographical. These pertain to the veritas historica (Orig., Hier. 20.7; Aug., Trin. XII,12,19). Origen, Eusebius of Caesarea and Augustine, who had to face the arguments made by *Celsus and *Porphyry of Tyre, were the chief witnesses to this concern (see Studer, Glaube und Geschichte; Studer, Historische Theologie; Fiedrowicz, Apologie, 208-226). The battle against these two pagan opponents, who fought on the historiographical level against Christianity, revolved around two issues. On the one hand, the apologists had to guarantee the authority of the text that documented the history of Israel, Jesus and the beginning of the church. In this regard, they distinguished between myth and history (narratio vera) (see Orig., C. Cels. 1,42.2,56ff. 4.42; Aug., Doct. chr. II,28,44; Civ. Dei 6,5-9. 18,16; Ep. 101,2; Ep. 143,12). To then bring to light the credibility of the witnesses, prophets and apostles, the Christian authors recalled their simplicity, competence, their agreement with one another, and esp. their willingness to endure so many difficulties to the point of martyrdom (see Orig., C. Cels. 1,9ff.; III,39; Eus., Dem. I,5). They esp. noted the vast and rapid spread of the preaching of the gospel (see, e.g., Orig., C. Cels. III,29; in Fiedrowicz, Apologie, 222ff.). Eusebius esp. regarded *Moses as a historian worthy of trust (see SC 215,57-58, with Praep. VII,8,1-3 and XI,4,4-5). Origen saw in Christ himself the most credible witness to the divine truth (see C. Cels. 1,43-44). On the other hand, the defenders of the historical truth of Christianity sought to demonstrate the value and use of faith for the knowledge of the truth (see Studer, Geschichte und Glaube, 187-193). Referring to daily life—the work of farmers, marriage, the undertakings of sailors and merchants—they demonstrated the necessity of trust and hope for human life and, therefore, also for religious and moral life (see Orig., C. Cels. 1,9ff.; Eus., Dem. 1,5; Aug., Util. cred. 7,16; 12,26). Reviewing the biblical and Greco-Roman ideals, the apologists also emphasized the exemplary nature of the persons whose lives were told.

To fully understand the meaning of historical truth, it is necessary to distinguish between historic faith and spiritual faith (see Studer, Geschichte und Glaube, 194-197, with Aug., Vera rel. 50.99). Admitting as true what is recounted in the historia sacra (Bible), each one recognizes with historic faith things accessible to human experience. Leading to a deeper meaning in the biblical story, both a prophecy and a figure of a later event reveal a superior truth (see above for Ambrose's exegetical terminology). But this knowledge is not yet spiritual faith in which the Christian shares the faith of the biblical witnesses, for example, the faith of *Peter, who confesses that Jesus is the Son of God. Only those who look on the eternal truth (see Phil 3:13), which is not perceived with human powers alone, believe with spiritual faith (see Aug., Vera rel. 7,13; Trin. IV,16,21; XIII,20,25; Ep. 147,4,10). Adhering to Christ, they bring to fulfillment the prophetic and apostolic message (see Orig., C. Cels. III,39 and 43; Eus., EcclTh 3,5, according to which faith in the Trinity is not owed to Moses and even less to Plato, but to Christ). Assisted by divine grace, spiritual faith enjoys a certainty that is superior to every form of human knowledge (see Orig., C. Cels. III,3; HGen 10,2: Aug., En. Ps. 104,27).

III. The search for the truth. Desiring to better understand the gospel message, the Christian authors of the ancient church at first did not seek to respond to such questions as what is God, the world and the human being, in and of themselves. Their chief concern was rather to know how to become united to God, how to hold fast to Christ, how to find the vision of truth. The spirituality of the search of truth is attested esp. by three eminent witnesses: Origen, Gregory of Nyssa and Augustine.

In the prologue of his chief theological work, Origen announces his objective of wanting to lead his readers to Christ, who is the truth (Princ. I praef. 1; see the beginning of the hermeneutical part Princ. IV,1,1, where it is the truth that is spread through the doctrines of Christ; see Studer, Begegnung; Studer, Liebe zu Christus). Origen does not speak here of the truth in a philosophical sense. He includes it, instead, in the meaning that *John attributed to it in his gospel. This is not surprising, if one keeps in mind that he composed his De Principiis in a time in which he was concerned with the first verses of the fourth gospel and was developing esp. his thoughts on the epinoiai ("names, titles") of Christ, among which the "truth" occupies an eminent place (see CIo I,21,125-139). Origen therefore looks at the truth that leads to life as well as the message on the origin of love. In fact, he suggests that only those who love Christ in an entirely personal way will be able to contemplate the truth that delivers them. How much Origen holds to this entirely personal approach to the truth is confirmed by Princ II,11, where he demonstrates that in life after death believers continue their search for the truth under the guidance of Christ, who leads them to the vision of God (see esp. Princ II,11,1-2; see H36Ps 2,1). The meaning of the encounter with Christ who is the truth then appears in the passages in which Origen speaks of Christ who opens the meaning of the Bible to believers (see esp. the text in which Origen explains 2 Cor 3:16-17, where the question of the veil that Christ takes away is presented: HLv 1,1; HEx 12,4, SC 321, 29-30). At the same time, the references to the place, the house were Christ who is the truth may be found, are interesting (see HGn 12,4; HLv 9,5). Convinced that Christ himself is the truth, Origen often interrupts his exegesis with prayers, asking his teacher for a solution to difficult questions (see HLv 6,6; HIud 8,5; HIer 9,10-11; see Monaci, Predicatore, 74-75). Perhaps the most beautiful testimony is found in his homily on Lk 4:16-30, in which Origen invites the faithful to look with the eyes of the human heart to Jesus, who will illuminate their face (HLc 32,6). In fact, in this prayer he addresses his teacher and Lord (see HIer 13,1; HLv 12,1; HNum 6,3). Although defending the tradition in which the community turns to the Father, he does not hesitate, therefore, to ask Christ for knowledge of the truth in the Bible.

The theological thought of Gregory of Nyssa is not characterized as much by the love of Christ who is the truth. Nevertheless, although expressing himself in a rather philosophical way on the search for the truth, he does not fail to emphasize that God, the highest truth, transcendent and accessible only through revelation, was manifested in the incarnation of the Word. However, the purification of the spirit and the life required from the human being is not reached without the help and example of Christ. It seems perhaps strange that the theme of truth does not have much importance in his Oratio Catechetica Magna (see 8-9 SC 453, 200ff.: The mystery of the truth). The chief spiritual works, however, the Vita Moysis and the Homilies on the Song of Songs, are strongly marked with this theme. The second part of the Vita Moysis is devoted to the contemplation of perfection (see J. Daniélou, in SC 1bis, 26-31, with VitaM 2,16-30: Ex 3:1-12). In the school of the mysteries of the faith, the believer, along with Moses, crosses the darkness to reach God, the light and the truth. The light is symbolized by the burning bush. The truth is the perception of being which is above every changeable being. The one who contemplates becomes an image of the infinite, although remaining mutable. In the sermons on the *Song of Songs, Gregory develops the mystagogy of darkness (HCant 11 on Cant 5,2: FChr 16/3, 586-591). Explaining the symbol of the door (Cant 5,1b), he emphasizes that the truth is outside human knowledge.

The soul must, therefore, request the keys from the Logos in order to open the door. Those who enter will not meet rain, but only a few drops of the truth. Their knowledge remains fragmentary (see also HCant proem.: FChr 16/1, 116: Love toward the spouse, Christ, leads to the truth; HCant 3 [1:9]: FChr 16/1, 204: Knowledge of himself is the way to the truth; HCant 14 on Cant 8:15: FChr 16/3, 742ff.: Christ is the foundation of the truth; the pillars are those who support with a good life and sound teaching the body of the church).

Augustine's spirituality was dominated by the search for the truth, as appears esp. from the Confessions and the De Trinitate (see Studer, Veritas Dei). In the account of his life, he described the circuitous journey that led him to Christ, the truth of God. At the beginning he was encouraged by Cicero's studium veritatis (Conf. III,5,7-8). Not finding the truth in the Bible, he was temporarily comforted by the truth of the *Manicheans (see Conf. III,6,10). Academic skepticism helped him overcome their error (Conf. V,6,10; VI,4,6). Ambrose helped him discover the truth in the sacred writings (Conf. VI,3,4) and the necessity of authority for their true understanding (Conf. VI,5,8). At the same time, he was delivered from philosophical difficulties through reading the books of the *Platonists (Conf. VII,4,6; VII,9,1-8). Knowing, at last, how to interpret the Bible, he recognized his God, who is the truth (Conf. X,23,33ff.). In fact, he even intuited that the Word through which God created all things is properly speaking the truth (Conf. XI,6,8-9,11). Augustine did not fail to resume his long journey toward the truth (Conf. VI,11,18).

In the De Trinitate Augustine's thought on truth is shown to be conditioned by two objectives: he seeks to help the faithful who were disturbed by the *Arian objections against the Catholic faith and at the same time tries to reassure certain intellectuals that there is no ascent to beatitude without the mediation of Christ (Studer, Einführung, 172; 209-210). According to the first approach, he deals with the truth of the eternal Word. Starting from the concept of the interior word (see esp. Trin. XV,10,17-1626), he demonstrates that the Word is the truth that allows one to see that it exists (see Trin. XV,11,20; XV,14,23). In view of the Nicene faith, Augustine affirms that the Word inasmuch as it is the truth is entirely similar to the Father. He maintains this perfect conformity for two reasons. On the one hand, the Word is substantialiter similar to the Father as the word corresponding to the knowledge (notitia) of the one who speaks (Trin. XV,11,20). On the other hand, the equality of the Son with the Father resembles the intimate relationship between action and the one who acts (Trin. XV,11,20). Moreover, Augustine develops his thoughts by continually basing his claims on the biblical texts (such as Jn 5:19-20 and Jn 14:6; also 2 Cor 1:18ff.), as well as the tradition, esp. *Hilary of Poitiers (Trin. VI, 10,11). Concerning himself with the knowledge of God along with other intellectuals of his own time, Augustine inserts in his exposition of the trinitarian faith some considerations on the ascent toward eternal life. Drawing inspiration from the writings of Cicero, for whom the studium veritatis leads one to beatitudo, he emphasizes that in the course that consists in the love and the search for the truth, only those who believe in the mediation of Christ succeed (Trin. XIV, 19,26). The thought that expresses with greater clarity the meaning of the entire search for the face of God, undertaken in the De Trinitate (see Trin. IX,1,1; XV,2,2), finds confirmation in the fourth book, both in the prologue, in which he speaks of those who know themselves and therefore intend to return by way of the truth to the immutable essence of God (Trin. IV, pr. 1), and in ch. 18, in which he provides a treatment of the purification by faith that leads one to the eternal truth (Trin. IV,18,24). At the same time Augustine developed his thought on the journey toward the vision of the truth with his considerations on truth which, illuminating the mind, make sure knowledge possible (Trin. IX,1,1-6,11; see Mag. 12,40). Finally, one should not forget that he never ceased to recall the personal intimacy that united him to Christ the Truth. Precisely his ideas on illumination recall his favorite theme on the sole teacher, a theme that would clearly express his personal relationship to Christ (see Studer, Schule; Studer, Die Liebe zu Christus). In fact, Augustine addressed Christ himself: "You have made heaven, earth and all things, . . . but your mercy is greater, which has led you to spread your truth around yourself (En. Ps. 88, 1,9, with Ps 88:9; see Io. eu. tr. 10,13; ser. 136,5).

G. Mueller, Lexicon Athanasianum, Berlin 1952; A. Méhat, Étude sur les Stromates de Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1966; I. Opelt - W. Speyer, Barbar: JbAC 10 (1967) 251-290; V. Hahn, Das wahre Gesetz, Münster 1968; H.J. Vogt, Das Kirchenverständnis des Origenes, Cologne 1974; G. Claesson, Index Tertullianeus, Paris 1974-75; T.G. Ring, Auctoritas bei Tertullian, Cyprian und Ambrosius, Würzburg 1975; A. Monaci, Origene predicatore, Milan 1987; F. Mann, Lexicon Gregorianum I, Leiden 1999; M. Fiedrowicz, Apologie im frühen Christentum, Paderborn 2000; N. Cipriani, Rivelazione cristiana: AugR 41 (2001) 498-598; Th. Böhm, Wahrheit, C. Patristik: HWP 12 (2004) 57-60; B. Studer, Schola Christiana, Die Theologie zwischen Nizäa und Chalzedon, Paderborn 1998; B. Studer, Die Kirche als Schule des Herrn bei Augustinus von Hippo: SA 127 (1999) 119-222; B. Studer, Augustinus, De Trinitate. Eine Einführung, Paderborn 2005; B. Studer, Die historische Theologie des Eusebius von Cäsarea: SA 141 (Rome 2006), 205-251; B. Studer, Glaube und Geschichte bei Origenes und Augustinus: SA 141 (Rome 2006), 177-203; B. Studer, Theologie als Begegnung mit Christus: SA 141 (Rome 2006), 137-45; B. Studer, Veritas Dei in der Theologie des heiligen Augustinus: Augustinianum 46 (2007) 411-455; B. Studer, Die Liebe zur Wahrheit in Origenes in Origeniana Nona: Origen and the Religious Practice of His Time, papers of the 9th International Origen Congress, Pécs, Hungary, 29 August - 2 September 2005, ed. G. Heidl - R. Somos, Leuven 2009, 669-689; B. Studer, Die Liebe zu Christus bei Origenes und Augustinus (at press).

B. Studer

TUR ʿABDIN. A mountainous massif found in the SE part of Turkey, at the border with *Syria and Iraq, to the E of Dyarbakir (ancient Amida) and Mardin which it borders. The Tigris River is its E border. In the S part is found Mt. Izla (Izlo; in Greek Izala). The modern-day chief center is the city of Midyat. After 363, until *Justinian, it constituted the Roman district at the border of the Roman Empire; around 640 it passed under Muslim rule, but the inhabitants remained Christian, although in recent decades their numbers have been quickly dwindling. Christianity spread in the region over the course of the 4th c. with *monasticism and the construction of more than 80 churches and monasteries. *Ammianus Marcellinus wrote that some of the monks were captured by the *Sassanid *Shapur in the territory between Amida and Mardin (18,10,4). The area is still very important for the Syrian Orthodox (or Syrian *Jacobites), because of the numerous monasteries and churches, both of which are witnesses to a very ancient Christianity. In the Middle Ages there were also *Nestorian monasteries. Tur ʿAbdin signifies in *Syriac "mountain of God's servants." The capital Hah (today Anitli) to the E of the region had at least eight churches, six of which are preserved. At the center of the little town remains the Church of the Virgin *Mary (known as Hadra), which was constructed in the 7th c., a quasi-square-shaped building. The church of the martyr Sovo, a Persian Christian prince who was killed around the mid-4th c., preserves the remains of a 5th-c. structure. Likewise in the nearby villages of Keferzi and Arnas, the churches seem to date back to the 7th c.

To the SW of Midyat, at ca. 20 km (12.42 mi), towers the important and grandiose monastery of Mar (Mor) Gabriel (near the village of Qartmin), known in ancient times as Mor Simeon, the most ancient monastery established by the monk Samuel at the end of the 4th c., the see of the metropolitan bishop of Tur ʿAbdin. The monastery received assistance from emperors *Arcadius, *Theodosius II and *Anastasius (d. 518), who financed the construction of a church partially preserved in the original and still in use today. Mosaics remain in the vault containing three crosses in medallions and fragments of floral designs, as in the case of the flooring in opus sectile consisting of marble in six different colors. There are no representations of animate figures. Near this church, in the NW part, there is a small octagonal church (called the Church of Theodora), possessing a diameter of 10.5 m (34.44 ft), dating back to the 6th c., most likely contemporaneous to the preceding one. The octagonal form recovers the number eight, which expresses "the fullness of the resurrection" (Ambrose, Ex. in Lucam 7,173) and is therefore well-suited to being a baptistery. At 6 km (3.7 mi) from the city of Mardin, one finds the monastery of Mor Hananyo (Kurkmo Dayro in Syriac and Deir al-Za`faran in Arabic), which dates to the end of the 5th c.; it was the see of the Syrian Orthodox patriarch from 1160 until 1932; the modern-day patriarch Ignatius Zakka resides at *Damascus.

G. Bell, The Churches and Monasteries of the Tur ʿAbdin, intro. and notes by M. Mundell Mango, London 1982; J.P. Foudrin, Les églises à nef transversale d'Apamée et de Tur Abdin: Syria 62 (1985) 319-335; A. Palmer, Monk and Mason on the Tigris Frontier: The Early History of Tur ʿAbdin, Cambridge 1990; G. Wiessner, Christliche Kultbauten im Tur ʿAbdin: III-IV; EAM 11, 374-377; H. Hollerweger, Turabdin: Lebendiges Kulturerbe / Living Cultural Heritage / Canli Kültür Mirasi, Linz 1999.

A. Di Berardino

TURA. In August of 1941, some Egyptian workers who were commissioned by the English army to clean out the grottoes excavated in the ancient rock caves of Tura (ca. 12 km [7.45 mi] S of Cairo) discovered in a gallery at least 2,016 pages of *papyrus containing the writings of *Origen and *Didymus the Blind. The discovery was announced to the world only after the World War II had finished, with a detailed account which made known the fortuitous circumstances surrounding the discovery and the subsequent difficulties to gather the majority of the papyri discovered and stolen by the same men who had found them (Guéraud). Their spread was also favored by the conditions in which the papyri had lain for centuries. Belonging to eight original codices, they were found unfastened from their binding and in the form of fascicles (averaging 16 pages in length), grouped together or wrapped into the form of a scroll, before being deposited into the gallery. The unfastening of the papyri, which were palimpsests with the presence of holes antecedent to the rewriting, was initially performed by expert hands. The type of writing and corrections date the texts starting from the end of the 6th c. (Koenen - Doutreleau, 551-564).

Even after more than 60 years since the discovery, it is still impossible to give a precise summary on the inventory of the original deposit because of the dispersion of the texts throughout the world. Of the 913 codices and the two scrolls which are in folio layout, concerning which we have clear verification, the majority are found in the Museum of Egyptian Antiquities in Cairo (604 fol.), a fair amount are found at the University of Cologne, Institut für Altertumskunde (117 fol.), and the remainder are located at the Bibliotheca Bodmeriana (or Bodmer Library) of Cologny, Switzerland (25 fol.), the British Library of London (7 fol.), the state Institute of Papyrology of the University of Milan (2 half pages); and a very small portion (158 fol.) are in the hands of private collectors, some known and others not. All information, however, is lacking for 92 pages of the original discovery (Aland - Rosenbaum, 470-471).

According to the most accepted hypothesis, the codices belonged to and came from the Greek monastery of Arsenius (d. 449), the remains of which are found on a terrace of the mountain of the quarry of Tura, slightly higher than the place of discovery (Koenen - Müller-Wiener, 48-51; Aland - Rosenbaum, 471). A possible reason for the location of the papyri in a dark place of the ancient caves of the pharaohs has been thought to lie in an expurgation of the monastery's library following the condemnation of Origen and Didymus at the Synod of *Constantinople of 543 and at the Council of Constantinople of 553. But this is a presupposition that cannot be held with certainty given the traces of numerous corrections already within the same texts. Due to the professional unbinding of the papyri and the presence of glue between the pages, it has also been hypothesized that the discovered gallery, adjacent to a large room excavated in the rock, was a type of depository for the monastery's library office. Still, the lack of clear evidence leaves unresolved the question concerning the reason for the deposit of codices in the obscurity of that gallery, an event that certainly took place between the end of the 6th and the 7th c. (Aland - Rosenbaum, 471).

The papyri lack both title and subscriptio. The attribution of the texts to Origen and Didymus was made possible only following a work of comparison with the *catenae and a comparison of the theological contents of the documents. For the restitution of the first known texts, or those known only in translation, the discovery contributed to a better understanding of the two Alexandrians. With respect to Origen, the papyri of Tura contained the Dialogue with Heraclides and the two treatises On Easter; moreover, extracts from the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, the text of which was only possessed in *Rufinus's Latin translation and the catenae; Contra Celsus; part of the Homily on the Witch of Endor (1 Sam 28); a homily (attributed to Origen with reservations) on the gradual Psalms: 125,1a-b; 129,1-5; 130,2b-c; 131,1b.2a.7a.8a.9b.12.17a; 132,1.3a; 133,2a.

For the corpus of Didymus (313–398), the documents of Tura contain the following: (1) five commentaries on OT books (Gen; Job; Zech; Ps; Eccl); (2) a short commentary on Jn 6:3-33; and (3) a dogmatic text in the form of a dialogue between Didymus and a heretic. Thanks to the OT commentaries (only several fragments from the catenae remained in Greek), scholars are now capable of better evaluating Didymus's stature as a famous exegete and theologian of his time, in line with Origen's teaching. With respect to the exegetical tradition, his commentary on Genesis, which extends to ch. 17, seems to be particularly original. Didymus thus went beyond the majority of previous commentaries on the text of *Genesis, which stopped at the six days of creation (*Basil of Caesarea and *Gregory of Nyssa). The Tura commentaries have also allowed scholars to discover Didymus's influence on subsequent exegesis. The commentary on Zechariah, through *Jerome and his commentary In Zachariam, whose spiritual interpretations faithfully imitate Didymus, influenced the exegesis of this prophet's text until the end of the 19th c.; and with respect to his commentary on Ecclesiastes, the respective commentaries on this sapiential text of Jerome and *Olympiodorus depend on Didymus's work. For the dogmatic aspect, the Tura commentaries reveal the importance of his *Christology. In order to defend the divine and human reality of Christ, neither God nor man, but God who became man (ἐνανθρώπησις), with a complete body, soul and spirit (In Zac. IV,235), Didymus combats various heretics, *docetists and *Arians, and esp. in the commentaries on Zechariah and the Psalms against the teaching of *Apollinaris of Laodicea (Ghattas).

O. Guéraud, Note préliminaire sur les papyrus d'Origène découverts à Toura: RHR 131 (1946) 85-108; H.-Ch. Puech, Les nouveaux écrits d'Origène et de Didyme découverts à Toura: RHPhR 31 (1951) 293-329; P. Nautin, Homélies paschales II, Trois homélies dans la tradition d'Origène (SC 36), Paris 1953; L. Doutreleau, Que savons-nous aujourd'hui des Papyrus de Tura?: RechSR 43 (1955) 161-193; J. Scherer, Entretien d'Origène avec Héraclide (SC 67), Paris 1960; L. Doutreleau, Didyme l'Aveugle. Sur Zacharie, I-III, (SC 83-85), Paris 1962; L. Koenen - L. Doutreleau, Nouvel inventaire des papyrus de Tura: RechSR

55 (1967) 547-564; L. Koenen - W. Müller-Wiener, Zu den Papyri aus dem Arsenioskloster bei Tura: ZPE 2 (1968) 41-63; L. Moraldi, Opere esegetiche di Didimo il Cieco nei papiri di Tura: Athaeneum 58 (1970) 401-407; B. Kramer, Eine Psalmenhomelie aus dem Tura-Fund: ZPE 16 (1975) 164-213; P. Nautin - L. Doutreleau, Sur la Genèse, I-II (SC 233; 244), Paris 1976/78; O. Guéraud - P. Nautin (eds.), Origène. Sur la Pâque. Traité inédit publié d'après un papyrus de Toura, Paris 1979; B. Kramer, Didymus von Alexandrien: TRE 8 (1981) 741-746; G. Sgherri (ed.), Origene. Sulla Pasqua. Il papiro di Tura, Milan 1989; K. Aland - H.-U. Rosenbaum, Repertorium der griechischen christlichen Papyri II, Berlin-New York 1995 (bibl. of the sources); M. Ghattas, Die Christologie Didymos' des Blinden von Alexandria in den Schriften von Tura, Münster-Hamburg-London 2002; M. Ghattas, Didymos der Blinde von Alexandrien in der Auseinandersetzung mit Apollinaris von Laodicaea und seinen Lehren, in P. Gemeinhardt (ed.), Patristica et Oecumenica. Festschrift für Wolfgang A. Bienert zum 65. Geburtstag, Marburg 2004, 45-49; E. Prinzivalli (ed.), Didimo il Cieco. Lezioni sui salmi. Il commento ai salmi scoperto a Tura, Milan 2005.

V. Lombino

TURIBIUS of Astorga. Bishop of Astorga toward the mid-5th c. In order to combat the *Priscillianists, he composed a Commonitorium and a Libellus which, through the deacon Pervincus, he sent to Pope *Leo. These works have not survived, but on the basis of what is related to us from Pope Leo's detailed response, which has been preserved in the Hispanic Canonical Collection (Decret. 61), we know that in the Commonitorium a general speech was made on the pastoral action of the bishop and on the doctrinal questions pertaining to *Priscillianism, although in the Libellus, in a systematic way, the chief errors of Priscillianism were summarized and refuted in ten points. Extant is one of his letters to the Gallaecian bishops *Idatius and Ceponius (Ep. ad Hidatium et Ceponium) on the apocrypha used by the Priscillianists. It seems that he traveled quite a bit, as appears from this letter, the authenticity of which cannot be considered definitively proven. Perhaps a local and late cult was established for him, but it is unfortunately impossible to determine whether it was really for him or whether he was confused with Bishop Turibius of Palencia, who lived in the 6th c.

CPL 564; PL 54, 693-695; L. Alonso Luengo, Santo Toribio de Astorga, Madrid 1939; DHEE 4, 2575; B. de Gaiffier, Vie et miracles de S. Turibius: AB 59 (1941) 34-37; J. Campos, La epístola antipriscilianista de San León Magno: Helmantica 13 (1962) 269-308; H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila, Oxford 1976, 208ff.; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispanolusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 57-61.

P. Marone

TURIN

I. Christian origins - II. Council.

I. Christian origins. Roman Augusta Taurinorum was perhaps constructed on the ancient Taurasia, the capital of the Taurini. Christianity reached the city in the 3rd c.; the first signs, however, of the Christian presence were several *martyrs: Adventor, Solutor and Octavius, whose cult was already widespread in the 4th c. (Maximus of Turin, Serm. 12: CCL 23,41-42; BS 1,663-667). Nevertheless, the first known bishop was *Maximus, between the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th c. (d. ca. 420); the chief Christian see and even the first in Piemonte was Vercelli (Vercellae), which was established around 345; it was known for the action of its bishop *Eusebius (d. 371), but also as an important Roman city, where the governor of the province of Liguria often went. With his preaching, Maximus makes known to us the importance of his community, which was primarily made up of catechumens and neophytes, and the difficulties that he encountered in the midst of a very strong pagan presence in the city, esp. in the countryside, which he was only able to convert through the action of the landholders (Serm. 82). Until his time, the territory of Turin depended on the episcopal see of Vercelli. Maximus participated at the Synod of Turin, which was celebrated in 398 (see Serm. 21 and 58); he died after 412 (see Serm. 30 and 31). Other bishops of significant importance are as follows: *Maximus II (see var. aus. Congrès, 502-509), who was present at the Synods of Milan (451) and Rome (465) and delivered a speech at Milan for the inauguration of the ecclesia maior; around the end of that century, we meet Victor, a friend of *Epiphanius of Pavia, who went with him to the court of the *Burgundians for the liberation of the Itali, who had been taken as hostages to *Gaul; Bishop Ursinus lived in the 2nd half of the 6th c. (ca. 562–ca. 609), as soon as his diocese was split apart, despite his opposition and that of *Gregory the Great (Ep. IX,214: MGH Epist. II,200; IX,226: MGH Epist. II,217). Around 570 Turin passed under the rule of the *Longobards (Lombards), who turned it into an important duchy.

EC 12, 318-319; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, II, Faenza 1927, 1044-1050; var. aus., Congrès archéologique du Piémont (1971), Paris 1978 (important articles); G. Casiraghi, Il problema della diocesi di Torino nel Medioevo: Bollettino storico-bibl. subalpino 75 (1977) 405-534; F. Bolgiani, La penetrazione del cristianesimo in Piemonte, in Atti del V Congr. naz. di archeol. cristiana, I, Rome 1982, 37-61; A. Fitzgerald, The Relationship of Maximus of Turin to Rome and Milan: A Study of Penance and Pardon at Turin of the Fifth Century: Augustinianum 27 (1987) 465-486; L. Cracco Ruggini, Torino romana e cristiana, in Sto- ria illustrata di Torino, ed. V. Castronovo, Turin 1992, 21-40; C. De Filippis Cappai, Massimo, vescovo di Torino e il suo tempo, Turin 1995; Massimo di Torino, Atti del conv. int. nel XVI centenario del concilio di Torino, Turin 1998.

II. Council. Summoned in 398 by bishop *Simplicianus (the successor to *Ambrose of Milan) and the pope, who had sent some letters, upon the request of the Gallican episcopate (ad postulationem provinciarum Galliae sacerdotum), who had been unable to settle several conflicts. The council lasted for several days and finished on 22 September; it was perhaps presided over by Simplicianus of Milan and not by Maximus (the signatures are lacking). This brought an end to the internal conflicts that the churches of Gaul had among each other in relation to the events concerning *Priscillianism and the competition between some episcopal sees. *Felix of Trier, for the good of peace (pacis bonum), resigned as bishop, and with this action brought the Felician schism to an end. At the same time, the following disputes were also resolved: that between Proculus of Marseille and his suffragan bishops (can. 1); that between the bishops of *Arles and *Vienne (Gaul), who disagreed over the title of primate (can. 2) in Viennensis and in Narbonensis Secunda, and that between the Martinians of Tours and Bishop Bricius. On the basis of canons 1 and 2, the metropolitan had the prerogative in the ordinations over all his province. During the council, the hosting bishop, Maximus, delivered two speeches (21 and 88).

CCL 148, 52-60; SC 241, 133-145; Hfl-Lecl 2, 129-134; Palazzini 5, 345-346; L. Duchesne, Le concile de Turin: Revue Hist. 87 (1905) 178-302; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, I, Paris [2]1964 (see index); Id., La date du concile de Turin (398 or 417): BLE 74 (1973) 289-295; M. Kulikowski, Two Councils of Turin: JTS 47 (1996) 159-168; R. Savarino, Il concilio di Torino, in Atti del conv. int. nel XVI centenario del concilio di Torino, Turin 1998, 202-227.

Ch. Munier - G. Pilara

TYANA

I. City - II. Council.

I. City. Tyana (modern-day Kemerhisar) is situated in SE *Cappadocia near the mountains of Taurus, which separates the coastal area from the Anatolian highland; the city was known esp. as the homeland of the famous *Apollonius, who lived during the 1st c. AD, a philosopher and theurge who was somewhat of a pagan counterpart to *Jesus Christ, whose life was narrated by Philostratus in the 3rd c. *Porphyry of Tyre also made a parallel between Christ and Apollonius. A sanctuary was dedicated to him, which had been restored by the emperor *Caracalla (Cassius Dio, History 77,18,4). There was an important statio on the main street (Itin. Ant. 145,2; Itin. Burd. 577,7, p. 93; Tabula Peut. IX,2) for *Syria through the *Cilician ports (Strabo, XII,537; XIII,587), where in the northern part the three roads from *Ancyra, Mazaca and *Iconium converged. The territory was called Tyanitis. It was a city that had very ancient origins; it was the capital of the Hittite kingdom in the second millennium BC and a flourishing commercial center during the Persian Empire. According to Strabo (XII,2,7,538C), it was, with Mazaca (later known as *Caesarea), the only city in Cappadocia worthy of this name, and it was deeply Hellenized in a country that generally was seldom touched by Hellenism and with essentially rural characteristics (see Philostr., Vita Apoll. I,4) due to an abundance of water. At the time of Caracalla, it received the title Antoniniana colonia Tyana. A long aqueduct supplied the city with water. In 377, the emperor *Valens created the province of Cappadocia Secunda, whose metropolis was *Tyana, which also became a metropolitan see; this division met fierce resistance from *Basil of Caesarea, who lost a part of his territory. Ongoing archaeological digs reveal the various remains of the Roman city.

Bishops: Eupsychius (at *Nicaea), Theophronius (at the Council of *Antioch in 341), *Anthimus (372, an enemy of Basil of Caesarea), Etherius, *Theodore, the friend of *John Chrysostom (d. 404), Callopius, Longinus, Theodore II, Eutherius (at the Council of *Ephesus), Patricius (448 at the Council of *Constantinople), Cyrus, Cyriacus, Paul (536), Euphratas (553), Justin (680) and Paphnutius.

PWK VII, A2, 1630-1642; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of the Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford [2]1971, 177ff., 181ff., 185ff.; for the bishops, see M. Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, I, Paris 1740, 395-396; Fedalto 1, 30-31; D.H. French, The Roman Road-System of Asia Minor: ANRW, II, 7,2 (1980) 698-729; D. Berges - Jh. Nollé, Tyana, I-II, Inschriften griechischer Städte aus Kleinasien, Bonn 2000.

M. Forlin Patrucco

II. Council. In this Cappadocian city in 366 many *homoiousian bishops met together, coming from Syria and the regions of *Asia Minor near Syria, among whom were *Eusebius of Caesarea (that is, of Cappadocia), *Athanasius of Ancyra, *Pelagius of Laodicea and Gregory of Nazianzus, the father of the famous orator. They approved of the work conducted by the homoiousian delegation (*Eustathius of Sebaste, *Silvanus of Tarsus and *Theophilus of Castabala) who sent to Pope *Liberius in the West for assistance and solidarity against the persecution imposed by the emperor *Valens; he was persuaded to sign the Nicene homoousios. They also arranged that the Eastern bishops receive a copy of the letters (of Liberius and the bishops of *Gaul, *Africa and *Sicily) that the delegates had brought with them. To then ratify communion with the Western bishops, they proposed the gathering of a new council at *Tarsus, in *Cilicia, which, however, never materialized.

Hfl-Lecl 1, 979; Simonetti 398.

M. Simonetti

TYCHON (Tikhon, Tichon), saint. We know little about Tychon, bishop of Amathus in Cyprus, modern Limassol, consecrated by *Epiphanius of Salamis. What we do know comes from two not very reliable editions of a late Vita attributed to *John the Almsgiver (d. 617). John, bishop of Alexandria, and originally from Cyprus, wanted to be buried at the church dedicated to Tychon. Around the 7th c., a church arose over the tomb of Tychon which had become the object of pilgrimages. Tychon is considered the patron of vine growers because of a miraculous episode recounted in the Vita. From this episode, H. Usener (1834-1905) has supported the well-known theory by which devotion to the patron of vine growers was connected to the Christianization of a rural pagan deity, linked to regeneration and fertility cults. Usener's thesis, valued by philologists for its detailed investigation of the author's style (reviewed by P. Maas, ByzZ 17 [1908] 609-613 and G. Pasquali, Rivista Filologica Classica 37 [1909] 277-280), was subject in time, on the historical-religious side, to criticism by some of those same philologists (P. Maas, cit. 613) and esp. by H. Delehaye (1859–1941). Although his thesis was of a limited value within the historical-religious research of the time, the investigation by Usener on Tychon contributed remarkably to the study of links between the ancient Greek religions and Christian worship. The Byzantine Synaxary* and the Roman Martyrology commemorate Tychon on 16 June.

BHG, II, 309-310; LTK 10/2, 419; BS 12, 471-472; H. Usener, Sonderbare heilige. Texte und Untersuchungen, I, Der heilige Tychon, ed. A. Brinkmann, Leipzig-Berlin 1907; Id., San Ticone, ed. by I. Sforza, Brescia, 2007; H. Delehaye, Saint de Chypre, AB 26 (1907) 116-301, esp. 229-232 and 244-245; Id., reviewed by Usener, AB 26 (1909) 119-123.

R. Ronzani

TYCONIUS (d. before 400). *Augustine (see Ep. Parm. I,1,1; I,2,2; II,21,40; II,22,42; III,3,17-29; De doctI rin. christ. III,20,42; III,33,46; Quaest. in Hept. II,47,102; C. litt. Pet. II,83,184; Ep. 41,2; 87,10; 92,14; 93,10.43.44.45; Retract. II, 18) presented Tyconius (ca. 330–390) the lay *Donatist exegete as a man of penetrating genius, who as a Donatist defended the universality of the church to the point of bringing about his condemnation in a Donatist council in 380. Tyconius continued to regard himself as a Donatist and did not back down in his fight against *Parmenian, providing an example of how the good and the evil coexist within the bosom of the church until the end of time.

Augustine used and recommended Tyconius's writings, but he also introduced some nuances to them. He made special use of the work Liber regularum (De doctr. christ. III,30,42-47,56) and the Commentary on the Apocalypse, which he cited explicitly (De doctr. christ. III,30,42), in addition to making recourse to this treatise implicitly in other places of his work. *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 18) completes Augustine's mention of this work by ascribing two more works to Tyconius: the De bello intestino and the Expositiones diversarum causarum, which were written in 370/375 but are now lost. With respect to Tyconius, Gennadius emphasized his spiritual interpretation, the corporality of the angels, his millennialist ideas and those concerning the resurrection. Other references to Tyconius and his works can be found in the writings of *Quodvultdeus (Dim. temp. XIII, 22), *Primasius, *Cassiodorus and Ambrosius Autpertus. Primasius (PL 68,793-936; PLS IV,1208-1220) collected and expurgated Tyconius's Commentary on the Apocalypse. Cassiodorus (PL 70,1406-1418) on a few points, and Ambrosius Autpertus, in many, follow Tyconius, but take into account critical statements made by Primasius. Bede (PL 93,129-200) summarizes the Lib. reg. and the Comm.; *Caesarius (PL 35,2417-2452; ed. Morin, Maredsous 1942, II,209-277) summarizes them more to the letter; *Beatus of Liébana, along with the anonymous author of the Tyconian Fragments of Turin, faithfully preserves, in the form of catenae, the majority of the lost commentary (starting from the 9th c.). All these authors praised Tyconius's exegetical and doctrinal subtlety, but they eliminate and correct what they regarded as tending toward heterodoxy (see ps.-Isidore: PLS IV, 851, 7-47). Beatus, however, was an exception. Hence the fact that, although the original Commentary has been lost, it is possible to reconstruct it by starting from the way in which Catholic commentators followed it: *Victorinus (*Jerome), Caesarius of Arles, Primasius, *Apringius, Cassiodorus, Bede, Ambrosius Autpertus, Beatus and the Turin Fragments.

Tyconius's explicit interpretations of the Apocalypse that have been preserved are very few: Rev 5:6 (Bede: PL 93,145,49-50); Rev 8:7 (Bede: PL 93,145,55-56); Rev 8:7 (Bede: PL 93,156,12-16); Rev 9:3-11 (Cassiodorus: PL 70,1410,40-44); Rev 9:16 (Primasius: PL 68,861,11-15; Ambrosius Autpertus: CCL, cont. med. 27, 359, 24-27); Rev 12:4 (Bede: PL 93,166,36-39); Rev 12:5-6 (Cassiodorus: PL 70,1411,25-30); Rev 14:5 (Bede: PL 93,174,22-23); Rev 14:18-19 (Bede: PL 93,178,6-15); Rev 15:5 (Ambrosius Autpertus: CCL, cont. med. 27A, 589,10–590,15); Rev 16:17 (Bede: PL 93,181,48-182,10); Rev 17:6-7 (Bede: PL 93,183,37-43); Rev 17:9 (Bede: PL 93,183,44-48); Rev 19,21 (Bede: PL 93,191,6-9); Rev 20:13 (Bede: PL 93,194,11-14). The other citations are not explicit. With respect to the De bello int. and the Expositiones divers. caus., one can only identify the content of these works through conjecture. The Lib. reg., written in 392, is a manual of hermeneutics: seven rules (the complete work has not survived) with which the exegete—using a certain rationale—uncovers the secrets of Scripture pertaining to the great revelation: Christ and the church. With these rules, the exegete can identify whether the text is speaking of the Lord or his body (Rule 1), the bipartite body (Rule 2), the promises and the law (Rule 3), the species or the genus, the part or the whole (Rule 4), recapitulation (Rule 6), the devil or his body (Rule 7). To demonstrate the validity of these rules, and to respond to the ecclesial problems against Donatists and Catholics, Tyconius commented on the entire Apocalypse, the final exhaustive revelation about the church. One perceives in the author an interest in healing the schism and finding a purer church: one finds traces of gnostic interpretations, and the entire commentary has roots in the traditions present in the writings of ps.-*Barnabas, *Irenaeus, *Hippolytus, *Tertullian, *Cyprian and in the short ps.-Cyprian treatises.

All of these traditions, laid out with logic and skill, reinforce his *ecclesiology: the authentic church is the one that is persecuted just as its head (Christ). Ecclesiology and *Christology always go together. Only the elect enter the kingdom (church-kingdom). The day of judgment will lay bare before everyone hypocrisy, the worst of evils, which is now latent.

Tyconius does not accept the sum saints + sinners, but instead the opposition saints or sinners. The church is universal; but Tyconius, instead of opting for an intensive catholicity in opposition to an extensive catholicity, admitted both concepts. Each passage of the Apocalypse allowed him to demonstrate how the holy, universal and bipartite church walks in history in the midst of hypocrisy, persecution and other manifestations of the *Antichrist.

Editions: CPL 709-710; The Book of Rules of T., ed. F.C. Burkitt, Cambridge 1894 (repr. Kraus 1967); PL 18, 15-66; D.L. Anderson, The Book of Rules of T.: An Introd. and Transl. with Comm., Louisville, KY 1974; T. Afri fragmenta . . . , ed. Amelli, Monte Cassino 1897 (= PLS I, 622-652); The Turin Fragments of T. Commentary on Revelation, ed. F. Lo Bue, Cambridge 1963.

Studies: T. Hahn, Tyconius Studien, Leipzig 1900 (repr. Aalen 1971); W. Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis, Göttingen [6]1906, 53-72; Monceaux V, 163-219; Patrologia III, 109-112; A. Pincherle, L'ecclesiologia nella controversia donatista: Ricerche Rel. 1 (1925) 134-148; Id., Da T. a Sant'Ambrogio: ibid. 1 (1925) 443-446; Id., Nuovi frammenti di T.: RSLR 3 (1969) 756-757; Id., Alla ricerca di T.: SSR 2 (1978) 357-365; H. van Barkel, T., Augustinus ante Augustinum: NTT 19 (1930) 36-57; J. Ratzinger, Beobachtungen zum Kirchenbegriff des T. im Liber Reg.: REAug 2 (1956) 173-186; L.J. van der Lof, Warum wurde T. nicht katholisch?: ZNTW 57 (1966) 260-282; P. Cazier, Le Livre des règles de T. Sa transmission du Doctr. Christ. aux Sent. d'Isidore de Séville: REAug 19 (1973) 241-261; E. Romero Pose, T. y el sermón in nat. sanct. innoc.: Gregorianum 60 (1979) 129-149; Id., Et caelum ecclesia et terra ecclesia. Exégesis ticoniana del Ap. 4,1: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 469-486; Id., Una nueva edición del Comentario de Beato de L.: Accad. N. dei Lincei, Boll. dei Classici 1 (1980) 221-231; Id., La Iglesia y la mujer del Ap. 12 (Exégesis ticoniana del Ap. 12, 1-2): Compostellanum 24 (1979) 293-307; Id., Símbolos eclesiales en el comento a Ap. 1,13-3,22 de T., diss. P.U.G., Rome 1978; PCBE 1, 1122-1127; K.B. Steinhauser, The Structure of Ticonius' Apocalypse Commentary: VChr 35 (1981) 354-357; Id., The Apocalypse Commentary of T.: A History of its Reception and Influence, Frankfurt a.M. 1987; M.G. Cox, Augustine, Jerome, T. and the Lingua Punica: Studia Orientalia 64 (1988) 83ff.; G. Gaeta, Il "Liber Regularum" di Ticonio: studio sull'ermeneutica scritturistica: AnSE 5 (1988) 103-124; P.C. Bori, La ricezione delle "Regole" di Ticonio, da Agostino a Erasmo: AnSE 5 (1988) 125-142; M. Dulaey, La sixième Règle de T. et son résumé dans le De doctrina christiana: REAug 35 (1989) 83-103; J.-L. Maier, Le dossier du donatisme, Berlin 1989; E. Romero Pose, El Comentario al Apocalipsis de Ticonio: CrSt 11 (1990) 179-186; C. Mandolfo, Le "Regole" di Ticonio e le "Quaestiones et responsiones" di Eucherio di Lione: AnSE 8 (1991) 535-546; L. Ayres, Agustín y Ticonio sobre metafísica y exégesis: Augustinus 40 (1995) 13-30; M.A. Tilley, Agustín: ¿interpretó mal a Ticonio?: Augustinus 40 (1995) 297-302; E. Romero Pose, El milenio en Ticonio: exégesis al Apoc. 20, 1-6: AnSE 12 (1995) 327-346; E. Romero Pose, Los ángeles de las Iglesias: (Exégesis de Ticonio al Apoc.1, 20-3, 22): Augustinianum 35 (1995) 119-136; K.B. Steinhauser, Ticonio: ¿era griego?: Augustinus 40 (1995) 283-290; R. Gryson, Fragments inédits du commentaire de Tyconius sur l'"Apocalypse": RBen 107 (1997) 107, 189-226; Sette regole per la Scrittura / Ticonio, ed. L. Leoni - D. Leoni, Bologna 1997; P. Camastra, Il Liber regularum di Ticonio: contributo alla lettura, Rome 1998; P.B. Harvey, Approaching the Apocalypse: Augustine Reads John's Revelation: AugStud 30 (1999) 133-151 P. Marone, L'uso delle regole di Ticonio nella produzione letteraria di Agostino: SMSR 24 (2000) 241-254; Ead., La continuità esegetica che caratterizza le opere di Ticonio ovvero l'applicazione delle regole nel "Commento all'Apocalisse": SMSR 25 (2001) 253-270; J.-M. Vercruyse, Tyconius. Le livre des Règles, Paris 2004.

E. Romero Pose

TYPOLOGY. The term comes from the Greek typos (Lat.: typus, figura, forma, imago) which means

"mark, sign, representation, image" etc. The apostle *Thomas said that he would not believe unless he put his hand "in the sign [typos] of the nails" (Jn 20:25). A belief in the unity of the two Testaments led early Christians to see a close connection and correspondence between persons, events and institutions of the first covenant with the second. This correspondence did not pertain to the details, but the essential element; by and large such a correspondence was only affirmed. It was based on the conviction that the character of God's action does not change over the course of salvation. Already in the OT one found a correspondence between events: for example, the traditions of the *exodus were seen as a type of the final redemption of Israel (Is 51:10-11; 52:7-12). When the preceding tradition or personage is interpreted as an expression of God's new action in history, it is the typos of a new reality (antitype, see Heb 9:24, where the term antitypos appears in the plural), which is its fulfillment. That an individual or an event is the typos of something else can only be seen a posteriori. This means that the OT writer was not aware that he was communicating a typological message which was only understood at a subsequent time. The typological interpretation sought to make manifest the understood correspondence to a person, or otherwise, according to the saying that the "New Testament is hidden in the Old, and that the New reveals the Old." In the gospel of *John it is affirmed that the Scriptures speak of Christ (5:39); it is Christ who provides meaning for the OT and the NT. *Melchizedek becomes a type of Christ in the epistle to the Hebrews. Because Christ is the fulfillment of the OT, many individuals and events are interpreted as types of Christ. The types of the OT (*Adam, *Abel, *Abraham, Melchizedek, Isaac, *Job, *Jacob, Sarah, *Aaron, etc.) provided meaning to the living continuity of sacred history. Aaron, for example, is a type of Christ, although his son is a type of the bishop (Methodius, De lepr. 7). Jacob is a symbol of the Christian people, although the limping Jacob is a figure of the church, which is limping on account of the presence of sinners (Aug., Sermo 5,8). The individuals and the events, who are truly historical, assume an exemplary condition of another future reality within a unified history. The *Sabbath is the type and image of the future kingdom of the saints (Hippolytus, In Dan. 1,14.6). The chief characteristic of typology is the affirmation of the unity of all Scripture. *Ambrose states: ille [Melchizedek] in typo, hic [Christus] in veritate: typus autem sit umbra veritatis (De David 11). The distinction between allegory and typology is fluid inasmuch as they are not entirely differentiated interpretive methods but rather are mixed. See *allegory – typology and its bibliography.

J. Daniélou, Sacramentum futuri, Paris 1950; G.W.H. Lampe - K.J. Woollcombe, Essays on Typology, London 1957; J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie, Paris ²1976 (bibl.); R.M. Davidson, Typology in Scripture, Berrien Springs 1981; M. Simonetti, Lettera e/o allegoria. Un contributo alla storia dell'esegesi patristica, Rome 1985; M. Simonetti, Sul significato di alcuni termini tecnici nella letteratura esegetica greca: la terminologia esegetica nell'antichità: VetChr 20 (1987) 25-58; J.N. Guinot, La typologie comme technique herméneutique: Figures de l'Ancien Testament chez les Pères (Cahiers de Biblia Patristica 2), Strasbourg 1989, 1-34; J.N. Guinot - M. Simonetti, Ancora su allegoria e termini affini negli scrittori greci: AnSE 8/2 (1991) 363-384; G.W. Buchanan, Typology and the Gospel, Lanham, MD 1987; Hist. Wörterbuch der Rhetorik I (1992) 330-393; R. Trevijano, La Biblia en el cristianismo antiguo, Estella Navarra 2001, 83-108; Ch. Kannengiesser, Handbook of Patristic Exegesis, I, Leiden 2004, 228-242; 251-256; Lampe, Patristic Greek Lexikon, s.v., 1418-1820; J.G. Muller, L'Ancien Testament dans l'ecclésiologie des Pères. Une lecture des Constitutions Apostoliques, Turnhout 2004.

A. Di Berardino

TYRE

I. City and Christian origins - II. Councils - III. Archaeology.

I. City and Christian origins. Tyre (today Sûr in Lebanon) was an ancient Phoenician city on the Lebanese coast, whose inhabitants in the 8th c. BC established numerous colonies on the coasts of the W Mediterranean Sea, among which were *Carthage and *Hippo. In ancient times it was an island, now united to the continent with a strip of land. It possessed two ports and was well connected to the hinterland by means of streets and with navigation routes with other Mediterranean cities; during the Roman period it also had a statio at Puzzuoli, near Neapolis, and in many W cities, inasmuch as it exported the grain from the plain of Hauran. It was conquered by Alexander the Great in 332 BC; in 64 BC, Pompey assigned it to the Roman province of *Syria. Herod the Great had numerous buildings constructed there. *Septimius Severus, who was supported by its inhabitants in his struggle against Pescennius Niger, adorned it with monuments and lifted it to the status of a colony, also sending some military veterans there. It was an important commercial and industrial center esp. because of its port and famous glass and purple factories. A philosophical school was also found there; the pagan *Porphyry, who wrote against the Christians at the end of the 3rd c., was from Tyre. *Jerome called it the most beautiful city of Phoenicia (Comm. in Ezech. 26,7; 27,2: PL 25, 241ff.; 246-247). With the division of Phoenicia into two provinces, which occurred before 425, Tyre became the civil and religious metropolis of Phoenicia Prima, with the exception of Berytus which enjoyed the autonomy of self-governance. It fell under Arab rule in 638.

The city of Tyre is mentioned many times in the gospels, usually along with Sidon (Mt 11:21-22; 15:21; Mk 3:8; 7:24; Lk 6:17; 10:13). The apostle *Paul, upon coming to Tyre in ca. 57, already found some Christians there (Acts 21:4-7). According to the ps.-Clementine literature, *Peter preached there (Hom. 3,58ff.: PG 2,147-148). Its first known bishop was Cassius, who participated at the council of 190 on the celebration of *Easter (Eus., HE 5,25); from the mid-3rd c., its bishop was Marinus, who was mentioned by *Dionysius of Alexandria (Eus., HE 7,5,1). *Origen died at Tyre (Jer., De vir. ill. 54; *Photius, Bibl., cod. 118; see *Epiph., Pan. LXIV, 3,6: PG 41,1074). According to Jerome, *Methodius of Olympus was bishop there (De vir. ill. 83). During the *Diocletian persecution, there were many *martyrs in that city, among whom was Bishop Tyrannius (Eus., HE 8,13,3); Theodosia, who besought the confessors who were awaiting execution to remember her when they received their heavenly reward (Eus., De mart. Pal. 7,1); and Ulpian (Eus., De mart. Pal. 5,1). *Eusebius of Caesarea, moreover, found there a letter affixed by the emperor *Maximinus Daia, who praised its inhabitants for having issued decrees against the Christians (HE 9,7,3). The well-learned priest *Dorotheus, who lived perhaps at the time of Diocletian, was appointed there by the emperor as procurator of the imperial purple-dyery, and Eusebius had "heard him explain the Scriptures with much insight" (HE 7,32,4). The Christian community of Tyre had to have had many members and must have possessed much wealth because, after the great persecution, it was able to construct a large church. During that occasion, *Eusebius delivered an inaugural speech (HE 10,4,2-72), also providing a description of the church, which he called the most beautiful of all Phoenicia (HE 10,4,1). During this period, the bishop of Tyre was *Paulinus, who was first a priest of Antioch, to whom Eusebius dedicated the 10th book of his Ecclesiastical History (see 10,1,2). At the Council of *Nicaea (325), Zeno the bishop of Tyre was in attendance; he was succeeded by Paul. At the Synod of Tyre in 335, *Athanasius was condemned. Likewise from Tyre were Edesius and *Frumentius, who landed by chance in *Ethiopia and found some Christians there. During the mid-4th c., the *Arian Uranius was bishop of Tyre (Athan., De synod. 12: PG 26,702; Socr., HE II,41; Epiph., Pan. LXXXIII,23), who was succeeded by Zeno II, who had been ordained by *Meletius of Antioch and who participated at the Synod of *Tyana in 365 (Soz., HE VI, 12) and that of Constantinople in 381 (Mansi 3, 568). A tenacious opponent of *Nestorianism was Photius bishop of Tyre, who was elected in 448 and took part at the Robber Council of *Ephesus (also known as the latrocinium) and at the Council of *Chalcedon. At the Council of Constantinople (553), Eusebius was present, who had also been invited by Pope *Vigilius.

PWK 26, 1876-1908; EC 12, 135-137; CE 14, 355-356; W.B. Fleming, The History of Tyre, New York 1915; G. Bardy, Sur Paulin de Tyr: RSR 2 (1922) 35-45; N. Jidejian, Tyre through the Ages, Beirut 1969; A.H.M. Jones, The Cities of Eastern Roman Provinces, Oxford ²1971. With respect to the bishops: Fedalto 2, 708-709; C. Smith, Christian Rhetoric in Eusebius' Panegyric at Tyre: VChr 43 (1989) 226-247.

A. Di Berardino

II. Councils. 335. The anti-Nicene reaction that developed in the East after 327 also struck *Athanasius in 335. The *Eusebians seized as a pretext some violent measures to which the followers of Athanasius were constrained during the struggle against the schismatic *Meletians and, having *Constantine on their side, they convoked a council at Tyre, to which Athanasius was obliged by a letter from the emperor to present himself. Nearly 60 Eastern bishops as well as many *Egyptians who had come with their patriarch participated there. Among the enemies of Athanasius were the following: *Eusebius of Caesarea, *Eusebius of Nicomedia and *Flaccillus of Antioch, who was the presider. The accusations of the Meletians were presented against Athanasius, and in order to obtain confirmation of these charges, an investigative committee was sent to Mareotis. The Egyptian faithful protested against the partiality with which the committee conducted its work but without obtaining their desired results. Athanasius then fled secretly from Tyre to appeal directly to the emperor. In his absence, the council condemned him for crimes and insubordination and deposed him from his see (September 335). On 30 October Athanasius presented himself at *Constantinople before the emperor, but the emperor confirmed the verdict and exiled him to *Trier.

448. In the aftermath of the *Nestorian controversy, *Ibas of Edessa, who in a letter to *Maris had heavily criticized *Cyril of Alexandria's actions, by order of the emperor *Theodosius II was judged by a council that had gathered at Tyre and Berytus. Denying that he was a Nestorian, he was sent away acquitted.

513/515. On an uncertain date, within these two years, *Severus of Antioch gathered at Tyre a council of Syrian bishops who belonged to the *monophysite movement, among whom were *Philoxenus of Mabbug. An overtly promonophysite interpretation was given to *Zeno's Henoticon. Such an interpretation drew opposition from both the more moderate supporters of the Henoticon and the radical monophysites, who completely rejected that formula of faith.

518. A small council held on 16 September approved the antimonophysite decisions reached during the preceding July by the Council of *Constantinople.

335: Hfl-Lecl 1, 659-666; Simonetti 124-128; K.M. Girardet, Kaisergericht und Bischofsgericht. Studien zu den Anfängen des Donatistenstreits (313–315) und zum Prozeß des Athanasius von Alexandrien (328-346), Bonn 1975; R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381, Edinburgh 1988, 259-263; A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie et l'Église d'Égypte au IVe siècle (328–373), Rome 1996, see Index. 448: Hfl-Lecl 2, 493-498. 513/515: Palazzini 5, 431-432. 518: Hfl-Lecl 2, 1049.

M. Simonetti

III. Archaeology. At the border of the modern-day city of Sûr, a monumental arch was found with a Christian chapel, already decorated with wall mosaics with the representation of the Virgin and the saints. Many Christian *sarcophagi come from Tyre which, although they cannot rival those possessed by the pagans that are rich with figures, remain as an important testimony to the existence of Christianity. There are many Christian funerary inscriptions that bear the indication of the job once held by the deceased: two deacons, one worked as a carpenter; the other, a jeweler; a subdeacon sold fabric; two cantors, one served at the Church of the Virgin *Mary, the other at the Church of Old St. Mary's. There also appears to have been a consecrated virgin. There is also an exceptional invocation: "O Lord, you who have undergone death, grant [me] rest" (Jidejian, Tyre, 118). There are no inscriptions of bishops or presbyters. Archaeologists do not know the whereabouts of their tombs nor that of *Origen of Alexandria, who died in this city. With respect to the cathedral constructed at the time of the emperor *Constantine by Bishop *Paulinus of Tyre, for which *Eusebius provides us an extensive description (HE 10,37-49), it seems that the remains of this building lie under the Crusader Church. There are no archaeological remains of the other three early Christian churches, as in the case of the monasteries and the oratories outside the city, which became places of pilgrimage. The rural church of St. Zechariah enjoyed the right of asylum as a result of an imperial concession (CIG 8800; A. Dain - G. Rouillard, Une inscription relative au droit d'asile, conservée au Louvre: Byzantion 5 [1930] 315-326). From Tyre derives a terra cotta with the representation of the "personified cross" (Bagatti, Church from Circumcision, 222-223). From the territory very near to the city, the mosaic of the Church of St. Christopher Qabr Hiran is well-known, with scenes taken from real life, seasons, etc., replete with theological and liturgical meaning.

N. Jidejian, Tyre Through the Ages, Beirut 1969; B. Bagatti, The Church from the Circumcision, Jerusalem 1971; J.-P. Rey-Coquais, Inscriptions grecques et latines dans les fouilles de Tyr (1963-1974). I. Inscriptions de la nécropole, Paris 1977; D. Feissel, Notes d'épigraphie chrétienne III: BCH 102 (1978) 545-555; M. Chehab, Une nécropole paléochrétienne à Tyr, in Atti del IX Congr. int. di archeologia cristiana (Roma, 21-27 settembre 1975), II, Vatican City 1978, 157-161; J.P. Rey-Coquais, Fortune et rang social des gens de métiers de Tyr au Bas Empire: Ktèma 4 (1979) 281-292; J. Wilkinson, Paulinus' Temple at Tyre: JOEByz 32 (1982) 553-561; C. Smith, Christian Rhetoric in Eusebius' Panegyric at Tyre: VChr 43 (1989) 226-247; J.P. Rey-Coquais, Tyr, métropole de Carthage et de beaucoup d'autres villes, aux époques romaine et paléochrétienne, in Africa romana, 10, Sassari 1994, 1339-1353.

B. Bagatti

U

ULFILA. See *WULFILA

UNITY. Unity was an important notion in the Greek philosophical tradition, esp. *Platonism, which had its roots in Eleaticism, but also represents a development of it, insofar as, unlike Parmenides, Plato did not deny multiplicity but rather resolved it into unity. Suffice it to think of Plato's conception of each Idea, which constitutes the unity of a multiplicity of realities participating in that Idea, and of his protology, which is based on the transcendent principles of the One and of the indefinite Dyad. For Plato, the One coincides with the Good; for Aristotle, the One conincides with Being. In *Neoplatonism, Plotinus's One (ἕν) is the first of his Triad, which transcends not only the sense-perceptible world, but even the intellectual one and Being itself.

In the NT, unity is emphasized esp. in John 17, in the fundamental prayer of Jesus for unity: he prays that his followers may be one (ἕν) as he and the Father are one. This prayer proved to be an important point of departure for patristic reflection on unity, the unity of the *Trinity, the unity of the church, the unity of the Logos and, esp. in the case of the Origenian tradition, the unity of all with God at the beginning and in the end.

*Clement of Alexandria, *Origen and *Gregory of Nyssa esp. applied the notion of transcendent unity to the Christ-Logos as the seat of the Ideas/logoi of all existing beings and to Christ's humanity as coinciding with all of humankind. The latter concept has important consequences in Origen's and Gregory of Nyssa's eschatology in relation to the eventual resurrection and restoration.

In *Middle Platonism, the Logos is the seat of the Ideas, which are the paradigms of reality, and joins them all in unity. Plato's Ideas indeed have become thoughts of God and are located in God's mind, that is, in God's Logos. *Philo, who was close to Middle Platonism, saw in the Logos, which is one, the totality of powers which are identical to the Ideas, the intelligible paradigms of sense-perceptible realities. Like an architect who forms the paradigm of a city in his mind, God's Logos is the seat of "the world composed by the Ideas" (De opif. mund. 17-20). The Logos, according to Philo, plays a core role in the creation of the world. Now, shortly after Philo, John in his prologue also assigned this role to the Logos, which he already identified with Christ, as Clement, Origen and many Fathers did afterward. The Logos, in Philo's view, is a real μεσίτης or intermediary between God and the world, and between unity and multiplicity (LA III 150; Leg. ad G. 55). The latter respect is precisely that which is most developed by Clement of Alexandria, who also took over Philo's doctrine of the divine dynameis and mostly transferred them onto the Logos.

In Strom. IV 25,155-156 Clement observes that, according to Plato, the nous, or Intellect, is like a divinity which is able to contemplate the Ideas and the invisible God and inhabits human beings. It is the seat of the Ideas and is itself God. Plato's soul absorbed in the contemplation of the Ideas and detached from the sense-perceptible world is assimilated by Clement to an angel who is with Christ. Clement constructs the equation "soul : Ideas = angel : Christ," drawing a parallel not only between the soul and an angel but also between the Ideas and Christ. For Christ is the Logos and, as such, the seat of the Ideas. Immediately afterward, in 156,1, indeed, Clement describes the Logos as Wisdom, Science and Truth, all notions pertaining to the gnoseological field, which is related to the function of Christ-Logos as teacher in Clement. The Son, in Clement's view, is the sum and unification of all the powers of the spirit, "all in one"; they "concur to constitute the Son," "contribute to the Son," so that the Son is the sum of all these spiritual dynameis, which were probably assimilated by Clement to the Ideas in the Logos and the angels. (Indeed, he seems to have joined the speculation on the Logos to the Jewish-Christian doctrine on the angelic powers.) But Clement adds that the Son is not determined by the notion of each one of his powers. This suggests that Christ-Logos is not simply the sum of all these dynameis, but transcends them in a superior unity. Indeed, Clement goes on to say in 156,2 that "the Son is not simply 'one thing' as one thing; nor is he 'many things' as parts of a sum, but he is One thing as All things," ὡς πάντα ἕν. The Logos is not only One and not only All but All in One and One as All, the unity of multiplicity that transcends the many and makes them one. "Hence also all things; for the Son himself is the circle that embraces all the powers, which are encircled and unified into one." The Logos is the principle of all things because it embraces all in a superior unity and because it is the agent of creation. The notion of circularity in reference to the Logos's encompassing all in unity is further developed by Clement in 157,1: "For this reason the Logos is said to be the Alpha and the Omega [Rev 1:8; 22:13], because only in his case does the end coincide with the beginning; the Logos ends with the first principle without admitting of any interruption at any point." The Logos, being God, has no duality, no multiplicity, no division, but resolves every division and unifies multiplicity. Since the Logos is the transcendent unity of all, "to believe in Christ and through Christ means to become unified and simple, being unified in the Logos continually, without distractions or interruptions, whereas not to believe means to be in disagreement, separated and divided" (IV 25,157,2).

Clement's conception was taken up by Origen. The section of his Commentary on John devoted to the great prayer for unity in John 17 is lost, but a fragment on John 17:11 survives from the catenae (fr. 140), in which Origen explains, taking up a famous Aristotelian expression but applying it to a Platonic issue, that "unity has many meanings" (τὸ ἓν πολλαχῶς λέγεται); such as according to harmony and agreement, or according to similarity of nature, the unity of all human beings in Adam and in Christ is of the latter kind.

In Comm. in Io. I 20,119 Origen develops the idea of unity by observing that, whereas God the Father is One and absolutely simply One, Christ the Logos is "One through All." Christ is said to be "the first and the last" in Revelation because he is the first, the last and all that is in between, as Christ-Logos is "all things" (ibid., I 31,219), "all and in all" (ibid., I 31,225). The unity of the Logos is emphasized in Comm. in Io. XX 6,43-44 against those who "want to kill the Logos and to break him to pieces . . . to destroy the unity [ἑνότης] of the greatness of the Logos."

In Comm. in Io. I 19,114-115 Origen uses the metaphor of the project in the architect's mind employed by Philo to explain the relation between the Logos and the paradigm of the world; the living Wisdom of God is the Logos, who contains all the archetypal logoi that are the paradigms of all creation. That the logoi existed in unity in God's Logos-Wisdom ab aeterno, before their creation as substances, is declared by Origen in Princ. I 4,5. The Son/Logos/Wisdom contained in itself ab aeterno the "principles," "reasons" and "forms" of the whole creation (initia, rationes and species in Rufinus's version, corresponding to ἀρχαί, λόγοι and εἴδη), the Ideas in which every existing being participates (Princ. I 2,2). This, of course, depends on the Son himself existing ab aeterno as well as the Father, a point that Origen strongly defended against pre-Arian tendencies, according to which "there was a time when [the Son] did not exist." In The Trinitarian Theology of Gregory of Nyssa in his In Illud: Tunc et ipse Filius*: His Polemic Against "Arian" Subordinationism and the Apokatastasis,* a lecture at the International Congress on Gregory of Nyssa, Tübingen, Sept 2008, I demonstrated that Origen, far from being the inspirer of the Arians, was the inspirer of the Cappadocians' trinitarian theology and their anti-Arianism.

The dialectic between unity and multiplicity is an important theme in Origen's thought. Multiplicity is subsumed and transcended in the Logos's unity and, through Christ-Logos, in the eschatological unity of all rational creatures in God. This, the θέωσις, has often been misrepresented as pantheism, as though a substantial confusion should occur between God and creatures. But this is excluded by divine transcendence itself; the "divinization" of the noes will be their leading a divine life, and their unity in God is for Origen a unity of will. For all rational creatures will be oriented only to the Good, i.e., God, no longer to evil; neither will it be dispersed among minor or apparent goods, but God will be all good things, in one, for all. This eschatological unity will be unity in agapē, which is why there will be no more fall from unity in the apokatastasis: because caritas numquam cadit (Comm. in Rom. V 10,158-240). This agapē will keep all rational creatures in unity within themselves and with God, because agapē is a centripetal force: Tanta caritatis vis est ut ad se omnia trahat (ibid., V 10,226). The first fall, of Satan and Adam, took place before the manifestation of Christ's agapē, but in the apokatastasis agapē will be perfect (as the end will be not only similar to but even better than the beginning). The unity of the apokatastasis will never be disrupted by one rational creature's free will, which could endure forever in the rejection of God. Origen takes up Paul's revelation that nothing will be able to separate us from God's love, not even death, therefore, not even our free will (V 10,212-222). The fact that each rational creature's free will shall spontaneously adhere to the Good will also constitute the main feature of the final unity.

The current multiplicity of the rational creatures' wills and conditions will be subsumed and transcended in the final unity. The unity-multiplicity dialectic is clear in the following statement: Sicut multorum unus finis, ita ab uno initio multae differentiae ac varietates, quae rursum per bonitatem Dei, per subiectionem Christi atque unitatem Spiritus sancti in unum finem, qui sit initio similis, revocantur ("As there is one end to many things, so there spring from one beginning many differences and varieties, which again, through the goodness of God, and by subjection to Christ, and through the unity of the Holy Spirit, are recalled to one end, which is similar to the beginning," Princ. I 6,2). That the final unity is a unity of will is demonstrated also by Origen's statement that the cause of the multiplicity and diversity of the present state of things is precisely the rational creatures' free will, oriented in different directions after the fall, before which there was unitas and concordia (Princ. II 1,1): the initial unity was a concord of will, lost with the fall, when the noes began to wish something else than the Good, and dispersed itself into a multiplicity of volitions. Likewise, the final unity will be a unity of will. In I 6,2, the universality of the submission to Christ in Phil 2:10 is stressed, as well as the dialectic between the multiplicity of all creatures (omnes, omnis universitas) and the unity of the telos (unum finem); cf. I 6,4: Dispersio illa unius principii atque divisio ad unum et eundem finem et similitudinem reparatur ("That separation from the one beginning is undergoing a process of restoration to one and the same end and likeness"). It is precisely the unity of the telos that induces Origen to assume that not even the demons will be left outside (I 6,3: ab illa etiam finali unitate ac convenientia discrepabit ["whether that portion (which is evil) will differ from the final unity and fitness of all things"]).

Origen also employs the concept of unity in his anti-Marcionite and antignostic polemic, maintaining the unity of all Scripture, OT and NT, which in his view constitutes one and the same body, that of Christ (e.g., Comm. in Io. 10,18,107: "the unity [ἑνότης] of Spirit in all the Scriptures"). And he insists on the unity obtaining within the Trinity (e.g., Princ. 1,3,4: unitas Trinitatis).

Gregory of Nyssa also describes Christ-Logos-Wisdom as the seat of all Ideas of realities before creation (De Perf. 260B). Through God's dynamis, who is the Christ-Logos, these Ideas became creatures. This is the creation of the world performed by the Christ-Logos, which perfectly corresponds to In Hex. 72B: the Ideas of all things were contemplated by God, in the divine Mind-Logos, before their creation as realities, and it was "the Logos of dynamis" that brought these Ideas to reality. The "divine dynamis" is again said to have created all things in De hom. op. 3: "The creation [κτίσις] was made impromptu, so to say, by the divine dynamis, in that it was constituted at the same time as the order was given."

Differently from what he seems to imply in his own De perfectione and In Hexaemeron, however, but with a parallel with the special status of the logikoi in Origen, Gregory in De hominis opificio applies the notion of the preexistence of the Ideas of creatures in the Logos only (or to a greater degree) to the human being, "in such a way that the human being could be allotted a dignity more ancient than its birth. . . . It is only the creation of the human being that the Creator of the universe approached with extreme care and circumspection, to the point that he prepared even matter in advance for it, before its realization, and made its form similar to an archetypal Beauty. And, after establishing in advance the end for which this being had to appear in the world, he produced its nature in conformity with that end, and appropriate to its activities, so to be apt to the established objective." All creatures are brought to being by the Logos, but only for the human being, image of the archetypal Beauty, does the Logos seem to have had a plan ab aeterno, or at least a particularly careful plan and aim.

Gregory also took over Origen's reflection on the dialectic between unity and multiplicity in respect to the beginning and the end of this world. In the present life, division and multiplicity are due to the different choices of the rational creatures' will. The beginning and the end are characterized by unity and uniformity, which are essentially a unity of will, directed to the Good (e.g., De an. 81Bff.). This will be the assimilation to God (De an. 89ff.), which, too, had a counterpart at the beginning, when "human nature was 'something divine,' before the human being acquired the impulse to evil" (ibid., 148AB). It was divine because it was all in the Good, in unity, and it will be divine in the end, when all will voluntarily adhere to the Good and nobody will choose evil any more.

The unity of the Logos as "all things in one," subsuming and transcending multiplicity, is also present in Origen's and Gregory of Nyssa's conception of the assumption of all humanity on the part of Christ, so that the body of Christ is all humankind, and of the eventual presence of God "all in all," where the latter "all" are primarily all humans qua subsumed in Christ. This emerges, for instance, from Origen's Hom. in Lev. 7,2,10-12, and entails that the resurrection of Christ was not only the one which occurred historically but also the great, general resurrection of humanity in the end. The theme of human beings "scattered" in death/perdition and brought to unity by, and in, the Christ-Logos is emphasized by Origen also in connection with the motif of Jesus's gathering into ἕν the scattered children of God, which repeatedly appears in Origen's Commentary on John, in which the theme of unity through Christ, esp. based on John 17:21, is essential. In XXVIII 21,185 Origen even joins these two motifs. The eschatological reconstitution of Christ's body is connected to the interpretation of 1 Cor 15:28 and the equation between universal submission to Christ and God in the telos and universal salvation. Gregory of Nyssa takes up this whole set of ideas in his In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius, as I have argued elsewhere (SP 44 [2010]). Christ will have finished the "work" to which he refers in John 17:4 after making even the last sinner just. Until not one rational creature remains outside the body of Christ and all are in submission to him, Christ will not be able to submit to God. In all humanity (his body), made perfect by him, Christ will accomplish his work, as the result of which "God will be all in all" (Orig. Hom. in Lev. 7.2.6). Christ-Logos is the superior unity of all human creatures together, "all in One," and his eventual submission to the Father, that is, the submission of all humanity to God, will have as a result that God, who is One, and the One par excellence, will be in all, and for each of these "all" will be "all," that is, all things. This conception of God as the One who includes and transcends all things in a superior unity, and the One in whom all will be in the end, passes through Christ-Logos as the unity of all human beings. Gregory of Nyssa draws on these notions in his Tunc et Ipse. In Comm. in Io. X 35-36.225-238 Origen affirms that Christ's body, which is the temple of living stones erected on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, and which thus typologically represents the church, will rise again at the resurrection of all humanity. All the bones of this dispersed body will be reassembled. The resurrection of Christ from his death on the cross, which occurred in the past, embraces the mystery of the resurrection of the whole body of Christ (i.e., all humankind). Christ's body has not yet risen in the final, blessed resurrection that is the object of our hopes, a "great and difficult mystery" foreseen in Ezek 37:1-11 (related to the resurrection also in Gregory's De anima). These are Christ's scattered bones that will be reassembled in the end (233-236): "At the resurrection of Christ's true and most perfect body, Christ's limbs and bones, now dry . . . will be reassembled, up to the perfect anthrōpos [Eph 4:13]." In his lost commentary on Ephesians, fr. 16,15, this theme of the eschatological building up of Christ's body is connected to the unity assured by agapē: "Endeavoring to keep the unity of spirit in love . . . now, the unity of spirit is kept when love binds together those who are unified according to the Spirit, and gathers them together into one and the same body, that of Christ." In 9,65ff., Origen more directly refers this theme to 1 Cor 15:28: God "subjected everything under Christ's feet, and constituted Christ as the head over all beings, for the church, which is his body, the perfect totality of the one who perfectly accomplishes and completes all in all." Origen in his commentary identified the church, Christ's body, with all humans and angels, the same rational creatures portrayed by Gregory in De an. 132-136, as participating in the heavenly feast of apokatastasis. Origen in Comm. in Io. X 14.83 already described such heavenly feasts too.

Gregory in Tunc et Ipse supported a nonsubordinationist and "anti-Arian" interpretation of 1 Cor 15:28, which was anticipated by Origen; he took up both the main pillars and the tiniest details of Origen's exegesis, as I demonstrated thoroughly in Trinitarian Theology. In Gregory's argument, the eschatological submission of Christ to God, fully achieved after the rejection of evil on the part of all, is the submission of his body, that is, all human beings joined in unity (In Illud 19,19–20,7). Since the body of Christ is also the church (Col 1:24-25), the church will coincide with all humankind. In the relevant passage the dialectic between "all" (humans) and "one" (body of Christ) is highlighted by Gregory from the very beginning. "All," through participation, will contribute to the construction of Christ's body; all will reach unity of faith and knowledge and will make up Christ in perfect wholeness, as Gregory says drawing on Origen (Princ. 1,6,2; 1,2,10; 2,8,5). Gregory insists on unity and concord/harmony in the apokatastasis: the "whole body" of Christ will be "in accord with itself"; "the entire creation" will be "in harmony with itself" (In Illud 20.10-11), and, according to Phil 2:10-11, to which Gregory expressly refers, every knee will bend, of all beings in heaven, on earth and in the underworld, and all will proclaim that Christ is the Lord, which means, in his view, that all will believe and be saved. The whole creation will become "one single body" (ἕν, In Illud 20.14). The unity of all humans in the one body of Christ is extended to all creatures. On the basis of the aforementioned arguments, Gregory in In Illud 21 proposes a cogent syllogism: if submission means salvation, according to Origen's equation and Ps 61:2, and if "every being" that is in Christ, conceived as unity in multiplicity, is saved, then, since all will be in Christ's body, "no being will remain outside the saved." This, together with several other unequivocal passages, also refutes the hypothesis that the apokatastasis is "simply" the final resurrection for Gregory and thus does not imply universal salvation. In In Illud 23, too, Gregory argues in the same way, moreover introducing, like Origen, the key concept of agapē in the telos: if the Father loves the Son, according to John 17:23, and all human beings are in the Son, again as multiplicity subsumed in unity, then the Father loves all human beings as the Son's body, and the Son's submission to the Father means that all humanity will "attain the knowledge of God and be saved" (1 Tim 2:4-6). Gregory depends on the notion of the Christ-Logos being the unity of all human beings when in In Illud 21 he states that the elimination of death will have as a consequence that all will be in life, because all will be in Christ, who is "the Life" (John 11:25), and Christ's body will be constituted by all human beings. Similarly, Origen argued that in the end all will be in life, because eternal life, i.e., Christ, excludes eternal death altogether (Comm. in Rom. 5.7), since they are incompatible with one another; thus, one must be eliminated, and 1 Cor 15:25-28 reveals that what will be eliminated is death. According to Gregory, Christ is the Mediator in that he unifies all to himself and to the Father, in a function of unification of multiplicity (In Illud 21,10-16; cf. Origen, Princ. 2,6,1; C. Cels. 3,34). Christ unifies all human beings in himself and unites them to the Father through himself, i.e., through his subsuming them in unity in his body.

Consistent with the notion of the Christ-Logos as unity of multiplicity, Gregory in In Illud 22-23 insists on Christ's prayer for unity in John 17:20-23. He observes that Christ "unifies all" in himself and to the Father; all become "one and the same thing," ἕν, with Christ and God who are one; Christ, being in the Father, by joining us to himself in unity accomplishes the union of all human beings with God. Christ's prayer for unity in John 17:20-23 was one of Origen's favorite biblical quotations in support of the idea of perfect unity in the apokatastasis, which, in his view, will be the accomplishment of the subsumption of all multiplicity in a superior unity, e.g., in Princ. 1,6,2 (restituetur in illam unitatem quam promittit Dominus . . .) and 2.3.5: Quod dicit Salvator . . . "Sicut ego et tu unum sumus, ut et isti in nobis unum sint," ostendere videatur . . . id cum iam non in saeculo sunt omnia, sed omnia et in omnibus Deus. All beings will be God through θέωσις. In 3,6,1, Origen expresses the same idea against the background of the eschatological passage, from image of God to likeness with God and from likeness to unity in God (ἕνωσις). The unity of all will depend on the fact that all will eventually be in God and God will be all in all (see also ibid., 3,2,4; 3,6,6, in which unity is again emphasized). According to Gregory, the eschatological unity of all will be brought about by the Spirit (In Illud 22), which will restore all human beings to unity among themselves and with God, after separation due to sin; Origen had already assigned to the Spirit an essential role in the return of all human beings to unity in God (see, e.g., Comm. in Rom. 8,4).

Eusebius, who was an admirer of Origen, like him insists on the unity that will characterize the apokatastasis with quotations from John. All humanity's unity with God (οἱ πάντες εἷς, ἑνωθέντες τῇ θεότητι) in the apokatastasis will be, not a unity of substance, as though a confusion of essences should occur (οὐ κατὰ συναλοιφὴν μιᾶς οὐσίας), but a unity of perfect virtue, to which all will be brought: κατὰ δὲ τελείωσιν τῆς εἰς ἄκρον ἀρετῆς . . . τέλειοι κατεργρασθέντες. "All" (οἱ πάντες) will achieve unity with God. As the Son is one with the Father, according to Jesus's declarations in the gospel of John, so will "all" imitate this unity: πάντας ἡμᾶς κατὰ τὴν αὐτοῦ μίμησιν τῆς ἑνότητος.

Two authors who knew very well the Origenian tradition and the works of the Cappadocians, Ps.-*Dionysius and *Maximus the Confessor, also take up the perspective of the importance of unity. In Dionysius, this notion is extraordinarily emphasized and is articulated in the (Neoplatonic) development from μονή to πρόοδος to ἐπιστροφή: initial unity in God, who is the One, dispersion into multiplicity, and return to unity in God in the apokatastasis, a progression that was also stressed by *Evagrius, another supporter of the apokatastasis, who saw the latter as strongly characterized by unity. Esp. his followers later theorized an initial monad, which will be reconstituted in the eventual restoration. In Maximus, the concept of unity is highlighted both in connection with the return of all to God (on which see Ramelli, Apocatastasi, chapter on Maximus) and in relation to the notion of the Christ-Logos, who is presented by him, too, as the superior unity of all the logoi of creation (for which see Tollefsen).

T.T. Tollefsen, The Christocentric Cosmology of St Maximus the Confessor, Oxford 2008; I. Ramelli, Clement's Notion of the Logos "All Things as One": Its Alexandrian Background in Philo and Its Developments in Origen and Nyssen, in Alexandrian Personae: Scholarly Culture and Religious Traditions in Ancient Alexandria (1st ct. BCE–4th ct. CE), eds. Z. Plese–R. Hirsch-Luipold, Tübingen 2010; id., Apocatastasi, Milan 2009; id., "In Illud: Tunc et Ipse Filius . . ." (1Cor 15,27-28): Gregory of Nyssa's Exegesis, Its Derivations from Origen, and Early Patristic Interpretations Related to Origen's, seminar paper at the 2007 Oxford Patristic Conference, SP 44 (2010).

I. Ramelli

UNUS EX TRINITATE PASSUS EST. Basing its claim on the 12th anathema of *Cyril of Alexandria (DS 263; 401), the *monophysite tradition introduced the christological formula unus ex Trinitate passus est, which, for its opponents, only signified theopaschitism, a charge leveled by the *dyophysites against Cyril and his followers. It was only gradually received by the Chalcedonians, who were protected by the emperor *Justinian. Under the influence of the Scythian monks, led by Maxentius and supported by *Boethius, and through *Dionysius Exiguus (d. ca. 545) was it finally also imposed under Pope *John II in the Latin Church (DS 401).

V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der skytischen Kontroversen, Paderborn 1935; A. Grillmeier, Vorbereitung des Mittelalters: CGG 2, 791-839; J. Chéné, Unus de Trinitate passus est . . . : RecSR 53/4 (1965) 545ff.; Grillmeier, II/2, Freiburg 1989, 336-355: Giustiniano e gli Sciti; 536-559: Giovanni II.

B. Studer

URANIUS, presbyter. Disciple of *Paulinus of Nola; in 431 he wrote a letter on the death of his teacher, addressed to a certain *Pacatus who desired to illustrate Paulinus's life in Latin verse (see par. 1 of Ep.: PL 53,860).

CPL 207; PL 53, 859-866; P.-M. Duval, La Gaule jusqu'au milieu du Ve siècle, Paris 1971, n. 298, pp. 700-701; A. Pastorino, Il De obitu sancti Paolini di Uranio: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 115-141; PCBE 2, 2342-2343.

S. Zincone

URBAN I, pope (222–230). Urban I succeeded Pope *Callistus I and died in 230, after eight years of his pontificate (Eus., HE 6,21,23). Urban was bishop of Rome in a period of religious peace, even though the Christian community of the city of *Rome was still in an upheaval over the schism of *Hippolytus. Tradition venerates him as a *martyr on 25 May, but his supposed martyrdom lacks any historical foundations, particularly because we lack any evidence that the empire of *Alexander Severus pursued anti-Christian persecutions during those years. The legend, moreover, anachronistically associates this pontiff with the martyr *Cecilia (LP I, 63). Urban was buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus, where the inscription pertaining to him was found.

AASS Maii VI, Antwerp 1688, 11-14; Eus., HE 6, 21,2; 6,23,3 and 6,43,6; LP I, XCIII-XCIV, CCXLVI-CCXLVII, 4 and 5, 62 and 63, 143-144; 509; II, 56 and III, 74; Jaffé 87, 13-14 (apocryphal letter); G.B. de Rossi, La Roma sotterranea cristiana, II, Rome 1867, XX-XXI, XXIII-XXV, XLI, 24, 33-48, 51-54, 132, 148-152, pl. II, 3; G. Wilpert, La cripta dei papi e la cappella di Santa Cecilia nel cimitero di Callisto, Rome 1910, 15, 17-18, 25, 33-34, pl. II, 8; P. Allard, Storia critica delle persecuzioni I, Florence 1931, 393-394, 399-401; Storia critica delle persecuzioni II, Florence 1935, 186; AB 88 (1960) 192-193; BS 12, 837-840, 840-841 (A. Amore - M.C. Celletti); The Oxford Dictionary of Popes, Oxford-New York 1986, 15-16; EPapi I, 258-261 (F. Fatti); LTK³ 10, 454 (S.Ch. Kessler).

M. Spinelli

URBANUS of Sicca (5th c.). Bishop of *Sicca Veneria, successor of *Fortunatian, during the 1st years of the 5th c. (Aug., Epp. 148,1; 149,3,34), and a disciple of *Augustine. He was the one who provided Augustine with information about Darius, the court magistrate (Ep. 229,1), who in turn, with a letter (230,1) praised him in Augustine's presence. In 418 Urbanus excommunicated his presbyter, *Apiarius of Sicca, for certain crimes, otherwise unknown, and this individual appealed to the Roman see, an unusual course of action for a nonbishop. But Pope *Zosimus accepted this recourse and sent three delegates to *Africa to resolve the dispute, which was discussed in May of 419. This act of the pope provoked reciprocal embassies and tensions between the Roman see and the African church.

DTC 15, 2307-2312; PCBE 1, 1232-1233; J. Merdinger, Rome and the African Church in the Time of Augustine, New Haven, CT 1997, 111ff.

E. Romero Pose

URBS BEATA JERUSALEM. A hymn of rare beauty, its author is unknown. Composed presumably around the 8th–9th c., it is present in some liturgical books starting from the end of the 9th c. We find it codified for the first time in the Pontifical of Poitiers, now in the modern-day Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal in Paris (cod. 227). Initially composed according to a trochaic meter, it was changed into iambics at the time of Pope Urban VIII (1623–1644). The reform of the hymnary by the Second Vatican Council divided the hymn into two parts and has remained in this form in the Editio typica altera 1985: the first part is set forth as a hymn at Vespers (ss. 1-24), although the second constitutes the hymn for Lauds (ss. 25-48). Both hymns finish with the same trinitarian doxology (ss. 49-51). It was used as the hymn for the dedication of a church and celebrates the praises of the heavenly *Jerusalem, a figure of the earthly church. In its essential structure it speaks to us of a double dimension of the church, namely that of heaven and that of earth. The living stones of the heavenly Jerusalem are arranged in unity, having as its cornerstone Christ himself. While singing the hymn we contemplate the church in its celestial reality, so that the pilgrim church on earth can anticipate the beauty of heaven in its journey toward the kingdom. This hymn contains no negative or pessimistic allusion to the final destiny of humanity.

G.M. Dreves - C. Blume (eds.), Analecta hymnica medii aevi, Leipzig-Frankfurt a.M. 51 (1908) 110-112; A. Lentini, Hymni instaurandi Breviarii romani, Vatican City 1968, 143 (with comm.); P. Tena, Ritual de dedicación de Iglesias: Phase 111 (1979) 183-221; H. Rahner, Mater Ecclesia (Hymns of praise for the church, taken from the first millennium of Christian literature), Milan 1972; N. Zanini, Urbs Jerusalem beata (historical, liturgical and theological study), Rome 2002.

L. Dattrino

URSACIUS of Singidunum (d. after 369). *Arian bishop of Singidunum (Moesia Superior), a disciple of *Arius himself. Regarded by *Hilary as an ignorant and perverse man (Oratio synodi Sardicensis ad Constantium imperatorem, I,5: CSEL 65,184), he was for 30 years with *Valens of Mursa one of the most active and unscrupulous opponents of *Athanasius. He sided against Athanasius during the Council of *Tyre (335) and with the calumnies that he had circulated at *Constantinople, he was able to have Athanasius exiled by the emperor *Constantine. Excommunicated and opposed by the Council of *Serdica (343), Ursacius was able to obtain readmission into ecclesiastical communion during the Synod of *Milan (347), after the condemnation of the Arian teaching and the retraction of everything he had said up until that point concerning Athanasius. Nevertheless, he again sided against Athanasius at the synod of *Arles of 353 and at the synod of Milan of 355. Then in 357–358, he was among the redactors of the formulas of faith signed by Hosius of Cordoba and *Basil of Ancyra, and in 359 he participated in the composition of the *homoian formula, which was at the basis of the convocation of the Council of *Rimini (359). Finally, after having worked within the synod of Constantinople (360), because even the emperor Constantius favored the affirmation of the homoian doctrine, in 369 he was definitively excommunicated by Pope *Damasus and died shortly thereafter.

CPG 2123.13-14.24; H.G. Opitz, Athanasius Werke, II,I, Berlin 1935-41, 138 and 152-153; Y.-M. Duval, La "manoeuvre frauduleuse" de Rimini. À la recherche du "Liber adversus Ursacium et Valentem," in Hilaire et son temps. Actes du Colloque de Poitiers 29 septembre – 3 octobre 1968, Études Augustiniennes 1969, 51-103.

P. Marone

URSINIUS, Testimony of (apocryphal). Two *Syriac texts, erroneously called epistula, found under the name of a philosopher Ursinius (an unknown figure). They speak of the signs that accompanied the death of Christ and the spread of the Christian faith; they were transmitted in Syriac from the late works in the Chronicle of Michael the Syrian and in the Chronography of Bar Hebraeus and in Arabic by the Chronicle of Agapius; they seem to come from the 5th–7th c.

CANT 309; W. Witakowski, in Starowieyski 1/2, 570-572; N. Zeegers Van der Vorst: OCA 221 (1983) 63-77.

M. Starowieyski

URSINUS, antipope (d. 385). The most ancient source that speaks about the origin of the Ursinian *schism is a document against *Damasus (Coll. Avel. 1: CSEL 55, 1-4), which substantially agrees with the information provided by *Ammianus Marcellinus and *Jerome. Immediately after the death of Pope *Liberius (24 September 366), several priests and deacons elected *Damasus in the basilica of S. Lorenzo in Lucina, although others elected the deacon Ursinus in the Basilica Iulii (the modern-day basilica of S. Maria in Trastevere), who was immediately consecrated by Paul bishop of Tivoli. Damasus's supporters at once laid siege to the basilica for three days, and various people were injured. In the meanwhile, Damasus established himself in the Lateran Basilica and was consecrated. Ursinus along with the others was exiled by Viventius, prefect of the city, but his followers occupied the Liberian Basilica (Basilica Sicinini), where they were besieged by Damasus's supporters, and on 16 October 366, a massacre occurred (Coll. Avel. 1,7: CSEL 55, 3; Ammianus, Rerum gest. XXVII, 3,11ff.). On 15 September 367, Ursinus and his exiled followers were allowed to return to *Rome, and immediately they occupied some churches, for which reason the prefect expelled them again on 16 November of the same year. Because many of his followers had stayed at Rome, fights occurred once again, which prompted the intervention of the prefect and the emperor, who prohibited the supporters of Ursinus from residing in the city or other places nearby. Nevertheless, the schismatic group continued to harass Damasus by making use of the convert *Isaac the Jew. Ursinus and some of his supporters were sent to *Gaul (Coll. Avel. 11 and 12: CSEL 55,52-54); subsequently, Ursinus was at *Milan, where he joined forces with the *Arians (Ambr., Ep. 4) and was therefore banished to the city of *Cologne, Germany, before the year 378; upon the death of Pope Damasus (11 December 384), Ursinus's supporters once again plotted to bring about his election, but *Siricius was elected by unanimous vote.

DCB 4, 1068-1070; EC 12, 923-924; Fliche-Martin III, 241-242; M. Green, The Supporters of the Antipope Ursinus: JTS 22 (1971) 531-538; Ch. Pietri, Roma Christiana, I, Rome 1976, 408-423, 733-737 (see also the Index: II, 1701); PCBE 2, 2356-2358; EPapi I, 372-374; G. Pilara, Problemi ancora aperti nel pontificato damasiano. Lo scisma ursiniano e i concili romani nel pontificato di Damaso: Clio 28/1 (2002) 115-133.

A. Di Berardino

URSINUS of Bourges (3rd c.). The cult of Ursinus dates back to the 6th c., when Bishop Probianus of Bourges, between 558 and 573, recognized his body preserved in a *sarcophagus, which he transferred into the Church of St. Synphorianus, built by him outside the city walls, near *Germanus of Paris. This church would subsequently be called "St. Ursinus." He was the first bishop of Bourges (Aventicum, Bituriga etc.) according to the 9th-c. episcopal list (Duchesne II,22). *Gregory of Tours, in the Historia Francorum (1,31), attributes the evangelization of the territory to an anonymous disciple of seven evangelizing bishops of the mid-3rd c., while in the Gloria confessorum he writes that Ursinus was the first apostle of Bourges, referring to him as a discipulis apostolorum episcopus ordinatus (Gloria Conf. 80: PL 71,887), without giving a precise date, but adds that his memory was lost until Probianus's miraculous discovery. The Ecclesia prima of Bourges is very ancient, inasmuch as, according to Gregory of Tours, it was constructed by the wealthy Leocadius, a descendant of the *martyr of *Lyons of 177, Vettius Epagatus (Hist. Franc. 1,31), and should be dated around the mid-3rd c. Ursinus's feast is celebrated on 9 November (likewise according to the Roman Martyrology) and 29 December.

BHL 8411-8415; BS 12, 861-863; Cath 15, 560; BBKL 12, 947-951; L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, II, [2]1910, 22-26; 122-124; J.-J. Villepet, Nos saints berrichons, Bourges 1931, 192-198; M. de Laugardière, L'Église de Bourges avant Charlemagne, Paris 1951, 16-27, 92-97; É. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, I, [2]1964, 109-115; Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule, VI, Prov. eccl. de Bourges, Paris 1989, 20ff.

A. Di Berardino

URSULA and the 11,000 virgin martyrs. The point of departure for the cult is an inscription of the senator Clematius (CIL 13,1313*: sanctae virgines pro nomine XPi sanguinem suum fuderunt): whether this is an early Christian inscription (4th–5th c.) or the medieval copy of an ancient one, it attests the cult of the anonymous virgins in a cemeterial church, now St. Ursula, N of the walls of the Roman city of Colonia (Cologne). For the following five centuries, there is no other documentation of a martyrial cult in this place. Nor does the Gallican version of the Mart. hier. know the virgins of Cologne. Only from the 9th c. did the legend of 11 virgins, linked with that church (a funerary monument with 11 places), spread, and in a subsequent period there is information about Ursula and the 11,000 virgins. Near the basilica was a convent of nuns, called monasterium beatarum virginum, ceded in 922 to the ladies of Gerresheim. In the 10th–11th c. the legend of St. Ursula developed: she was the daughter of a British king who had made a vow of virginity. With 11,000 virgins she passed through Cologne on a pilgrimage to Rome, where she was baptized by Pope Cyriacus (unknown from pontifical records); back in Cologne, all of them were martyred by Attila. The new wall, which in 1106 joined the convent of St. Ursula to the city, was the occasion for seeking out the relics of the 11,000 virgins (now in the "golden room"). Their cult spread from Cologne to all of Europe; their feast is 21 October (Mart. rom.).

BHL 8426-8451; BS 9, 1252-1271; LCI 8, 521-527; RAC 10, 583-585; N. Gauthier, Origine et premiers développements de la légende de Sainte Ursule a Cologne: Comptes rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres des séances de l'année 1973 Janvier-Mars, Paris 1973, 108-121; J. Kremer, Studien zum frühen Christentum in Niedergermanien, Diss., Bonn 1993, 165-180; W. Rosen - L. Wirtler (eds.), Quellen zur Geschichte der Stadt Köln 1, Cologne 1999, 53-58; G. Wolff, Das römisch-germanische Köln, Cologne [5]2000, 253-255; G. Nürnberger, Die Ausgrabungen in St. Ursula zu Köln, Diss., Bonn 2002; N. Gauthier, Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII[e] siècle, 12, Paris 2002, 56-60.

S. Heid

USURY. Even though the NT does not explicitly denounce usury (Lk 6:34 cannot be so interpreted), the Fathers, appealing esp. to texts of the OT (Ex 18:7-8; 22:25; Lev 23:35; Dt 15:3; 23:20; Ps 15:5; Ezek 18:4-9), regarded it as incompatible with the Christian life (Clem. of Alex., Paed. 1,10; Strom. II, 19). In the condemnation of usury, they followed a teaching more broadly present in the Jewish world to the point that *Tertullian treats it as one of the indicative aspects of the harmony between the OT and the NT (Adv.

Marc. IV,17; Greg. Nyss., Epist. can. 6: PG 45,234). *Cyprian dedicated an entire thesis of his Testimonia to demonstrate the illicitness of usury (Test. III,48). It is esp. condemned because it is contrary to the love that Christians must show to the poor: in fact, it masks, under the appearance of giving, the true reason that makes it exist, namely to impoverish one's neighbor (Commod., Instruct. 65; Lact., Instit. divin. 6,18; Hilar., In ps. 14,15). For *Basil of Caesarea, usury not only makes the poor even poorer, but also deprives them of freedom (Hom. II in ps. 14). In Basil's Epist. 188 (PG 32,682) important information is found pertaining to the penitential practices to be applied with respect to usurers. For *Gregory of Nyssa, usury is a sin unknown to nature because it allows one to obtain gain from inanimate things, although in nature it is only from animate things that one can derive some fruits (Hom. IV in Eccl.; Greg. Naz., Or. 16,18; Ambr., De off. 111,3). Likewise for Gregory of Nyssa, usury increases the number of poor people (Hom. IV in Eccl.), and the usurer is similar to the thief (Contra usurarios). *Ambrose dedicated an entire work to the theme of usury: De Tobia. Allowed by the imperial laws (De Tob. 42; John Chrysos., Hom. LVI in Mt.), Ambrose conceived the practice of usury as possible only in the case in which it was practice toward an enemy of war (De Tob. 51; it seems, however, that this concession was owed only to the interpretive difficulties contained in the text of Dt 23:20-21). But in other works, the condemnation of usury by Ambrose is absolute (De Nabuthe 4,15; De bono mortis 12,56) and is also directed at the hoarding of grain and the speculations made in time of famine on the prices of agricultural products, all of which were considered legitimate maneuvers by usurers (De off. III,41). The same condemnation reappears in the writings of *John Chrysostom (Hom. 41 in Gen.; Hom. XIII in I Cor.; Hom. X in I Thess.), *Jerome (Com. in Ez. 18,6), *Augustine (Enarr. in ps. 36 serm. 3,6; Serm. 38; 86; Bapt. 4,9), *Leo the Great (Epist. IV: PL 54,613; Serm. 17) and in can. 20 of the Council of *Elvira (Mansi 2, 9) and the first Council of *Arles (Mansi 2, 472).

DTC 15, 2316-2333; R.P. Maloney, Early Conciliar Legislation on Usury: RecTh 39 (1972) 145-157; R.P. Maloney, The Teaching of the Fathers on Usury: An Historical Study on the Development of Christian Thinking: VChr 27 (1973) 241-263; M. Giacchero, Aspetti economici fra III e IV secolo: prestito ad interesse e commercio nel pensiero dei Padri: Augustinianum 17 (1977) 25-37; A. Di Berardino, La défense du pauvre: saint Augustin et l'usure, in Augustinus Afer, ed. P.-Y. Fux et al., Fribourg 2003, 257-262 (with bibl.).

M.G. Mara

UZALIS. Archaeological research places Uzalis ca. 60 km (37.3 mi) N of *Carthage, 18 km (11.2 mi) NW of Utica and 19 km (11.8 mi) SE of Hippo Diarrythus (modern-day Bizerte) and the modern-day inhabited center of El Alia. *Augustine says that Uzalis was near the colony of Utica, at that time on the sea. During the episcopate of *Evodius, a fellow countryman and friend of Augustine, some of the relics of St. *Stephen the first *martyr arrived at Utica, brought by the presbyter *Orosius, coming from *Palestine, perhaps in 418 (see Aug., Civ. Dei 22,8,22). Through Augustine and the anonymous report of the *De miraculis S. Stephani from ca. 425, we know that Uzalis had become a center of pilgrimage, not only for the surrounding peoples, but also for people coming from far off (Carthage, *Cappadocia). The local population was very proud of possessing Stephen's remains and of being the center of attention. At Utica there were various Christian buildings: the urban cathedral (where Stephen's memoria was found), the martyrial sanctuary in the countryside, a church referred to as "of the promontory," an episcopal monastery and perhaps a convent.

A. Caserta, Evodio di Tagaste amico e discepolo di S. Agostino: Asprenas 3 (1956/57) 123-152; C. Lepelley, Les cités de l'Afrique romaine au Bas-Empire, Paris 1981, II, 246; A. Beschaouch, Sur la fixation à El-Alia, non loin de Utique, de l'emplacement d'Uzalis, cité d'accueil des premies reliques, en Occident, du protomartyr Étienne: CRAI 2001, 1525-1232; T. Ghalia, Le site d'Uzalis: recherches récentes en archéologie et en épigraphie, in J. Meyers (ed.), Les miracles de saint Étienne. Recherches sur le recueil pseudo-augustinien (BHL 7860-7861), avec édition critique, traduction et commentaire, Turnhout 2006, 81-87; Y. Duval, Les monuments du culte d'Étienne à Uzalis, ibid., 89-100.

A. Di Berardino

V

VAGHARSHAPAT – ETCHMIADZIN. The city is found ca. 20 km (12.4 mi) W of Yerevan and would correspond to the ancient Kainepolis (i.e., new city); it was occupied in AD 163 by the Roman general Statius Priscus. Around the end of the 2nd c. it was reestablished by Vagharsh I, from whom it took its name, becoming the second city of the kingdom, after Artashat, and residence of the Arsacidans. After 301, when Christianity became the religion of the state, the city was the Christian center of *Armenia by choice of *Gregory the Illuminator, who had a vision of Christ, who indicated where and how to build a church. On account of this vision, he changed the city's name to Etchmiadzin (which means "the descent of the Only Begotten") and there ordered the construction of a cathedral in 305. It became the see of the Armenian *catholicos until 439 and then again from 1441 onward. From 1945 the name Etchmiadzin was extended to Vagharshapat. Here we find numerous relics (the lance of Longinus, the hand of Gregory the Illuminator etc.). According to the sources, the most ancient buildings of worship in Armenia were built in the city (along with those of Ashtishat), on the place of the martyrdom of the female saints Gayané (Gaiana) and Hripsimé (Ripsima), by order of the same St. Gregory the Illuminator (d. 325), respectively reconstructed in 630 and 618: these were two quadrangular buildings with a vault, whose entrance is still marked by the use of the trumpet. From the sources, moreover, we know of the existence at Vagharshapat of a fortified bishop's palace. The most significant building in terms of art history is the cathedral, whose present form, the result of numerous reconstructions, dates partly to the 7th c.; the cathedral is an architectural palimpsest, which makes it possible to identify the most ancient phases. The tetraconch form, adopted in the phase attributed to Vahan Mamikonian (end of the 5th c.), was respected in subsequent reconstructions, although it is hardly likely that the original 4th-c. building also presented an analogous layout, as Khatchatrian claims (under the modern-day building an apse belonging to the primitive phase was found). It must have been a building with three aisles divided by pillars, belonging to the type of basilica found at Qassaq. The church of Zvart'noc is a martyrium—theophanic and not a sepulchral—of St. Gregory, which simultaneously functioned as the palace church of the Armenian catholicos Nerses III (541–661); it is a tetraconch with three exedrae opened by columns, with the exception of the E exedra, surrounded by a gallery for walking and with a rectangular room jutting out to the E. The construction arose on the site in which, according to legend, the angels, in Armenian Zvart'noc, the Vigilant Forces, appeared to St. Gregory; it was completed upon the order of the catholicos Nerses III the Builder (641–661), and constitutes at the same time the point of arrival and departure of certain experiments in Armenian construction. At Vagharshapat in 491 a well-known synod was held, which officially marked the church's adherence to *monophysitism (for other buildings, see *Armenia).

A. Khatchatrian, RBK s.v. Etchmiadzin (with the preceding bibl.); A. Khatchatrian, Inscriptions et histoire des églises arméniennes, Milan 1974, 94; CE 14, 513; EC 5, 181-183; A. Zarian - A. Ter Minassian, Vałarshapat, Milan 1998; ODB 3, 2149; J. Ausflag, Petit Dictionnaire de l'Orient chrétien, Turnhout 1991, 204-205 and 462; LTK³ 4, 941-942; N. Garsoïan, Was a Council Held at Vałaršapat in A.D. 491?: Muséon 117 (2004) 497-506.

M. Falla Castelfranchi

VAISON, Council of. Gathered in this city of *Gaul on 13 November 442, under the honorary presidency of Bishop Auspicius but the effective presidency of *Hilary of Arles, this council completed the disciplinary work of the Council of *Orange (441).

CCL 148, 94-104; Hfl-Lecl II, 454-460; Palazzini 6, 16-17.

Ch. Munier

VALENCE, Council of. An interprovincial gathering of bishops from *Gaul, held on 12 July 374. In their synod, the fathers established four disciplinary canons pertaining to admittance to holy orders, the *penance of virgines lapsae and the case of those who had themselves rebaptized by heretics.

CCL 148, 35-45; Hfl-Lecl I,2, 982; Palazzini 6, 18-19.

CH. MUNIER

VALENS, emperor (d. 378). Valens, appointed Augustus by his brother *Valentinian I, was emperor of the East from 364 to 378, when he was conquered and killed on 9 August at Adrianople. A follower of the *Arian creed according to the Formula of *Rimini, he was also its convinced supporter against the *homoiousians and the Nicenes, whom he persecuted (Soz., HE 6,7: with respect to the fate of the delegates of the assembly of *Lampsacus). In 365 he issued an edict that sent the bishops who had entered their sees under the reign of the emperor *Julian back into exile (Socr., HE 4,2; Soz., HE 6,7). In 367, the beginning of the Gothic War, he was baptized by the Arian *Eudoxius of *Constantinople, and two years later, during the occasion of the appointment the Arian *Demophilus as the successor of Eudoxius, he began a new persecution against those who did not adhere to the Arian faith (Soz., HE 6,14; Basil, Ep. 243; Greg. Naz., Or. 20; 25; 43). The changes that marked the religious politics of the 5th c. in the last two years of his life (the revocations of the sentences of exile inflicted on the Nicenes is from 376) had two interpretation: it was seen as a sincere change of mind (Socr., HE 4,35) or as a political necessity in the face of the exacerbating military situation (Ruf., HE 2,13). Allusions to Valens as the one responsible for the difficult situation in the empire are present in the writings of *Ambrose (Exp. ev. Lc. I,32; II,37; see J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise, 334 n. 51).

L.-S. Le Nain de Tillemont, Histoire des empereurs, V, Venezia 1732; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'empire romain, Paris 1933, R. Snee, Valens' Recall of the Nicene Exiles and Anti-Arian Propaganda, Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies 26 (1985) 395-419; N. Lenski, Failure of Empire: Valens and the Roman State in the Fourth Century A.D., Berkeley, CA 2002.

M.G. MARA

VALENS of Mursa and URSACIUS of Singidunum (Belgrade) (4th c.). These two important proponents of Illyrican *Arianism appear for the first time, still at a young age, at the Council of *Tyre (335) in the ranks of *Athanasius's opponents. It has been thought that their pro-Arian bent derived from direct contact with *Arius during their exile in Illyricum (326–328). Although Westerners, they were part of the anti-Nicene and anti-Athanasian Easterners at the Council of *Serdica (343), and the Western bishops criticized them for their Arianism; Valens was also charged with having sought, sometime earlier, to have himself irregularly transferred from Mursa to *Aquileia. The position of the two men, who were residing in the part of the empire governed by Constans and which was anti-Arian in belief, was not easy, and in 347, during the occasion of Athanasius's reentry at *Alexandria, they formally reconciled with him. But when Constantius II was left as the sole emperor, the influence of the two—esp. Valens, who had been very close to him during the battle of Mursa against the usurper Magnetius (351)—gradually increased, and they took part firsthand in the action aimed at aligning the Western episcopate along the anti-Athanasian and anti-Nicene line of the East. Working in close contact with *Germinius, bishop of Sirmium from 351 onward, they took part in the Council of *Milan (355), where Valens prevented the approval of the Nicene Creed proposed by his opponents, and they worked on a Second Formula of *Sirmium in 357, the most openly pro-Arian statement among those published during those years.

The success of the *homoiousian response took them by surprise, and they, obedient to Constantius's wishes, signed the anti-Arian decisions of the Council of Sirmium of 358. But at the Council of *Rimini of 359 they headed the pro-Arian minority, which, after much maneuvering and strengthened by the support of the emperor, imposed on the anti-Arian majority the Formula of Rimini. The anti-Arian action that followed the death of Constantius (362) put them in a difficult situation when they attempted to defend their position. Nevertheless, thanks to the politics of nonintervention promoted by *Valentinian I, they were able to preserve their episcopal sees and on the whole safeguard the Arian positions of Illyricum, which were considerable thanks to their own action. Around 365, Valens graciously received *Eunomius, who was passing through while heading for exile; Valens was able to have his sentence of exile revoked by interceding with the emperor of the same name. In 366 they sought to dissuade Germinius from his decision to abandon the Formula of Rimini in favor of a formula more explicitly anti-Arian, and for this reason they convoked a small Arian council at Singidunum (Belgrade), but without success. After this event, we have no information about these men.

CPL 682-684; M. Meslin, Les Ariens d'Occident, Paris 1967, 71-84; Simonetti 597; Y.-M. Duval, L'extirpation de l'Arianisme en Italie du Nord et en Occident: Rimini (359-60) et Aquilée (381), Hilaire de Poitiers (m. 367-8) et Ambroise de Milan (m. 397), Aldershot 1998, p. 16 of the Index.

M. Simonetti

VALENTINIAN I (d. 375). Emperor of the West from 364 to 375, although professing the Nicene faith, his religious action was inspired by the principle of neutrality (CTh 9,16,9) not only for political reasons but also because it reaffirmed the principle that, as a layperson, it was not permissible for him to render a judgment in questions of faith (Soz., HE 6,7). He ratified the election of *Ambrose in 373 and reminded Valentinian II of the respect owed to ecclesiastical autonomy and the approval of his appointment (Ep. 21,2-5). Ambrose himself in Ep. 17,16 (PL 16,1006) imagined a speech that Valentinian would have given in the event that he had been informed of the presence of the *Altar of Victory in the Senate house, and, upon his death, in the funerary oration, he recalls the faith that he showed under the emperor *Julian (De obit. Valent. 55). A proof of the respectful distance that separated Valentinian from Ambrose is found in the silence that Ambrose maintained concerning the emperor's second marriage to *Justina after his divorce from his first wife.

W. Heering, Kaiser Valentinian I, Magdeburg 1927; R. Andreotti, Incoerenza della legislazione dell'imperatore Valentiniano I: Nuova Rivista Storica 15 (1931) 456-516; J. Gaudemet, L'Église dans l'Empire romain, Paris 1958; R. Soraci, L'imperatore Valentiniano I, Catania 1971; E. Peretto, Testo biblico e sua applicazione del De obitu Valentiniani di Ambrogio: Vichiana: rassegna di studi filologici e storici 18 (1989) 99-170; F. Heim, Les figures du prince idéal au IVe siècle: du type au modèle, in Figures de l'Ancient Testament chez les Pères, Strasbourg 1989, 277-301; F. Pergami, La legislazione di Valentiniano e Valente (364-375), Milan 1993.

M.G. Mara

VALENTINIAN II (371–392). In 375, upon the death of his father *Valentinian I, while still a young boy, Valentinian was proclaimed Augustus by the troops of Illyricum. He at first governed under the protection of his mother *Justina and, upon her death, under the *pagan Arbogastes, his minister and tutor; nor should one forget the political protection offered to him first by *Gratian, then by *Theodosius. Yet the main influence on Valentinian's religious policies was his relationship with *Ambrose, which at first was difficult because of the influence of the Arianizing Justina and her personal hostility toward the intrusiveness of the bishop (Ambr., Ep. 20,27), but which then became marked by filial dependence on Ambrose. When, upon the death of Valentinian's mother, Theodosius imposed upon him the pagan Arbogastes as his minister, the struggle between the young emperor, who by that point had become a fervent Catholic, and his pagan minister was inevitable, and this disagreement cost Valentinian his life. In fact, in 392, he was found dead in his palace of *Vienne (*Gaul), and scholars have yet to determine with certainty whether it was a suicide or murder by Arbogastes. Various works written by Ambrose provide information about the first and second periods of Valentinian's life. In 384 the Senate's second petition concerning the Altar of Victory led Ambrose to send him letters 17 and 18 against *Symmachus's request. Within the context of the anti-Arian controversy, Ambrose reminded Valentinian in letter 21 of the respect his father had for the church's autonomy, and in the Sermo contra Auxentium he explained to the faithful gathered in the basilica the real reason for his refusal to hand that autonomy over to the emperor just as he had requested. In 387, however, Valentinian himself turned to Ambrose in order to ask him to go to *Trier before *Maximus to obtain Gratian's body and esp. to dissuade him from his objective of invading *Italy (Ambr., Ep. 24). After the death of Justina, in 388, Ambrose lauded the return of Valentinian "to the door of faith" (Exp. Luc. IX,32) and exonerated him from the responsibilities of his preceding political actions (De Joseph 36). The decree of 391 that outlawed the pagan cult and rejected the restoration of the Altar of Victory can be credited to Valentinian's friendship with Ambrose. In 392, once the remains of the young Valentinian were covered at *Milan, Ambrose mourned his death in a letter to the emperor Theodosius (Ep. 53) and in a funerary oration (De obit. Valent.).

A. Morpurgo, Arbogaste e l'Impero romano dal 379 al 394, Trieste 1883; A. Solari, La crisi dell'impero romano. II. Gli ultimi Valentiniani, Rome 1933; J.R. Palanque, Saint Ambroise et l'empire romain, Paris 1933; R. Paribeni, Da Diocleziano alla caduta dell'impero d'occidente, Bologna 1941; F. Lipani, La controversia sull' "Ara Victoriae": Atene e Roma 41/2-3 (1996) 75-79; F. Moroni, Il conflitto per l'altare della Vittoria, Rendiconti dell'Istituto Lombardo, Classe di Lettere. Scienze morali e storiche, 1996; M. Sordi, I rapporti di Ambrogio con gli imperatori del suo tempo, in "Nec timeo mori." Atti del Congr. Int. di Studi ambrosiani, Milan 1998, 107-118.

M.G. Mara

VALENTINIAN III (419-455). Son of *Constantius III and *Galla Placidia (sister of Honorius). Valentinian was Roman emperor of the West 424–455. After the coronation, which occurred at *Rome in 425 when he was only six years of age, he moved to *Ravenna, where, at court, the poet *Merobaudes drew a picture of Valentinian and his family in a short poem, 23 verses of which have survived (MGH, Auct. ant. 14, 3). His reign, under the guidance of his mother, was marked by the last great crisis of the Western empire, namely the invasion of the *Huns. The Western empire at this time was also threatened by the *Vandals, who had appeared in North *Africa, which had been torn apart by the revolt of the two generals *Aetius and *Bonifacius. Rome owed its survival to the military valor of Aetius and the appeal of Pope *Leo the Great to *Attila the Hun. Valentinian's unwise politics, which went so far as murdering Aetius (21 September 454), and his lack of moral compass were cause for his assassination. His religious politics, which were marked by the influence of Leo the Great, resulted in a subsequent repression of paganism, prohibiting, under the death penalty, the reopening of the temples and the offering of sacrifices (CJ I, 11,7); he issued prohibitions against heretics and *Nestorians (CJ I,1,3; 5,6), *Manicheans (PL 54,622-624) and the *Pelagians of southern *Gaul (PL 48,409), thereby confirming all the privileges of the Catholic Church (CJ I, 2,12). Petitioned by Leo the Great, Valentinian repeatedly decreed in favor of the primacy of the bishop of Rome (see Leo the Great, Epp. 10 and 11 in the controversy with *Hilary of Arles). In *Hydatius's Chronicle (SC 218,162), there are frequent references to Valentinian.

G.A. Balducci, La politica di Valentiniano III, Bologna 1934; A. Solari, La crisi dell'impero romano, IV, Rome 1936; P. Stockmeier, Leo I. des Grossen Beurteilung der kaiserlichen Religionspolitik, Munich 1959; F. de Marini Avonzo, La politica legislativa di Valentiniano III e Teodosio II, Turin 1975; A.M. Musumeci, La politica ecclesiastica di Valentiniano III: Siculorum gymnasium 30 (1977) 431-481; M. Bianchi Fossati Vanzetti, Le Novelle di Valentiniano III, I, Fonti, Padova 1988.

M.G. Mara

VALENTINUS (d. after 416). Catholic bishop (4th–5th c.) of Baiana in *Numidia. He took part in an embassy to the imperial court (Aug., Ep. 88,10). He participated at the Council of *Cirta against the *Donatists (Ep. 141,1) and at that of Milevis (416) against the *Pelagians (Ep. 176). Valentinus was present at the conference of *Carthage (411) (Coll. Carth. I,57,99).

PCBE 1, 1130-1132.

E. Romero Pose

VALENTINUS, martyr. In the Mart. hier. (14 February), a martyr at Terni is mentioned whose basilica is attested to in the 8th and the 9th c. (Duchesne, LP 1,427; 2,154). On the same road, that is, the Via Flaminia, but at leaving *Rome, stands another basilica of Valentinus, whose construction is attributed to Pope *Julius I (337–352), but his titular church was not described as being dedicated to a particular saint (Duchesne, LP 2, 9). Pope *Theodore (642–649) restored it (Duchesne, LP 1, 333); he actually completed the work begun by Pope *Honorius (Duchesne, LP 1, 334, n. 10). All the itineraries mention the basilica (De Rossi, Roma sotterranea cristiana, I, Rome 1864, 176-177). These reliable details leave open three possibilities: (1) two distinct saints, one at Terni, the other at Rome; (2) one sole Valentinus, of Terni, buried there, whose brandea were taken to Rome; (3) one sole Valentinus, of Rome, whose cult spread along the Via Flaminia arriving to Terni. In favor of third hypothesis is the epigraph of the Roman basilica: an inscription dated to 318 bears witness that the cemetery was used very early, and some inscriptions from a later age use the name of St. Valentinus. There is, however, the fact that of the most ancient documents, that is, the Mart. hier. and the Liberian Catal., the first places the martyr at Terni, although the second does not present Valentinus as a saint. For this reason, scholars propose that one can perceive in the Roman personage the one who supplied Pope Julius the funds for the construction of the suburban basilica; the Passion BHL 8450-8461 would have contributed to confusing him with the person of the same name from Terni.

Vies des SS. 2, 322-323; LTK³ 10, 998-999; BS 12, 896-899; A. Amore, I martiri di Roma, Rome 1975, 13-16; J.C. Poulin, Valentin de Terni: AB 119 (2001) 309-310.

V. Saxer

VALENTINUS the Apollinarist. *Leontius of Byzantium (Fraud. 104ff.) preserves several chapters of an Apologia which the *Apollinarist Valentinus wrote "against those who say that we maintain that the body [of Christ] is consubstantial with God." The chapters cited distance themselves from the other Apollinarists; in particular they are directed—according to the title that Leo reports—"against the doctrine of Timothy and his followers, and their teacher Polemon." *Polemon and *Timothy, in fact, took positions opposed in practice and differentiated in doctrine; however, with Valentinus we find ourselves before an explicit affirmation that Christ is the "true Son of God sarkophoros" (Lietzmann, p.

288, 1. 20), and that this flesh is the "clothing of the hidden mystery" (Lietzmann, p. 289, 1.13). The salvific capacity is given from the union of the Spirit (Lietzmann, p. 290, ll. 10-12). Voisin spoke of the "moderate Apollinarists" (pp. 124ff.); but one should rather say that these are elements of Antiochene Apollinarism (see Lietzmann, pp. 9, 15-16).

CPG II, 3732; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, TU 1, Tübingen 1904, 157, frag. 287-291; G. Voisin, L'apollinarisme. Étude historique littéraire et dogmatique sur le début des controverses christologiques au IV^e siècle, Louvain 1901, 112-113; DTC 15, 2519-2520.

E. Cavalcanti

VALENTINUS the Gnostic (2nd c.). In his refutation of *gnosticism falsely so called, *Irenaeus of Lyons drew connections between the different heretical teachings that he presents by using the schema of diadochē, namely the succession of teachers that was typical of the philosophical schools of his time; he therefore speaks of a "Valentinian school" that dates back to a 2nd-c. teacher by the name of Valentinus. Recent studies, however, have brought to light how, in this case, it is difficult to speak of a true and proper development, by disciples, of an organic doctrinal system starting from an original nucleus that would be found already in the teaching of Valentinus, as we understand it through the testimonies that have come down to us. This phenomenon is also verified in the ancient philosophical schools, where personal succession did not always necessarily imply a continuity and development in the doctrinal elements of the instruction of a founding teacher.

According to the information provided by the heresiologists, Valentinus, perhaps of Egyptian origin (see Epiph., Pan. XXXI,2,3), came to the city of *Rome around 140 (see Iren., Adv. haer. III,4,3; Eus., HE 4,11,1). At a certain point he left the great church and established his own school, where he spread his teachings. From his works we possess only a few fragments preserved in the writings of the Fathers (see Clem. of Alex., Strom. II,36,2-4; II,114,3-6; III,59,3; IV,89,1-3; IV,89,6-90,1; VI,52,3-53,1; Ps.-Hippol., Ref. VI,42,2; VI,37,7; X,13,4), which are insufficient for reconstructing his thought with precision. On the basis of what has survived, an image of Valentinus emerges, a biblical theologian who has traces of Platonic influence but who is not very far from the very well-defined borders of Christian orthodoxy.

The information, however, that we possess on complex theological systems elaborated by the students of Valentinus is much more detailed; heresiologists have transmitted to us a good six distinct presentations (Iren., Adv. haer. I,1-8, 11-12, 13-21; Ps.-Hippol., Ref. VI,29-36; Tertull., Adv. Valent.; Clem. of Alex., Exc. ex Theodoto; Orig., In Iohannem, esp. book XIII; Epiph., Pan. XXXI,58; XXXV,4). These are the chief characteristics of the doctrinal Valentinian system: the divine *Pleroma is composed of 30 Aeons, joined in coupled syzygies; the first four couples are the most important and form the primordial *Ogdoad, from which originate all the other Aeons. The unity of the two elements of pairs (syzygiae) is presented as the model of unity which was broken by sin, symbolized by the sexual separation of *Adam from Eve, and that the spiritual human being must be reestablished by reuniting itself with his celestial partner. The first origin of sin is indicated in the vicissitudes of the last Aeon, namely Sophia, who, through her immoderate desire to know the unknowable Father, brings about the degradation of the divine element in the world, which originates precisely from the materialization of the ignorance or error of Sophia. At the same time, the process of the recovery of the fallen divine element by the heavenly Savior began. This process—which leads to various moments, an intervention of various divine beings, the activity of the Demiurge, the distinction of human beings into three types (spiritual or pneumatic, animal or psychic, and material or hylic)—would lead at last to the reintegration in the Pleroma of the divine element, stripped from the contamination with matter, and the organization of the other beings according to their nature (complete salvation and full reintegration for the pneumatics; partial, inferior salvation for the psychics; dissolution for the hylics).

The Valentinian school was divided into two branches: one Italic and the other Eastern (see Ps.-Hippol., Ref. VI,35). *Heracleon, *Ptolemy and *Florinus belonged to the Italic branch; *Theodotus and *Mark, to the Eastern branch.

Sources: Fragments from the writings of Valentinus have been provided in the original Greek, translated into German and analytically commented in: Ch. Markschies, Valentinus Gnosticus? Untersuchungen zur valentinianischen Gnosis mit einem Kommentar zu den Fragmenten Valentins, Tübingen 1992 (WUNT 65); the heresiological texts pertaining to the Valentinian school, in the original and in It. trans., are found in M. Simonetti (ed.), Testi gnostici in lingua greca e latina, Milan 1993.

Studies: F.M. Sagnard, La gnose valentinienne et le témoignage de saint Irénée, Paris 1947; A. Orbe, Estudios valentinianos, 5 vols., Rome 1955-66; B. Layton (ed.), The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, I: The School of Valentinus, Leiden 1980; Ch. Markschies, Alte und neue Texte und Forschungen zu Valentin und den Anfängen der "valentinianischen" Gnosis, in A. Böhlig - Ch. Markschies, Gnosis und Manichäismus. Forschungen und Studien zu Texten von Valentin und Mani sowie zu den Bibliotheken von Nag Hammadi und Medinet Madi*, Berlin 1994, 39-111; J.-D. Dubois, Valentin, école valentinienne: DSp 16 (1997) 146-156; Ch. Markschies, Valentinian Gnosticism: Toward the Anatomy of a School, in J. Turner et al. (eds.), The Nag Hammadi Library After Fifty Years, Leiden 1997, 401-438; N. Förster, Marcus Magus. Kult, Lehre und Gemeindeleben einer valentinianischen Gnostikergruppe. Sammlung der Quellen und Kommentar (WUNT 114), Tübingen 1999; F. Bermejo Rubio, La escisión imposible. Lectura del gnosticismo valentiniano, Salamanca 1998; A. Wucherpfennig, Heracleon Philologus (WUNT 142), Tübingen 2002. Bibliographic list: D.M. Scholer, Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1948–1969, Leiden 1971 and Nag Hammadi Bibliography 1970–1994, Leiden 1997, and subsequent Supplementa published annually, edited by Scholer as well in the journal "Novum Testamentum"; E. Thomassen, The Spiritual Seed: The Church of the "Valentinians," Leiden 2006.

C. Gianotto

VALERIA. Province of former Pannonia Inferior, Valeria was reorganized in 293; it bordered the Danube River to the N and E, reaching to the S slightly N of the Drava River; and to the W, with Pannonia Prima, according to a N-S line that crossed the plain of *Pannonia. Toward the end of the 3rd to the beginning of the 4th c., immigrants from the E who introduced Christianity established themselves in Pannonia. The period of transition from paganism to Christianity is well documented from the tombs, primarily the *sarcophagi found at Brigetium. In one of these tombs, situated in the central position with respect to the others, archaeologists found a silver staff decorated in niello technique, which can be dated to the end of the 3rd c. The staff (lituus) probably belongs to an augur as a symbol of his dignity and was perhaps destined to be passed on after his death to the new priest. The fact that this object was found within his tomb perhaps indicates that he was the last city augur before the advent of Christianity.

In the formation of the religious life of Valeria, even *Judaism, in the period of transition, had an important role. At Intercisa (today near Donaújváros, in Hungary) in the 3rd c. there was a Jewish community that possessed a synagogue. The persecutions of the Christians, which are more or less documented in other provinces, have not yet been attested in Pannonia.

The administrative center and the most important diocese of the region was Sopianae (Pécs), but scholars do not know anything about other diocesan sees. The bitter confrontations between *Catholics and *Arians, which were attested in Pannonia Prima, certainly had repercussions even in the 5th c.

The most important Christian monuments came to light at Sopianae. Six funerary cells were discovered around the modern-day cathedral: no. 1 composed of a crypt, with external pilaster strips; no. 2 similar to no. 1; two others (nos. 5 and 6), of the same type, but more modest; nos. 3 and 4 in a polylobate layout, respectively trichoral (no. 3) and septichoral (no. 4). Chronologically the first, similar to that of Aquincum (Obud), is datable to the 5th c. Some of these memoriae have been painted. The most valuable have been preserved in no. 1, and although they have generic affinities with the paintings from the Roman catacombs, they reveal local characteristics. There are scenes from the OT and the NT (the adoration of the *magi, *Adam and Eve, *Jonah and the Good *Shepherd). On one wall the figures of the apostles *Peter and *Paul acclaim a *monogram of Christ among the stars; on another wall is painted a garden of *paradise. At the center of the vault a Christogram is prominent, on the sides of which are found shields with two busts of male figures with beards, and in the spaces between the shields, fountains with *peacocks or small birds. Cell 2 is also decorated with frescoes, although of a lower quality and not well preserved: in a niche a vase with grapes is painted; on the entry wall a garden of paradise. Both memoriae belong to the 4th c. With respect to the basilicas, at Aquincum is a twin basilica without an apse, but with a bench for the clergy of the common type in the Upper Adriatic in the 5th c. At Intercisa a three-aisled basilica with a rectilinear apse was found; at Gorsium (today the village of Tác, in Hungary), which in the 4th c. was reconstructed with the name of Herculia, two churches were discovered, both with an apse and the larger with a baptistery. Rich archaeological material was discovered in the 5th c.: vases of ceramic and glass, bronze panels with Christian scenes, fragments of architectural sculpture and many sarcophagi.

J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'empire romain, Paris 1918; T. Nagy, A Pannoniai kereszténység története a római védörendszer összeomlásáig. Die Geschichte des Christentums in Pannonien bis zu dem Zusammenbruch des römischen Grenzschutzes, Budapest 1939 (in Hungarian with a summary in German); F. Gerke, Die Wandmalereien der neu gefundene Grabkammer in Pécs (Fünfkirchen). Ihre Stellung in der spätrömischen Kunstgeschichte des I. Jahrhunderts, II. Halbband, Baden-Baden 1954, 147ff.; F. Fülep, Early Christian Gold Glasses in the Hungarian National Museum: Acta Antiqua Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 16 (1968) 401ff.; F. Fülep, Scavi archeologici a Sopianae: CCAB 16 (1969) 151ff.; Z. Kádár, Lineamenti dell'arte della Pannonia nell'epoca dell'antichità tarda paleocristiana: CCAB 16 (1969) 179ff.; A. Mócsy, Pannonia and Upper Moesia, London 1974; J. Fitz, Gorsium, Székésfehérvar 1976; The Archaeology of Roman Pannonia, ed. G. Radan, Budapest-Lexington 1980; F. Fülep, Sopianae, Budapest 1984; Römisch-frühchristliche Denkmäler in Pécs (Ungarn), Würzburg 1986; D. Gáspár, Römische Kästchen aus Pannonien, Budapest 1986; L. Barkóczi, Pannonische Glasfunde in Ungarn, Budapest 1988; D. Gáspár, Christianity in Roman Pannonia: An Evaluation of Early Christian Finds and Sites from Hungary, Oxford 2002.

N. Cambi

VALERIAN, emperor (ca. 193–260). Publius Licinius Valerian, Roman emperor (253–260), appointed by the legions upon the death of Trebonianus Gallus, he settled his son Gallienus on the throne, entrusting to him the defense of the W borders. Valerian was taken prisoner by the Persian *Shapur I, during a military campaign in the East, and he died shortly thereafter. At first he was favorable toward Christians, whom he received even in his own home, as attested by *Dionysius of Alexandria in the letter to Hermammon (Eus., HE 7,10,3); he then became hostile toward them for political reasons (under Valerian the state officially became aware of the church's existence and for the first time unleashed a general persecution). In 257 and 258 he issued two edicts against the Christians, striking them with an iron fist: among the victims of the persecution were Popes *Stephen I and *Sixtus II, *Lawrence, *Dionysius of Alexandria, *Cyprian and *Fructuosus. *Commodian likened (Carmen apol., passim) the seven years of Valerian's reign to the seven years of the *Apocalypse.

J. Hearly, The Valerian Persecution: A Study of the Relations Between Church and State in the Third Century, London 1905; R. Rémondon, La crisi dell'impero romano da Marco Aurelio ad Anastasio, Milan 1975; R. McMullen, Christianizing the Roman Empire: A.D. 100-400, New Haven CT, 1986; M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; M. Christol, L'empire romain du III[e] siècle. Histoire politique (192-325 après J.-C.), Paris 1997; S. Roda, Profilo di storia romana. Dalle origini alla caduta dell'Impero d'Occidente, Rome 2001; R. Selinger, The Mid-Third Century Persecution of Decius and Valerian, Frankfurt 2002.

L. Navarra

VALERIAN of Aquileia (d. 388). After *Fortunatian had been compromised by *Arianism, St. Valerian (368?–388) succeeded on the episcopal cathedra of *Aquileia. He immediately inaugurated a more clear-cut theological and pastoral course of action in favor of the Council of *Nicaea. Under his episcopal governance, Aquileia acquired a preeminent role among the churches of N *Italy, including *Milan, where the semi-Arian *Auxentius ruled, and also among those situated between the Adriatic Sea and the Danube River. Perhaps it was also this vigorous action for orthodoxy, in addition to its geographical placement, that made Aquileia the see of a Western council in September 381. Valerian knew how to enlist a well-prepared and hard-working presbytery, which was described even by St. *Jerome as practically a chorus beatorum.

PCBE 2, 2237-2239; A. Scholz, Il "Seminarium Aquileiense": Memorie Storiche Forogiuliesi 50 (1970) 5-106; G. Cuscito, Cristianesimo antico ad Aquileia e in Istria, Trieste 1977, 177-179 (with bibl.); A. Scholz, Fede e politica ad Aquileia. Dibattito teologico e centri di potere (secoli IV-VI), Udine 1987, 45-77.

G. Cuscito

VALERIAN of Calahorra (Calagurris). Bishop at the beginning of the 5th c. He is mentioned by *Prudentius (Perist. 11,2) and *Jerome (Vir. ill. 111). He wrote a profession of faith that has been preserved. He probably belonged to a wealthy family from the region of *Saragossa.

CPL 558a; PLS 1, 1045; J. Madoz, Valeriano obispo calagurritano, escritor del siglo V: Hispania Sacra 3 (1950) 131-137; DHEE 4, 2705; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, II, Madrid 1998, 264-265.

M. Díaz y Díaz - P. Marone

VALERIAN of Cimiez (d. ca. 460). Valerian perhaps belonged to the noble family of the Valeriani; he married, then became a monk, first on the Continent, then on the isle of *Lérins. Around 439, he was elected bishop of Cimiez (Cemenelum), a suburb of Nice, and as such he participated at the Councils of *Riez in 439 and *Vaison in 442, which had been summoned to strengthen ecclesiastical discipline. He supported Archbishop *Hilary of Arles in the fight against Leo I. In 449 he approved of the election of Ravennius, the abbot of Lérins. He signed the Tomus ad Flavianum (Leo the Great, Ep. 102) and intervened again in the Council of *Arles of 455, which settled the dispute between the bishop of Fréjus and Lérins. He died shortly after around 460. His feast day is celebrated on 23 July.

He wrote about 20 homilies, which esp. treat moral questions and the necessity of consistency in the Christian life (and he recalls theories deriving from Stoic philosophy). His doctrine of grace seems to be close to that of the teachers of Provence (*semi-Pelagians). He also wrote a Letter to the Monks on Virtue and the Order of the Apostolic Teaching. Riberi attributes the homily De dedicatione ecclesiae to him, but other scholars doubt this attribution.

Editions: see CPL 1002-1004; Homiliae XX, Ep. ad monachos: PL 52, 691-758; Hom. de dedicatione: PLS III, 184-188; [ed. in prep. for CCL and SC by J.-P. Weiss]; It. trans.of the 20 Homilies and the Ep. ad monachos, ed. by L. Fatica, Rome 1995, [2]2001.

Studies: DTC 14, 2520-2522; BS 12 (1970) 912-914 (bibl.); J.-P.

Weiss, La personnalité de Valérien de Cimiez: Annales de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences humaines de Nice 26 (1970) 141-162; P.M. Duval, La Gaule chrétienne jusqu'au Ve siècle, Paris 1971, 761-762; J.-P. Weiss, Valérien de Cimiez et Valère de Nice: SE 21 (1972/73) 109-146; Patrologia III, 514-515; C. Tibiletti, Valeriano di Cimiez e la teologia dei Maestri Provenzali: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 513-532; J.-P. Weiss, La prédication paschale de Valérien de Cimiez: Annales de la Faculté des Lettres et Sciences humaines de Nice 50 (1985) 415-422.

M. MARITANO

VALERIUS of Bierzo (d. after 691). Spanish ascetic and author of the 2nd half of the 7th c. A native of the region of Asturica (province of Léon), probably of Bierzo (the area bordering *Gallaecia). After having received the scholastic formation of his time, he entered the monastery of Complutum, which had been established by *Fructuosus of Braga, whose ascetic footsteps he followed. Obsessed by the idea of the devil and the dangers of life in the world, he always lived in solitude. He spent his life in continual penance and led some disciples and monks, who were quite numerous in Bierzo. His friend, and perhaps his disciple, was the abbot Donadeus, to whom he dedicated his writings. His intransigent asceticism detected diabolical tricks everywhere. He died after 691. His memory in that place lasted at least until the 10th c., when Bishop Gennadius of Astorga began to commemorate him along with Fructuosus of Braga as a prototype of the ascetic life in Bierzo.

Scholars know of his personality from his writings, almost all of which were written between 675 and 690. For the formation of the monks whom he led, he redacted a hagiographical compilation of approximately 50 texts, which has been preserved more or less complete in various manuscripts from the 10th to the 12th c. Among them we find *Jerome's life of *Paul, *Hilarion and Malchus; *Possidius's Indiculus, the lives of St. Germanus, brief, edifying narrations chosen from the Vitae Patrum and the Vita Fructuosi, some narrations written by himself, and others of less interest. The compilation should be read with two poems (the Epitameron), which illustrate its objectives, describing it as a means of spiritual edification, providing an axis of orientation for monastic conversion. The short texts included in it narrate the visions of paradise that monks or conversi had seen; a curious passage comes under the form of a letter that summarizes for the monks of Bierzo how much Valerius had come to know of *Egeria's Itinerarium. He presents Egeria as a courageous heroine of faith, a woman extremely devoted to *Scripture. He also composed a treatise on the monastic life (De genere monachorum), only fragments of which have been preserved.

One of his books on instruction has a broader character (Epitameron de quibusdam admonitionibus vel rogationibus), which for the purpose of moral and spiritual edification—in part echoing *Isidore's Sentences—unites some sophisticated literary techniques: they are poetic compositions in places where the initial words of each verse or the entire poem begin with the same letter. It seems that Valerius was also interested in a particular genre of texts such as those of the centos of the Psalter. An extensive portion of the De quinquageno numero psalmorum, which is a small treatise on the *Psalms, has survived.

A lot of personal information concerning Valerius is supplied in his autobiography (Ordo querimoniae prefati discriminis) and in the two works that summarize it (Replicatio sermonum a prima conversione and Quod de superioribus querimoniis residuum sequitur), which were written approximately 20 years after, portraying in different perspectives themes that were already present in it. At the center of his life are spiritual battles and his resistance to temptation, which at times took on a concrete and violent form.

Moreover, some scholars have recently attributed to Valerius De vana saeculi sapientia, a booklet that has come down to us anonymously, which praises the Christian life, a life which is explained in the monastic context.

CPL 1276-1293; Díaz 285-303; PL 87, 421-455; R. Fernández Pousa, San Valerio. Obras, Madrid 1942; C.M. Aherne, Valerio of Bierzo, Washington, DC 1949; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, La compilación hagiográfica de Valerio del Bierzo: Hispania Sacra 4 (1951) 3-25; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Anecdota wisigothica. I, Salamanca 1958, 49-61, 89-116 (PLS 4, 2019-2029); M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Códices visigóticos en la monarquía leonesa, León 1983, 117-148; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Visiones del Más Allá en Galicia durante la Alta Edad Media, Santiago 1985, 31-61; J. Gil - B. Löfstedt, Sprachliches zu Valerio von Bierzo: Cuadernos de Filología Clásica 10 (1976) 271-304; U. Domínguez del Val, Historia de la antigua literatura latina hispano-lusitana, IV, Madrid 1998, 345-387.

M. DÍAZ Y DÍAZ - P. MARONE

VANDALS. A population of Germanic stock (although originally from Scandinavia), which in the 1st c. AD was located in the Baltic region between the Elbe and the Vistula. Pliny (Nat. hist. 4,99) assigns the name Vandili to a vast group of E Germanic tribes (Burgodiones, Varinnae, Charini and Gutones); also in the writings of *Tacitus (Germ. 2,2) one finds the form Vandilii, which is to be connected with the name of Lugii (Germ. 43,2), mentioned by Strabo (Geogr. 7,1,3) as allies of Maroboduus, and by Tacitus (Ann. 12,29-30) as allies of Hermunduri against Vannius (AD 50). Having descended S to the Danubian limes, the Vandals were explicitly mentioned for the first time during the war led by *Marcus Aurelius against the Marcomanni and Quadi (171–173). They were divided into two groups, the Silings (Ptolemy, Geogr. 2,11,10)—hence the name Silesia—and the Asdings (Dio Cassius, Hist. 71,12). In 214, under *Caracalla, we find them in disagreement with the Marcomanni; in 270, the Vandal Asdings, having crossed into *Pannonia, were defeated by *Aurelian and pushed back beyond the Danube River; having risen again over the Danube toward the W and having forged toward the Rhine border, in 279 the Vandal Silings were defeated along with the *Burgundians in *Rhaetia by Probus. Around 335, the Vandal Asdings, when beaten by the Goths on the Danube River, obtained permission from *Constantine to reside in Pannonia, as subjected to the Romans and with the obligation of supplying military contingents. They remained here for nearly 60 years, and at the end they were forced by the pressure of the *Huns to go back to the Rhine border, where, along with the Suevi, Alani and Siling Vandals, who had already been forced W in the 3rd c., formed a large barbarian column, which, after having overcome the resistance of the *Franks (in a battle with them the Vandals lost their king Godigiselus), crossed the Rhine on 31 December 406 (with the complicity of the Vandal *Stilicho—according to the accusation reported by *Orosius, Hist. 7,38,3-4), invaded *Gaul and inflicted severe devastation. In the autumn of 409, the Vandals, Suevi and the Alani, supported by Gerontius (supporter in *Spain of the usurper Maximus), crossed into Spain, subjecting it to the most disastrous raids, to the point that in 411 they made a peace treaty with the emperor *Honorius, who recognized the settlement of the barbarians as foederati: the Asdings and the Suevi took *Gallaecia; the Silings, *Betica; the Alani, *Lusitania and *Carthaginensis. In 416, the *Visigothic king Wallia gathered under himself the entire population of the Vandals and the remnants of the Alani, with the title of "King of the Vandals and the Alani." Subsequently the Vandals descended into S Spain (from which people derive the name of Andalucia) and were able to conquer Cartegena and *Seville (425) and therefore came to the point of guaranteeing their control over all Spain. At that time the *Arian Vandals' intolerance toward the Catholics already manifested itself; their intolerance would then explode into particularly violent forms in *Africa.

In 428, Gunderic was succeeded by his brother *Genseric (428–477), who, the following year, led his people (a combination of approximately 80,000 disbanded Vandals, Alani and Visigoths who had remained in Spain) to *Africa, drawn by the richness and fertility of the region (*Italy's supply of grain depended on Africa), and favored by the disagreement between Boniface, governor of the province, and the imperial governor (but the idea that Boniface himself called the Vandals to Africa seems spurious). The Romans were soon routed and were only able to keep possession of major centers such as *Carthage and *Hippo (it was precisely during the Vandal siege that St. *Augustine died here on 28 August 430); subsequently a peace agreement was concluded on the basis of which the Romans granted the Vandals the status of foederati established in the consulate of *Numidia with Hippo as the capital. Thus began the African kingdom of the Vandals, which reached the apex of its power under Genseric. The Vandal reign extended progressively: on 19 October 439 (which became the first year of a new Vandal system of dating) Carthage was conquered, and in 442 a peace agreement with the Western emperor recognized the independence of the Vandal kingdom and its extension to other African regions; at the same time a very skilled Vandal fleet repeatedly struck the coasts of Sicily and Sardinia with pirate invasions. The death of the emperor *Valentinian III offered Genseric the occasion to pounce on Rome and subject it to a new sack, after the Visigothic one of 410, in June 455. (A certain moderation was observed toward the Christian churches likewise through the intervention of Pope *Leo I.) After two weeks Genseric left Rome and took back to Africa a large amount of plunder, as well as important hostages, including Valentinian's widow Eudoxia and her daughters Eudocia (who was given in marriage to *Huneric, Genseric's son) and Placidia (later released with her mother). Repeated military and diplomatic attempts to weaken and ruin Vandal power did not succeed, and in 476 the emperor of Byzantium had to officially recognize the Vandal kingdom over a vast territory: the entire province of Africa, the *Baleari, Ischia, *Corsica, *Sardinia and Sicily (which afterward, except for the city of Lilybaeum, was ceded to *Odoacer in exchange for an annual tribute).

The Vandal settlement in Africa led to serious social and religious upheavals. Particularly in the province of Proconsularis (or Zeugitana) around Carthage landholders were dispossessed and exiled or forced to remain on their former landholdings as slaves or colonists; but also in the other regions there were state confiscations and impositions of heavy taxes. Likewise, the Vandal Arians subjected the Catholics to the harshest persecutions: countless acts of physical violence were perpetrated, orthodox worship cult was prohibited, the Catholic clergy were exiled, and the churches and the ecclesiastical properties were either torn apart or confiscated and handed over to the Arian clergy (on the shock of the first strike, see Aug., Epist. 228; on the situation until the end of the conquest of Carthage of 439, see a group of 12 Sermones* attributed to the bishop *Quodvultdeus; more generally on the drama of the Catholics under the Vandal domination, see the Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae by *Victor of Vita, published ca. 488). Toward the end of the reign of Genseric, the persecution lightened, and the exiled clergy were allowed to return.

Genseric was succeeded by his son *Huneric (477–484), who, after an initial period of relative tolerance toward Catholics (in 481 a bishop of Carthage, Eugenius was reinstalled), once again undertook a fierce repression: of particular gravity was the decree on 24 January 484 that determined that all the edicts previously promulgated by the Roman emperors against the heretics should now be applied to the Catholics, with all the consequences that this entailed; among other things, all those who had worked in the army or in the public administration were forced to choose between a conversion to *Arianism or dismissal, accompanied by exile and confiscation of goods; the conference of African bishops that had opened at Carthage on the subsequent 1 February was concluded in a bloody way for the Catholic side. Under Huneric, the Mauri (Berbers) were able to withdraw from Vandal rule.

His successor Gunthamund (484–496) took a milder approach in religious affairs: the Catholic churches were reopened, and those exiled were able to return. He, moreover, repressed a revolt of the Mauri and made a futile attempt to recover possession of Sicily. He imprisoned the poet Dracontius (the chief proponent of the cultural rebirth that characterized Vandal Africa) for a poem that may have been dedicated to the emperor *Zeno. Gunthamund was succeeded by his brother Thrasamund (496–523), who established a policy of close collaboration with Theodoric, whose sister Amalafrida he married in 500, as part of a project to establish a grand alliance among Arian Germans, of whom the Ostrogothic king had to be the leader. Under Thrasamund the exile sentences against the Catholic clergy were resumed (without, however, the violence of earlier times); among the exiles was also the bishop of Ruspe, *Fulgentius, who was destined to become a figure of great prestige among the African episcopate of this time: precisely for this reason in 515 Thrasamund had him recalled to Carthage for a debate on trinitarian questions; but the attempt was brought to nothing by Fulgentius's intransigent orthodoxy, who was forced to return to exile in Cagliari.

Hilderic (523–530), the son of Huneric and Eudocia, brought about a political turning point: the Vandal king broke the preceding agreement with the Ostrogoths (he had Amalafrida arrested and slew the Goths in her entourage) and established ties with the emperor of Byzantium and the Romans and fully restored freedom of worship to the Catholics. (In 525 a council of Catholic bishops was held at Carthage.) But the pro-Roman and pro-Catholic politics of Hilderic aroused deep discontent among the Vandals, which exploded during the grave defeats he underwent at the hands of the Mauri: the king was deposed, imprisoned and replaced by Gelimer (530), Genseric's great-grandson. The emperor *Justinian then took the opportunity to send to Africa an expeditionary force (in which the historian *Procopius of Caesarea served, who provided a summary of that campaign) led by *Belisarius, who, aided by the forces of Ostrogothic support in Sicily, the rebellion of Sardinia and the favor of the African population itself, in a brief time (June 533-March 534) overthrew the kingdom of the Vandals, who thus definitively exited human history.

L. Schmidt, Geschichte der Wandalen, Munich 1942; H. Helbling, Goten und Wandalen. Wandlung der historischen Realität, Zürich 1954; Ch. Courtois, Les Vandales et l'Afrique, Paris 1955; F. Giunta, Genserico e la Sicilia, Palermo 1958; H.J. Diesner, Das Vandalenreich. Aufstieg und Untergang, Stuttgart 1966; A. Morazzani, Essai sur la puissance maritime des Vandales: BAGB (1966) 539-561; H. Schreiber, I Vandali, Milan 1984; S. Lancel, Victor de Vita et la Carthage vandale, in L'Africa romana, Atti VI conv. di studio, Sassari 16-18 dicembre 1988, ed. A. Mastino, Sassari 1989, II, 649-661; A. Isola, I cristiani dell'Africa vandalica nei Sermones del tempo (429-534), Milan 1990; A. Isola, *A proposito dell'*inscitia dei Vandali secondo Fulg., ad Tras. 1, 2, 2: RomBarb 13 (1994-95) 57-74; F.M. Clover, The Late Roman West and the Vandals, Aldershot 1993; Y. Modéran, La chronologie de la Vie de saint Fulgence de Ruspe et ses incidences sur l'histoire de l'Afrique vandale: MEFRA 105 (1993) 135-188; N. Francovich Onesti, I Vandali. Lingua e storia, Rome 2002.

A. Marchetta

VANNES, Council of. Having gathered in this city of *Gaul to ordain a new bishop, many bishops from the province of *Tours, under the presidency of their metropolitan *Perpetuus, promulgated 16 disciplinary canons. The precise date of this council is unknown; it can be dated between 461 and 491.

CCL 148, 150-158; Hfl-Lecl II, 2, 904-906, 1382.

Ch. Munier

VARIMADUM, Contra. Among the anti-Arian African writings of the 5th c. there appears a collection of biblical passages written by an unknown author which has been transmitted to us as the Contra Varimadum. Composed around 445–450, that is, between the taking of *Carthage by *Genseric in 439 and the disastrous Conference of Carthage that took place between *Arians and Catholic bishops, called by *Huneric in 484, this document presents different opportunities to better know, through the author and his antagonists, the Catholic resistance to the *Vandal persecution, anti-Arian African theology and the biblical text used in the controversy.

Published by B. Schwank under the name of Ps.-Vigilius, in the past the Contra Varimadum was assigned by copyists and medieval readers to *Augustine or *Athanasius, although the first editor hypothesized that the work might be that of *Hydatius. Once these patristic authors were excluded because of theological ideas, style and the time of the work, it was assigned to *Cerealis bishop of Castellum Ripense (Mauretania Caesarensis), the author of a book contra Maximinum Arrianum. But this attribution remains every bit as hypothetical as the attribution of Contra Varimadum to *Vigilius of Thapsus, maintained by P.F. Chifflet, whose edition was published by Migne (PL 62,351-434). However, it is likely the case that the historical figure Varimadus is to be identified with Maribadus, the deacon of that "evil heresy" against which Vigilius of Thapsus argued (Altercatio 2,45: PL 62,226D), or with Marivaldus, an Arian deacon who was esp. influential at the court of Huneric, mentioned by *Victor of Vita (Hist. persec. I,48: CSEL 7,21,7-9). However long the identity of the Contra Varimadum may continue to remain unknown, he was certainly an African, a victim of the Vandal suppression toward the Catholic communities and their bishops, who were forced to conduct their anti-Arian polemics often far from their sees in Africa. Exiled like other famous colleagues, Ps.-Vigilius was able to write the Contra Varimadum in *Italy, most likely at Naples, where shortly before against the same Arian deacon Varimadus he had composed another text, which has, however, been lost (Var, Praef. 1-12).

From one theological point of view, the Contra Varimadum does not present anything esp. original but repeats the objections to the Arian theses of the Catholic tradition (esp. from *Ambrose's De fide ad Gratianum Augustum). It informs us, however, on the difficult points of the controversy of Catholics with the Vandal Arians, which was resolved with recourse to many passages from *Scripture. In the Contra Varimadum, the accumulation of biblical texts is at times so much that the questions posed constitute a type of scriptural florilegium, subdivided by theological themes in three books. In the first is treated the unity of the *Trinity and the equality of the Son; in the second, the equality of the *Holy Spirit to the *Father, and in the third, the names that Scripture attributes to the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. Even though on the whole the work is a compilation of biblical passages, it is not without several theological peculiarities such as the omission of technical terms pertaining to the Trinity (e.g., essentia and homoousion*) or to *Christology (*Leo the Great's utriusquae naturae).

Because of the rare biblical passages used, the Contra Varimadum turns out to be useful for the history of the *canon of Scripture and the history of *exegesis. Among them there stands out the so-called Johannine Comma (1 Jn 5:7-8), which is present in the Vetus Latina and which was used by African Catholics in the anti-Arian controversy (one finds it in the statement of faith set forth by the Catholic bishops at the conference debate with the Arians of 484: *Victor of Vita, Hist. persec. III,11: PL 58,227C; in the Ps.-Athanasian De Trinitate: De Trin. 43.60: PL 62,243; CCL 50,69; in *Fulgentius of Ruspe, Contra Fabianum 21,4; De Trin. 1,4; Responsio c. Arianos 10). In the Contra Varimadum it is opportunely set within the context in order to explain the Arian claims on Jn 14:28 (Pater maior me est ["the Father is greater than I"]). After a series of biblical verses which serve to demonstrate that the Son is less than the Father only in adsumpti hominis forma ("in the form of the assumed human being"), although he is equal in deitatis naturae substantia ("in the substance of the divine nature"), our author concludes: Tres sunt, inquit, qui testimonium perhibent in terra: aqua, sanguis, et caro, et tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in caelo: pater, uerbum, et spiritus, et hic tres unum sunt ("There are three, he says, who bear witness on earth: water, blood and flesh, and there are three who bear witness in heaven: Father, Word and Spirit, and these three are one") (Schwank, 20-21).

We do not know whether and to what degree the Contra Varimadum played a role in favor of the Catholic cause in Africa. It certainly spread in Europe, esp. in those areas in which, before the conversion of the Germanic peoples to the Catholic faith, the anti-Arian controversy remained alive. In *Gaul, *Caesarius of Arles used it extensively in his Breuiarium aduersus haereticos (ca. 525), and one century later in *Spain, a manuscript used it along with other passages from Scripture, modifying it, however, in many parts. In the 8th c., the Contra Varimadum was present in the monastery of Corbeia antiqua and finally in the 9th c. the False Decretals received several portions of it (ca. 850).

CPPM II/A 1694; B. Schwank (ed.), Pseudo-Vigilii Thapsensis opus Contra Varimadum, CCL 90, VI-XVI; 1-134; G. Ficker, Studien zu Vigilius von Thapsus, Leipzig 1897; G. Bardy, Vigile de Thapse: DTC 15 (1946) 3005-3008; B. Schwank, Zur Neuausgabe von Contra Varimadum nach dem Codex Paris B.N. Lat. 12 217 im Corpus Christianorum Series Latina XC: SE 12 (1961) 112-196; M. Simonetti, Letteratura cristiana d'Africa, in A. Di Berardino (ed.), Patrologia. I Padri latini, Genoa 1996, 19-57.

V. Lombino

VATICAN

I. History and Archaeology - II. Investigations Under the Basilica of St. Peter.

I. History and Archaeology. Since ancient times, on the right bank of the Tiber River near *Rome one could find a vast territory that the literary sources defined at first as the Ager Vaticanus and later Vaticanum. This broad area was traversed by three chief roads (Triumphalis, Cornelia and Aurelia), although there are difficulties in reconstructing these roads with precision. This area was occupied by extravagant gardens and necropolises, abundant remains of which have been found many times over the centuries. The most famous of such necropolises was that along the Via Cornelia, which was excavated during the years 1940–1949 and 1953–1957 under the Vatican basilica: there one finds two rows of sepulchral buildings for the wealthy, both square and rectangular in layout, from different chronological periods extending from the age of Hadrian until the end of the 3rd c. Some of the most ancient tombs, poor earthen burials, were discovered in the area designated with the letter P, an area nearly 30 m² (98.4 ft.²) laid bare to open sky and close to other funerary buildings to the N of the sepulchral road. In this place set against the W wall a small funerary aedicule with two recesses placed above was found, separated by a stone table supported by two marble columns, in which one can recognize the so-called trophaeum, which according to *Gaius stood above the tomb of the apostle *Peter. The necropolis was deliberately covered with dirt and sealed off during the Constantinian age for the construction of the Christian basilica, which he placed over it: the last datable burial was that of Trebellena Flaccilla, in the T mausoleum, where there is a cinerary urn that contained a coin datable to the years 317/318.

The most important monumental building of the Vatican area, which corresponds to the left side of the modern-day basilica of St. Peter and almost parallel to it, was certainly the circus built by *Caligula in the horti Agrippinae. At the center of the circus—abandoned by the 2nd half of the 4th c.—there was, as is well known, an Egyptian monumental obelisk that had been transferred from *Alexandria on a ship specifically built for this purpose, which Pope Sixtus V had placed at the center of the St. Peter's Square. The circus Gai et Neronis, whose precise shape remains solely hypothetical, is also known because under the emperor *Nero the gardens that lined them received the numerous evacuees who had survived the famous fire of July 64 and, shortly thereafter, became a theater for some of the mass executions of Christians who were regarded as responsible for this incident. During this persecution the apostle *Peter was also crucified and his body buried in the place today marked by the high altar and Bernini's baldachino (canopy) in the Vatican basilica.

In the Vatican area, moreover, scholars know of the existence of an important Phrigianum, a sanctuary of the Phrygian goddess Cybele, but its topographical placement turns out in any case to be problematic, and well-known interpretive problems remain even for the Gaianum.

II. Investigations Under the Basilica of St. Peter. A deep sense of sacred respect and reverential religious fear stopped people for nearly sixteen centuries from undertaking digs under the floor of the Vatican basilica near the tomb of St. Peter. Already at the time of the construction of Bernini's canopy, during the years of the pontificate of Urban VIII (1623–1644), we know in fact of the apprehensions caused by undertaking the construction of the heavy structure and the risks that it could cause cave-ins that would definitively wipe out the traces of the apostle's tomb and the nearby places of burial of the faithful. The origin of the explorations carried out under the Petrine basilica in the mid-20th c. dates back to the year 1920, when Gustavo Giovannoni—on the occasion of the 400th anniversary of the death of the painter Raphael and with the desire of bringing to light the remains of the ancient Constantinian basilica and the church of the 16th c.—at a gathering of the Pontifical Roman Academy of Archaeology, set forth the proposition of undertaking some exploratory digs in the sacred grottoes. Benedict XV, having obtained the consent of the pontifical commission of sacred archaeology, was favorable to the careful investigations, which, however, did not begin under his patronage due to his untimely death, and the ambitious project of excavation was left untouched even during the pontificate of Pius XI

(1922–1939). It was only with his successor Pius XII (1939–1958) that the complex work of excavation began: the work carried out during the first months of his pontificate certainly contributed to rendering the Vatican grottoes more accessible; nevertheless, the central part of them, subdivided into three aisles by strong concrete pillars, provided only limited height which gave Giovannoni, a member of the Collegio degli Architetti della Fabbrica di S. Pietro, the idea of lowering its flooring ca. 80 cm (31.5 in). Shortly thereafter, on 18 January 1941, while carrying out a shallow excavation near one of the pillars of the central aisle, archaeologists discovered an elegant frame of a mausoleum (subsequently named F or Caetennius Antigonus): in this way began the second and most important and fruitful phase of the archaeological explorations under the Vatican basilica. Under the administrative and moral authority of Monsignor Ludwig Kaas—treasurer of the Reverenda Fabbrica di S. Pietro—Pius XII appointed a commission of archaeologists made up of Enrico Josi and the Jesuits Antonio Ferrua and Engelbert Kirschbaum, to whom was subsequently added the architect Bruno Maria Apollonj Ghetti, although the technical part was entrusted to the aforementioned Giovannoni, who was assisted by Enrico Galeazzi and Giuseppe Nicolosi, architects of the Fabbrica di S. Pietro. The excavations, as deep as ca. 10 m (32.8 ft) in some places, allowed the identification under the modern-day floor of the sacred grottoes—built with two different levels of walkways for the better preservation of the highest mausoleums of the lower necropolis—the tomb of St. Peter, upon which a funerary aedicule adjacent to the so-called red wall was built around the mid-2nd c.—namely, the trophaeum of Gaius, that is, the tomb of the apostle mentioned by *Eusebius of Caesarea in the polemical dialogue of the presbyter Gaius against the Montanist *Proclus. That first Memoria apostolica was later encompassed within the monument constructed by Constantine and on the same site, with deliberate continuity, the altar of *Gregory the Great, that of Callistus II (1123) and the modern-day papal altar of Clement VIII (from 1594) were built. After the official publication of the excavations in 1951, other archaeological investigations were carried out between 1953 in 1958 by Adriano Prandi, and during those same years Margherita Guarducci deciphered, not without disturbing suspicions and controversies, the graffiti under the Confession of the basilica and identified the relics of St. Peter with the "discovered bones" coming from a hollow portion of wall g. The results of the research carried out during the 1950s and, esp., the notice of the discovery of St. Peter's bones—confirmed by the official recognition of the church by request of Pope Paul VI—provoked a lively scientific and religious debate.

The bibl. on the Vatican is enormous. For an overview, accompanied by a rich and concise supplement, see P. Liverani, La topografia antica del Vaticano, Vatican City 1999, and L. Bianchi, Ad limina Petri. Spazio e memoria della Roma cristiana, Rome 1999.

For the explorations under the floor of the Petrine basilica, see B.M. Apollonj Ghetti - A. Ferrua - E. Josi - E. Kirschbaum, Esplorazioni sotto la Confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, Vatican City 1951; A. Prandi, La zona archeologica della Confessio Vaticana, Vatican City 1957; M. Guarducci, I graffiti sotto la Confessione di San Pietro in Vaticano, I-III, Vatican City 1958; A.A. De Marco, The Tomb of Saint Peter, A Representative and Annotated Bibliography of the Excavations, Leiden 1964; M. Guarducci, Le reliquie di Pietro sotto la Confessione della Basilica Vaticana, Vatican City 1965; id., Le chiavi sulla pietra. Studi, ricordi e documenti inediti intorno alla tomba di Pietro in Vaticano, Casale Monf. 1995 (extensive bibl.); P. Zander, La tomba di San Pietro e la necropoli vaticana: dalle prime esplorazioni ai recenti restauri, in Pietro. La storia, l'immagine, la memoria, Milan 1999, 215-226.

M. Ghilardi

VEDASTUS, saint (d. 540). St. Vedastus (French Vaast, Gaston) was born, according to his Vita, at the borders between Limousin and Périgord; however, according to a recent hypothesis, he was born at Châlus. He became a hermit near Toul; the bishop there ordained him a priest. Taken to *Reims by *Clovis, he was perhaps his catechist. *Remigius of Reims had him appointed bishop of Arras (after 496) and subsequently of Cambrai, with the duty of returning those regions to Christianity that had become *pagan with the arrival of the Franks. Around 534 he withdrew to solitude beyond the River Crinchon. He died in 540, after 40 years of his episcopate. He was buried in the Church of Notre Dame of Arras; then by Aubert of Cambrai-Arras, one of his successors, he was translated into his cell outside the city, which became the center of the powerful Abbey of St. Vaast. His first Vita is owed to *Jonah of Bobbio (before 642) (BHL 8501-8505), another to Alcuin (800) (BHL 8506-8508), who also wrote a Mass (lost), inscriptions for altars and churches, and a homily (BHL 8509). There are some libri miraculorum from the 9th–14th c. (BHL 8510-8519). The saint's feast day falls on 6 February, the translation of his relics on 1 October (Mart. hier.).

BHL 8501-8519; BS 12, 965-968; LCI 8, 537-539; LMA 1, 1027-1028; 8, 1442-1443; BBKL 12, 1178; P. Leman, Topographie chrétienne d'Arras au VI[e] siècle. La Vita Vedasti et les données de l'archéologie: Revue du Nord - Archéologie 77 (1995) 169-184.

V. Saxer - S. Heid

VENANTIUS FORTUNATUS (ca. 535–ca. 600). A Latin Christian poet who was born around 530 at Duplavilis (Valdobbiadene). *Arator and the Byzantine intellectual milieu of *Ravenna had a great influence on his literary formation. His classical knowledge flourished, as is reflected in his numerous borrowings from the writings of Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, and, to a lesser extent, Horace and other poets from the Silver Age; his biblical learning can be perceived in the frequent scriptural citations, esp. from the *Psalms, Isaiah and the gospels. There is no lack of evidence of his knowledge, even though partial, of the writings of some Fathers. His writings give the impression that he had read *Sedulius, *Orosius, *Caesarius of Arles and *Hilary of Poitiers.

Healed from a serious eye disease after having been anointed with oil from the lamp that burned before the image of St. *Martin of Tours in the basilicas of Sts. *John and *Paul, he departed in 565 for *Gaul on a pilgrimage of thanksgiving to the tomb of his protector, but also perhaps to withdraw from the disturbances brought on him by the authorities of Ravenna for his nonconformist stance during the controversy of the *Three Chapters. In 566 he was at Metz at the court of the king of Austrasia Sigebert I, whose marriage with Brunhilde he celebrated in a poem, thereby obtaining for himself a prestigious position. Having completed his pilgrimage at *Tours, in 567 he took residence at *Poitiers on account of the former Queen *Radegund, who, having taken on the monastic veil along with her daughter Agnes, retired to the convent. He also remained for some time at the court of Chilperic, king of Neustria. Consecrated bishop of Poitiers in 597, he died there shortly after 600. A person of great notoriety, even though controversial, he lived through some of Gaul's darkest historical moments: the intrigues of Queens Fredegund and Brunhilde and the rivalries between Chilperic and Sigebert and Galaswinth. At times he remained silent, perhaps through prudence; at times he praised the Merovingian sovereigns, according to a literary practice that was still flourishing at that time. His lyrical effusions over Radegund and Agnes should be read in light of their spiritual transformation.

His works include eleven books of miscellanea, nearly 300 compositions mostly in verse on sacred and secular subjects; the Vita S. Martini, recast into hexameters, with personal references, of the biography redacted by *Sulpicius Severus; and the Vitae written in prose on saints Hilary, *Germanus, Albinus, *Paternus, Radegund, *Marcellus, Amantius, Médard, Leobinus and Maurilius. The religious lyrics contain Venantius's entire Christian subject matter, the meaning of death, the veneration of the cross, devotion to *Mary and guidance for human souls. His investigation into the transcendent found singular expression in his travel poetry: the pilgrim always marks the sanctuaries that he encounters or regards them as a goal, understood as points of privileged encounter with the supernatural. As a hagiographer, given the panegyrical nature of the Vitae, he is more interested in moral edification than in historical accuracy, even though he does not fail to emphasize at times his role as an eyewitness. In these biographies one perceives thaumaturgic and demonic elements as well as a clear propensity toward the aristocratic milieu. Venantius Fortunatus is primarily remembered for two hymns, Vexilla regis prodeunt and Pange lingua gloriosi, written in 568–569 for the solemn entry of a relic of the cross into Poitiers; these two hymns were immediately inserted into the liturgy.

CPL 1033-1052; PL 88; BS 12, 985-987; D. Tardi, Fortunat. Étude sur un dernier représentant de la poésie latine dans la Gaule mérovingienne, Paris 1927; J. Laporte, Le royaume de Paris dans l'oeuvre hagiographique de Fortunat, Poitiers 1953; K. Steinmann, Die Gelesuintha-Elegie des Venantius Fortunatus (Carm. VI,5), Zürich 1975; L. Navarra, A proposito del "De navigio suo" di V.F. in rapporto alla "Mosella" di Ausonio e agli "Itinerari" di Ennodio: SSR 3 (1979) 79-131; B. Brennan, The Career of Venantius Fortunatus: Traditio 41 (1985) 49-78; G. Palermo, Venanzio Fortunato, Vite dei santi Ilario e Radegonda di Poitiers, Rome 1989; S. Tamburri, Venanzio Fortunato, La Vita di S. Martino di Tours, Naples 1991; J.W. George, Venantius Fortunatus: A Latin Poet in Merovingian Gaul, Oxford 1992; var. aus., Venanzio Fortunato tra Italia e Francia. Atti del conv. int. di studi, Treviso 1993; F.E. Consolino, L'elegia amorosa nel De excidio Thoringiae di Venanzio Fortunato, in La poesia cristiana latina in distici elegiaci. Atti del conv. di Assisi marzo 1992, Assisi 1993, 241-254; P. Santorelli, L'Epitaphium Eusebiae di Venanzio Fortunato (IV,28), La poesia cristiana latina in distici elegiaci. Atti del conv. di Assisi marzo 1992, Assisi 1993, 285-294; M. Roberts, The Description of Landscape in the Poetry of Venantius Fortunatus: The Moselle Poems: Traditio 49 (1994) 1-22; M. Reydellet, Venance Fortunat. Poèmes, t. I. livres I-IV, Paris 1994; D. Fiocco, Venanzio Fortunato: le "Vitae" dei santi e il modello episcopale, Rome 1997; S. Di Brazzano, Venanzio Fortunato, Opere, 1. Carmi, Rome 2001; Venanzio Fortunato e il suo tempo, ed. Fondazione Cassamarca, Treviso 2003; A. de Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique, 10, Paris 2006, 59-104.

L. Navarra

VENERANDUS of Altaripa (7th c.). Belonging perhaps to a senatorial family of S *Gaul (Stroheker), Venerandus established the first Benedictine monastery of Merovingian *Gaul, at Altaripa in the diocese of Albi in Provence. The foundation dates back to the time of Fibicius of Albi, as is shown from a letter sent to Bishop Constantius (620–630), grandson and successor of Fibicius, to whom Venerandus recounted the circumstances connected to the event.

The letter (dated between 625 and 626) is the only source that we possess on the matter and is of great importance because it contains the first mention of the Benedictine Rule, two centuries after the death of St. *Benedict and after the 50th anniversary of the destruction of Monte Cassino (ca. 577), and provides testimony to its spread in S France. Venerandus sent to Constantius the text of the Rule of St. Benedict, abbas Romensis, so that he might preserve it in the episcopal archives and check that it be faithfully observed in the monastery he established. The small monastery of Altaripa thus competed with Luxeuil for the primacy and merit of having imported and spread the Rule in France; Venerandus became the first link of a chain that saw the transmission of the Rule, through Constantius of Albi, a correspondent with Desiderius of Cahors, to the circles of the court (Prinz; Engelbert). All of this is in opposition to the hypothesis forwarded by de Vogüé, who instead identifies the means of spreading the Regula along with the writings of *Gregory the Great, the Irish *Columbanus and the Franco-Irish monastery of Luxeuil.

Traube was the one who, by analyzing the author's Latin, demonstrated that the document (which has come down to us in a 15th-c. copy) was redacted in the S of Merovingian Gaul, which could be considered the first witness to the spread of the Rule. Starting from the attribution Romensis given to Benedict, Traube himself eventually hypothesized that there was a relationship with the "interpolated" class of manuscripts of the Benedictine text.

Despite the chronological concurrences, it is unlikely that our Venerandus was the same person mentioned by Fredegarius in IV,73 (MGH, Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, II, Hannoverae 1888, 158).

CPL 1305; CCL 117 (1957) 502-503 = L. Traube, Textgeschichte der Regula S. Benedicti, Munich 1898, 35-37, 92-93; K.F. Stroheker, Der senatorische Adel im spätantike Gallien, Tübingen 1948, 226; F. Prinz, Frühes Mönchtum im Frankenreich, Munich-Vienna 1965, 267-268; P. Engelbert, Regeltext und Romverehung. Zur Frage der Verbreitung der Regula Benedicti im Frühmittelalter: Römische Quartalschrift 81 (1986) 39-60; S. Pricoco, La Regola di San Benedetto e le Regole dei Padri, Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Milan 1995, XLIV-XLVIII; Patrologia 4, 349-350 (Y. Hen).

B. Clausi

VENERIUS of Milan (d. after 406). Deacon during the episcopate of *Ambrose, he became bishop of *Milan upon the death of *Simplicianus, in 400 or 401 (Paulinus of Milan, Vita Ambr. 46; Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 20,3). His episcopate unfolded during the difficult years caused by the threat of the *Visigoths in N *Italy and in the surrounding areas of Milan and the spread of *Vigilantius's teachings. He found himself involved in the *Origenist controversy: Pope *Anastasius I, in a letter to *John of Jerusalem dated between the years 400 or 401 (Mansi 3,944; ACO I,5,74), claims that he had previously written to Venerius (PLS 1,791-792; CPL 1639) concerning the condemnation of *Origen. Venerius was included by *Jerome among all those who had favored Origen's condemnation (Apol. c. Ruf. II,22). In June 401, Venerius received from the bishops gathered in council at *Carthage a request to help with the needs of the African clergy (Concilia Africae a. 345 - a. 525: CC 149,194-196). In 404, *John Chrysostom turned to him, as well as to Pope *Innocent and *Chromatius of Aquileia (Pall., Dial. 2: SC 242, 94), in order to request support in light of the threat posed by *Theophilus of Alexandria and his own removal from office; *Palladius mentions one of Venerius's letters, along with those of the emperor *Honorius, Pope Innocent and other bishops, that was taken to the court of the emperor *Arcadius at Constantinople following a council held perhaps at *Rome before 406 in support of John Chrysostom (Dial. 4: SC 341,84); moreover, John Chrysostom's Ep. 182, written in 406, was sent to Venerius. *Ennodius dedicated one of his poems to Venerius (Carm. II,79).

BS 12, 1009-1011 (bibl.); PCBE 2263-2264.

A. Pollastri

VERANUS of Cavaillon (d. after 589). Bishop and saint, patron of the city and the diocese of Cavaillon, in provincia ecclesiastica Arelatensi. A local tradition maintained that he was born at Valchiusa (near Avignon), to a nonaristocratic family, in the 2nd decade of the 6th c.; others maintained that he was born at Javols, in the area near Mende (Lozère) or rather at Jargeau (Loiret). In any case, the saint spent part of his life at Valchiusa, leading an eremitic life at Cavaillon; there he built a chapel in honor of the Virgin (where his body was then buried in a stone *sarcophagus) and performed his most famous miracle by delivering the region from a dragon that was tormenting it. Having become bishop of Cavaillon by wish of King Sigebert I (d. 575), he governed his diocese until his death, which certainly occurred after 589. It seems that he was buried at Valchiusa in the chapel built by him, upon which a church dedicated to him was then built in the 8th c., which was subsequently rebuilt during the 11th–12th c. through the work of the monks of the Abbey of Saint Victor of Marseille. Still existing today, the church encloses an empty sarcophagus and an altar from the Merovingian era. The remains of his body were translated to Jargeau (diocese of Orléans) at the beginning of the 11th c., but the relics were also protected in the cathedral of Cavaillon.

His cult enjoyed noteworthy fortune, which was initially limited to the region of Valchiusa, but then extended after the 11th c. to the rest of France. In Provence the saint is commemorated on 13 November, the date of his depositio* according to the Vita Verani (BHL 8536: probably from the Carolingian age); at *Lyons and in the nearby diocese he is commemorated on 11 November, perhaps because he was confused with the bishop of Vence of the same name (son of *Eucherius of Lyons), whose depositio is remembered on 11 November in the Hieronymian Martyrology; in other dioceses he is commemorated on 19 October, the date of the translatio of the saint's body from Valchiusa to Jargeau, where the parochial church was consecrated to him in 1154.

Beyond the hagiographical tradition, Veranus was a historical figure who left many traces of himself. He was among the 64 bishops who took part in the Council of Mâcon (585), a true and proper general council of the Frankish nation (Amiet), called by King Guntram of Borgogna and the metropolitan bishop of Lyons, whose primary objective was to deliberate on a matter of ecclesiastical discipline. On this occasion it seems that they decided in favor of priestly celibacy, as shown by the Sententia de castitate sacerdotum (CPL 1022), a brief summary of the synodal intervention of a Bishop Veranus, for which reason Jacques Sirmond (in PL 72) also proposes the possible attribution of this text to Veranus of Lyons.

*Gregory of Tours, who knew him personally, had met him between 581 and 586 (Mir. II,60), recalls several important events from his life: along with Bishops Artemius of Sens and Agricius of Troyes, he was sent by Guntram to *Chlothar II to investigate the death of Bishop Praetextatus of Rouen, who was assassinated by a hired killer of Queen Fredegund (Hist. VIII,31); in October 587, he baptized the son of King Childebert, Theoderic (Hist. IX,4); he was among the nine bishops of the kingdom of Borgogna who elaborated and signed the letter of response to Bishop Gondegisilus, on the question of the revolt of the monks of the monastery of Radegund at Poitiers (Hist. IX,41). Gregory also alludes to Veranus's thaumaturgic attributes and the aura of sanctity that surrounded him while he was still alive: "This pontiff was . . . endowed with great virtues, to the point that, often, if he made the sign of the cross on the sick, immediately with the help of God he brought them back to health" (Hist. IX,4).

CPL 1022; BHL 8536; BHL Nov. Suppl. 8536b. Concilia Galliae. A. 511 - A. 695, ed. C. de Clercq, CCL 148 A (1963) 248; Sententia de castitate sacerdotum, PL 72, 699-702; Vita Verani, ASS Octobris, VIII, Brussels 1853, 452-474; Greg. Tur., Hist., It. trans. of M. Oldoni, Naples 2001, II (Books VIII-IX). BS 12, 1017-1021 (R. Amiet - C. Colafranceschi); O. Pontal, Histoire des conciles mérovingiens, Paris 1989, 186-191; B. Jussen, Patenschaft und Adoption im frühen Mittelalter. Künstliche Verwandtschaft als soziale Praxis, Göttingen 1991, 206-210 (Eng. trans. Newark, DE 2002); Patrologia IV, 343-344 (Y. Hen).

B. Clausi

VERANUS of Vence (d. ca. 475). Second son of St. *Eucherius of Lyons, a vir clarissimus, who, around 420, retired to a private life with his wife and children, Veranus was born in the year 400 at *Lyons, and his brother *Salonius, at *Lérins. Veranus was educated by *Vincent of Lérins and by *Salvian of Marseille. His father sent him the treatise Formulae spiritualis intelligentiae on biblical exegesis. We find him as the bishop of Vence in 451; his brother Salonius was bishop of Geneva from 440 onward. During this age he placed his signature on the letter of the Council of *Arles to Pope Leo the Great. He wrote with bishops Ceretius of Grenoble and Salonius to the same pope concerning his Tomus ad Flavianum (Leo the Great, Ep. 68). In the letter, he asked the pope to correct for them a copy of the Tomus, because such an important treatise had to be free from errors. Veranus still appears in the correspondence of Pope *Hilarus until 465 (Epp. 10; 12) but perhaps also in Lucidus's letter, in which case he lived until 474. Along with his brother Salonius he appears in the episcopal list of Lyons, in which they were inserted because of their father. According to the Hieronymian Martyrology (feast day 11 November), he was buried at Lyons.

BHL 8538; BBKL 12, 1224-1227; J. van der Straeten, Un éloge ancien de S. Veran, fils de S. Eucher: AnBoll 83 (1965) 81-94; R. Nouailhat, Saints et patrons. Les premiers moines de Lérins, Besançon 1988.

S. Samulowitz

VERECUNDUS of Iunca (d. 552). Historians know neither the place nor the date of Verecundus's birth, an African writer of the 6th c. We know with certainty that he was the bishop of Iunca in Byzacena and that he had an important role in the controversy of the *Three Chapters, during which he maintained a firm stance toward the imperial authority, so much so that in 551 he was forced to flee along with Pope *Vigilius and take refuge at *Chalcedon, where he died in 552. The following works were certainly written by Verecundus: the Commentarii super Cantica Ecclesiastica, where he offers an *allegorical commentary on nine OT songs, following *Origen and *Augustine, but not without scholarly rigor and originality, and the Carmen de satisfactione paenitentiae, written in 212 hexameters, in which with a sincere enthusiasm, although not without some literary complacency, he confesses, as *Dracontius had done already, the sufferings of the one who, after painful experiences, places his hope in divine Mercy. Isetta, although recognizing several difficulties, attributes to Verecundus the Carmen ad Flavium Felicem de resurrectione mortuorum. The attribution of the Excerptiones de gestis Chalcedonensis Concilii to Verecundus, however, is doubtful; the attribution of the Exhortatio paenitendi and the Lamentum paenitentiae and the Crisiados Libri III (the work of a humanist author) is completely untenable.

CPL 869-871; PLS IV, 39-234; J.B. Pitra, Spicilegium Solesmense, IV, Paris 1858; R. Demeulenaere, CCL 93, Turnholt 1976; Carmen de paenitentia, intr., testo critico, tr. e comm. ed. M.G. Bianco, Naples 1984; H. Scheider, Die altlateinischen biblischen Cantica, Beuron 1938; E. Kullendorff, Textkritische Beiträge zu Verecundus Iuncensis, Lund 1943; O. Rousseau, La plus ancienne liste de cantiques liturgiques tirés de l'Écriture: RecSR 35 (1948) 120-129; M. Schuster, art. Verecundus: PWK 27/1, 1010-1012; A. Hudson-Williams, Notes on Verecundus: VChr 6 (1952) 47-51; L. Brou, Études sur les Collectes du Psautier, I, La série africaine et l'évêque Verecundus de Junca: SE 6 (1954) 73-95; C. Magazzù, Tecnica esegetica nei "Commentarii super cantica ecclesiastica" di Verecondo di Junca, Messina 1983; S. Isetta, Carmen ad Flavium Felicem. Problemi di attribuzione e reminiscenze classiche: VetChr 20 (1983) 111-140; M.G. Bianco, Verecondo di Iunca, un poeta ancora trascurato del VI secolo, in Disiecti membra poetae, I, Foggia 1984, 216-231; M.G. Bianco, Note al Carmen de paenitentia di Verecundo di Iunca: Augustinianum 24 (1984) 549-560; Patrologia IV, 43 and 53-54; BBKL 12, 1239-1240.

S. Costanza

VERONA. An important Roman city of N *Italy on the Adige River from which numerous remains from that period still exist. Found at the crossroads at a point of exceptional strategic importance, it was often the theater for military battles: the emperor *Decius defeated Philip the Arab there in 249; *Constantine conquered *Maxentius's army (CIL 5,3331); Stilicho defeated King *Alaric in 403; and *Theodoric routed King *Odoacer. The emperor *Gallienus (253–368) reconstructed its walls and expanded them. Theodoric built a solid palace there and also a new circuit of walls (Anonymous Vales. 71); in 569 it was sacked by Alboin, king of the *Longobards (Lombards). Christianity must have been organized at Verona over the course of the 3rd c., after *Aquileia, as the lists of Veronese bishops from the beginning of the 8th c. suggest (the 8th-c. Viel of Classis [a cloth embroidered with the images of the first 35 bishops] and the early 9th-c. Versus de Verona [or De laudibus Veronae]; see MGH, Poet. aev. Car. 1, 121ff.), according to which the first was a certain *Euprepius. Mention is made of the martyrs Firmus and Rusticus, perhaps under Maximilian. Nevertheless, the first bishop that historians have reliable information about is Lucilius (or Lucillus, as he was called by *Athanasius), who participated at the Council of *Serdica in 343 (Mansi 3,38; Athanasius, Apol. c. Ar. 50: PG 25,338; Apol. ad Const. 3: PG 25,599). If Lucilius appeared as sixth on the list, Euprepius must have been from the 3rd c. The eighth of the series was *Zeno, of African origin, after 356, who was also the most important pastor of the Veronese church in antiquity, to which he provided a great impetus with his commitment to evangelization and organization in an area that was still primarily *pagan but at the same time contained a strong Jewish presence in the city; at his time buildings of Christian worship were still few (see Tract. II,6,2: CCL 22,168). Zeno also favored the ascetic life because at Verona one of the first communities of virgins in the West arose.

Around 380 the bishop of Verona was Syagrius, to whom *Ambrose sent two letters rebuking him for the procedure taken toward the virgin Indicia (Ambrose, Epp. 5 and 6: PL 16,929-943). During this period, the Veronese church depended on the church of *Milan; it would subsequently depend on Aquileia. In the 5th c., we meet Bishop Petronius, the 13th of the series, to whom Lanzoni attributes two sermons, which usually go under the name of *Petronius of Bologna (CPL 210-211: PLS 3,141-143); we then know of Gaudentius. There are few Christian archaeological remains; between the 5th and the 6th c., a large basilica with one aisle was built.

During the Early Middle Ages, Verona was furnished with a scriptorium; its first known scribe was Ursicinus (517). Its Capitular Library was very rich with ancient manuscripts, many of which came from other scriptoria. The three most famous manuscripts are as follows: St. *Augustine's De civitate Dei (5th c.), *Hilary of Poitiers's In Psalmos and De Trinitate (5th c.), the Purple Evangelary (5th c.), the Didascalia apostolica (5th c.), the work of *Sulpicius Severus transcribed in 517 by Ursicinus, and different sacramentaries, among which was the Sacramentarium leonianum (see E.A. Lowe, Codices latini antiquiores, IV, Oxford 1947, 32-40). For the early Christian remains of Verona, see *Italy.

DACL 15, 2959-2962; EC 12, 1282-1299; EAA² 5, 107-1021; F. Lanzoni, Le diocesi d'Italia, Faenza 1927, 929-934; A Grazioli, La giurisdizione di Milan a Verona all'epoca di Ambrogio: Scuola Catt. 68 (1940) 373-379; G.B. Pighi, Versus de Verona. Versus de Mediolano, Bologna 1960; P.L. Zovatto, Arte paleocristiana a Verona: il cristianesimo a Verona, in Verona e il suo territorio, Verona 1960, 553-613; E. Lodi, Le due omelie di san Petronio vescovo di Bologna, in Misc. Liturgica card. G. Lercaro, II, Rome 1967, 263-301; var. aus., Storia della cultura veneta, I: Dalle origini al Trecento, Vicenza 1976 (various articles); G.B. Pighi, Cenni storici sulla Chiesa Veronese, I, Verona ²1980; L. Franzoni, Immagine di Verona romana: AAAd 28 (1986) 345-373; Il Veneto nell'età romana, ed. G. Cavalieri Manasse, 2 vols., Verona 1987; R. Canova dal Zio, Le chiese delle Tre Venezie anteriori al Mille, Padua 1986; Teoderico il grande e i Goti d'Italia, in Atti del XIII Congr. int. di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 1993; EAM 11, 561ff.; R. Lizzi Testa, Christianization and Conversion in Northern Italy, in The Origins of Christendom in the West, ed. by A. Kreider, Edinburgh-New York 2001, 47-95, esp. 70ff.

A. Di Berardino

VERONICA. In the Acts of Pilate (ch. 7) Berenike is mentioned (Beronike, in Latin Veronica) identified with the woman with the issue of blood healed by *Jesus (Mk 5:25 and par.). According to *Eusebius of Caesarea, she must have come from Paneas, where there was a statue of the woman with the issue of blood standing before the Lord (HE 7,18); according to another opinion, Veronica came from *Spain. This Berenike-Veronica (also called Basilla [Basilissa?]) in the apocrypha of the Cycle of Pilate received the image of Christ (perhaps a reminder of the legend of *Abgar) and came to *Rome with Volusianus (*Death of Pilate, Vindicta Salvatoris, Healing of Tiberius). A Libellus (Gk. Deesis) Veronicae haemorrhousae is found in *John Malalas's Chronographia (PG 97,365-368). During the Middle Ages (12th c.?), this Veronica became the woman at the sixth station of the Via Crucis.

BHL 8549; BHG 779-780; BS 12, 1044-1050; LCIK 8, 543-545; C.W. Goodwin, The Anglo-Saxon Legends of St. Andrew and St. Veronica, Cambridge 1851; E. v. Dobschütz, Christusbilder: TU 18 (1899) 197-262.

M. Starowieyski

VERSUS DE SEX AETATIBUS ET MUNDI PRINCIPIO. The author of this short work is regarded as a certain Theo(do)fridus, bishop of Amiens (d. after 683). His name appears in the second verse of the same document: Aspice, Deus, de supernis sedibus / Quos Theodofridus condedit versiculos. The first verse, which begins with the words, Ante saecula et mundi principio, constitutes a brief profession of faith in the most Holy *Trinity: Tu, Pater sancte, genuisti Filium, / Qui tecum regnat cum sancto Espiritu. There follows an invocation of God by the author, who wishes to describe briefly the history of the world from the creation to the last judgment, which is divided into six periods: (1) from the creation to *Noah (vv. 3-7); (2) from the sons of Noah to the calling of *Abraham (vv. 8-9); (3) from Isaac to Saul and *David (vv. 10-16); (4) from Absalom to the deportation to Babylon (vv. 17-19); (5) from Zerubbabel to King *Herod (vv. 20-21). (6) The sixth period (vv. 21-25) begins with the birth of *Jesus Christ; the author mentions some of the Lord's most significant miracles (e.g., the resurrection of Lazarus, the multiplication of bread, the wedding at Cana); and he describes his death on the cross, resurrection and ascension to heaven. The final verse refers to the last judgment with the punishment of the wicked and the rewarding of the righteous. The individual verses end with the refrain: Deus qui iustus semper es laudabilis (perhaps in imitation of the *Psalms). The theology is the traditional type, which underscores the creative work of God the Father in this project of salvation which is accomplished in and by Jesus Christ; the *Holy Spirit is only mentioned in the initial invocation. This short work is characterized by a certain rhythmic beauty and provides an original vocabulary, even though this vocabulary displays various terms that are not attested to in classical Latin but by that point were present in medieval Latin (saecula, espiritus, etas etc.).

CPL 2301. MGH, Poetae Latini, 4,2, Strecker, n. 40, 559-564.

W. Turek

VERUS ISRAEL. The notion of the Verus Israel is evidently Christian, but it is already found in the Essene literature, discovered in the grottoes near the Dead Sea, with the objective of legitimizing the community with respect to the priesthood of *Jerusalem, which the Essenes regarded as illegitimate. For the Christians this notion expressed the conviction that, on the divine level, they were the authentic heirs of Israel of the era of the Second Temple (before 70 CE). The notion is established on a rereading of the ancient beliefs and practices according to the categories of thought more or less inherited from *Paul of Tarsus: letter and spirit; provisional and eternal; particular and universal; material and spiritual.

Along this theological line, the covenant with *Abraham, the "father of many nations," is considered as an announcement of Christ's mission: thus in this "new covenant," destined from here onward to all humanity, circumcision, the chief sign of the covenant, prefigures the "circumcision of the heart," that is, baptism, which alone allows one to approach the "true" meaning of the *Scriptures. Moreover, the law of *Sinai, reserved for the Jewish people, now proclaims Christ, the "new law," and the "inheritance" of the Promised Land and represents in anticipation the universal gathering of the nations "on the holy mountain": the double lineage of the patriarch symbolizes Israel "according to the flesh" and Israel "according to the spirit."

The totality of the commandments, events and institutions of ancient Israel was interpreted in the messianic sense in *Jesus Christ. The concept of Verus Israel finds its most ancient explicit formulation in the writings of *Justin Martyr. The proximity of the two expressions shows that "true" and "spiritual" are almost understood as synonyms: "Because we are . . . the true and spiritual Israel, who, through the work of Christ crucified, have been led to God" (Dialogue 11,5). "We are the true Israelite race" (Dialogue 135,3).

The problem was fundamentally at the center of the process of separation between Christianity and *Judaism; it thus determined the representation that Christians from the beginning had of themselves in relation to the Jews and *pagans. Likewise in Justin's writings, it occupies an exceptional place that corresponds to a particular and unique period in the history of the relationship between Judaism and Christianity: previously the Christian community was not sufficiently distinct from the Jewish community so that this type of difficulty could be taken into consideration. After Justin's work—esp. when Christianity became the official religion of the empire—the new situation of the two communities made the question short-lived. The Christian claim of being Israel was no longer affirmed except in a marginal way; it finds no echo in the Jewish literature, nor even in controversial writings.

M. Simon, Verus Israel, Étude sur les relations entre chrétiens et juifs dans l'empire romain (135-425), Paris 1948, [2]1964 (see HTR 92 [1999] 465-478); Verus Israel. Nuove prospettive sul giudeocristianesimo, ed. G. Filoramo - C. Gianotto, Brescia 2001.

S.C. Mimouni

VERUS of Orange (5th–6th c.). Verus is regularly presented as the successor and biographer of St. *Eutropius, but in effect we only know him as the author of the biography of the latter (BHL 2782). In the title of the short work, one reads: Domino sancto papae Stephano Verus. The "pope" Stephen in question was the bishop of *Lyons, who held that see from 501 to 515. Perhaps Verus was not a bishop. In this case Stephen was the successor of Eutropius and the predecessor of Florentius, who is attested in 517.

CPL 2099; J.-H. Albanès - U. Chevalier, Gallia christiana novissima, VI, Montbéliard 1916, 10-18; BS 5, 345; DHGE 16, 82.

V. Saxer - S. Samulowitz

VESPASIAN, emperor (AD 9–79). Titus Flavius Vespasian, Roman emperor from 69 to 79, the founder of the military dynasty of the Flavii (his sons *Titus and *Domitian immediately sided with him after his proclamation as emperor by the legions of *Egypt, *Syria and Judea). Flavius Josephus, the Jewish historian who worked at the court of the Flavii, disapproving the violence of the intransigents against the Christians and the murder of *James (Ant. XX,200ff.), reveals to us the disposition that the Flavian dynasty had toward the adherents of the new religion. Two fragments from the writings of *Hegesippus, cited by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 3,12; 3,20,1-7), allude to the deliberate action taken by Vespasian and his sons against the descendents of *David in *Palestine also for the objective of determining whether the Christians constituted a threat from the political point of view. Vespasian's tolerance was owed to his observation that Christianity posed no threat and that *Judaism and Christianity differed greatly. One should note that Vespasian, a follower of the traditional Roman religion, while alive did not wish to be considered a god. He died of a fever in February 79, after having reorganized the army, completing financial reforms, and increasing judicial and legislative tasks. When his son Titus returned from the East in 71, Vespasian celebrated with him the triumph in destroying *Jerusalem.

M. Sordi, I cristiani e l'impero romano, Milan [2]1990; G. Jossa, I cristiani e l'impero romano da Tiberio a Marco Aurelio, Naples 1991; F. Jacques - J. Sheid, Rome et l'intégration de l'Empire, Paris 1990, (It. trans.) Roma e il suo impero, Rome-Bari 1992; B. Levick, Tiberius the Politician, London-New York [2]1999; C. Salles, La Rome des Flaviens: Vespasien, Titus, Domitien, Paris 2002.

L. Navarra

VESTIARIUS (Vestararius). Custodian of the treasury and the wardrobe (vestiarium) of high ecclesiastical and lay dignitaries, or rather of chapters, churches and monasteries. At *Rome, starting at least from the 8th c., this name was used to refer to the official placed in charge of the Lateran patriarchate's vestiarium, in which, as is shown from a passage of the Liber pontificalis (Duchesne LP I,328-329), in addition to the sacred garments of the Roman pontiff, the various cymilia episcopii were preserved, which had been gifts from emperors and high dignitaries. From the biography of Pope Stephen III (768–772) (LP I,470), we learn that the building contained an oratory dedicated to St. *Caesarius of Arles, concerning which location—and consequently that of the vestiarium, within the context of the Lateran Palace—nothing is known (Lauer, Le Palais de Latran, 96, n. 2). Among the administrative duties of the vestiarium, and esp. that of its leader, the vestiarius, was the duty of preparing, executing and recording in the appropriate books some of the papal activities such as the establishment and construction of buildings, restorations and donations. On this basis, one scholar has hypothesized (Geertman, More veterum, 34, 63) that the compilers of the Liber pontificalis did their work under the aegis of the vestiarium, and are to be regarded, perhaps, as employed by this administration. From the Ordo Romanus I (nn. 10, 22) it turns out that on the feast days the vestiarius had to supply, by placing his own seal on them, the sacred vessels and the evangelaries that were needed for the Mass; in the procession he rode immediately after the pope. Just one name of a vestiarius—a certain Baiolus, mentioned on a Roman inscription of an imprecise date and provenance (Diehl, 1325)—is known to us before the pontificate of Hadrian I (772–795), during which four individuals held this office: among these was the future Leo III, who held the post until his election as pope (LP I, 519 n. 77).

P.L. Galletti, Del Vestarario di Santa Romana Chiesa, Rome 1758; Duchesne LP I, pp. CLXII, CCXLIII-CCXLIV; Ph. Lauer, Le Palais de Latran. Étude historique et archéologique, Paris 1911; M. Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du haut moyen âge, II, Louvain 1948, 43, 70 and 73; H. Geertman, More veterum. Il Liber Pontificalis e gli edifici ecclesiastici di Roma nella tarda antichità e nell'alto medioevo, Groningen 1975, 34, 63.

V. Fiocchi Nicolai

VESTMENTS, LITURGICAL. The garments worn by sacred ministers during religious functions. Although, as it seems, in the ancient religions (with special attention to *Judaism) it was a somewhat natural practice to put on special garments for particular cultic circumstances, the same thing cannot be said for the pre-Nicene church. Whether due to a spirit that sought distinction and contrast with practices and customs that recalled the ancient Jewish law, or due to the more restricted and reserved character of early Christian worship, the vestments ordinarily used in civil Greco-Roman life were also used for the liturgical office. However, it appears that the best or cleanest and, as it seems, white garments were soon reserved for the liturgical celebrations (Clem. of Alex., Strom. IV,22,141,4; Canones Hipp. 37 and then Jerome, Adv. Pelag. I,29); it seems logical therefore to speak of garments since the end of the 2nd and the beginning of the 3rd c. which were reserved for liturgical use, although perfectly identical in form and cut with the vestments of daily living. One must turn to a statement from *Origen with caution when he asserts that "the priest uses certain garments when in the ministry of the sacrifices and others when he goes out in public" (aliis indumentis sacerdos utitur dum est in sacrificiorum ministerio, et aliis cum procedit ad populum, In Lev. hom. IV,6); the interpretive registers adopted here are undoubtedly twofold: one, real, referring to the OT text, the other, so to speak, moral, with respect to the path of the Pauline conception of ἐνδύειν. The same caution is also needed for one of *Jerome's statements, which very often depend on Origen; he seems to echo Origen when, choosing the word habitus, he maintains that "the divine religion has one attire in the ministry, another in common use and life" (religio divina alterum habitum habet in ministerio, alterum in usu vitaque communi, In Ezech. XIII,44,17ff.: PL 25,437). Such testimonies (see also Jer., Ep. 29,4 and 64,15) are therefore not specifically related, as is often claimed (see M. Righetti I,585), to specific liturgical Christian garments. Likewise unreliable, because of its well-known late composition (5th–6th c.), is a claim from the Liber pontificalis (XXIV,3) concerning the time of Pope *Stephen I (254–257): "He [i.e., Stephen I] established a law that priests and Levites not use sacred garments in daily use except in church" (constituit sacerdotes et levitas ut vestes sacratas in usu cottidiano non uti, nisi in ecclesia).

Mention is made of a ἱερὰ στολή in a revealing statement from *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (HE 2,23: PG 82,1065), which refers to the 330s and reveals how, with the deregulation of worship and as a result of some privileges and honors obtained by the Christian religion in the 4th c., some clergy did not resist the temptation of using some precious materials in the making of their own garments to the point of enriching them often with every type of decoration and embroidery. Indeed, a certain reluctance was shown shortly thereafter by certain prominent individuals in the the church immediately after this custom spread, esp. in the West. *Augustine, e.g., who once emphasized the simplicity of his manner of dress—certainly referring to that of his liturgical ministry—not only publicly rejected such refinements but also disapproved of the tendency that followed from them to make a distinction of clothing within the various levels of the clergy; moreover, he made it clear that every precious garment given to him with the purpose of distinction would be sold and the proceeds distributed to the poor (Serm. 356,13: PL 39,1579-1580 and see also Epist. 263,1: PL 33,1082). Pope *Celestine I also took a stance (428) against these attempts at a hieratic restoration of the priesthood, when he expressed regret for the initiative of some of the bishops of *Gaul to introduce certain distinctions in their clothing (amicti pallio et lumbos praecincti) that, in contrast to the customs of the Fathers, tended to give more value in the worship service to the letter and not the spirit of Sacred *Scripture (Lk 12:35). The clergy had to distinguish itself from the people "by teaching, not by garment; by way of living, not by dress; by purity of mind and not by purity of external forms of worship" (doctrina, non veste; conversatione, non habitu; mentis puritate, non cultu, Epist. 4,1,2: PL 50,430-431).

The substantial identity in the style between clothes commonly used in civil life (even by the clergy) and the garments reserved for liturgical actions seems, however, to have remained until secular fashion, esp. male, gradually changed, esp. with the impact of the barbarian manners and customs at the time of the invasions; it therefore came about that the old festal garments, then called "vestments," continued to be used by the ministers exclusively in the liturgical celebrations. All of this was because an understandable sense of the sacral inalterability which the traditions and customs tied to religion often take, and (as Theodoret and Augustine have already indirectly testified) for the same refinement with which such garments were often made and which arguably contributed to enhancing the sacredness and thus the very office of the priesthood. In fact, that at the end of the 5th c. there was already an awareness of a distinction between the two ways of dressing is deducible even from some ecclesiastical norms concerning the dress of the clergy even in civil life (see Stat. Eccl. Ant. 25-26: CCL 148,171), making it possible to preserve the ancient vestments. Thus, e.g., can. 5 of the Council of Mâcon (581 or 583) decrees, "Let no cleric presume to put on either worldly garment or shoes except what befits religion" (nullus clericus sagum [a shorter tunic] aut vestimentum vel calceamenta saecularia, nisi quae religionem deceant induere praesumat). Finally, it is important to remember how at the end of the 6th c. (but this must have already occurred earlier) we have indirect information of liturgical garments worn over ordinary clothes (can. 12 *Narbonne of 589).

Likewise for the East, a decree of the so-called Council of *Trullo II (691–692) explicitly prohibits the clergy from putting on unsanctioned garments (can. 27). It is, therefore, possible to conclude, in light of what has been said up to this point, that alongside what had become known as the "liturgical" vestments, the clergy were ordered to wear special clothes even in daily life. The simplicity of such dress was otherwise emphasized by the choice of rather simple material and by the prohibition of using showy colors (can. 1 of the aforementioned Council of Narbonne and can. 16 of the Second Council of *Nicaea of 787). But readers should consult, among other things, the studies written by Retzlaff and Innemée listed in the bibliography.

One should add that the more strictly liturgical vestments, along with the other insignia discussed below, because of a special symbolic meaning assigned to them by ancient (primarily early medieval) spirituality—and often inherent to their ancient use, form and *color—wound up becoming an integral part of the liturgical actio. Already can. 6 of the aforementioned Council of Mâcon (CCL 148A,224) orders, e.g., the archbishop not to celebrate the Mass without the pallium and, later, Amalarius (9th c.), in a more explicit way, would understand the vestments prescribed for the divine office as the exemplum bonae conversationis for the Christian people (Lib. off. II,15). It is certainly, therefore, to the "interpretation" of this symbolism perfectly understood for centuries—as elsewhere evidenced by the special orations that arose gradually during the years and repeated until 1969—that we owe, more or less, the preservation of this dress intact until our very day.

As far as the chronological limits assigned here allow, let us now discuss some of the various Western liturgical vestments, distinguishing them, as is usually done when evaluating them, between undergarments (alb and girdle, amice, cotta and rochet) and outer garments (chasuble, cope, dalmatic and tunic). Here I would include also the treatment of other vestments, classified by some as insignia, together with other specific signs of distinction among the various grades in the ecclesiastical hierarchy which are, therefore, organically a part of the liturgical wardrobe. Finally, the paraments for the Eastern rite (*Greek, *Syriac, *Armenian, *Nestorian-Chaldean and *Coptic) are less numerous than the Latin ones. More precise information, when necessary, will be given under their Western equivalent, although some iconographic references are reserved for the conclusion of this entry.

Alb. Derives from the tunica talaris et manicata camisia of the Romans which, broad and long, covered the entire body from the neck downward. It was also commonly called camisia because of its origin in the (shorter) secular garb, alba on account of its color (white), linea because of its material (linen) and also colobium (cut off), if the sleeves were short or completely missing. From the very beginning of Christianity it received a special meaning of purity and incorruptibility; for this reason it was put on by the faithful immediately after having received baptism (see "white," under *Color, Symbolism and Liturgy). As a special liturgical vestment of priests, it is mentioned in the West (398?) by can. 60 of the so-called IV Council of *Carthage (CCL 148,176), which allowed deacons to use it only tempore oblationis . . . vel lectionis, but also earlier in the East by *Eusebius of Caesarea (HE 10,4,2) with the term ποδήρης and by *John Chrysostom (In Mt. hom. 82,6), who instead calls it χιτωνίσκος. In the Byzantine rite, the στιχάριον, a garment put on by priests and deacons, would correspond to it.

Cingulum. The cingulum (ζώνη) was coupled with the alb. In ancient times it was tied around the waist when shown in public. It seems that Pope *Celestine I already alludes to one of its liturgical uses in the aforementioned letter to the bishops of *Gaul, setting forth again the traditional symbolic interpretation of Lk 12:35 (in lumborum praecinctione castitas). Along the same lines, see Amalarius (Lib. off. II,22,2).

Amice. Corresponds to the humerale or the anagolaium (see ordo Rom. I, 34: ed. Andrieu, II,78). In Greek one finds the terms ἀναβόλαιον, αὐάλαβος. It is a rectangular piece of material placed over the shoulders, before the alb, if done according to the Roman custom, and then made to pass under the armpits to tie the garments to the waist and allow for freer movement. At first, the privilege of the bishop of *Rome and his deacons, it extended during the Carolingian age to all clerics. With respect to its origins, various hypotheses have been proposed: some medieval liturgists such as Honorius of Autun (Gemma animae I,201) regarded it as deriving from the Hebrew ephod; during the modern era, it has been affirmed (O. Casel: JLW 1927, 139-141) that it came from the amictus of the Romans and their sacrifices or, more simply, from the focale or sudarium, which in civil life was placed around the neck to protect it from perspiration or the cold (J. Braun, Die lit. Gew., 45-46). More broad and convincing testimonies have been brought forth by Callewaert (pp. 241-248) in favor of a monastic-Egyptian provenance. Amalarius (Lib. off. II,17), looking at the way in which the amice was worn (collum undique cingimus), believed that it symbolized restraint in the use of the tongue (custodia vocis, castigatio vocis). The same was said in Guillaume Durand's Pontifical (I,11,16: ed. Andrieu, 357), when the amice was placed on the head during the ordination of the subdeacon: a custom that can still be found in some ancient monastic orders.

Cotta and rochet. Regarded as modifications of the camisia, these are mentioned here to complete the essential framework of the undergarments, even if of a relatively late use. The cotta, which had broad and long sleeves, derived from the superpelliceum, a broad and comfortable alb used in liturgical functions above the everyday padded garments, esp. in the cold northern countries. Beginning as a choir garment (replacing the camisia among the lower clerics), it was gradually shortened to the knees.

The rochet (rochetum), mentioned for the first time in the Synod of Trier 1238 (Mansi XXIII,478), is distinguished from the cotta by narrow and shorter sleeves. It was worn directly over the cassock and was proper to prelates. It was never regarded as a liturgical vestment. Initially, hanging to the feet, it derived from the camisia or the alba romana, succa or the subta worn by medieval church officials as a daily garment and over which the liturgical alb was then placed.

Chasuble (φελίνιον). The outer garment that the priest uses to celebrate Mass. Historically the planeta or the casula derived from the paenula (φενόλιον), a heavily used overcoat in the Greco-Roman world until the 4th–5th c., designed primarily to protect the wearer from the rain or the cold or for traveling. It was a type of circular cloak into which the head was inserted through an opening from which a hood (cucullus) often hung. Having fallen into disuse in the civil realm, it remained in use among the clergy both in daily life and in the liturgical office. It seems initially to have appeared in this latter use under the name of amphibalus (see Sulp. Sev., Dial. I(II), 1,5ff.: CSEL 1,181).

The use of the chasuble, before the spread of the cope, does not seem to have been exclusively reserved for the Mass, and at Rome it was put on, although for different functions, by all the clerics; in the Gallican liturgy, however, its use was most likely restricted to bishops and priests (see Ps.-Germ. Par., Exp. brevis ant. lit. gall. II: PL 72,97). Already the object for some time of various decorative motifs and representations (generally Christ and the Virgin or the patron saint), which made it increasingly heavy, the planeta underwent various transformations that gradually shortened it, first only on the front side, then along the arms to become, from the 14th–15th c. until almost our own day, a type of scapular. In the Eastern rite, it has generally preserved the ancient form.

For Amalarius (Lib. off. II,19,2 and 26,2) the casula refers to the opera corporis pia (fames, sitis, vigiliae, nuditas, etc.), which was proper to each member of the clergy. For other medieval authors such as Rupert of Deutz (De div. off. I, 22), it represented, instead, Christ's vestment, that is, the church.

Cope. According to J. Wilpert (I,84), it drew its origins, not so much from the paenula itself, as from the lengthening of the lacerna (a short summer cloak, open in front, lighter and more comfortable than the paenula) or from the byrrhus (see Aug., Serm. 356,13), with the hood, heavier and well-suited for winter. According to other scholars (see Callewaert, 227-228), it instead derived from the clerical and monastic capa or cappa from the 8th–9th c., worn primarily in choir when one was assisting at the lower functions or taking part in the processions. Over time, the hood was reduced to a type of shield (clipeus) laid out on the shoulders.

The cope seems to have been unknown until the 9th c. (Amalarius, in fact, does not mention it in his list of liturgical vestments); for one of its first symbolic meanings (= sancta conversatio), one must consult the work of Honorius of Autun (Gemma animae I,227).

Dalmatic and tunic. The dalmatic was a sort of cassock, with shorter and disproportionately broader sleeves, decorated with two purple perpendicular clavi. In ancient times, it was used as an outer garment by senators and noteworthy individuals. It came to make up part of the paraments that were proper to the pope, and subsequently it was a distinctive honorary garment granted by the Roman pontiff to his deacons, perhaps starting from the 4th c. (LP I,171). Gradually an object of privilege for the deacons of various churches, it began around the 9th c. to be worn by presbyters under the chasuble (see Walafrid Strabo, De reb. eccl. 24). It is certain, however, that in the West from the 9th c. onward the dalmatic was the outer liturgical garment of the deacon, although bishops and presbyters continued to wear it under the chasuble, adjusting it thereafter to the various colors of the chasuble.

In the investigation into the symbolic meaning of this vestment, Amalarius saw in the white dalmatic, which was intrinsic to the ministry of the deacon, the application of the biblical passage Jas 1:27, that is, religio sancta et immaculata and the purity in which those devoted to the cura proximorum are preserved (Lib. off. II,21 and 26,2).

One should regard the σάκκος as a type of dalmatic, a vestment used in the Greek rite. From a certain era onward, the bishops used this vestment to distinguish themselves from priests, to whom was reserved the φελόνιον.

The tunicella is the subdeacon's dalmatica minor or the tunica stricta. In its original form, it was without clavi, shorter and narrower, with long and cramped sleeves. Likewise remembered as a pontifical garment—one should interpret the Ordo Romanus I, n. 34 in this way, which speaks of the two dalmatics—it was the subdiaconal tunic already in the 6th c., but soon after was abolished by *Gregory the Great (Reg. Epist. IX,12: PL 77,956); the subdeacons, therefore, until the 9th c. put on the chasuble as a liturgical outer garment.

Both the dalmatic and the tunic, given their original white color, were always regarded as clothes of delight and, therefore, fitting for the liturgical days of joy and feast, but were prohibited during Advent and Lent, the exception being the Gaudete and Laetare Sundays.

It is fitting to consider now some other garments generally classified as distinct insignia of various levels of the ecclesiastical hierarchy. One of the first references to some of these is found in the writings of *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. XXIV,783ff.: CSEL 30,232-233).

Maniple. Subdiaconal insignia that derives from a type of cloth from a ceremony (mappa) that was very much in use at Rome. In the Roman rite it was more correctly registered under the term mappula; its equivalent in the Greek rite was enchirion, which in a way similar to the epigonation (a rigid rhomboid decoration that hung from the belt) was worn on the right-hand side and only by the bishop. The Liber pontificalis* probably provides information on this parament first in the life of Pope *Sylvester (314–335), and then in that of Pope *Zosimus (417–418), when it speaks of a pallium linostinum that the deacons wore on the left-hand side (I,171.223). However, it did not remain for long as the prerogative of deacons alone.

Amalarius, who calls the maniple sudarium, discerns in it the "godly and worldly thoughts by which we wipe off the troubles of the soul from the weakness of the body" (piae et mundae cogitationes, quibus detergimus molestias animi ex infirmitate corporis—Lib. off. II,21,2). The 13th-c. Roman Pontifical interprets it, however, as the fruit of good works (IX,6: ed. Andrieu, p. 336).

The epimanikia (cuffs) which the Easterners wore at the end of each arm of the tunic resemble more the sleeves of a cotta.

Stole. According to Dix (p. 404), the stole is perhaps the most ancient insignia. It is similar to the maniple and is a parament specific to the deacon, worn by him as in the manner of a shoulder strap; as worn by bishops and presbyters, however, it rests on the nape, with the ends hanging down in the front. The latter group, if dressed in a camisia, put it on crossed over the chest (can. 4 Braga from 675). The term stola spread greatly around the 9th c., although its original name was orarium (ὠράριον, ἐπιτραχίλιον), probably a sort of wrap around the mouth to protect it from the wind or something else (see Pincherle, 55) but which may have already become in civil life a distinctive sign of an office or dignity, if it is true that the Council of Laodicea (end of 4th c.?)* sought to prohibit the use of the orarium by subdeacons, lectors and cantors (can[s]. 22 and 23).

For Amalarius it is a sign that indicates humility, a virtue necessary for the deacon to complete the duties proper to his office; it represents, that is, the yoke of Christ, the gospel, onus leve ac suave (Lib. off. II,20 and 26,2).

In the East ὀθόνη is the term used by *Isidore of Pelusium; it seems to indicate the stole (Epist. 1,136). In describing the office of the deacon, here too the reminder is of the Lord's humility. The Greek ἐπιτραχήλιον, however, differs from the Western stole in that it has an opening through which the head passes and comes almost to the feet.

Pallium. Liturgical insignia reserved for the pope and the metropolitan *archbishops. It is made by a strip that circles like a ring around the neck, from which two short bands of equal size hung in front and in back. The use of the pallium in the Western church dates back to the 5th c. and probably derives from another liturgical insignia, the ὠμοφόριον already widespread around 400 among the bishops of the East. The once popular thesis promulgated by Th. Klauser (Der Ursprung . . . , 17-19.25 and nos. 23-36) that maintained that the pallium was derived from a secular vestment, a privilege of the dignitaries of the Byzantine court then extended to the episcopal authorities, today meets some reservations (Marinone, 95-96). It is certain, however, that at the beginning of the 5th c. Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. 1,136) developed its symbolic meaning and saw in it a representation of the spiritual power and the pastoral care that was proper to the bishop. In the West, the pallium, initially adopted as an exclusively papal insignia, starting from the 6th c. was a privilege that extended to the metropolitans and also some bishops.

Besides the rationale (superhumerale), a decorative collar with two appendages before and two worn over the chasuble as a sign of distinction by some bishops of Germany, France and Poland, one must keep in mind at this point some pontifical insignia: the miter, the pastoral staff, the ring, the pectoral cross, and other accessories such as gloves and shoes.

Miter (κάθαρις, cidaris for Jerome, In Zach. 1,3,1/5: CCL 76 A, 771): an ornamental hat, signifying the bishops' authority in specific ceremonies. Its origin as a liturgical insignia is uncertain. Parallels can be found in the infula or the miter (μίτρα) of the *pagan priests (see Virg., Aen. II,430; IX,616; X,538) or in the headgear of the Jewish priests (Ex 28:4, 40; 29:9; 39:28; Lev 8:9, 13). In the Christian world one finds the miter more often to indicate the headgear of consecrated virgins. This is the case in the writings of *Optatus of Milevis (De schism. Don. II,19). Jerome would subsequently speak about this (see also Ep. 64,3, 13, 18) and *Isidore of Seville (Orig. XIX, 31,4), distinguishing it from the pileus, which is proper to men. The ancient Mozarabic liturgy (Lib. ord. 23: ed. Férotin, ch[s]. 66-67) knew of the impositio of a religiosa mitra during the consecration of an *abbess. The evolution of this type of headgear as a liturgical emblem seems, however, to have occurred around the 9th c., and probably once, analogously for what occurred to other items of clothing, the liturgical mitra derived from the headgear, camelaucium (καμελαύκιον), which was very often used in ordinary life, primarily in the East, by the emperors and high officials. For the 8th c., the Liber pontificalis (I,390), in fact, provides information on a camelaucium used by the pope during solemn occasions.

Although in the West one finds a primitive wedge-shaped form, in the Eastern rite it assumed that of a crown (surmounted later by a cross) which, according to Dix (p. 407), seems to have had originated in the Persian turban.

The papal tiara (LP II,296,22) also seems to derive from the camelaucium. The Ordo Romanus XXXVI,55 perhaps alludes to it at the end of the 9th c., when it speaks of a regnum, in the form of a helmet of white cloth, which was placed on the head of the newly elected pope. It began to become differentiated from the miter probably when, with the army of the temporal papal power, a crown was added to it, gradually becoming three crowns (triregnum) in the 14th c.

Pastoral staff (baculus, ferula, virga, cambuta). Already designated by Pope *Celestine I (Epist. 4,1,2) as the symbol of regimen pastorale, can. 28 of the Synod of *Toledo of 633, the Liber Ordinum, 19 (ed. Férotin, cc. 59-60) and a 7th-c. penitential written by Theodore of Canterbury (PL 99,928-929) still refer to the pastoral staff with this name with respect to the consecration of an abbot. P. Radó (II,1468) believes that there was a probable Eastern derivation of the liturgical use of the episcopal staff (ῥάβδος, βακτηρία).

With respect to its symbolic meaning, Isidore (De eccl. off. II,5,12) saw represented in it the episcopal authority and office. As a liturgical emblem, however, it did not enjoy a universal dissemination and, esp. at *Rome, it did not come into use until very late (Dix, 412 and n. 3).

Ring. Augustine seems to refer to an episcopal ring (Epist. 59[217],2: PL 33, 227). As an emblem of the bishop, however, it was mentioned for the first time in can. 28 of the IV Council of Toledo (633) at one with Isidore (De eccl. off. II,5,12) who explicitly represents it as a signum pontificalis honoris, vel signaculum secretorum. The use of the ring was first reserved for bishops, then passed on to the abbots. The so-called annulus piscatoris (fisherman's ring), however, that was used by the pope to seal the breves does not seem to have appeared until later (13th c.).

Pectoral cross (σταυρός). Decorated often with precious stones and with a relic inside, the pectoral cross was often worn dangling from the neck, primarily by bishops as a truly distinctive sign of their office. The first examples are rather late, and the first to speak about it was Pope Innocent III (De sacro alt. myst. I,53). It is only mentioned here because it has been presumed that one of its derivations was from the φυλακτήρια (as well as from the ἐγκόλπια), which was worn in ancient times by Christians on the chest (see Jerome, In Matth. IV,23,5) and which in different ways enclosed relics, sacred objects or even sayings from the gospels.

Gloves (chirothecae, χειροθήκη). Scholars likewise do not know exactly when these began to be used in the liturgy; it has been suspected by some that this occurred as early as the 6th c. (DACL 6,624-627), but it most certainly can be traced, according to the witness of some inventories, to the 9th c. The use of gloves properly speaking perhaps remained unknown in the East; in practice, however, they were replaced, as was shown, by the ἐπιμανίκια (embroidered cuffs).

Shoes. Shoes consisted of an external part, the sandal (campagus), and an inner part, the sock (udo, caliga). Already used by the upper classes, they must have been a liturgical emblem. Gregory the Great, e.g., speaks of them in the letter he sent to Bishop *John of Syracuse (Epist. VIII,27). At that time it was reserved for the popes and Roman deacons. They were regarded by Amalarius (Lib. off. II,25,1ff.) as a symbol of preaching.

Finally, for the sake of completeness, it should be remembered that among the papal paraments were included the fada (a broad petticoat that dragged on the ground and was buckled at the hips), the succinctorium (worn tied to the right of the belt) and the fano, an oval-shaped garment worn on the arm over the chasuble and often confused with the amice and the maniple, which were likewise called fano, phano, as occurred with the velum (see Radó II,1459-1460), upon which the celebrant offered the eucharistic bread. The aforementioned papal emblems were generally not mentioned during the Middle Ages.

With respect to the most ancient iconographic documentation, one should just note the most revealing examples (other information can be found in the bibliography). In the mosaic of S. Agnese Extra Muros at Rome (7th c.), one of the two popes is wearing the white tunic and, over it, a chasuble and pallium. St. Sixtus and St. Optatus, in the fresco of the crypt of Pope *Cornelius (6th–7th c.), in the area of the catacomb of St. *Callistus, also wore an ample chasuble on which the pallium stands out. Pope *Sylvester is also represented dressed in papal clothes in the mosaic of S. Martino ai Monti (5th c.) at Rome. In the fresco of the crypt of the "Velatio" (end of the 3rd c.), in the Roman cemetery of Priscilla, one can decipher in the left group a representation of a bishop with his deacon. The question remains, however, very controversial (see C. Carletti: VetChr 9 [1972] 124-126). In the mosaics of the basilica of S. Vitale at Ravenna (6th c.), Ecclesius and Maximian seem to be wearing a stole rather than a pallium. Examples then of the monastic garb (8th c.) are revealed in the frescoes of the Roman monastery of St. Sabas and in the oratory connected to the basilica of S. Ermete on the Salaria Vetus. Among the numerous examples of encolpia, or pectoral crosses, one should note the beautiful example in the Monza cathedral sent by *Gregory the Great to Queen *Theodelinda.

In addition to consulting the various entries found in the EC, DCA (1880; repr. 1968) and in the ODC ([3]2005) and the respective entries the most recent citations, one should consult also: LMA 5 (1991) 1197-1204; DSp 16 (1994) 511-516; DIP 9 (1997) 1951-1959; Cath 15 (2000) 954-964; TRE 13, 159-167; ODB 2, 1240; Coptic Enc. 5, 1475-1479; RBK 5, 741-775; EAM 1, 39-48; for the widest treatments on the topic, the following two studies remain very useful: J. Braun, Die liturgische Gewandung im Occident und Orient nach Ursprung und Entwicklung, Verwendung und Symbolik, Freiburg i.B. 1907; and Die liturgische Paramente in Gegenwart und Vergangenheit, Freiburg i.B. [2]1924, revision of his Handbuch der Paramentik, for which there is an Italian version, edited by G. Alliod (I Paramenti sacri. Loro uso, storia e simbolismo, Turin 1914). Certainly more rigorous, however, are the contributions offered by P. Batiffol and C. Cecchelli (see below). One should also note, moreover, for some historical notes: G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy, London [2]1945 (1975), 350, 398-416; P. Radó, Enchiridion Liturgicum II, Rome 1961, 1443-1479; P. Borella, Il rito ambrosiano, Brescia 1964, 442-445; M. Righetti, Manuale di Storia Liturgica, Milan [3]1964, 584-642; W.J. Grisbrooke, Vestments, in Ch. Jones - G. Wainwright - E. Yarnold (eds.), The Study of Liturgy, London 1978, 488-492, although, for the more specific aspects, see: L. Eisenhofer, Das bischöfliche Rationale. Seine Entstehung und Entwicklung, Munich 1904; C. Callewaert, Sacris Erudiri. Fragmenta liturgica collecta . . . , Steenbrugge 1940, 211-250; P. Salmon, Étude sur les insignes du pontife dans le rite romain, Rome 1955; P. Salmon, La "ferula," bâton pastoral de l'Évêque de Rome: RSR 30 (1956) 313-327; P. Salmon, Aux origines de la Crosse des Évêques, in Mélanges M. Andrieu, Strasbourg 1957, 373-383; P. Salmon, Mitra und Stab. Die Pontifikalinsignien im römischen Ritus, Mainz 1960; Th. Klauser, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Insignien und Ehrenrechte, in JbAC Erg. 3, Münster W. 1974, 195-211 (art. from 1949); B. Sirch, Der Ursprung der bischöflichen Mitra und päpstlichen Tiara, St. Ottilien 1975; L. Trichet, Le costume du clergé, Paris 1986. For the Eastern and Byzantine liturgy, in addition to E. Trenkle, Liturgische Geräte und Gewänder der Ostkirche, Munich 1962, and A. Papas, Bibliografia sulle vesti religiose e liturgiche del rito bizantino: Θεολογία 52 (1981) 754-778 (written in Greek); for a specific bibliography on various rites and for the terminological similarities of individual garments, see J. Assfalg - P. Krüger, Kleines Wörterbuch des Christlichen Orients, Wiesbaden 1975, s.v. Liturgische Gewänder. Useful, for the individuation of symbolic and eucological aspects, see R. Bornert, Les Commentaires Byzantins de la Divine Liturgie du VII[e] au XV[e] siècle, Paris 1966.

On the correct meaning of some terms, the following works, among others, have provided an in-depth treatment: S. Bertina, Ὀθόνια ex papyrorum testimoniis linteamenta: Studia papyrologica 4 (1965) 27-38; A. Pincherle, Orarium e Sudarium: RSLR 9 (1973) 52-56; G.J.M. Bartelink, Φυλακτήριον*-phylacterium*: Mélanges Chr. Mohrmann, Utrecht-Amsterdam 1973, 25-69. For research on the iconographic witnesses, see in addition to G. Wilpert, Le pitture delle catacombe romane, Rome 1903, the contribution offered by P. Batiffol, Le costume liturgique romain: Études de Liturgie et d'Archéologie chrétienne, Paris 1919, 30-83, that of C. Cecchelli, La vita di Roma nel Medio Evo, I,2: Le arti minori e il costume, Rome 1960, 755-840 and esp. 933-1011, and for a more particular aspect, that of M. Marinone, Un'antica testimonianza iconografica sull'uso della stola diaconale in Occidente: EphLit 90 (1976) 88-99.

For the East, see N. Thierry, Le costume épiscopal byzantin du IX[e] au XIII[e] s. d'après les peintures datées (miniatures, fresques): REByz 24 (1966) 308-315; id., Les plus anciennes représentations cappadociennes du costume épiscopal byzantin: REByz 34 (1976) 325-331; C. Walter, Art and Ritual of the Byzantine Church, London 1982; A. Papas, Die Ideen des 7. Ökumenischen Konzils über die kirchliche Kunst und die Paramentenpracht des Byzantinischen Ritus: AHC 20 (1988) 370-378; K.C. Innemée, Ecclesiastical Dress in the Medieval Near East, Leiden 1992. Finally, on the religious garment in general, s.v. Abito religioso and Costume dei monaci e dei religiosi: DIP I (1974), 50-79 and III (1976), 204-249; M. Augé, L'abito religioso, Rome 1977; G. Retzlaff, Die äussere Erscheinung des Geistlichen im Altag: Intern. kirchliche Zeit. 69 (1979) 46-57, 88-115, 129-208; M. Boulding, Background to a Theology of the Monastic Habit: The Downside Review 98 (1980) 110-123; Liturgia, ed. D. Sartore - A.M. Triacca - C. Cibien, Cinisello Balsamo 2001, 141-149; S. Pricoco, Il monachesimo, Bari 2003, 120-126.

V. Pavan

VICTOR (6th c.). African Catholic bishop of an unknown see, during the reign of the *Vandal Thrasamund (d. 523), who was sent into exile to *Sardinia, just as many other proponents among the Catholic clergy were (508/509). Over the course of his episcopate, he became interested in the theological questions pertaining to the *Acacian *schism, and between 519 and 523, he signed the letters written by *Fulgentius of Ruspe to the *Scythian monks (Ep. 17: CCL 91A,563-615) and the *archimandrite John of Constantinople (Ep. 15: CCL 91A,447-457).

PCBE 1, 1183; Y. Modéran, La chronologie de la vie de saint Fulgence et ses incidences sur l'histoire de l'Afrique vandale: MEFRA 105 (1993) 135-188.

P. Marone

VICTOR (Vincent), Donatist. A proponent of the Rogatist *Donatist movement who converted to Catholicism, identified by some scholars as the similarly named Catholic bishop *Victor of Cartenna (De Veer). Around 418 Victor composed a work in two books taking as his point of departure one of *Augustine's writings (Ep. 190: CSEL 57,137-162), which he had found in *Mauritania Caesarea in the home of a Spanish priest by the name of Peter. This work, which must have surely been dedicated to the priest Peter, has been lost, but on the basis of books 3 and 4 of the Augustine's De natura et origine animae (CSEL 60,359-419), which refutes it, one can say with certainty that it treated the question of the soul's origin and that in a not-so-orthodox manner it came, e.g., to maintain that souls were corporeal, preexistent and identifiable with God.

Augustine, Retractationes II, 56: CCL 57, 135; PCBE I, 1173-1175; A. De Veer, BA 22, 763-764; A. Zumkeller, anima: et eius origine (De): Augustinus-Lexikon, I, 1986-94, 340-350.

P. Marone

VICTOR I, pope (189?–198?). With Victor the *papacy entered a new phase of its history. For the first time, the interventions of the Roman community became concretized in the person of its bishop and this in a matter of universal discipline, namely that of the celebration of *Easter (Eus., HE 5,23-24). With the exception of the church of *Ephesus under *Polycrates (Eus., HE 5,24,1-8), all the communities shared the Roman tradition of celebrating the Easter feast on Sunday, instead of 14 Nisan, although not all—e.g., *Irenaeus of Lyons (Eus., HE 5,24,1-18)—approved of the authoritarian procedures employed by the Roman bishop. Victor showed himself no less decisive in the face of adoptionism, excommunicating *Theodotus the Elder (the Tanner). Victor's writings have not been preserved. They are only mentioned by *Eusebius (HE 5,28,6.9) and *Jerome (Vir. ill. 34).

BS 12, 1281-1285; H. von Campenhausen, Ostertermin oder Osterfasten. Zum Verständnis des Irenäusbriefes an Viktor: VChr 28 (1974) 114-138; J.A. Fischer, Synoden im Osterfeststreit: AHC 8 (1976) 15-39; R. Cantalamessa, La Pasqua nella Chiesa antica, Turin 1978 (Ger. trans. Bern 1981); P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen, Tübingen [2]1989, 323-341; E. dal Covolo, Letteratura cristiana: RSLR 29 (1991) 213-221; LTK[3] 10 767; LACL (2002) 717 (bibl.); TRE 25, 93-97.

B. Studer

VICTOR of Antioch. Presbyter (around 500), is known, mistakenly, as the author of a commentary on the gospel of Mark; in reality, the text attributed to him is part of a catena whose chief sources are the homilies on *Matthew by *John Chrysostom, *Origen, *Cyril of Alexandria, *Titus of Bostra and *Theodore of Heraclea. Scholars must first clarify, however, whether the author of this compilation, who evidently uses the catena on Matthew in its primitive form, is the same author of the scholia* on the OT and NT texts which, in different catenae manuscripts, go under the name of Victor. We have no information on the life of this individual.

CPG III, 6529; C.F. Matthaei, Βίκτωρος πρεσβυτέρου Ἀντιοχείας κατ' ἄλλων τινῶν ἁγίων πατέρων ἐξήγησις εἰς τὸ κατὰ Μάρκον ἅγιον εὐαγγέλιον, 2 vols., Moscow 1775; Commentaries on Luke in A. Mai, Scriptorum veterum nova collectio e Vaticanis codicibus edita, 9, Rome 1837, 633-693. Fragments of his exegesis on Jeremiah and Jeremiah's Lamentations are found in M. Ghislerius, In Ieremiam Prophetam Commentarii, Leiden 1623; the individual scholia on the book of Deuteronomy, the books of the Judges and Kings, as well as the book of Daniel, are of little importance. PWK 8 A, 2066; LTK[3] 10, 791; EC 12, 1540; Altaner, Patrologia, 479; Beck 420-421; M. Cahill, The Identification of the First Markan Commentary: RBi 1001 (1994) 258-268; T. Fuhrer, Victor von Antiochien: LACL, 624.

J. Irmscher

VICTOR of Capua (d. 554). Victor, who died on 2 April 554, according to a funerary inscription, was bishop of *Capua for 13 years and 34 days (CIL X,4503). He was a person of learning exemplified by his knowledge of Greek, mathematics, astronomy and music, and he was well-versed in theology and exegesis as well. The Venerable *Bede writes concerning him that he was a vir doctissimus et sanctissimus (De rat. temp. 51: PL 90,502B). Victor was asked for his opinion on the Easter *computus, and he preferred that of the Alexandrians (E. Caspar, Geschichte des Papsttums, Tübingen 2, 307-308); he composed a Libellus de cyclo paschali on this matter (PL 68,1097-1098; PLS 4,1194-1195), a text used by Bede and also mentioned by Adonis (PL 123,108), only fragments of which have been preserved, in which one finds a discussion on this matter offered by *Victorius of Aquitaine. Other fragments are found in the writings of *John the Deacon (CPL 951) and have been collected by Pitra (Spicilegium Sol. 1,296-301).

Pitra published a long fragment of another work by Bishop Victor (the six fragments in reality constitute one sole passage: Spicilegium Sol. I,287-289; PLS 4,1194-1196), that is, the Reticulus (de Arca Noe), which in the catena*, still unedited, by *Paul the Deacon is referred to as the Libellus. In this text, taking into consideration the dimensions of Noah's ark, Victor speculates on the numbers and their symbolic meaning, connecting them to Christ along the lines of preceding tradition, esp. *Augustine; he practiced arithmological/christological exegesis. Alcuin cites a passage from one of Victor's otherwise unknown works, the Liber sponsorum (responsorum) (part of which was written by Pelagius), and another by his supposed version of a work by *Cyril of Alexandria (PLS 4,1191). He certainly translated from the Greek: Pitra published Origenian passages translated from some commentaries on *Genesis and *Exodus, and other passages translated from the Greek (Pitra I,267-268; PLS 4,1191-1193). A fragment from another one of his lost works has been preserved: Capitula de resurrectione Domini (PLS 4,1196-1197). Paul the Deacon (see *John III, pope) provides, in the catena, other fragments from the writings of Victor of Capua (PLS 4,1197-1199).

Victor's most important work was the revision of the Diatessaron*, *Tatian's work, which he called the Diapente, the continuous narration of the four gospels, and normalizes it on the basis of the Vulgate text (Victor says of this: unum ex quatuor evangelium compositum). In the Praefatio in evangelicas harmonias Ammonii, he reveals the state of his soul when faced with an unusual text and its concerns. He says that by chance that text had come into his hands, but without the author's name; *Eusebius of Caesarea came to know that it could be the work of Tatian, a heretic; for this reason he takes a precautious and circumspect stance toward the orthodoxy of the work; moreover, Victor added to it the canons of Ammonius/Eusebius, that is, the references to the four gospels, before the text and wrote the reference numbers in the margin in such a way that the reader (studiosus lector) could check the authenticity and precision of the gospel text cited. The Codex Fuldensis contains the entire NT, lists of liturgical readings of the Pauline epistles for the different liturgical feasts and also other texts, among which was the apocryphal *Epistle to the Laodiceans. The transcription and revision of the work were completed in the spring of 546, and the work was revisited in 547: two signatures guarantee the dates. The manuscript, perhaps belonging to St. Boniface (d. 754), is preserved at Fulda (Codex Fuldensis) and is an exceptional testimony to the Vulgate. The work edited by Victor was used by translators in the ancient German. Pitra also published (Spicilegium Sol. 1,265-277) the Scholia Veterum Patrum (*Polycarp, but in actuality only *Pacatus, *Origen, *Basil, *Didymus and *Severian), which were passed down by Victor.

Morin attributes to him the letter (PL 30,501-504; see RBen 7 [1890] 416-423) addressed to Constantius of Aquino (bishop between the years 525/573). The author refers to the lectionary as Comes and distinguishes its two types: one destined for liturgical use and the other for instruction. Because Victor in the Codex Fuldensis had inserted a list of readings, it is entirely likely that he was able to compose a lectionary, concerning which the letter speaks. The lectionary, however, was revised or rather changed in subsequent times, but the accompanying explanatory letter had a separate fate.

CPL 953a-956; R. Gryson, Répertoire général des auteurs ecclés. latins de l'antiquité et du Haut Moyen Âge, Freiburg 2007, 810; Stegmüller 1279, Suppl. 8286, 2-5; CPPM 2A, 2960/2960c; PL 68, 251-252 (Praefatio in evangelicas armonias); PL 90, 502; 68, 1097 (fragment from the Easter cycle); PLS 4, 1183-1199 (the fragments of all the writings); DCB 4, 1009-1010; DTC 15, 2874-2876; BS 12, 1253-1255; E. Ranke, Codex Fuldensis, Marburg and Leipziag 1868; Th. Zahn, Geschichte des N.T. Kanons, II,1, Erlangen-Leipzig 1890, 574ff.; L. de Bruyne, La préface du Diatessaron latin avant Victor de Capoue: RBen 49 (1927) 5-11; P. McGurk, The Canon Tables in the Book of Lindisfarne and the Codex Fuldensis of Victor of Capua: JTS 6 (1955) 192-198; F. Bolgiani, Vittore di Capua e il Diatessaron: Memorie Accad. Sc. Torino, Cl. Sc. Mor. 4a,2, Turin 1962 (foundational); B. Fischer, Bibelausgaben des frühen Mittelalters, in La Bibbia nell'Alto Medioevo, Settimane del Centro Italiano di studi sull'Alto Medioevo, X, Spoleto 1963, 519-600 (Victor: 545-555); T. Baarda, Essays on the Diatessaron, Kampen 1994; W.L. Petersen, Tatian's Diatessaron: Its Creation, Dissemination, Significance and History in Scholarship, Leiden 1994; U.B. Schmid, In Search of Tatian's Diatessaron in the West: VChr 57 (2003) 176-199.

A. Di Berardino

VICTOR of Cartenna. African bishop and writer of the 5th c., mentioned only by *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 77), who attributes to him the lost treatise Adversus Arianos dedicated to *Genseric (428–477); a book on public *penance that perhaps is to be identified with the Ps.-Ambrosian De paenitentia, which has come down to us in two codices under the name of Victor of Tunnuna; a consolatory work, now lost, dedicated to a certain Basil for the death of his son (the attempt to identify this work with the De consolatione in adversis attributed to *Basil of Caesarea is less likely: PG 31,1687-1704); and numerous homilies collected in books by the bishop's brother, which are likewise lost. The De paenitentia is an exhortation that emphasized the function of repentance for the remission of sins and the confidence inspired by divine mercy, which is to forgive even the person who has fallen into sin again (there is a discussion whether the treatise was referring only to divine forgiveness or also to the repetition of confession before a bishop or a priest).

CPL 854: PL 17, 971-1004 (1059-1094); DTC 15, 2876-2877; Moricca III, 1, 746-747; PCBE 1, 1175; F. Görres, Der echte und falsche Victor von Cartenna: ZWTh 49 (1906) 484-494; B. Poschmann, Die abendländische Kirchenbuße im Ausgang des christlichen Altertums, Munich 1928, 166-171; J.T. Cummings, Jubilation or Ululation? Patristic Testimony for the Old Latin, Especially Ps. 88,16: SP 18,1 (1985) 311-312; Patrologia 4, 21-23; LTK[3] 10, 764; BBKL 12, 1343-1344.

F. Scorza Barcellona

VICTOR of Marseille (d. 287/292). At *Marseille around 416 *John Cassian built two *monasteries outside the city in a cemeterial area: one for women (Holy Savior) and the other for men (St. Peter). The latter would become the monastery of St. Victor in memory of the martyr buried onsite. According to the 5th-6th-c. testimonies, which are greatly embellished, Victor was a soldier who refused to worship the *pagan divinities. Thrown into prison, he became a convert to Christianity. After various tortures, he and other Christians were decapitated and thrown into the sea, but they were discovered by some Christians, who buried them in the pagan cemetery near the port. Recent digs carried out in the crypt of the monastery of St. Victor revealed the existence of a martyrial Christian cult in a pagan cemetery. The archaeological testimonies confirm later traditions. Scholars have discussed whether Victor is the proper name of a martyr or rather a personalization of the Christian victory over paganism, or even the use of a known name for anonymous deceased and venerated persons onsite. The name Victor at that time was very widespread. The first testimony of a basilica dedicated to St. Victor dates to the end of the 6th c. His feast day is 21 July.

BHL 8569-8572; AASS Iulii 5, 135-142; BS 12, 1261-1273; Cath 13, 605-606; BBKL 21, 1510-1511; Provinces ecclésiastiques de Vienne et d'Arles, ed. N. Gauthier - J.Ch. Picard, Paris 1986, 129-130; J.-C. Moulinier, Saint Victor de Marseille: les récits de sa passion, Vatican City [2]1995; Y. Mafart, L'Abbaye Saint-Victor de Marseille: étude anthropologique de la nécropole des Ve et VIe siècles, Paris 1980; J.-C. Moulinier, Autour de la tombe de saint Victor de Marseille: textes et monuments commémoratifs d'un martyre, Marseille 2000; M. Fixot - J.-P. Pellettier, Saint-Victor de Marseille, de la basilique paléochrétienne à l'abbatiale médiévale, Marseille 2004.

A. Di Berardino

VICTOR of Tunnuna (d. after 566). African bishop of the 6th c. (the name of his see is uncertain in the manuscript tradition of his work just as in *Isidore of Seville [Vir. ill. 49.50 and Chron. 1]). He was opposed to the condemnation of the *Three Chapters, and for this reason around 555 he was sent into exile in *Egypt by *Justinian. Called back in 564–565 to *Constantinople so that he might sign the condemnation, he held to his convictions and for this reason was locked in a *monastery of that city, where he died shortly after 566. He was the author of a Chronicle that began from the creation of the world and ended with the first year of the emperor Justinian (566). Only the part pertaining to the years 444–566 remains. The work is interesting for the religious history of the 5th–6th c. and for the information on the author's personal experiences. Until the year 443, Victor's Chronicle must have appealed to *Prosper of Aquitaine's Chronicle, as is acknowledged at the beginning of a long fragment that has survived.

CPL 2260: PL 68, 941-962; Th. Mommsen, Chronica minora 2 (MGH, Auct. ant. 11), Berlin 1894, 163-206; CCL 173A (ed. C. Cardelle de Hartmann, 2001). Chronica: Chiesa e impero nell'età di Giustiniano, ed. A. Placanica, Impruneta 1997; DTC 15, 2880-2881; EC 12, 1543; Moricca III, 2, 1364-1366; J. Fitton, The Death of Theodora: Byzantion 46 (1976) 119; S. Teillet, Des Goths à la nation gothique. Les origines de l'idée de nation en Occident du Ve au VIIe siècle, Paris 1984, 421-427; S. Muhlberger, Prosper's Epitome Chronicon: Was There an Edition of 443?: CPh 81 (1986) 240-244; A. Placanica, Da Cartagine a Bisanzio: per la biografia di Vittore di Tunnuna: VetChr 26 (1989) 327-336; Patrologia 4, 38-40; LTK[3] 10, 770; A. Placanica, De epistola Vigilio supposita animadversiones in Victorem Tunnunensem (Chr.a. 542,1): Latinitas 38 (1990) 25-33; C. Cardelle de Hartmann, Victoris de Tunnuna, Consularia Caesaraugustana: CCL 175/A (2001).

F. Scorza Barcellona

VICTOR of Vita (ca. 429–510/512). Bishop and author of a history on the *Vandal persecution in *Africa at the time of *Genseric and *Huneric. There has been much discussion on the identification of this Victor—author of the Historia, who was called a bishop in the manuscript tradition—with the bishop Victor Vitensis, mentioned in the Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Africae (list of African bishops from the Carthaginian council of 484) in the section reserved for the bishops of *Byzacena (Victor Vitensis non occurrit). This identification conflicts with the information that the author supplies about himself in the Historia, from which it turns out that at the time of the events narrated he was not the bishop of Vita but instead belonged to the Carthaginian clergy (see Hist. II,5; II,18; II,27; II,40; III,49 etc.). That he was not a bishop but a simple priest is evident, moreover, from the way in which he speaks about the bishops, referring to them always in the third person and never including himself in their number (Hist. II,53-55; III,2; III,5) and, from the very fact that he did not undergo with them the exile that followed the failure of the council of 484 (Hist. III, 15ff.). The aforementioned bit of information indicated in the manuscript tradition must not, therefore, be understood in the sense that Victor was the bishop of Vita (episcopus Vitensis) during the persecution, but that Vita was his city of birth (patriae Vitensis), and that he, a priest of *Carthage until the death of Huneric, only subsequently became bishop of Vita or of another see unknown to us. It is difficult to determine the year of Victor's birth. The fact that the events pertaining to the landing of the Vandals (429) and the reign of Genseric (Hist. I) are narrated in more general terms than those pertaining to the reign of Huneric (Hist. II-III), and the fact that for the first books the author seems to be using earlier sources, although for the reign of Huneric he appeals to his own personal testimony, leads one to suspect that in 429 Victor had not yet been born or had just been born. This conjecture is confirmed by the information that when Valerian of Abensa was banished by Genseric (after 455), Victor still did not hold the priestly office (Hist. I,40), which was usually assumed around 30 years of age. The date of his death is also uncertain. According to Chifflet and Liron, Victor was that bishop of Byzacena who in 507 ordained *Fulgentius of Ruspe and shortly thereafter was exiled by Thrasamund to *Sardinia, where he died around 510 or 512.

Victor's work—which in the archetype has the title of Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae temporum Geiserici et Hunerici regis Vandalorum—begins with a prologue (the authenticity and literary unity of which has been wrongly doubted) that is a letter of dedication to an authoritative individual of the church, most likely the bishop of Carthage *Eugenius. The historical narration that follows is subdivided into three books: book 1 contains the events from the reign of Genseric from 429 (the year of the invasion) until 477 (the death of Genseric); book 2 narrates the events of the reign of Huneric from 477 to February 484 (Council of Carthage); to this book is added the Liber fidei catholicae, presented to the *Arians by four delegate bishops, in order to explain the Catholic doctrine, after the failure and suspension of the council of 484, and written, as it seems, by Eugenius with the collaboration of other bishops; book 3 narrates the events from February to the summer of 484 (the last ch., 71, which narrates the death of Huneric is an addition). The work concludes with an invective against the barbarians and a call for help to both God and men (chs. 61-70). The Historia was written at Carthage during the persecution, before the death of Huneric. The author himself provides at the beginning explicit chronological information: "Now [this] is the sixtieth year from that time in which that cruel and savage people of the Vandal nation arrived at the pitiable borders of Africa" (sexagesimus nunc agitur annus ex eo, quo populus ille crudelis ac saevus Vandalicae gentis Africae miserabiles attigit fines, I,1).

The dating of the work therefore depends on the year from which this sexagesimus begins, that is, from 429, the year of the invasion of the Vandals, or from 430, as soon as the occupation was completed, or from 425, the time of the first raid. We would thus have the year 488, 489 or even 484. This last date is most likely, inasmuch as it would also justify the final invocation of aid directed to the Romans, which suggests an untenable situation of extreme danger, which occurred immediately after the failure of the council of February 484.

Victor's Historia is an account of the persecution of the Catholic African church by the Vandal Arians, produced with the passion of a man belonging to the suffering party, and therefore it is not void of sectarianism and partiality. The reason for which this text was written is indicated in the prologue, which was addressed, it seems, to Bishop Eugenius: it offers to the recipient, according to what was requested, an exposition of the deeds that had occurred in Africa after the Vandal invasion, given that the same author knows how to elaborate them suitably, providing literary value to that material that was still unpolished. It is likely that Eugenius, who came to fill the episcopal cathedra of Carthage during the persecution, had asked Victor for an account of the Vandal occupation, to report them in turn to the Roman emperor and to set forth the urgency for immediate assistance. The Historia was, therefore, written in order to inform the Romans beyond the sea, by means of Eugenius, about the dramatic situation in Africa and to request assistance from the Roman emperor. Despite the limits due to the apologetic intent and the partisan passion, and despite some imprecisions and contradictions (which are not such, however, as to compromise the overall reliability of the narrative), and despite the exaggerations, fancies, and the irrational interpretation of the events and, in general, the naive theological interpretation of those events, and even despite the skewed perspective that he mechanically places before the Vandals and the Romans as Arians and Catholics, Victor's work has exceptional historical value, both because it is the sole source for many of the events narrated and because it offers the modern historian important pieces of historical, political, and geographic information, and for the various documents inserted in the narrative, among which the three edicts of Huneric are esp. significant (II,3-4; II,39; III,3-14), that shed light on barbarian-Roman law.

Victor's language, although with certain popularizing tendencies of common parlance, is that of the learned Carthaginian circles of the 5th c., with all the changes that the times and social and religious conditions of Africa and the influence of the biblical and liturgical literature brought to bear on it. The writer, although at times indulging in amplification and prolixity, is an effective storyteller who knows how to intrigue and captivate his readers.

CPL 798ff.; PL 58; MGH, Auct. ant. 3,1, Berlin 1879; CSEL 7, Vienna 1881. Translations: It.: S. Costanza, Rome 1981; Eng.: J. Moorhead, Liverpool 1992.

Studies: A. Schönfelder, De Victori Vitensi episcopo, Breslavia 1899; G. Ghedini, Le clausole ritmiche dell'Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae di Victor de Vita, Milan 1927; G. Capello, Il latino di Vittore di Vita: Atti della XXV riun. della Soc. It. delle Scienze a Tripoli, 25 (1937) 74-108; F. Di Capua, Il ritmo prosaico nelle lettere dei papi e nei documenti della cancelleria romana dal IV al XIV sec., III, Rome 1946, ch. V: Il ritmo prosaico nelle cancellerie dei regni romano-barbarici, 49ff.; Chr. Courtois, Victor de Vita et son oeuvre, Alger 1954; id., Les Vandales et l'Afrique, Paris 1955 (repr. Aalen 1964); D. Romano, Osservazioni sul prologo alla Historia di Vittore Vitense: AAPal ser. IV, 20 (1959-60), I, 19-36 (= Lett. e Storia nell'età tardoromana, Palermo 1979, 155-172); S. Costanza, Uandali-Ariani e Romani Catholici nella Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae di Vittore di Vita: Oikoumene. Studi paleocr. in on. del Conc. Vat. II, Catania 1964, 223-241; S. Costanza, Considerazioni storiografiche nella Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae di Vittore di Vita: BStudLat 6 (1976) 30-36; L. Alfonsi, L'Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae di Vittore Vitense, ovvero il rifiuto di un ipocrita rinunciatorismo velleitario: "Romani" e "barbari": Sicul. Gymn. n.s. 29 (1976) 1-18; A. Roncoroni, Vittore Vitense, Hist. III, 55-60: Sicul. Gymn. n.s. 29 (1976), 387-395; A. Pastorino, Osservazioni sulla "Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae" di Vittore di Vita, in La storiografia eccl. nella tarda antichità, Messina 1980, 45-112; S. Costanza, Vittore di Vita e la "Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae": VetChr 17 (1980) 229-268; R. Pitkäranta, Studien zum Latein des Victor Vitensis, Helsinki 1978 (see the review by S. Costanza: Orpheus 2 [1981] 223-232); Ph. Wynn, Rufinus of Aquileia's Ecclesiastical History and Victor of Vita's History of the Vandal Persecution: Classica et Mediaevalia 41 (1990) 187-198; S. Lancel, Victor de Vita et la Carthage vandale, in L'Africa romana VI/2, 649-661; A. Schwarcz, Bedeutung und Textüberlieferung der Historia persecutionis Africanae provinciae des Victor von Vita, in Historiographie im frühen Mittelalter, ed. A. Scharer - G. Scheibelreiter, Vienna 1994, 115-140; Patrologia IV, 35-38; W.E. Fahey, History, Community, and Suffering in Victor of Vita, in Nova Doctrina Vetusque: Essays on Early Christianity in Honor of Fredric W Schlatter, ed. D. Kries - C. Brown Tkacz, Bern 1999, 225.241; S. Lancel, Victor de Vita, témoin et chroniqueur des années noires de l'Afrique romaine au Ve siècle: CRAI (2000) 1199-1219; V. Aiello, Vittore di Vita e la legislazione vandalica: Atti Acc. Rom. Costant. 15 (2005) 253-283.

S. Costanza

VICTORINUS, poet (5th c.?). Dekkers (CPL 1458-1459) attributes to a Victorinus poeta, who lived perhaps in the 5th c., two short poems: the first, which goes by the name of De Pascha (var.: De cruce or De ligno vitae, which begins: Est locus ex omni medius . . .), wrongly attributed to *Tertullian or *Cyprian, and the other De Iesu Christo Deo et homine, which begins: Verbum Christe Dei, Patris . . . Indeed, this attribution is still disputed, and scholars have even debated the very existence of a poet named Victorinus. According to Roncoroni, it is always risky to attempt to make facile attributions to didactic compositions of the 4th and 5th c., just as to the epic-biblical poems of the same era, which have almost always come down to us as anonymous. In any case, "the attribution to a Victorinus is not documented by the manuscript tradition" (Roncoroni, 387, n. 21).

CPL 1458/1459; CPPM 2, 544; 1624; 1670; De Iesu Christo: PLS 3, 1135-1139; De ligno vitae: CSEL 3, 305-308; A. Roncoroni, Ps. Cipriano. De ligno crucis: RSLR 12 (1976) 380-390; C. Magazzù, Una nota al carme De Iesu Christo Deo et homine, in Hestíasis, Studi offerti a S. Calderone, V, Messina 1988 (1995) 285-293.

L. Dattrino

VICTORINUS of Petovium (Pettau) (d. 304?). We owe primarily to St. *Jerome the little we know about the person and work of Victorinus bishop of Petovium (Vir. ill. 74) in *Pannonia Superior (modern-day Ptuj, in Slovenia), who lived in the 2nd half of the 3rd c. and was *martyred (Vir. ill. 74) during the first years of the *Diocletian persecution, probably in 304. Forerunner of Latin biblical *exegesis, he dedicated the majority of his literary activity to it, as appears from the numerous documents that Jerome attributes to him. According to Jerome, Victorinus offered interpretations for the following books: *Genesis, *Exodus, Leviticus, Isaiah, *Ezekiel, Habakkuk, Ecclesiastes, *Song of Songs and—the only surviving document—the *Apocalypse (Revelation). This list is admittedly incomplete as can be seen from the expression that concludes Jerome's summary of Victorinus's work—et multa alia—and from the fact that Jerome himself mentions elsewhere (Comm. Matth., praef. [CCL 77,5,96] and Transl. Lat. homil. Origenis in Lucam, prol. [PL 26,231]) Victorinus's Commentary on Matthew. To this work perhaps belong the fragments that G. Mercati published from the Ambrosiana MS I 101 sup. with the title Anonymi chiliastae in Matthaeum fragmenta. The attribution to Victorinus would seem to be confirmed by linguistic-stylistic features in addition to those of content: *millenarism, which parallels that of the Commentary on the Apocalypse.

The Commentary on the Apocalypse, aside from what is in the original text, preserved by the 15th-c. MS Ottobonianus Lat. 3288 A, has come down to us in three subsequent recensions. For the first, upon the request of a certain Anatolius, Jerome subjected the text to a radical revision: he inserted additions (whose chief source was detected in *Tyconius's Commentary on the Apocalypse), made deletions and emendations, improved the diction and esp., as an unwavering opponent of millenarism, eliminated all trace of this teaching; in compliance with this last criterion, he replaced the entire conclusion, in which chs. 20 and 21 were explained mostly ad litteram. Of the other two recensions, the first sets forth the reelaboration of Jerome, revamping it at certain points and more extensively citing the text of the *Apocalypse; the other establishes all the preceding redactions, not without bringing emendations and transpositions. In light of the original recension, whose guidance alone is used for reconstructing the original idea of Victorinus on millenarism, one can assert that his adherence to this doctrine is neither complete nor unconditional. According to the traditional schema, his millennium is characterized by the preponderance of material goods. But alongside these, which in Victorinus's thinking are otherwise less crass than in the writings of *Papias or *Nepos or *Irenaeus of Lyons, spiritual goods also coexist: "In this kingdom those who were divested of their goods for the name of the Lord, and those who were killed with all type of iniquity and thrown in prison . . . 'will receive their consolation,' that is, celestial crowns and riches" (CSEL 49,152,16-20). Not very differently from the millenarists, Victorinus provides a fundamentally literal interpretation of Rev 20–21, but—and this is the most characteristic aspect of his millenarian kingdom—he does not hesitate to incorporate in the fabric of his literal commentary some *allegorical explanations: e.g., spiritualizing as much as possible the heavenly Jerusalem, he sees in its "doors of pearls" the "apostles," and in its "stones different by type and color" "human beings and the very precious variety of their faith" (CSEL 49,154,12-14). In Victorinus's exegesis a spiritual disciple of *Origen can be seen; in fact, even though Victorinus distances himself from Origen by adhering to millenarism, which Origen had combated in defense of a spiritual interpretation of those biblical passages that the proponents of the millennium explained in a literal sense, he turns to him when finding allegorical meanings from the context of Rev 20–21, to which the millenarists applied a strictly literal exegesis. Jerome's multiple testimonies concerning Origen's influence become extremely important when he refers specifically to Victorinus's lost works, which the father of the church at this time was still able to read. We learn from Jerome, e.g., that in the sex alae uni et sex alae alteri of Is 6:2 Victorinus saw allegorically the twelve apostles (Epist. 18 A, 6: CSEL 54,82) and in melior est puer pauper et sapiens quam rex senex et stultus from Eccl 4:13 saw, following Origen's path, an allegory of Christ and the devil (Comm. Eccl. 4,13-16: CCL 72, 290). Victorinus's predilection for allegorical-Origenian exegesis and his millenarian tendencies clearly emerge also from the fragment of the Tractatus de fabrica mundi, which is attested to by MS 414 of the 9th-c. Lambethana Bibliotheca Londinensis, a work which could be identified with one of the "numerous others" to which Jerome alluded without providing their titles, and which has been reattributed to Victorinus on the basis of its particular language, style and thought. The author explains the seven days of creation, dwelling with subtle considerations on the number four and, esp., on the virtue of the number seven, its importance in the history of humanity and in the development of the moral life. He also bears witness to his millenarian beliefs when—on the basis of the citation of Ps 89:4 ("For a thousand years in your eyes, O Lord, are as one day" [in oculis tuis, domine, mille anni ut dies una]), which by then had almost become canonical—he places the seven days of creation in relation to the 7,000 years of the duration of the world, and the seventh day of rest with the thousand years of Christ's kingdom, in which the Son of God will reign over the earth in the company of his elect.

Among the works of Victorinus, Jerome also mentions a treatise titled Against All Heresies (Vir. ill. 74), which Harnack identified with the Ps.-Tertullian text bearing the same title (with a quick review of the 32 heresies, from *Dositheus to *Praxeas), attested to in many MSS as an eighth appendix of *Tertullian's De praescriptione haereticorum. But this identification, which over time Harnack maintained with less fervor, would seem to be opposed by considerations of style and chronology.

Jerome's negative judgment on this author, who, though recognizing his compatriot's goodwill and erudition, criticizes him many times for not possessing a full knowledge of Latin or at least of not knowing this language as well as he did Greek (Vir. ill. 74; Comm. Is., prol.: CCL 73,3; Epist. 58,10: CSEL 54,539; Transl. Lat. homil. Origenis in Lucam, prol.: PL 26,231). And in Epist. 70,5 (CSEL 54,707) Jerome does not even acknowledge his erudition but only his eruditionis voluntas.

CPL 79ff.; PL 5, 301-344; CSEL 59 (PLS 1, 103-172); Sur l'Apocalypse, suivi du Fragment chronologique et de La construction du monde: SC 423; from the Commentary on the Apocalypse four redactions are provided.

Studies: A. von Harnack, Geschichte der marcionitischen Kirchen: Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theologie 19 (1875) 11ff.; J. Haussleiter, Die Kommentare des Victorinus, Ticonius und Hieronymus zur Apokalypse: Zeitschr. f. kirchl. Wiss. u. kirchl. Leben 7 (1886) 239ff.; L. Atzberger, Geschichte der christlichen Eschatologie innerhalb der vornicänischen Zeit, Freiburg i.B. 1896, 566-573; G. Mercati, Anonymi chiliastae in Matthaeum fragmenta: RIL, serie II, 31 (1898) 1203-1208 (ST 11, 3-49: with the text of the fragmenta); J. Haussleiter, Beiträge zur Würdigung der Offenbarung des Johannes und ihres ältesten lateinischen Auslegers, Victorinus von Pettau, Greifswald 1901; W. Macholz, Spuren binitarischer Denkweise im Abendland seit Tertullian, Jena 1902, 16ff.; C.H. Turner, An Exegetical Fragment of the Third Century: JTS 5 (1904) 218-241; J. Barbel, Christos Angelos, Bonn 1941, 79-80; L. Bieler, The "Creeds" of St. Victorinus and St. Patrick: ThS 9 (1948) 121-124; J. Daniélou, La typologie millénariste de la semaine dans le christianisme primitif: VChr 2 (1948) 1-16; J. Fischer, Die Einheit der beiden Testamente bei Laktanz, Victorin von Pettau und deren Quellen: Münch. Theol. Zeit. 1 (1950) 96-101; J. Daniélou, Théologie du judéo-christianisme, Tournai 1958, 341-346; M. Simonetti, Il millenarismo in Oriente da Origene a Metodio: Corona Gratiarum, I, Brugge 1975, 37ff.; C. Curti, Il regno millenario in Vittorino di Petovio: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 419-433; F.F. Bruce, The Earliest Latin Commentary on the Apocalypse, in Id., A Mind for What Matters: Collected Essays, Grand Rapids, MI 1990, 198-212; M. Dulaey, Jérôme "éditeur" du Commentaire sur l'Apocalypse de Victorin de Poetovio: REAug 37 (1991) 199-236; M. Dulaey, Victorin de Poetovio premier exégète latin, Paris 1993; M. Dulaey, Grégoire d'Elvire et le Commentaire sur la Genèse de Victorin de Poetovio: Augustinianum 38 (1993) 203-219; C. Micaelli, Tertulliano nel quarto secolo: Vittorino di Pettau e Vittricio di Rouen: SCO 43 (1993) 251-262; M. Veronese, Radici culturali di Vittorino di Petovio, in Italia e Romania. Storia Cultura Civiltà a confronto, ed. S. Satelia, Bari 2004, 181-194.

C. Curti

VICTORIUS of Aquitaine (mid-5th c.). Native of Aquitaine, a well-learned person who lived in the mid-5th c. *Gennadius relates that he was a calculator scrupulosus (De vir ill. 89 [88]). *Hilary, the archdeacon of *Rome and future pope, consulted him on the *Easter computus (PLS 3,380-381). Victorius's response consists of an accompanying letter and a table designed to calculate the Easter computus. It seems that he was the first to combine Meton's cycle (5th-c. BC Athenian astronomer), which equates 235 lunar months with 19 tropic solar years, with the cycle of the Sunday reiteration 7 x 4 = 28: therefore 19 x 28 = 532 Julian years, already a half century before *Dionysius Exiguus. This computus was adopted by the Council of Orléans of 541 and became widespread in *Gaul in the 7th and 8th c., until the introduction of the one made by Dionysius Exiguus. An extract exists that is attributed to the Venerable *Bede (PL 90,712 and PLS 4,2218). According to Gennadius, Victorius composed a chronological table from the creation of the world used by *Prosper of Aquitaine for his Chronicle and then by *Cassiodorus. He also composed a rudimentary Liber calculi. He was probably also the author of the Prologus Paschae (PLS 3,381).

Editions: CPL 2282-2283; PLS 3, 381-346 (Cursus paschalis) ed. also in MGH, Auct. Ant. 9, 677-735; PL 90, 677 (Liber calculi, ed. also made by Friedlein, Rome 1872): PLS 3, 427-441 (Prologus Paschae); E. Schwartz, Christliche und jüdische Ostertafeln, Berlin 1905, 58-103. [See also Abbo of Fleury and Ramsey, Commentary on the Calculus of Victorius of Aquitaine, ed. A.M. Peden, Oxford 2003].

Studies: C. Jones, Bedae Pseudepigrapha, Ithaca, NY 1939; DTC 16 (1951) 4371; A. Strobel, Texte zur Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Münster 1984, 19, 74, 76, 91, 118-119, 152; N. Angermann (ed.), Lexikon des Mittelalters 6, Munich-Zürich 1993, 1515-1516; BBKL 12 (1997) 1358-1359.

M. Maritano

VICTRICIUS of Rouen (ca. 340–ca. 410). Born around 340 "at the borders of the empire" (see *Paulinus of Nola, Epp. 18 and 37), Victricius worked in the military profession; he then renounced it—as did *Martin of Tours—in order to serve Christ. Ordained a priest, he devoted himself to the evangelization of the Nervi and Morini, in what is now the modern-day territory of Flanders, Brabant and Cambrésis. In 385 he became bishop of Rouen. He increased the spiritual life of his community by building churches, being vigilant over discipline and by supporting monastic life. Around 396 he went to Great Britain in order to combat the *Arian heresy and reestablish orthodoxy. In 403 he went to *Rome, perhaps to vindicate himself from accusations (of *Apollinarism?). In 404 Pope *Innocent I sent him the decretal Etsi tibi (see Jaffé 286) on recruitment and the virtues of the clerics. He died around 410. His feast day is celebrated on 7 August.

Making use of his rhetorical formation and possessing a solid literary formation, he wrote the De laude Sanctorum: it is a speech delivered in 396, in which he crafted a work in praise of some martyrs whose relics came from *Italy.

Editions: see CPL 481; De laude Sanctorum: PL 20, 443-458; ed. Sauvage (publ. by A. Tougard), Paris 1895; Mulders - Demeulenaere, in CCL 54 (1985) 69-93; French trans. R. Herval, Rouen 1966.

Studies: DTC 15 (1946) 2954-2956; R. Herval, Histoire de Rouen. I: Des Origines à la fin du XV[e] siècle, Rouen 1947, 19; Vies des SS. 8, 121-123; J. Mulders, Victricius van Rouaan: Bijdragen. Tijdschrift voor Filosofie en Theologie 17 (1956) 1-25; 18 (1957) 19-40, 270-289; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne, I, Paris [2]1964, 306-310, 383-385; BS 12 (1969) 1310-1315 (bibl.); P. Andrieu-Guitrancourt, Essai sur Victrice: Année Canonique 14 (1970) 1-23; Patrologia III, 515-516 (bibl.); J. Fontaine, Victrice de Rouen et les origines du monachisme dans l'Ouest de la Gaule, in L. Musset, Aspects du Monachisme en Normandie, IV[e]-XVIII[e] s., Paris 1982, 9-29; BBKL 12 (1997) 1359-1362 (bibl.).

M. Maritano

VIENNE
I. City and Christianity - II. Council.

I. City and Christianity. Colonia Julia Vienna in Narbonensis, later Civitas Viennensium or Vienna (in the 4th c.), metropolis of Viennensis and for some time the capital of a civil diocese, in the 5th c., one of the residences of the *Burgundian kings, experienced a new period of prosperity in the 2nd half of the 6th c. It housed one of the first communities of *Gaul since in 177 Sanctus appears there as a deacon (Eus., HE 5,1,17-18), but the first bishop with reliable attestation was Verus (Council of *Arles, 314), although he was preceded by Crescens (identified with *Paul's disciple!), Zacharias and Martin in a dubious list compiled by Ado of Vienne in the 9th c. Despite its antiquity, the provincial expansion of the episcopal see was opposed by the development of Arles; after the obscure figures of Justin, Dionysius, Parocos, Florentius and Lupicinus, *Simplicius tried to assert some metropolitan rights at the end of the 4th c., at the Council of *Turin, but Pope *Zosimus (417–418) favored the objectives of *Patroclus of Arles (Ep. 5, Col. Arelat. 5). After Claudius (. . . 441/442 . . .), Nectarius and Niceta (. . . 449 . . .), Mamertus, despite his pastoral zeal (Rogations), and despite the intellectual vitality of his brother *Claudianus (CPL 983-984), was unable to expand outside the limited provincial jurisdiction allowed to his see through the decision of Pope *Leo in 450 (Ep. 66; Pope Hilarus, Ep. 10). From the end of the 5th c., the new political geography favored Vienne for a certain time esp. after *Hesychius, under the governance of his son, the very famous *Avitus of Vienne (494–518; CPL 990-996), who was active at the court of the Burgundian king; after Julian (518/523–532) and Donninus, Pantagatus (538) and Hesychius (. . . 549–552 . . .) had performed before becoming bishops. But after Namatius (d. 559), Philip (. . . 570–573 . . .), Evantius (. . . 581–585 . . .) and Verus (586), Desiderius was unable to obtain the pallium from *Gregory the Great and was exposed to hostility from Aridius bishop of Lyons. The 7th-c. bishops Donnulus, Aetherius, Clarentius, Sindulf, Ecdicus, Coaldus, Dodolenus, Bobolinus, George, Deodatus, Blidrannus, Eocald, Eobolinus and Austrobert were not well known. Vilicarius, who received the pallium from Gregory III (731–741), was contemporaneous with the Saracen invasion (725) and in the end retired to a monastery, according to Ado, the bishop who died in 875. Despite all these difficulties, the local mission was very active in the 4th and the 5th c., as attested by inscriptions (esp. in the 6th c.) and numerous monuments: in the city one counts, in addition to the episcopal complex (dedicated to the Maccabees), the temple of *Augustus and Livia consecrated to the Christian cult (St. Mary) and two monasteries (St. André-le-Haut and St. Niceta); outside the walls, esp. on the right bank of the Rhône, stand several basilicas: the 4th-c. St. Gervasius, the 5th-c. basilica Stephani, St. *Peter (from the time of Mamertus) and several oratories; on the left bank is found the 5th-c. basilica Ferreoli.

L. Duchesne, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule, Paris 1907, I, 86-211; H. Leclercq, Vienne: DACL 15, 3038-3054; G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste, (Theophaneia 16), Bonn 1964; E. Griffe, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, Paris [2]1964, II, 146-189; 1965, III, 209-234, 323-325; F. Descombes, La topographie chrétienne de Vienne des origines à la fin du VII[e] siècle, in Colloque "Les martyrs de Lyon," Paris 1978, 267-276; F. Descombes, Hagiographie et topographie religieuse: l'exemple de Vienne en Dauphiné, in Hagiographie, cultures et sociétés, IV[e]-XII[e] siècles. Actes du colloque organisé à Nanterre et à Paris, 2-5 mai 1979, Paris 1981, 361-379; A. Pelletier, Vienne antique; de la conquête romaine aux invasions alamanniques (II[e] s. av. - III[e] s. apr. J.-C.), Roanne 1982; F. Descombes (mise à jour par P.-A. Fevrier - N. Gauthier), Vienne, in Topographie chrétienne des cités de la Gaule des origines au milieu du VIII[e] siècle. III. Province ecclésiastique de Vienne et d'Arles (Viennensis et Alpes Graiae et Poeninae), Paris 1986, 17-35; M. Jannet-Vallat et al., Vienne (Isère) aux premiers temps chrétiens, Lyon 1986.

Ch. Pietri - M. Ghilardi

II. Council. Around 471/475, Mamertus of Vienne had his Rogations accepted by his colleagues and the fasts that he had instituted for the three days that precede the *Ascension of Jesus. This custom quickly spread (Sidon. Ap., Epp. V,14; VII,1; Greg. of Tours, Hist. Franc. II,34).

CCL 148, 137; Palazzini 6, 45-46; 6, 129.

Ch. Munier

VIGIL. The vigiliae (pannychis: all-night vigil) were the four subdivisions of the night into three hours, each one in the Roman military order, with the objective of standing watch and checking that everything was peaceful. As a result, it was the act or the very fact of standing guard (vigilias servare). This Roman system was also widespread in *Palestine and was used by *Mark the Evangelist (6:48; 13:35). It is not clear whether *Luke used the Roman or Palestinian system when he wrote: et si venerit in secunda vigilia et si in tertia vigilia venerit (Lk 12:38). *Augustine testifies that quarta vero vigilia noctis, finis est noctis: una enim vigilia tribus horis constat (Sermo 75,6,7). In *Palestine, the ancient system of three nocturnal subdivisions also thrived (Strack-Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, Munich 1922, I,688-692). A derivative meaning is that of remaining awake during the normal hours of sleep. In the Christian context it was a nocturnal vigil of prayer, as one finds in the Acts of the Apostles at Troas (20:7). *Pliny discovered that the Christians gathered ante lucem on a specific day and sang a hymn to Christ quasi Deo (Ep. 10,109). These nocturnal vigils of prayer could have a private character; the communitarian ones, however, acquired a great importance. The most important was the great Paschal vigil (vigiliae claritas atque solemnitas: Aug. Sermo 223/E,1), which extended throughout the whole night, with numerous readings, songs, prayers, lighting of the paschal candle, the blessing of the new fire, a brief exhortation (the various sermons by *Augustine on Easter night are generally brief), baptism of catechumens and concluding with the celebration of the resurrection of Christ. The Easter vigil is the mater omnium sanctarum vigiliarum (Aug., Sermo 219,1). At *Rome one observes the vigils for the feast of Pentecost and that of the Four Seasons.

The source of the nocturnal vigil is unknown, but it may have derived from the Sunday celebration ante lucem mentioned by Pliny. *Tertullian speaks of the nocturnae convocationes, coetus antelucani (Ad uxorem II,4,2; De fuga 14,1), although the Easter night was already a great vigil. *Minucius Felix also spoke of nocturnal prayers (Octavius 8,4). The Christians of *Carthage stood vigil during the night in front of *Cyprian's prison door (*Pontius, Vita Cyp. 15,5); there were also vigils at the tombs of the *martyrs, a practice prohibited to women by the Council of *Elvira because often, under the shadow of prayer, sin was committed (can. 35: Mansi 1, 254). Over the course of the 4th c., vigils developed in some cathedrals on Sundays and also prayer vigils in monastic communities. *Athanasius attests that at *Alexandria the vigils were celebrated on special days (Apol. de fuga 14; Historia Arr. 81). *Basil of Caesarea extensively described the unfolding of a Sunday vigil at Caesarea of *Cappadocia: "Our people have the custom of awaking during the night and going to the house of prayer; the people praise God while exhausted, in repentance, tears, and after this prelude of prayer, the vigil proceeds to the singing of the *Psalms" (Ep. 207,3). He adds that they recited Psalms and antiphons and read readings and sang songs. *John Cassian describes the course of the night prayer in the monastic communities on Holy Friday and Saturday evening.

DACL 15, 3108-3118; C. Callewaert, De vigiliarum origine: Collationes Brugenses 23 (1923) 424-466; G. Marcora, La vigilia nella liturgia. Ricerche sulle origini e sui primi sviluppi (sec. I-IV), Milan 1954; A. Baumstark, Nocturna Laus, Typen frühchristlicher Vigilienfeier und ihr Fortleben vor allem im römischen und monastischen Ritus, Münster 1957; J.M. Hanssens, Nocturna Laus: Gregorianum 39 (1958) 747-756; G. Penco, Nuove luci sulla genesi dell'ufficio vigiliare: Rivista Liturgica 47 (1960) 236-242; C. de Barros Morrais, La Vigilia litúrgica: Cuadernos Monásticos 17 (1982) 89-93; M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, Milan [2]1955, II, 470-476; A. Martimort, La Chiesa in preghiera, Brescia 1983, IV, see the index; F. Manns, "Ante lucem" dans la lettre de Pline le Jeune à Trajan (Ep. X, 96): Antonianum 62 (1987) 338-343; F. Manns, "Domine, labia mea aperies." Liturgie juive et liturgie chrétienne: EphLit 111 (1997) 263-267.

A. Di Berardino

VIGILANTIUS (4th–5th c.). Born at Calaguris in the civitas of the Convenae (Saint-Martory in Comminges, Haute Garonne); see Jerome, Contra Vigil. I and VI; Gennadius, De vir. ill. 36. The priest Vigilantius completed a trip to *Palestine in 395, distributing alms and carrying a letter to *Bethlehem along with a panegyric for the emperor *Theodosius, which had been composed by *Paulinus of Nola (who was also called for this reason a clientulus Paulini by Jerome, Ep. 61,3). He lived in Bethlehem near Jerome, in harmony with him despite several esp. theological disagreements that incited the astonishment of Vigilantius, who had learned that Jerome and his friends were reading *Origen's writings (Jerome, Ep. 58 to Paulinus and 61 to Vigilantius). But Jerome became upset when he learned that Vigilantius, during his trip back to Nola and then to *Gaul (Paulinus of Nola, Ep. 5 to *Sulpicius Severus), had presented Jerome as an Origenist (Jerome, Ep. 61 to Vigilantius), which turned Jerome into his enemy. Jerome then wrote Vigilantius a letter containing accusations that offended Vigilantius concerning his theological origins, learning and capriciousness, a letter to which Vigilantius did not respond, given that he was interested in practical matters and not so much in theological questions. In 403, Riparius, a priest from the civitas of *Toulouse, which was near the region of Comminges, revealed to Jerome the campaign that Vigilantius was waging on the territory of his parish against the excessive cult of the martyrs (Jerome, Ep. 109 to Riparius) and against the thriving custom of sending alms to the monks of Palestine, which had begun probably following the consecration of the basilica at Toulouse dedicated to the bishop-martyr *Saturninus. Jerome quickly responded by stating that he was ready to engage Vigilantius in debate, who, however, had remained silent, not giving Jerome an opportunity for another invective.

In 406 the Tolosan deacon Sissinius, by order of Riparius and Desiderius, brought Vigilantius's writings (no longer extant) to Jerome, along with one of their letters (containing their accusation, which has likewise been lost); Jerome wrote a violent, polemical booklet titled Contra Vigilantium: according to this text, Vigilantius criticized the excessive cult of the martyrs, some liturgical customs connected to it (such as the vigils near the tombs of the martyrs with lit torches) and ecclesiastical celibacy, regarding it as heresy. He then reprimanded those who, having distributed all their goods, lived at the expense of the church. He criticized monastic life and the alms sent to the Holy Land. But one must keep in mind that these accusations are certainly not objective given Jerome's polemical style; in fact, it seems that Vigilantius's position represented that of the majority of the clergy of Gaul at the time (against, e.g., *Sulpicius Severus and *Vittricius of Rouen?), where the point of departure of the debate could consist in the difference between Jerome and Vigilantius's theological ideas: Jerome's idea, being proper to the Roman aristocracy, was mystical and outside time, well-suited for opposing religious and social life, which seemed unacceptable to Vigilantius.

According to *Gennadius, De vir. ill. 36, Vigilantius was a priest of *Barcelona because he had to flee from Gaul following Jerome's document. He was probably the one whom Sulpicius sent to Paulinus of Nola.

L. Lizop, Les Convenae et les Consoranni, Toulouse-Paris 1931, 248-258; P.-M. Duval, La Gaule jusqu'au milieu du Ve siècle, Paris 1971, 674ff.; H. Crouzel, Saint Jérôme et ses amis toulousains: BLE 73 (1972) 125-146; H. Crouzel, Un "piccolo cliente" di san Paolino di Nola: Vigilanzio di Calagurris, in A. Ruggiero - H. Crouzel - G. Santaniello, Paolino di Nola: momenti della sua vita e delle sue opere, S. Paolino Diocesana 1983 (Nola Biblioteca), 199-219; M. Massie, Vigilance de Calagurris face à la polémique hiéronymienne. Les fondements et la signification du conflit: BLE 81 (1980) 81-108; H. Crouzel, Un "hérétique" commingeois aux IVᵉ et Vᵉ siècles: Vigilance de Calagurris: Mém. de l'Acad. des Sciences, Inscr. et Belles-Lettres de Toulouse 6,15 (1985) 163-174; D.G. Hunter, Vigilantius of Calagurris and Victricius of Rouen: Ascetics, Relics, and Clerics in Late Roman Gaul: JECS 7 (1999) 401-430.

H. Crouzel - L. Odrobina

VIGILIUS. The Regula orientalis, a work composed perhaps in *Gaul around 420, is attributed to Vigilius (see *Gennadius of Marseille, De vir. ill. 51). This monastic rule, which includes 47 chapters (33 of which use *Pachomius), is on the whole very close to the long recension of *Jerome's translation of the Rule of Pachomius.

CPL 1840; PL 103, 477-484 (PL 50, 373-380 and PG 34, 983-990); A. Boon, Pachomiana Latina, Louvain 1932; C. De Clercq, L'influence de la règle de saint Pachôme en Occident: Mél. L. Halphen, Paris 1951, 169-176; A. Mundó, Les anciens synodes abbatiaux et les "Regulae SS. Patrum": SA 44 (1959) 107-125.

S. Zincone

VIGILIUS, pope (537–555). After *Silverius had been deposed in an irregular way (537), Vigilius, of senatorial origin, had himself elected bishop of Rome. Recognized by all after the death of his predecessor, he, contrary to the promises made to the empress *Theodora I, professed the faith of the Council of *Chalcedon and Pope *Leo the Great. *Justinian I, however, who in 543/544 had condemned the so-called *Three Chapters and had forced Vigilius to present himself at *Constantinople, led him to adopt such a hesitant attitude that Vigilius lost all respect from the Western bishops, and this all the more that Vigilius in 548 explicitly condemned, in the Iudicatum, the Three Chapters. Vigilius protested against a new imperial edict by excommunicating the patriarch *Menas of Constantinople. In fact, he refused to participate at the synod convoked by the emperor (553), justifying his position in the Constitutum I. Excommunicated by the synod, he was sentenced to prison or exile. In two documents, among which was the Constitutum II, he revoked his refusal to condemn the Three Chapters and thus received permission to return to *Rome. He died, however, at *Syracuse, and was dishonored for a long time even in the West.

CPL 1694-1697; PL 69, 15-114; 143-178; PLS IV, 1249-1252; ACO IV,II, 15-18, 138-168; K. Baus et al., Storia della Chiesa, III, It. trans. Milan 1978, 37-43 (bibl.); J. Straub, Die Verurteilung der Drei Kapitel durch Vigilius: Kleronomia 2 (1970) 347-375; E. Zettl, Die Bestätigung des 5. ökumenischen Konzils durch Papst Vigilius, Bonn 1974; G. Every, Was Vigilius a Victim or an Ally of Justinian?: Heythrop Journal 20 (1979) 257-266; Patrologia IV, 1694-1697; C. Sotinel, Autorité pontificale et pouvoir imperial: MEFRA 101 (1992) 439-463; BBKL 12, 1383-1387; LTK[3] 10 787-787; EPapi 1, 512-529; G. Pilara, La città di Roma fra Chiesa e Impero durante il conflitto gotico-bizantino, Rome 2006.

B. Studer

VIGILIUS of Thapsus. Participated, as bishop of Thapsus (Ras Dimas, Tunisia), at the dramatic meeting between *Catholics and *Arians which the *Vandal king *Huneric convoked in February 484. Modern scholars have hypothesized that he subsequently fled to *Constantinople. Various works have been mistakenly attributed to Vigilius, among which is the Ps.-Athanasian De Trinitate; but the following are certainly his: Contra Eutychetem and the Dialogus contra Arianos . . . , to which one should add with all likelihood the Ps.-Augustinian Contra Felicianum. This brief work presents in a dialogical form the themes of the trinitarian controversy, which was current in Vandal Africa, making use only of rational arguments without recourse to scriptural citations. The same material is treated in a much more vast and complete way in the Dialogus contra arrianos, sabellianos et photinianos in three books, where the dialogue between a Catholic and three heretical proponents has the objective of refuting one heresy by means of another. The objective is, however, primarily anti-Arian, and in fact the work has also come down to us in an abbreviated redaction containing two interlocutors, the Catholic and the Arian. In the Dialogus, Vigilius mentions two of his other anti-Arian works against Maribadus and against *Palladius of Ratiaria, both of which have been lost. The treatise Contra Eutychetem, in five books, presents the Catholic doctrine on *Christology as an intermediate position between the opposed errors of *Nestorius and *Eutyches and defends the Chalcedonian doctrine, which identifies two natures in Christ, human and divine, coexistent, without confusion and without separation, in one sole person. Providing various written citations in the last two books of the work, Vigilius refutes two *monophysite documents against the Council of *Chalcedon and against Pope *Leo the Great, which appear to have been otherwise unknown. Perhaps they are to be identified with the two writings of Timothy Ailouros (*Timothy II).

CPL 806-812; PL 42, 1157-1172; 62, 95-238; PCBE I, 1204-1205; Moricca III/2, 764-773; M. Simonetti, Letteratura antimonofisita d'Occidente: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 505-522; Patrologia IV, 23-26; Vigilio di Tapso, Contro Eutiche (It. trans. ed. S. Petri), Brescia 2003.

M. Simonetti

VIGILIUS of Trent. Third bishop of Trent (385?–405), Vigilius received from *Ambrose, at the beginning of his ministry, a letter accompanied by pastoral instruction (Ep. 17: PL 16,1024-1036). According to his Vita (BHL 8602ff.), written in the 6th c., he was famous for his missionary activity and for the construction of numerous churches. During his episcopate, in 397, Sisinnius, Marytirius and Alexander, his coworkers, were put to death. Vigilius himself sent a letter on the martyrdom to *Simplicianus bishop of Milan, and later another to *John Chrysostom, accompanying it with some relics. Likewise according to the Vita, he himself was stoned by pagans, and became patron of his diocese.

CPL 212ff.; PL 13, 549-558. – ASS Iun. 7, 144-147; BS 12, 1086-1088; A. Quacquarelli - I. Rogger (ed.), I martiri della Valle di Non e la reazione pagana alla fine del IV secolo, Trent 1985, 151-170; R. Lizzi, Vescovi e strutture ecclesiastiche nelle città tardoantiche, Como 1989, 50, 96; LTK³ 10 788; PCB 2, 2296; LACL (2002) 720-721; L.F. Pizzolato, Studi su Vigilio di Trento, Milan 2002.

B. Studer

VINCENT, martyr (d. 22 January 304). The most ancient nonhagiographical pieces of information on Vincent come from *Paulinus of Nola (Carm. XIX,164), *Prudentius (Perist. 4,77-80, 179-180; 5), and *Augustine's Sermons (Serm. 4,274-277, Caillou 1,47: PLS 2). These texts present Vincent as the deacon of Bishop *Valerius of Saragossa and martyr from the *Diocletian persecution; although the bishop survived, Vincent was sentenced to death and executed at Valencia on 22 January 304.

His Passion is based on this information (BHL 8627-8637), which was written in an epic form before the end of the 4th c. It abounds in punishments, visions, and other characteristics of dress and institutions, which show how quickly these literary procedures were present in Spanish *hagiography. The wordplays on Vincentius and the Latin verb vincere certainly took up a traditional theme, namely that of martyrdom as victory over the devil, but it also inspired *Augustine's sermons and the *Visigothic liturgical prayers.

The cult of the saint spread onward from the 5th c. in *Spain, *Gaul and *Africa, as both the churches built in his honor and the spread of his relics attest. His feast day, 22 January, appears in the Mozarabic calendars, in the Cal. Carth., in that of 6th- and 7th-c. Carmona, in the calendar of Polemius Silvius (448), and in the Hieronymian Martyrology.

PL 38, 1252-1268; Miscellanea Agostiniana, I, Rome 1930, 243-245; J. Vives, Oracional visigótico, I, Barcelona 1946, 157-166; Vies des SS. 1, 431-436; LTK³ 10, 802-803; BS 12, 1149-1155; A. Fábrega Grau, Pasionario hispánico, Madrid-Barcelona 1953-55, I, 92-107; II, 187-196; C. García Rodríguez, El culto de los santos en la España romana y visigoda, Madrid 1966, 257-278; V. Saxer, Le culte de S. Vincent en Italie avant l'an mil, in Quaeritur inventus colitur. Miscellanea in onore di Padre U.M. Fasola, Vatican City 1989, 745-761; V. Saxer, La Passion de S. Vincent diacre dans la première moitié du Vᵉ s. Essai de reconstitution: REA 35 (1989) 275-297; R. Soriano Sánchez, L'édifice cultique de la prison de saint Vincent à Valence/Espagne, in Actes du XIᵉ Congrès Int. d'archéologie chrétienne, III, Rome 1989, 1193-1201.

V. Saxer

VINCENT, presbyter (4th c.). Presbyter of the church of *Constantinople (Jer., C. Ioan. Hier. 41) but Latin in culture, known by *Jerome in *Italy and from that point onward his friend, a companion in travel (Jer., Ep. 61; C. Ruf. 3,22) and asceticism. Jerome dedicated to him the Latin translation of *Eusebius of Caesarea's Chronicle (GCS 47,1), which he finished between 378 and 381. Vincent exhorts him to study Scripture and to translate into Latin the writings of *Origen (PL 25,583-386); he accompanied Jerome first to *Rome and then *Palestine in 385 (CCL 79,93); he then went again to Rome prior to *Rufinus of Aquileia; he was still at Rome at the time of Pope *Anastasius (399–401); he then again returned to Bethlehem.

PCBE 2, 2306-2307.

A. Di Berardino

VINCENT of Capua (4th c.). Bishop of Capua, perhaps to be identified with the Roman priest of the same name who represented Pope *Sylvester at the Council of *Nicaea (325). In 344 he was sent on a mission, along with Euphratas of Cologne, to the court of *Constantius at *Antioch to mitigate his anti-Nicene measures, without any success. Sent by Pope *Liberius in 353 to *Arles, again at the court of Constantius, in a local council he yielded to signing the condemnation of *Athanasius. In 357, Liberius, who had been exiled in *Thrace on account of his attitude toward Athanasius, also wrote to Vincent, among other church officials, so that he might work, along with other bishops from Campania, for the revocation of his exile.

DCB 4, 1152; PCBE II/2, 2303-2305.

M. Simonetti

VINCENT of Lérins (d. before 450). Vincent lived in the 1st half of the 5th c. and is the most famous among the monks of Lérins. We gather bits of information about his life from *Gennadius (De vir. ill. 65 [64]) and Vincent himself (Comm. I,5,26-28). A native of *Gaul, he was involved in the tumultuous life of that century (and had a military career?), before retiring to the monastery of Lérins, where he was ordained a priest. Gennadius emphasizes his knowledge of the *Bible and the teachings of the church, which he probably acquired at Lérins. He had previously received a solid formation also in secular literature, as appears from his writing style. *Eucherius of Lyons presents him as a holy man, eminent for his eloquence and wisdom; he praises him as "a shining pearl of interior light" (De laud. eremi 42); he probably entrusted to him the education of his sons *Salonius and Veranus. He died before 450 (perhaps as early as 435). His feast day is celebrated on 24 May.

Vincent's fame is connected to his Commonitorium (Memorial), which was redacted around 434 with the pseudonym of Peregrinus. He composed, moreover, the Excerpta, a work mentioned in the 9th c. but discovered by Madoz in Cod. 151 of the Biblioteca comunale di Bagno a Ripoli and published in 1940: it was the first Augustinian florilegium with text pertaining to the mysteries of the *Trinity and the *incarnation, taken primarily from the De Trinitate. The Obiectiones Vincentianae have been lost. Vincent's writings are valuable because of their stylistic eloquence and clarity of thought.

The Commonitorium, with respect to heresiology, is the only work known to us in antiquity that treats the topic along theoretical lines, by asking what heresy is in contradistinction to orthodoxy. He provides a "treatment of method" and theology, not solely providing illustrations of it. Orthodoxy for Vincent is identified with the apostolic tradition; heresy is a distortion of it: the phrase quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est (ch. 2) is orthodox: three criteria of orthodoxy, therefore, are universality, antiquity and unanimity, which he then applies primarily to past controversies, esp. *Donatism and *Arianism.

In order to avoid the principle of tradition leading to theological immobility, Vincent also predicts a certain progress (ch[s]. 23-24): "It grows . . . and vigorously makes much progress . . . but only in its own genus, namely in the same doctrine, in the same understanding and the same notion" (Crescat . . . et multum vehementerque proficiat . . . sed in suo dumtaxat genere, in eodem sc. dogmate, eodem sensu, eaque sententia, ch. 23). The criterion would then be adopted by the First Vatican Council (see DS 3018).

The influence and success of the Commonitorium, esp. from the 16th c. on, were relevant and long-lasting: Catholics, Protestants, Old Catholics and Anglicans took him as a point of reference in relation to theological debate: to this end, see the writings of Roberto Bellarmino, Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet, John Henry Newman and Johann Joseph Ignaz von Döllinger. Today, although observing the validity of this thousand-year-old-plus definition of the Vincentian text (orthodoxy = tradition; heresy = change), there is a tendency, esp. among scholars, not to absolutize its normative value, to regard it more in the "affirmative" then in the "exclusive" sense.

R. Demeulenaere, Bibliographie choisie, in CCL 64 (1985) 141-144.

Editions: see CPL 510-511; Commonitorium: PL 50, 637-686; R. Demeulenaere: CCL 64 (1985) 147-195; Excerpta: J. Madoz, Madrid 1940 = PLS 3, 23-45; R. Demeulenaere: CCL 64 (1985) 199-231. Eng. tr.: R.S. Moxon, Cambridge 1915; It. trans.: C. Colafemmina, Alba 1968, and L. Longobardo, Rome 1994; Fr. trans.: M. Meslin, Namur 1959; Spanish trans.: L.F. Mateo Seco, Pamplona 1977.

Studies: J. Madoz, Un tratado desconocido de San Vicente de Lérins: Gregorianum 21 (1940) 75-94; DTC 15 (1950) 3045-3055; B. Luiselli, Sulla pseudonimia di Vincenzo di Lerino: Atene e Rome 4 (1959) 216-222; É. Griffe, Pro Vincentio Lerinensi: BLE 62 (1961) 26-32; W. O'Connor, St. Vincent of Lerins and St. Augustine: Was the Commonitorium of St. Vincent of Lerins Intended as a Polemic Treatise Against St. Augustine and His Doctrine on Predestination?: Doctor Communis 16 (1963) 123-257 [separately: Diss. Rome 1964]; Patrologia III, 517-521; M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo, Problemi vincenziani: Quaderni Catanesi 5 (1983) 341-359; A. Pastorino, Il concetto di tradizione in Giovanni Cassiano e in Vincenzo di Lerino: Sileno 1 (1975) 37-46; J.-P. Weiss: DSp 16 (1993) 822-832; A. Milan, Il problema della "tradizione": a proposito di Vincenzo di Lerino: Rassegna di teologia 37 (1996) 395-406; BBKL 12 (1997) 1432-1436; A. De Vogüé, Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l'Antiquité chrétienne. VII. Première partie. Le monachisme latin. L'essor de la littérature lérinienne et les écrits contemporains (410-500), Paris 2003.

M. Maritano

VINDICTA SALVATORIS (The Avenging of the Savior) (apocryphal). Latin text of the 9th/10th c., belonging to the cycle of Pilate, written with the objective of demonstrating the fulfillment of divine justice on the Jews, who were guilty of the death of *Jesus. In the Vindicta Salvatoris an account is given of the healing and conversion of the emperors *Titus and *Tiberius (along with the Cura santitatis Tiberii), the destruction of *Jerusalem, the mission of *Volusianus into *Jerusalem, and the image of Christ taken to *Rome by *Veronica (it reflects the story of the image of *Abgar). In the book, one finds echoes of Flavius Josephus's Jewish War (probably through the Latin translation of Josephus, the so-called ps.-Hegesippus, De bello judaico). The book is written in faulty Latin, lacks geographical and historical knowledge, and its underlying theological message is rather primitive; nevertheless, the Vindicta Salvatoris was a very popular book during the Middle Ages, and even Dante made reference to it (Par. VI,92).

CANT 70; BHL 4221 (4218-4222); Tischendorf 471-486; Santos Otero 507-526 (Sp. tr.); version in ancient French La vengeance du Seigneur, ed. A.E. Ford, Toronto 1984.

Translations: Eng.: Elliott 213-216 (frag.); It.: Erbetta 1/2, 388-397; Moraldi 1, 765-776; Craveri 412-422; Pol.: Starowieyski 1, 692-703; E. von Dobschütz, Christsbilder, TU 18 (1899) 214-217; EApC 2, 371-398.

M. Starowieyski

VINE. Wine and grapes are found frequently in ancient symbolic language as signs of happiness, fortune, fertility, rebirth and immortality, as shown by their association with the cult of Dionysius, the god who cyclically dies and is reborn, and their representation in funerary contexts. In the OT, in *Jacob's blessings, the Messiah is described: "Binding his foal to the vine, and his donkey's colt to the choice vine, he washes his garments in wine and his robe in the blood of grapes" (Gen 49:11). The vine is also a symbol of *Israel (Is 5; Hos 10:1), who is at times described as a vine that languishes (Is 24:7) or a chosen vineyard that is now contaminated (Jer 2:21). In the NT, however, Christ is the one who is said to be the true vine, while the *Father is the vinedresser and the faithful are the branches (Jn 15:1-6). The vine then appears in the parable of the murderous tenants, the kingdom of God, which the landlord will take from the wicked and give to a people able to make it fruitful (Mt 21:33-43; Mk 12:1-11; Lk 20:9-18), although the harvest is the balance of human actions presented in the sight of God at the end of life (Rev 14:17-20). The vine is, finally, the blood of Christ, poured out as a sign of the new covenant (Mt 26:26-29; Mk 14:22-25; and Lk 22:19-20).

Among the commentators of the early centuries, *Origen refers to Adam and Christ as the vines, who are different because of the quantity and quality of the fruits they brought forth (CRom 1: Hammond Bammel 76, 60-66). *Ephrem the Syrian affirms that at Christmas a barren vine bore a cluster of grapes into the world (Hymn. Nat. 4,27: SC 459,82). Origen then develops the theme of the spiritual vineyard, which all people have in their own heart and must cultivate thoughtfully (Hom. 36 Ps 1,2: SC 411,68).

But the grapes and the wine in the writings of Christian authors almost always become a symbol of Christ's blood: thus the Messiah, who washes his garments in wine and his robe in the blood of grapes (Gen 49:11), is for *Justin Martyr (I Apol. 32,7: PTS 38, 79; Dial. Triph. 54,1-2: PTS 47, 158-159) and *Irenaeus of Lyons (Demonstr. 5: SC 406, 166) Christ, who with the blood of his passion purified the sinful church, although, for Origen, it purifies his own flesh (Hom. Lev IX,5: GCS Origen VI,424, 3-24). *Tertullian also reads a passage from Genesis in reference to the passion of Christ and offers a similar interpretation for Is 63:1, where one finds the image of the grape gatherer dressed in garments stained by grapes (Adv. Marc. IV,40,5-6: CCL I,657,18-7). *Hippolytus, however, distinguishes in Gen 49:11 two symbols, seen in the expression "he washes his garments in wine," a type of Christ's baptism, and in the "blood of grapes," a type of Christ's passion (Ben.: PO 27, 80-82).

Even the saints led to martyrdom are squeezed like grapes at the winepress (*Cypr., Ep. 37,47-53: CCL 3B,179-180; *Zeno Ver., Tract. I,33,25-27: CCL 22,84; *Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 83,1: CCL 39,1146).

The vineyard in the parable of the wicked tenants of Mt 21:33ff. was traditionally interpreted as the Jewish people, entrusted to the priests and scribes, the tenants in the parable. But the landowner will take it away from them for having mistreated his envoys/prophets and for having murdered his own son, Christ: this is how the parable is interpreted in the writings of Irenaeus and Tertullian, although Origen, alongside this exegesis, presents an identification of the vineyard with teaching of the *Scriptures, first entrusted to the Jewish people, now to Christians (CMt 17,7-8: GCS X, 602-603).

Finally, the shoot with a cluster of grapes carried by two Israelite explorers with a bar during an exploration of the land of Canaan (Num 13:23-24) was, for the Fathers, a prefiguration of the cross of Christ: thus *Clement of Alexandria (Paed. 2,2,19,3: SC 108,46-48); *Maximus of Turin (Hom X,2: CC 23,35) and *Isidore of Seville (Quaest. in Vet. Test., in Num. 15,8-11: PL 83,346-347).

TIP 306; LCI 491-496; C. Leonardi, "Ampelos." Il simbolo della vite nell'arte pagana e paleocristiana, Rome 1947; M. Simonetti, I vignaioli perfidi, in M. Simonetti, Origene esegeta e la sua tradizione, Brescia 2004, 173-184.

C. Noce

VIR DEI. The category of the "divine man/man of God," which was typical of the Greco-Roman world, was frequently used during the first decades of the 20th c., due to the influence of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, to classify representations of Jesus in the NT Today this interpretation enjoys less consent among scholars, esp. because it has been noted that the characteristics of this figure change noticeably with the changing of eras and cultures. In fact, complete continuity can be identified only with the assistance of polymorphic and even polysemic concepts, such as dynamis (Corrington). A status quaestionis of scholarship on this debate is found in D. Zeller, Mensch, göttlicher: Neues Bibellexikon II (1995) 764-765, and, more extensively, in E. Koskenniemi, Apollonios von Tyana in der neutestamentlichen Exegese, Tübingen 1994, 64-164, and in D.S. du Toit, Theios Anthropos, Tübingen 1997, 2-39. Likewise, the concept of theios anēr was also supposed to have been operative even in Hellenistic *Judaism, which was regarded as the mediator between the Greek world and the NT and Christian world; subsequently, however, this foreignness of this idea both to biblical culture and also, therefore, to that of *Jewish-Hellenistic culture was seen—even where alongside the preeminent biblical roots, one cannot ignore the Hellenistic contribution. See C. Halloday, "Theios Aner" in Hellenistic Judaism, Missoula, MT 1977; W. Schottroff, Gottmensch I, in RAC 12 (1982) 155-234. From the lexical point of view, it has been observed that the term theios in early Christian Greek literature almost never indicates the divine nature and origin of the so-called anēr—it does not seem to be a technical expression during the pre-Christian age—which is true for the NT as well. D.S. du Toit, Theios Anthropos, 2-3, also provides similar observations, through his semantic analysis on the following terms: theios / thespesios / daimonios anthrōpos, from which emerges the important claim that these expressions do not indicate, ontologically, divine nature or sonship, at least in the pagan world, even if, as D. Zeller observes in ThLZ 123 (1998) 62-64, this conclusion does not seem to keep in mind the class of theioi andres supplied by the diviners or *prophets, the manteis, who are said to effectively possess a "divine nature" or theia physis, a topic researched by D. Zeller: The theia physis of Hippocrates and Other Divine Men, in Early Christianity and Classical Culture: Comparative Studies in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe, ed. J. Fitzgerald - T. Olbricht - M. White, Leiden 2003, 49-69. It is true, however, that the testimonies, from Pindar and Plato onward, show that this initially divine physis did not have an ontological significance, as is present, however, in the imperial literature and in Hellenistic Judaism, with Flavius Josephus, who uses the expression theios anēr more often. Plutarch, e.g., used theios in reference to a human being at one point in an ontological sense and at another in an ethical sense. In a text from the 2nd c. AD on Hippocrates, this individual is a theios, an individual who comes down from the gods.

One of the most famous "divine men" of Antiquity was, in the pagan sphere, *Apollonius of Tyana, whose biography, which attributes to him divine nature and descent, was written by Philostratus at the beginning of the 3rd c. AD, long after the death of Apollonius. In particular, it was the chronological deviation—much broader than that which fell within the life of *Jesus and the production of the gospels—that led Koskenniemi, 233-235 (and id., Apollonius of Tyana: A Typical theios aner?: JBL 117 [1998] 455-467), to put scholars on guard when using Philostratus as a source on the theios anēr for the 1st c. AD, challenging the thesis put forward by H. Betz—who investigated the concept in the Greco-Roman and ancient Christian world in Gottmensch II, in RAC 12 (1982) 234-312—that the thaumaturgic philosophers are representative expressions of the "divine man" in the ancient period. The interpretation of the category of the theios anēr as indicative in general of the ancients thaumaturges endowed with a supernatural or divine state, however, is still found in the thought of various scholars such as B. Kollmann, Jesus und die Christen als Wundertäter, Göttingen 1996, 58-59. In the literature from the imperial age, however, theios often refers to the founders of a discipline or philosophical school, denoting not so much the divine nature as their superiority over the average human being. This could also express itself, in wisdom, virtue, prophecies and artistic works as well as in miracles. In various cases, the expressions of this exceptionality may be based on a theia physis understood in a more or less ontological sense. Particularly with regard to this concept there seems to be a measurable difference from the biblical and Christian theios anēr, who, possessing more than simply a divine nature, is "of God."

In the Christian world, in fact, the theios human being finds its model in Christ, who was endowed with the divine nature as the Son of God, but, apart from the idea of participation in the nature of God through Christ, the theios anēr is the human being that belongs to God and imitates him by imitating Christ, and is in the first place the saint, a figure in turn subject to developments in history, from the *martyr to the confessor to the ascetic and also the churchman. Thus, e.g., *Origen, C. Cels. III,28, affirms that the human nature becomes divine through Christ: “So that the human nature [physis], thanks to its communion with what is more divine, becomes divine [theia], not only in Jesus, but in all those who with faith receive the life that Jesus taught.” Similarly, *Cyril of Alexandria states, Thes. 4: “The one who participates in the Son shares in the divine nature [theia physis].” In reference to human beings, theios also indicates in the writings of the Fathers the image of God impressed on our nature according to Genesis, through which Christian souls are called theiai psychai. The greatest frequency of the word theios, however, in reference to human persons is found in references to some of the saints and prophets as in *Ignatius of Antioch, Magn. 8,2 and the *apostles, as in Origen, C. Cels. VII,49; fr. 106 on Lamentations where *Paul is ho theios apostolos; Cyril of Alexandria, Dial. Trin. 1 where Paul is theios, just as *Moses in the Apos. Con. VI,24,5, *Job Apos. Con. V,7,21, etc. See also A. Grillmeier, Gottmensch III (Patristik), in RAC 12 (1982) 312-366. Precisely for their belonging and, therefore, closeness to God, the saints were perceived as intercessors for sinners, likewise on the model of Christ, the first intercessor, according to Origen's reflection (Ramelli).

There are numerous studies dedicated to the “divine men” or “saints” esp. in *Late Antiquity, where we find three paradigms: the pagan philosopher, the Christian ascetic and the rabbinic sage, all of whom were compared by R. Kirschner, The Vocation of Holiness in Late Antiquity: VChr 38 (1984) 105-124. An aspect of the vir dei is the ability to cure *soul and body, which also unfolds in miracles (J.M. Petersen, Dead or Alive? The Holy Man as Healer in the Late VI Cent.: JMedHist 9 (1983) 91-98): of great significance, therefore, is the role of “holy men,” both Christian and pagan, in the performance of miracles in pagan and Christian historiography of the 4th–6th c., a theme researched by L. Cracco Ruggini, The Ecclesiastical Histories and the Pagan Historiography: Athenaeum 65 (1977) 107-126. For example, the very conversion of *Rabbula, a 5th-c.bishop of *Edessa, initially a pagan son of a pagan man and a Christian woman, was owed to miracles, a sign of divine operation through human beings. Finally, the ecclesiastical ministry esp. in Late Antiquity conferred the character of theios on the one who acquired it: Ps.-*Dionysius the Areopagite, EH 1,3, defines the hierarchēs as entheos and theios anēr, a man of God and one inspired by God.

L. Bieler, Theios Aner: das Bild des göttlichen Menschen in Spätantike und Frühchristentum, Vienna 1936, repr. Darmstadt 1976; J.S. Lasso de la Vega, Eroe greco e santo cristiano, Brescia 1968 (orig. ed. 1962); M.S. Burrows, On the Visibility of God in the Holy Man: The Reconsideration of the Apa in the Pachomian Vitae: VChr 41 (1987) 11-33; P. Brown, The Making of Late Antiquity, Cambridge, MA 1976; G. Cracco, Uomini di Dio e uomini di chiesa nell'Alto Medioevo: Ric. storia sociale e relig. 12 (1977) 163-202; A. Malherbe, Ps. Heraclitus, Ep. 4: The Divinization of the Wise Man: JbAC 21 (1978) 42-64; M. Smith, On the History of the “Divine Man,” in Paganisme, judaïsme. Mélanges M. Simon, Paris 1978, 335-345; M. Smith, Ascesa e ruolo dei viri Dei nell'Italia di Gregorio Magno, in Hagiographie, cultures, sociétés, IVe-XIIe siècles, Paris 1981, 283-297; G. Fawden, The Pagan Holy Man in Late Antique Society: JHS 102 (1982) 33-59; E. Gallagher, Divine Man or Magician? Celsus and Origen on Jesus, Chico, CA 1982; H. Koester, The Divine Human Being: HThR 78 (1985) 243-252; G. Corrington, The “Divine Man”: His Origin and Function in Hellenistic Popular Religion, New York 1986; G. Corrington, Power and the Man: Helios (USA) 13 (1986) 75-86; G. Corrington, The Divine Woman? Propaganda and the Power of Celibacy in the NT Apocrypha: AnglTheolRev 70 (1988) 207-220; D. Frankfurter, Stylites and Phallobats: Pillar Religions in Late Antiquity: VChr 44 (1990) 168-198; R. MacMullen - E.N. Lane (eds.), Paganism and Christianity 100-425 C.E. A Sourcebook, Minneapolis 1992; G. Anderson, Sage, Saint and Sophist: Holy Men and Their Associates in the Early Roman Empire, London-New York 1994; A. Pilgaard, The Hellenistic theios aner: A Model for Early Christian Christology?, in The NT and Hellenistic Judaism, ed. P. Borgen - S. Giversen, Aarhus 1995, 101-122; H.J.W. Drijvers, The Man of God of Edessa, Bishop Rabbula: JECS 4 (1996) 235-248; R. Mathisen, Crossing the Supernatural Frontier in Western Late Antiquity, in Shifting Frontiers in Late Antiquity, ed. R. Mathisen, Aldershot 1996, 309-320; J.-J. Finterman, The Ubiquitous 'Divine Man': Numen 43 (1996) 82-98; J. Elsner, Hagiographic Geography: Travel and Allegory in the Life of Apollonius of Tyana: JHS 117 (1997) 22-37; P. Brown, The Rise and Function of the Holy Man in Late Antiquity: JECS 6 (1998) 353-376; E.A. Clark, Holy Women, Holy Words, ibid. 413-430; M. Gleason, Visiting and News: Gossip and Reputation Management in the Desert, ibid. 501-521; S. Harvey, The Stylite's Liturgy: Ritual and Religious Identity in Late Antiquity, ibid. 523-539; N. McLynn, A Self-Made Holy Man: The Case of Gregory Nazianzen, ibid. 463-483; M. Vessey, The Demise of the Christian Writer and the Remaking of “Late Antiquity”: From H.-I. Marrou's Saint Augustine (1938) to Peter Brown's Holy Man (1983), ibid. 377-411; W. Cotter, Miracles in Graeco-Roman Antiquity, A Sourcebook, London 1999; I. Ramelli, Philosophen und Prediger. Pagane und christliche weise Männer: der Apostel Paulus, in E. Amato - S. Fornaro (ed.), Dio von Prusa. Der Philosoph und seine Bild, Gottingen 2007, ch. IV; id., Alle origini della figura dell'intercessore in età paleocristiana, at press.

I. Ramelli

VIRGA (iconography). In early Christian figurative art, there appears, with noteworthy frequency and since earliest times, a character—either isolated or, more often, inserted in a context—in the act of wielding a rod, which interpreters, following the path of Wilpert (Wp 41ff.), have always considered and conventionally called the virga virtutis.

As early as pre-Christian antiquity, the virga had the primary meaning of a symbolic instrument of power over animals, human beings, and things, and secondarily of didactic activity, esp. for philosophical discipline. Patristic *exegesis added such meanings as sacramental, divine power, and liberation from physical and spiritual imperfections and death (Aug., En. in ps. 44,17-18; Quaest. in Num. XXXV; Ambr., De myst. IX,50).

During the 3rd c. this power appears exclusively associated with the figure of Christ—in scenes of the resurrection of *Lazarus, the multiplication of bread, the miracle of Cana—and the figure of *Moses—in the miracle of the spring. From the 4th c. onward the virga appears to be held by both Christ and Moses-*Peter in the Petrine cycle, and *Ezekiel in the resurrection of the dry bones. In rarer occasions the virga is held by figures who are isolated and indefinable or generally alluding to the doctrine both in communal cemeteries (Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro, 68) and in private hypogea, even in some of dubious Christianity or orthodoxy (Boyancé, Aristote sur une peinture, 107ff.; Himmelmann, Das Hypogäum der Aurelier, 24ff.).

At times, in the same figurative context, there appear two scenes with individuals armed with virgae, placed symmetrically to create a symbolic formal harmony (Van Moorsel, Il miracolo della roccia, 235-236).

A. Hermann, Ägyptologische Marginalien zur spätantiken Ikonographie: JbAC 5 (1962) 60-69; L. de Bruyne, Les lois de l'art paléochrétien comme instrument herméneutique: RivAC 39 (1963) 14ff.; P. Van Moorsel, Il miracolo della roccia nella letteratura e nell'arte paleocristiana: RivAC 40 (1964) 235-236; P. Boyancé, Aristote sur une peinture de la voie Latine, in Mélanges E. Tisserant, IV, Vatican City 1964, 107ff., M. Dulaey, Le symbole de la baguette dans l'art paléochrétien: REAug 19 (1973) 3-38; N. Himmelmann, Das Hypogäum der Aurelier am Viale Manzoni, Mainz 1975; U.M. Fasola, Le catacombe di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975, 68; M. Dulaey, "Virga virtutis tuae, virga oris tui." Le bâton du Christ dans le christianisme ancien, in Quaeritur inventus colitur. Miscellanea U.M. Fasola, Vatican City 1989, 235-245; U. Utro, TIP, 300-302.

F. Bisconti

VIRGILIUS MARO, grammarian. Originally perhaps from *Gaul or *Ireland, Virgilius lived between the 6th and the 7th c. It does not seem that he can be identified with the person targeted by *Ennodius in his epigrams De quodam stulto qui Virgilius dicebatur (Carm. II,118-122). The grammarian Virgilius composed epitomes and letters; the first constitute 15 compendia on more general questions of grammar or order, although the second focus on the eight parts of speech. *Bede was among the first who knew and used the Virgilius's works.

CPL 1559; J. Huemer, Virgilii Maronis grammatici opera, BT, Leipzig 1886; Virgilio Marone grammatico, Epitomi ed Epistole, crit. ed., G. Polara, It. trans. L. Caruso and G. Polara, Naples 1979; G. Pesenti, Frammento bobiense di Virgilio grammatico: BollFilolClass 27 (1920-21) 49-52 (ed. of a new fragment from the Epitoma de metris); D. Tardi, Les epitomae de Virgile de Toulouse. Essai de traduction critique avec une bibliographie, une introduction et des notes, Paris 1928, D. Poli, I frammenti di Virgilio Marone grammatico ser. n. 3762 dell'"Oesterreichische Nationalbibliothek" di Vienna: Quaderni linguistici e filologici 1982-84, 107-138 (critical ed. of the fragments and paleographic commentary); B. Löfstedt, Zum Wortschatz des Virgilius Maro Grammaticus: Philologus 126 (1982) 99-110.

S. Zincone

VIRGIN – VIRGINITY – VELATIO. The term "virginity" in early Christian writings (παρθενία, εὐνουχία, ἐγκράτεια, ἀγαμία, ἁγνεία) signifies a former type of ascetic life (βίος) which consists in the total renunciation of the exercise of sexuality. None of the aforementioned terms adequately expresses the reality to which it refers. Virginity leads one to think of a condition of physical integrity usually applied to females. In the case of males, mention was often made of "ascetics"; the term singularitas (Tertull., Exhor. castit. 1,1; Ps.-Cypr., De singul. cler.) recalls the solitary life of the one who does not have a wife. *Tertullian used the term virginitas to refer to a threefold physical integrity, a nativitate since birth; a lavacro, from baptism; and a morte coniungis, from the death of a spouse, with monogamy (Exhor. castit. 1,4).

Virginity had followers from the earliest days of Christianity (in the ancient world, however, nonsacral virginity was regarded as foolishness because it was contrary to the purpose of humankind: procreation). Many men and women from every type of life, following Christ since childhood, remained chaste for their whole life (Justin Martyr, I Apol. 15). Many Christians of both genders grew old without marrying (ἄγαμοι) (Athenag., Legat. 33). According to Tertullian, some live in virginal continence, remaining so even as elderly people, just as children (senes pueri: Apol. 9,19). *Eusebius of Caesarea reports the tradition of the two daughters of the apostle *Philip, who grew old remaining virgins (HE 5,24,2), placing it in the eschatological context of the resurrection. According to *Ambrose, the Christian virgins were so numerous that, if they were supported in the manner of the vestal virgins, the public treasury would be insufficient to meet this expense (Ep. 18,12).

Not unlike widows, virgins were a definite category, recognized by the church: in the liturgical gathering they had a reserved spot. They lived in the world; subsequently, the monastery became the ideal place to receive virgins and ascetics.

Virginity, inasmuch as it was a form of life, was understood to be perpetual and not temporary, as in the case of the vestal virgins, which was not morum pudicitia, sed annorum (Ambr., De virginibus I,4,15). As with all the *Fathers, Ambrose insists on the interior and spiritual nature of Christian virginity, which is embraced for love of God. In the case of the vestal virgins it is a purely physical fact: nulla meritorum est pietas, nulla mentis integritas, but only carnis virginitas (De virginitate 13). Their virtue is specious because it is not free and disinterested: illic praemiis revocantur a nuptiis . . . violentia fit, ut capiantur (De virginitate 13). Nevertheless, during the era of the Christian emperors, the rules concerning Christian virgins witnessed similarities to those of the vestal virgins; although rejected by the Fathers, they seem to have drawn inspiration from them.

The idea of virginity as total consecration to God is therefore disinterested per se: just as the contemplative Christian life, of which it is an element, is not ordered by its nature to any practical end of service. "The ascetic life has only one objective: salvation" (*Basil of Caesarea); the ascetic as such is not entrusted with the care of souls (Hausherr).

According to Ambrose, the chief duty of the bishop is to cast seeds of chastity and to inspire love for virginity: virginitatis studia provocare (De virginitate 26), at times also responding to the criticisms raised against this way of life. Such negative arguments were, e.g., the extinction of humanity, although the practice of virginity, far from compromising the development of humankind, was accompanied by an increase of births (De virginitate 36). Another criticism could be taken from the mentality of the OT where a sign of God's blessing was a fruitful marriage: God, by giving a son to Elizabeth, took from her a cause for her shame (Lk 1:25). The Virgin *Mary herself speaks of the "lowliness" of her virginal state (Lk 1:48). This criticism was refuted through a theology of virginity that emphasized the supernatural character of this state of life, emphasizing the advantages of virginity and the disadvantages of marriage.

In the writings of Christian authors, virginity usually has a biblical rationale: it is inserted in the history of salvation from which it receives meaning. The kingdom of God is already realized in the person of Christ, a virgin: those who confess virginity place themselves in harmony with the kingdom (Mt 19:12). With Christ the last times have been inaugurated but have not yet been fulfilled. Virginity is added to the realities that are characteristic of the kingdom, at the same time present and future: it has inaugurated its kingdom, which, however, also coexists with marriage. The antithesis marriage-virginity is not of a philosophical nature but is the dialectic present-future of the history of salvation. Marriage belongs to a provisional order destined to disappear; virginity is established on the fact that we are in the last times, in which the figure of this world is passing away (1 Cor 7:29-31), and the earthly values, among which is marriage, are relativized. God thus becomes the center of asceticism: the human being is conformed to his plan of salvation. Just as present and future coexist, virginity is optional, and marriage remains permissible, precisely for the present age (or the desire of the soul for union with God can and must be reconciled also with the demands of the family: *Gregory of Nyssa, De virg.), although virginity is the beginning and, at the same time, awaits and prophesies of the future age. It represents a "new," "messianic" ideal, which is essential for Christianity, given that this ideal is not an exclusive property of monasticism but is universal for all Christians (Gregory of Nyssa, De virg.).

Almost all Christian authors, in commending virginity, had recourse to the topos, specific to the Cynic-Stoic diatribe, of the inconveniences and the troubles of marriage: worries about children, the humiliating condition of inferiority of a woman who has a dominus for a husband (Aug., Confess. IX, 9,19), lack of time for prayer and Bible reading (Tertull., Ad uxorem 1,4). With this objective, they take away eschatological meaning of 1 Cor 7:28, where emphasis is given to the troubles connected to the final time, not to those deriving from the contingencies of married life. *Methodius of Olympus, ignoring considerations of this type, places virginity in the context of the history of salvation when he excessively exalts it: virginity, conceived as the natural condition of the human being in *paradise before the Fall, indicates the way to salvation (in his thought, one must keep in mind the influence of *Platonism). Through virginity, humanity manifests its relationship with the divine and participates, according to the category of beauty, in the transcendence and holiness of God (Banquet). A subsequent method of promoting virginity was the interpretation of virginity as a marriage (*see Sponsa Christi), in which there is no death, and its spiritual fruitfulness is great (Tertull., Ad. uxorem I,4,4; Resur. 61,6; Virg. Vel. 16,4; *Venantius Fortunatus, De virginitate).

In general, one can observe that the Fathers took from the *Encratite theology great regard for virginity and continence, although setting aside the excessive elements. According to *Athenagoras, many men and women grow old in virginal life in the hope of being closer to God (Legat. 33). *Clement of Alexandria, on the one hand, regarded virginity as a gift from God, to be chosen freely, but in the meantime marriage is not to be disparaged, even if per se virginity is at a higher level than marriage (Strom. IV,149,1), given that it leaves one free time for the service of God and for this reason likens one to the life of the angels. On the other hand, widowhood is regarded more highly than virginity because the widow knows what is being renounced (Strom. III,101,5; VII,76,3), and thus marriage is also greater than virginity inasmuch as the spouses resist such temptations that the virgin does not know.

Likewise according to *Origen, virginity is a gift (Comm. in Mt. 14,25): it is not obligatory, but it is only a form of respect owed to the evangelical precept (Comm. in Rom. 10,14); in this regard he delineates the difference, later established, between the evangelical order and counsel. Origen is closer to the Encratite theology in comparison to *Clement of Alexandria: the continence of males follows the example of Jesus; that of women, *Mary (Comm. in Mt. 10,17). By means of these, the human being becomes like a child who still does not know sexuality (Comm. in Mt. 13,16): sexuality makes the human being impure, even if it is carried out within marriage: for this reason the human being is born with original sin (Hom. in Lev. 8,3; 12,4): Clement, however, also combated this teaching of the Encratites.

In the theology of Tertullian, chastity is sanctity: the human being, the image of God, becomes similar to God with chastity (Exh. cast. 1,3). One of the great advantages of virginity is that it leaves time for prayer, the reading of the Scriptures; virginity makes human beings more spiritual; the one who remains a virgin becomes angelic already in the present (Ad uxorem 1,4). In the thought of Tertullian the *Montanist, continence ensures "a great capital of sanctity; with a renunciation of the exercise of sexual intercourse, one acquires the *Holy Spirit," and free from a woman, a man has a taste of the things of the Spirit (Exhor. castit. 10,11). *Cyprian followed his teacher when he stated that the virgins belonged to the angels already, the kind that we will become only after the resurrection (De hab. virg. 22).

*Athanasius views virginity in the context of the hundredfold reward, according to the parable of the sower (Ep. virg. 151,63; this parable was interpreted and exegeted first with respect to the *martyrs). *Gregory of Nyssa makes Christ come out of the corruptible state of the body and from birth through virginity (Virg.); in the explanation of *John Chrysostom, marriage was invented only to restrain the human state after the sin of *Adam and Eve (Virg. 15,2), but virginity is a gift, to be chosen freely.

*Ambrose likewise (De virginibus) regarded virginity as an angelic life because the virgin is the spouse of Christ: a specific attribute only possessed by the Christian religion—Ambrose naturally did not disparage marriage for this reason (Virg. I,6,24). Virginity is the essence of chastity, which rejects every bodily contact, whose most authentic example is Mary. According to Ambrose, it is better for the virgin to choose suicide than to suffer defloration at the hands of the persecuting pagan (Virg. III,7,32; Augustine was more restrained on this point: Civ. Dei I,26).

*Jerome was closer to the Encratite line: according to his teaching it is good if the wife lives with her husband as if he were her brother: for this reason she also acquires a masculine character (Ep. 71,3). *Jovinian's teaching, which maintains that marriage and virginity have the same value, was rejected by Augustine (Virg. 45,46), but the same Augustine defends marriage against the *Manicheans.

The great regard for virginity is therefore common in the writings of the Fathers, likewise in association with the virginal-angelic life.

The obligations for those who wished to consecrate themselves to God were very severe: it was requested that the veil of the virgin be given only to that young girl who was presented at a young age: mature in faith and virtue, reserved in conduct, protected by her mother and firm in her resolution (Ambrose, De virginitate 39). To accomplish this ideal, the virgin had to overcome the resistance of her relatives: vince prius, puella, pietatem. Si vincis domum, vincis saeculum ("Young girl, first conquer piety. If you win for yourself a home, you win the present age," Ambr., De virginibus I,12,64).

The virgins made a public profession of their life commitment (Ps.-Ambr., Laps. virg. 5,19) and received a veil: sacro velamine tecta es (Ps.-Ambr., Laps. virg. 5,20). "To take on the veil" became synonymous with making a virginal profession (Ambr., De virginitate 39). *Marcellina, Ambrose's sister, made her profession before Pope *Liberius in the basilica of St. *Peter, on Christmas Day perhaps in 353. The ceremony implied a change of garment and a speech for the newly professed woman (Ambr., De virginibus III,1,1).

The one who has professed to be a virgin must leave her house only when accompanied by her mother, and that should only happen rarely, even if it is just for going to church: the separation of virgins from society was considered a sign of modesty (Exhor. virg. 71). Visits even to their parents and friends were rare (De virginitate III, 3,9). Cyprian prohibited virgins from flaunting their wealth, abundance, adornments, participating in nuptial banquets and from visiting baths (De hab. virg. 19). Tertullian demanded that virgins wear a veil, inside and outside church; if it is taken off, the Spirit remains offended. A young girl without a veil is no longer a virgin (De virg. vel. 3). The veil is the helmet and the shield that protects the virgin from temptations, scandals, gossip and envy (De virg. vel. 15). The veil must not be short like a cap but must come down covering the shoulders, just like hair let down (De virg. vel. 17,2).

A great problem for virgins was pride: the excellence of their state could suggest such thoughts, to which the Fathers drew attention: "If one can persevere in chastity for the glory of the Lord, let that one remain humble. If one boasts, one is lost" (Ignatius, Polyc. 5,2); a humble wife is worth more than a proud virgin (Aug., Enarr. in Ps. 75,16; 99,13; Sermo 354,9).

This form of Christian asceticism had value for the Fathers only if united to orthodoxy. With respect to the vestal virgins and continent pagan priests, Tertullian spoke of the chastity that led to ruin (perditricem); only Christian chastity saves (conservatricem) (Exhor. cast. 13,2). The asceticism of *Marcion and the Encratites was regarded by Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian as ungodly and blasphemous because it was an expression against the God of the OT. The chastity of these heretics was prompted by the objective of not collaborating, through marriage, in the work of the Creator God. True chastity, homage to God, cannot be separated from faith in the true God. This was also St. Augustine's teaching: one cannot call veraciter pudicum the one who does not practice virtue propter Deum verum (Nupt. et concup. I, 3,4).

R. Metz, La consécration des vierges dans l'Église romaine, Paris 1954; H. Crouzel, Virginité et mariage selon Origène, Paris-Bruges 1963; L. Legrand, La dottrina biblica della verginità, It. trans. Turin 1965; S. Frank, Anghelikòs Bíos. Begriffsanalytische und begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum "engelgleichen Leben" im frühen Mönchtum, Münster 1964; P.F. Beatrice, Continenza e matrimonio nel cristianesimo primitivo (sec. I-II), in var. aus., Etica sessuale e matrimonio nel cristianesimo delle origini, Studia Patr. Mediol. 5, Milan 1976, 3-68; C. Tibiletti, Ascetismo e storia della salvezza nel De habitu virginum di Cipriano: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 431-442; C. Tibiletti, Verginità e matrimonio in antichi scrittori cristiani, Rome ²1983; G. Sfameni Gasparro, Enkrateia e antropologia. Le motivazioni protologiche della continenza e della verginità nel cristianesimo dei primi secoli e nello gnosticismo (SEA 20), Rome 1984; A. Guillaumont, Le célibat monastique et l'idéal chrétien de la virginité ont-ils des motivations ontologiques et protologiques?, in La tradizione dell'enkrateia. Motivazioni ontologiche e protologiche. Atti del Colloquio int., Milan, 20-23 aprile 1982, ed. U. Bianchi, Rome 1985, 83-98; C. Tibiletti, Matrimonio e verginità in S. Agostino, in Fede e sapere nella conversione di Agostino, ed. A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Fac. di Lettere Genova 1986, 27-42; Ch. Munier, Mariage et virginité dans l'Église ancienne (Ier-IIIe siècles) (Traditio christiana 6), Frankfurt 1987; C. Tibiletti, Metodio d'Olimpo. Verginità e platonismo: Orpheus 8 (1987) 127-137; P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity (Lectures on the hist. of religions n.s. 13), New York 1988; H. Savon, Un modèle de sainteté à la fin du IVe siècle: la virginité dans l'oeuvre de saint Ambroise: Problèmes d'histoire du christianisme 19 (1989) 21-31; A. Cameron, Virginity as Metaphor: Women and the Rhetoric of Early Christianity, in History as Text: The Writing of the Ancient History, ed. A. Cameron, Chapel Hill 1990, 181-205; D. Hart Mark, Reconciliation of Body and Soul: Gregory of Nyssa's Deeper Theology of Marriage: ThS 51 (1990) 450-478; V. Andò, La verginità come follia: il Peri parthenion ippocratico: Quaderni storici 25 (1990) 715-737; L. Desanti, Vestali e vergini cristiane: AARC 8, Naples 1990, 473-488; Th. Felder, Jungfräulichkeit als Anteilnahme am Geheimnis der Kirche nach Augustinus, Innsbruck 1991; A.-G. Hamman, Ascèse et virginité à Carthage au IIIe siècle, in Memoriam sanctorum venerantes: miscellanea in onore di V. Saxer (Studi di antichità cristiana 48), Vatican City 1992, 503-514; C. Mazzucco, Matrimonio e verginità nei Padri tra IV e V secolo: prospettive femminili, in La donna nel pensiero cristiano antico, ed. U. Mattioli, Genoa 1992, 119-153; P. Huybrechts, Le Traité de la virginité de Grégoire de Nysse: idéal de vie monastique ou idéal de vie chrétienne?: NRTh 115 (1993) 227-242; P. Mattei, Deux notes sur mariage (divorce) et virginité dans Novatien: RSLR 29 (1993) 357-365; B. Brennan, Deathless Marriage and Spiritual Fecundity in Venantius Fortunatus's De virginitate: Traditio 51 (1996) 73-97; H.F. Keroloss, Virginity in the Early Church: The Meanings and Motives of Sexual Renunciation in the First Four Centuries, New York 1996; V.E.F. Harrison, Gender, Generation, and Virginity in Cappadocian Theology: JTS 47 (1996) 38-68; Ch. Methuen, The "Virgin Widow": A Problematic Social Role for the Early Church?: HTR 90 (1997) 285-298; R. Lizzi, Vergini di Dio, vergini di Vesta: il sesso negato e la sacralità, in L'eros difficile: amore e sessualità nell'antico cristianesimo (Armarium. Biblioteca di storia e cultura religiosa 9), ed. S. Pricoco, Soveria Mannelli 1998, 89-132; G. Schöllgen, Der Eros der Jungfräulichkeit: zum Konzept der sexuellen Askese in den sogenannten Thekla-Akten, in Im Gedächtnis der Kirche neu erwachen: Studien zur Geschichte des Christentums in Mittel- und Osteuropa: Festgabe für G. Adriányi (Bonner Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte 22), Cologne-Vienna 2000, 597-606; D.G. Hunter, The Virgin, the Bride, and the Church: Reading Psalm 45 in Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine: Church History 69 (2000) 281-303; RAC 19, 523-592.

C. Tibiletti - L. Odrobina

VIRGO PARENS. The *carmen Virgo Parens, from the codices, is mainly attributed to *Gregory the Great, but also to *Jerome and, according to the De metris of *Aldhelm, who cites it in v. 10, to an unknown Andrew the Orator. The dogmatic content and metrical and stylistic analysis suggest that the carmen should be dated between the 6th and 8th c. It came to light in a complete form only within the anthology inscriptions contained in the cod. Palat. Lat. 833, olim Laureshamensis, of the 9th c., which concluded with an ametrical poem dedicated to Pope Gregory, and in an 11th-c. miscellaneous codex of Antwerp, with a dedication to Rusticiana. Other codices have transmitted it in a fragmentary manner. The text was published for the first time at Antwerp by Theodore Poelmann in 1560 and later by Caspar von Barth and in various epigraphic collections. The carmen contains in 24 verses some themes of a doctrinal character, esp. of a *christological nature and on the virginal maternity of *Mary. In all probablity, the carmen was used in the Advent and Christmas *liturgy and, perhaps, also in other circumstances, but its good fortune in the course of the centuries is connected to its popular recitation and singing.

C. von Barth, Adversariorum commentariorum libri LX, I, Frankfurt, 1624; J. Gruter, Inscriptiones antiquae totius orbis Romani, Heidelberg 1602-1603; G. Fleetwood, Inscriptionum antiquarum Sylloge, London 1691, 534,1; G.B. De Rossi, ICR 2,1, Rome 1888, 36 n. 2; Anthologia Latina, ed. F. Buecheler-A. Riese, Leipzig 1906, I,2, 494[C]; PLS 3, 1429-1430; R.M. D'Angelo, Natura umana e divina di Christo in Anth. Lat. 494[C] R.[2], Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, n. F. 147 (2004) 390-407; A. Brasseur, Uirgo parens. Le destin d'une épigramme latine des premiers siècles de notre ère, Geneva, Droz, 2006 (Publications romanes et françaises, 240).

R. Ronzani

VIRTUES and VICES. The concept of "virtue" goes back to Greek philosophy: already mentioned by some pre-Socratic philosophers, it was primarily the Socratic tradition that used it. *Plato provided the first systematization of this concept, in the form of the four fundamental virtues (Rep. 427e), later called "cardinal" virtues (Ambrose, Hom. Luc. V,62), because these correspond to the natural human constitution, of which they manifest harmony and good moral health. *Aristotle continues this tradition, complementing it: for him, the virtues are not innate but acquired. He distinguishes between intellectual and moral virtues and inserts them within the framework of hexis, in Latin habitus, that is, the overall disposition of the human being. Virtue arises out of the exercise of human freedom and thus means excellence (which is a fundamental meaning of the term aretē); it is the permanent disposition of choice, which is brought about by holding oneself to the just means determined by reason (EN II, 6,1106b36-1107a1). Ancient *Stoicism spread Platonic thought far and wide concerning the four cardinal virtues (prudence, fortitude, wisdom and temperance); see Diog. Laer., Vit. Philos. VII,92.

The Platonic teaching on the virtues posed some complex problems for early Christian thinkers who were intent on distinguishing themselves from the milieu in which they lived and affirming the uniqueness of Christianity while desiring to safeguard whatever good was found in pagan teaching. The problem was complex inasmuch as in the biblical tradition one did not find a systematic theory of virtue. It was an important problem of Christian acculturation: how to move from a Semitic form of thought to a form of thinking that was dominant in the Greco-Roman world. In fact, with respect to the OT, with the exception of the late book of Wisdom, which lists the four virtues (8:7), we find, if not the precise term of "virtue," at least numerous moral behaviors that imply a relation to God that can be categorized under one virtue or another. However, it remains difficult to transfer these behaviors into the Greco-Roman world. *Philo of Alexandria reconciled the formulas of Aristotle and the Stoics with the *Bible: the virtues are planted and perfected in the soul by the power of God (Leg. alleg. I,52.48.49).

The NT, however, already presented an outline for the interpretation of the virtues and the Christian ideal. The only case in which one finds the term "virtue" used is Phil 4:8, where virtue is connected to everything that is true, pure and honorable. Virtue, therefore, is understood with the meaning of "excellence," ideal behavior. But at the same time *Paul emphasized the fact that following Christ led to some specifically Christian virtues, which were essentially free and a gift of God: faith, hope and charity (the most ancient citation is 1 Th 3:1; and then 1 Cor 13:13). The Fathers also composed different genealogical lists of virtues (see, e.g., Shepherd of *Hermas III,8,7); these lists agree inasmuch as they place faith at the beginning and charity at the end (Ign., Eph. 14,1).

Although the first Christian writers do not speak very much of the virtues, which in their eyes were connected to pagan morality, starting from *Clement of Alexandria the effort to integrate pagan teaching on the virtues in a specifically Christian ethical reflection became esp. emphasized. A large quantity of the Platonic and Stoic ethical teachings passed into Clement's writings on Paul. The definition of virtue (Paed. I,101,2; III,35,2) goes as follows: virtue is produced from a just mixing of natural inclinations, learning and exercise, as the Aristotelian school taught. Virtue is insufficient, however, by itself to obtain Christian happiness: Christian happiness does not depend on external events but only from deep-seated conviction (Strom. IV,52,1-2). The doctrine of the self-sufficiency of virtue had constituted an essential element of Stoic and *Middle Platonist ethics. The same idea was supported by *Justin Martyr (see Apol. II,11). Clement was the first Christian writer to present an organically developed doctrine of the four virtues, called "cardinal." The first is prudence, distinguishing in the Aristotelian manner between practical wisdom (that is, prudence) and in "theoretical" wisdom (Top. VI,3,141a 6ff.). In this definition Clement (Strom. VI,154,4) agrees with Alcinous (Didask. 153,4-6). The definition of prudence in Strom. II,34,4; III,84,1 etc. ("prudence prescribes what must be done and identifies what must not be done") derives from Stoicism and in harmony with that of the Middle Platonists Alcinous (Didask. 182,23-24) and Apuleius (Plat. II,228); substantially the same procedure that Clement uses—deriving the meaning from Stoicism and in harmony with the Middle Platonism that was contemporaneous to him—can also be found in the definition of the other virtues. Moreover, along with the Middle Platonists, Clement also attributes one specific virtue to a particular part of the soul: (1) prudence perfects the logistikon, the intellect; (2) courage is the force of the thymoeidēs, of the irascible appetite when it is moved against evil; (3) temperance resists the epithymētikon, which is concupiscence; (4) justice harmonizes in just proportion the exercise of the preceding virtues. One likewise finds in the writings of Clement the idea, typical of the Stoics, that the virtues are like a chain: one follows the other. By emphasizing the dynamic aspect of virtue, the Stoics saw its efficacy in the battle against the vices and the passions, which are the illnesses of the soul. Their ideal of impassibility, apatheia, was adopted by the Eastern Fathers but with an essentially different meaning. After Clement, teaching on virtue already constituted an essential part of the moral and ascetic teaching of Christians.

In the Latin world the first example of the use of the term "virtue" is given to us by *Tertullian, who regarded virtue primarily as patience, to which he dedicated a specific treatise (On Patience). The Christian's patience is not, among the virtues, the most important, given that love has the first place, as one reads both in Paul's epistles and in the corpus of Johannine writings. But Tertullian, on the one hand, wanted to demonstrate that there existed a point of contact between pagan and Christian ethics (see Apol. 46,2), and on the other hand, he wanted to emphasize the uniqueness and superiority of the Christian virtue of patience, and last, he could not disregard the Stoic doctrine, which during this time was the most authoritative in the ethical sphere. Patience, moreover, constituted an essential element of Roman morality: e.g., it was praised in the military sphere and the specific life of the Quirites. For this reason, even the Christian—who being a "soldier of Christ," according to an idea in which Tertullian draws on the ethics of Paul—had to exercise the virtue of patience both in daily life and esp. in the case of *martyrdom. The Christian was therefore the equivalent of the Roman hero and the Stoic wise man. As a result, this conception of patience derives in large measure from the Stoic idea of "impassibility" (apatheia), and such virtue is, in Tertullian's description, more Stoic than Christian. The author, moreover, also uses pagan concepts, and more specifically, those of Seneca (who, as is known, was often called by him "one of our own") (see Epist. Luc. 66,45-48; also in 67,4-5 Seneca emphasized the role played by patience in the practice of wisdom). Other reminiscences of Seneca are found in the elaboration of the gospel precept (Mt 5:39): "But whoever slaps you on your right cheek, turn to him the other also." Tertullian analyzes the inner satisfaction that is evidence of the patient person: he shows how impassibility tires and brings down his enemy. This affirmation adopts many insights offered by Seneca, when the latter describes the disposition of those who cause offense and the reaction of those who suffer from it (see Epist. 53,12; De const. sap. 3,5; 9, 4-5; 14,2); see also the affirmation, "The gain of the one who causes offense consists in the pain of the one who undergoes it" (De const. sap. 17,4). Also the affirmation that the basis of Christian patience is the patience of Christ during his passion (see Tert., On patience 3,1ff.), or God's patience shown toward human beings (see 2,1), is closer to a pagan way of thinking. This patience, in fact, has nothing to do with the salvation brought by Christ to human beings by means of his passion. The life of the wise Stoic is an illustration of a teaching and concrete example of human perfection, while that of Christ is the foundation of human virtue and the ideal model proposed for the Christian's imitation (On Patience 6,1).

The great artisan of the integration between pagan and Christian virtue was *Ambrose of Milan, whose De officiis drew on Cicero's model, having the same title: the Ambrosian conception of virtue inaugurated the new attitude of the Christian's toward the pagan virtues. This Christianization of the virtues was then brought to completion esp. by *Augustine, who emphasized the superiority of the specifically Christian virtues, faith, hope and charity, over those pagan ones, which are simply moral, the art of living well (Civ. Dei XXII,24). But esp. during the anti-Pelagian controversy, Augustine energetically affirmed that virtue only comes from God (Civ. Dei XIX,25). Starting from Augustine, the four cardinal virtues were integrated with the Christian ("theological") virtues, and the synthesis offered by *Gregory the Great would facilitate this integration.

The struggle between virtues and vices was likewise an idea of Greek origin, shown by the exemplification of the choice that was placed before Hercules at the crossroads (Xenophon, Mem. II,1,22-23), according to the teaching of the Pythagorean Prodi-cus: the hero, as a young man, sees Aretē and Kakia presenting themselves before him, each one of which set forth a choice of life. Ambrose drew inspiration from this image, explaining that in our soul, pleasure and virtue are opposed (De Cain et Abel I, 4,13-5,21). Tertullian (Spect. 29,5) and *Cyprian (Mort. 4) had already represented the conflict between virtues and vices. Augustine, illustrating the interior debate in which he found himself before conversion, primarily makes his "old friends" speak, that is, carnal pleasures, and then listens to the speeches of Continentia (Conf. VIII,11,25-27). During the same years *Prudentius dedicated an extensive exposition to this theme in his epic poem titled Psychomachia ("battle of the soul" or "battle in the soul," namely, between virtue and vice), which had a very broad echo during the Middle Ages.

Gregory the Great, commenting on Job 39:25 (Mor. XXXI,45,87-91), describes the combat against the human being waged by the entire army of vices: their leader is pride, and the commandments are the seven chief vices; he does not speak, however, of a combat of vices against virtues, because the latter are not mentioned. *Isidore of Seville (Sent. II,32-34: PL 83,634-644) spoke generically of a battle of the virtues against the vices.

With subtle psychological observation, the Greek fathers (and subsequently the Byzantines, esp. the hesychasts) described the birth of the passions. They begin from the conviction that wickedness does not belong to the nature of the human being; it must, therefore, come "from outside" by means of a wicked thought (logismos). "The source and principle of all sin are wicked thoughts," Origen had already said (Comm. Matth. 21: GCS 40,58). The first level of this beginning is the prosbolē, which is a suggestion, a sinful image. There follows the syndiasmos, a "conversation" with what is suggested, without any decision for or against. The synkatathesis is the consent given to the suggestion. The palē is an internal struggle, the effort to deliver oneself from wickedness. The one who consents more often falls into aichmalōsia, captivity of the pathos, passion (John of Damascus, De virt. et vit.: PG 95,93A). In the West, in Augustine's writings we read of three levels: suggestus-delectatio-consensus (Enarr. in Ps. 143,6). But Augustine also spoke of the combat and the consuetudo in wickedness.

Avoiding the first suggestions, say the ascetics, is humanly impossible. Avoiding consent is necessary. The art of the spiritual life, however, consists in knowing how to avoid even "conversations" with evil.

To immediately combat the evil thought from the outset requires discernment. To facilitate the process, *Evagrius of Pontus presents a list of eight chief vices, which then became traditional. His teaching is summarized in ch. 6 of the Praktikos: "In all, there are eight chief ideas that include all of wickedness: the first is that of the gluttony [gastrimargia], then that of fornication [porneia], the third of avarice [philargyria], the fourth of sadness [lypē], the fifth of anger [orgē], the sixth of sloth [akēdia], the seventh of vainglory [kenodoxia], the eighth of pride [hyperēphania]" (SC 171,506ff.).

Latin authors (*John Cassian) reduced the list to seven vices, because they united vainglory to pride; moreover, they substituted sadness with envy (which is the sadness that arises by seeing somebody else's good); likewise, the order is reversed on the basis of Sir 10:15 (Vulg): Initium omnis peccati est superbia ("The beginning of all sin is pride"). The Easterners, on the contrary, remained faithful to Evagrius's order, whose teaching yielded splendid fruits in the 7th c. with *Maximus the Confessor.

DSp 9, 955-957; DTC 15, 2739-2799; J.S. Stelzenberger, Die Beziehungem der frühchristlichen Sittenlehre zur Ethik der Stoa, Munich 1933, 307-354; G.E. Konstantinou, Die Tugendlehre Gregors von Nyssa, Würzburg 1966; W. Völker, Scala Paradisi. Eine Studie zu Johannes Climacus und zugleich eine Vorstudie zu Symeon dem Neuen Theologen, Wiesbaden 1968; A. Guillaumont, Introduzione al Praktikós di Evagrio: SC 170, 55ff.; M. Spanneut, Le stoïcisme des pères de l'Église . . ., Paris [2]1957, Th. Spidlík, La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique: OCA 206, Rome 1979, 255ff. (vices), 277ff. (virtues).

C. Moreschini

VISIGOTHS. Population of E Germans, belonging to the great people of the *Goths, who emigrated from the banks of the Baltic Sea into S Russia on the Dniestr River and on the Black Sea. The era in which the division of the Goths into *Ostrogoths and Visigoths occurred is uncertain. According to Jordanes, this took place after their siege in *Pontus when the Visigoths recognized the authority of the Baltungs; the Ostrogoths, on the other hand, recognized the authority of the Amali. In the 4th c. Christianity spread among them in the *Arian form preached by Bishop *Wulfila. At the same time the Visigoths were forced by the *Huns to move toward the W and to thus enter the Roman sphere.

In 376, led by Fritigern, they crossed the Danube and were obliged to defend *Thrace. On account of the Roman administrators, they rebelled and defeated the Roman forces at Marcianopolis in 377 and then inflicted on them a defeat at Hadrianopolis (9 August 378), where the emperor *Valens lost his life; the emperor had rushed to protect *Constantinople, which was threatened by the invaders. Subsequently, the Goths, led by Athanaric, prudently agreed to become allies of the empire, taking up a stable dwelling in Moesia Inferior. After the death of *Theodosius the Great (395), *Stilicho took from Alaric, the new dux of the Visigoths, any hope of obtaining high Roman military dignity, although he had participated in the battles against the usurper Eugenius and had suffered heavy losses of troops in the battle near the River Frigido (5 September 394). The consequences were disastrous for the empire because Alaric with his people put *Thrace, *Macedonia and *Thessaly to the test; he entered Greece and conquered *Athens; he then crossed the isthmus of *Corinth to then dwell in the Peloponnese and finally settled in Illyricum, which he governed in the name of the emperor *Arcadius with the title of dux and magister militum, in expectance of the propitious occasion that would allow him to invade the Italian peninsula. In 400, once the Alans and the Vandals had entered Noricum and Rhetia, Stilicho had to advance toward them. Alaric therefore headed toward *Milan, but Stilicho, who had reached an agreement with those barbarians, turned back and defeated the Visigoths at Pollenza on the River Tanaro (402). Upon the death of Stilicho (408), Alaric found no resistance on his path into *Italy and was able to go straight toward *Rome.

After the first sack of Rome in 410, while there was great confusion in the Italian peninsula, which by that time had fallen to pieces, the Visigoths, the protagonists of one of the most traumatic events in the history of the city of Rome, soon found themselves without leadership because of Alaric's unforeseen disappearance. After three days of sacking Rome, Alaric came up with the idea of quickly pursuing the conquest of the rich province of *Africa, to then reenter and rule with an iron fist over the entire peninsula. His brother-in-law Ataulf succeeded him, who, intimidated by the overwhelming forces of Heraclian, the general of *Honorius, abandoned the idea of the conquest of Africa and preferred to go N toward *Gaul, where, in 412, he began a true and proper war against the Romans after having made a pact with the antiemperor *Jovinus, who had usurped the title in 411; however, the agreement between the two lasted none too long on account of Jovinus's desire to govern the entirety of Gaul without interference from anyone. Ataulf then turned to the emperor Honorius, promising the head of the usurper as well as the return of his sister *Galla Placidia, who had been taken prisoner by the Goths during the sack of Rome, in exchange for provisions of grain and an allotment of land. Honorius accepted at first but then did not keep his promise, a deed which forced Ataulf to adopt a hostile stance against the empire.

In 413 the Visigoths were able to occupy in rapid succession *Narbonne, *Toulouse and *Bordeaux, and at the beginning of 414 Ataulf, after Galla Placidia had been married a second time, radically changed his disposition from bellicose to peaceful. Nevertheless, war immediately became inevitable and, after changing events, once the situation of the Goths became desperate, Ataulf was forced to seek refuge in *Spain, where in 415 he occupied the province of Tarraco, dwelling there for a short while. Wallia, his successor, maintained his promises to the Romans, and between 416 and 418, he obtained the province of Aquitanica Secunda and some neighboring districts. That same year Wallia died. His successor *Theodoric (419–451) had the duty of establishing and executing the division of lands among the Gothic and Roman population, the latter of which was forced, to its detriment, to accept the situation. The relations between the two peoples were also difficult because the Visigoths did not seem to regard with due seriousness the value of the foedus that had long connected them to the empire. One simply has to think of what occurred in 422, when the Romans, who had lined up for war against the Vandals, counting on the intervention of Gothic troops, had the unfortunate surprise of being attacked from behind the back precisely from their "allies," who took the occasion to attempt to deliver themselves from the imperial yoke. The Visigoths witnessed their full sovereignty recognized over the provinces which were originally assigned to them (Aquitanica Secunda and the NW corner of Narbonensis Prima). In exchange, they were forced to restore to the empire the territories conquered until 426. The Visigothic kingdom of Toulouse was thus born. Only the danger of the *Huns threatening Rome could unite the Romans with the Visigoths against a common enemy. King Theodoric helped defeat *Attila in the Battle of the Catalaunian Plains (451), where the same courageous Gothic sovereign met his death.

After the reigns of Thurismund (451–453) and Theodoric II (453–466), it was *Euric who took the reins of the kingdom of Toulouse and was the true founder of that kingdom because the emperor Julius Nepos (475) formally recognized his sovereignty over the entire region including that territory between the Loire River, the Rhone River, the Pyrenees Mountains and the two oceans, and also Alvernia. With Euric not only the kingdom of Toulouse reached its maximal extension because a good part of the Iberian Peninsula was connected to it, but, as Sidonius Apollinaris recalled, the court of Toulouse became a vital and living center. The border of that kingdom was in continual opposition between the Gothic Arian minority and the Catholic majority. The situation intensified with Alaric II, Euric's successor, who, as the last act of conciliation between the two populations of different religious confessions, promulgated on 2 February 506 the Lex Romana Visigothorum, also called the Breviarium Alarici. The Gallo-Romans, however, wanted to remove the Visigoths and sought assistance from the Frankish king *Clovis, who had recently converted to Catholicism (496). The Frankish king therefore attacked Alaric, who lost the battle and his life at Campus Vocladensis (modern-day Vouillé). It was the end of the kingdom of Toulouse. The Visigoths were able to survive only thanks to the intervention of Theodoric the Great, who preserved the crown for his infant grandson Amalaric (507–531). He, likewise for confessional reasons, mistreated his spouse *Clotilde, Clovis's daughter, leading Clovis to declare war on the newborn Spanish kingdom. Alaric was defeated near Narbonne in 531, and the Visigoths, unable, as in the recent past, to count any longer on Theodoric's assistance and no longer able to endure the push of the experienced, warlike people like the Franks, lost Aquitaine. Immediately after the defeat, *Alaric was slain by his own soldiers, and with his demise the royal dynasty of the Balti was extinguished; from that time onward the throne was the object of pursuit by many aristocratic families, and the induction of a new dynasty became impossible.

The emperor *Justinian sought to take advantage of the internal disagreements at the court which from Athanagild was established at *Toledo and conquered Baetica (modern-day Andalusia). The brother of Athanagild, *Leovigild (567–583), extended the rule of his kingdom of the Suevi, in *Gallaecia, and inflicted a heavy defeat on the Franks also thanks to the decisive contribution of his son *Recared. Once the internal tensions between Arians and Hispano-Catholics were resolved, Leovigild dedicated himself to fierce anti-Catholic persecutions to which even his son Ermenegild fell victim, while Recared (586–606) began the work of Romanization of the kingdom with his conversion to Catholicism and the ensuing conversion of his people, which was decided at the Third Council of *Toledo (589). The fusion was thus accelerated between the Visigoths and the Hispano-Romans and, despite the foolish attempts to bring *Arianism back to supremacy such as those carried out by Witteric (603–610), was greatly aided by developments in Visigothic legislation.

Scholars are not certain (in fact, they are in considerable disagreement) whether the aspect of personality rather than territoriality prevailed in Visigothic law, but since Recceswinth with the Liber Iudiciorum of 654, all the laws were gathered together, which he regarded as antiquae, and his own were added to these and were considered the corpus that was thus established as valid for the entire population of the kingdom. This had also as its objective reaching a definitive integration between Arians and Catholics. Characteristic, however, of the kingdom of *Sisebut (612–620) was the persecution of Jews, who, since the imperial age, lived in great numbers in *Spain and were protected by the apposite laws. In the 5th c. with the Lex Romana Visigothorum, Alaric II had received the Roman legislation concerning the Jews and only introduced some restrictions such as the maintenance of the separation between the races that resulted from the law that made marriage between Catholics and Jews adultery, and the prohibition for Jews of possessing Christian slaves and holding public offices. With the Third Synod of Toledo, Recared had already modified the law of Alaric II, making *baptism obligatory for the sons of mixed marriages; Sisebut went further and ordered that all Jews be baptized, with the punishment of exile and confiscation of their goods if they refused to do so. Sisebut was a leader of noteworthy stature who was not only distinguished in victorious military campaigns and in defense of Catholicism but was also a man of letters who had a significant role in the so-called renaissance of culture in Spain.

After Recared's conversion, numerous prestigious episcopal schools were developed that were aimed at the formation of the Gothic bureaucracy as well as the clergy. Alongside the episcopal schools, monastic schools were already spreading which had a foundational importance in the rediscovery and the ensuing study of the Latin classics. There were not a few Visigothic sovereigns who acquired an unusual amount of culture for the times, and Sisebut was one of these; in fact he was one of its authors. The most serious problem of the Toledan kingdom was the internal conflict at the court between those who desired to return to their Arian origins and the supporters of the Catholic Church. Moreover, there always remained the unsolved question of the succession to the throne, which remained electoral and not dynastic. A remedy to the political instability was sought, but all attempts were in vain, and the perennial infighting among the nobility caused the decline of the society. Upon the death of Wittizia, in 710, the new king Roderic was not recognized by Wittizia's relatives, and in the meantime the Arabs, who had already besieged Spain during the reign of Wamba (672–680), took advantage of the disagreement among the Gothic aristocrats; under the leadership of Al Tarik, on 19 July 711, near Lake Janda, they obtained an important victory over the Visigothic army led by Roderic himself. In 713 the Visigothic king, once his military forces had gathered for a final and desperate attempt of defense near Segovia, underwent a decisive defeat that was the final act of Visigothic rule over the Iberian Peninsula, which from that moment would uninterruptedly remain in the hands of the Arabs for seven centuries.

Sources: Auctarium Havniense, MGH (AA) IX, 249ff.; Braulius of Saragossa, Epistolae, ed. Madoz, Madrid 1941; Chronica Caesaraugustana, MGH (AA) XI, 221ff.; Chronica Gallica, MGH (AA) IX, 615ff.; Codex Euricianus, ed. A. d'Ors. Estudios Visigóticos II. Cuadernos del Instituto Jurídico Español 12, Rome-Madrid 1960; Concilia Hispaniae, PL 84, 327-562; Concilios Visigóticos, ed. J. Vives, España Cristiana, 1, Barcelona-Madrid 1963; Continuationes Isidorianae, MGH (AA) IX (2), 323-388; Epistulae Arelatenses genuinae, MGH (Epist.); Formulae Visigothicae, MGH (Form.); Fredegar, Chronicon, MGH (SRM) II, 1-193; John of Biclaro, Chronicon, PL 96; Julian of Toledo, Historia rebellionis Pauli adversus Wambam Gothorum regem, PL 96, 759-796; Julian of Toledo, Vita sancti Ildefonsi, PL 96; Gregory of Tours, Historia Francorum, ed. M. Oldoni, Vicenza 1981; Ildephonsus Leodegarius of Toledo, Opera omnia, PL 96; Isidore of Seville, Etymologiarum sive originum libri XX, ed. W.M. Lindsay, II, 1911; Id., Historia de regibus Gothorum, Wandalorum et Suevorum, PL 58; Id., Chronicon, PL 83; Id., De natura rerum, ed. J. Fontaine, Bordeaux 1960; Id., Sententiae, PL 83; Id., De Ecclesiae Officiis, PL 96; Id., De viris illustribus, PL 83; Id., Regula monachorum, PL 83; Id., Liber numerorum, PL 83; Id., De Veteri et Novo testamento quaestiones, PL 83; Id., Versus in Bibliotheca, ed. Beeson, in Isidor-Studien, Munich 1913, 133-166; Jordanes, De origine actibus Getharum, MGH Auct. Ant. V/1, 53-138; Laterculus regum Visigothorum, MGH (AA) XIII, 461ff.; Leander of Seville, Regula ad virgines, PL 72; Leges Visigothorum, MGH Leges nationum Germanicarum I; Lex Romana Visigothorum, ed. G. Haenel, 1849 = Aalen 1962; Liber Ordinum, ed. Ferotin, Paris 1904; Luca Tudensis, Chronicon mundi, III, in R. Grosse, Las fuentes de la época visigoda y bizantina (Fontes Hispaniae Antiquae IX), Barcelona 1947; Martin of Braga, Opera Omnia, ed. C.W. Barlow, in Papers and monographs of the American Academy in Rome 12, New Haven, CT 1950; Sidonius Apollinaris, Carmina, MGH (AA) VIII; Sidonius Apollinaris, Epistulae, MGH (AA) VIII; Sisebut, Vita Desiderii, MGH, SRM III; Sidonius Apollinaris, Epistolae Visigothorum, MGH, Epist. III; Sidonius Apollinaris, Carmen de eclipsibus solis et lunae, edited by J. Fontaine in the ed. of the De natura rerum by Isidore of Seville, Bordeaux 1960.

Studies: R. de Ureña, La legislación gótico-hispana, Madrid 1905; Hfl-Lecl; Z. García Villada, Historia eclesiástica de España, t. II, 1 and 2 (Época visigótica), Madrid 1933; A. García Gallo, Nacionalidad y territorialidad del derecho en la época visigoda: AHDE 13 (1936-41) 168-264; R. Menéndez Pidal, Historia de España, 3 vols., Madrid 1940; Vives, Concilios; A. Mundò, Il monachesimo nella penisola iberica fino al secolo VII, in Settimane di studio del Centro italiano di Studi sull'Alto medioevo, IV, Il monachesimo nell'alto medioevo e la formazione della civiltà occidentale, Spoleto 1957; J. Fontaine, Isidore de Séville et la culture classique dans l'Espagne wisigothique, II, Paris 1959; A. d'Ors, El Código de Eurico: Estudios visigóticos II, Cuaderno del Instituto Juridíco Español 12, Rome-Madrid 1960; P. Riché, Éducation et culture dans l'Occident barbare. VI^e-VIII^e siècles, Paris 1962; J. Fontaine, Conversion et culture chez les Wisigoths d'Espagne, in La conversione al Cristianesimo nell'Europa dell'alto medioevo, Centro italiano di Studi sull'Alto medioevo (Spoleto 14-19 aprile 1966), Spoleto 1967, 87-147; G. Astuti, Sul sistema delle fonti negli ordinamenti dei regni romano-barbarici dell'Occidente, in Le fonti. Età romano-barbarica, Padova 1968, App. II, 489-508; E.A. Thompson, The Goths in Spain, Oxford 1969; J. Orlandís, El primer renacimiento eclesiástico en la España visigoda, Madrid 1976; M. Rouche, L'Aquitaine: Des Wisigoths aux Arabes, 418-781: Naissance d'une région, Paris 1979; E. James (ed.), Visigothic Spain, Oxford 1980; H. Mitteis - H. Lieberich, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte. Ein Studienbuch, Munich 1981; L.A. García Moreno, Historia de la España visigoda, Madrid 1989; H. Wolfram, Histoire des Goths, Paris 1990; B. Luiselli, Storia culturale dei rapporti tra mondo romano e mondo germanico, Rome 1992; M. Banniard, La genesi culturale dell'Europa, Bari 1994; M. Caravale, Ordinamenti giuridici dell'Europa medievale, Bologna 1994; P. Cazier, Isidore de Séville et la naissance de l'Espagne catholique, Paris 1994; P.C. Díaz - R.G. Salinero, El Código de Eurico y el derecho romano vulgar, in Visigoti e Longobardi, ed. J. Arce - P. Delogu, Florence 2001, 93-115; L. Montecchio, I Visigoti e la rinascita culturale del secolo VII, Perugia 2006.

L. Montecchio

VISIO BARONTI (ca. 679). An account of the vision of a village in the afterlife by the monk Barontius from the monastery of Lonrey (Longoretus), written during the 6th year of the reign of Theodoric III (678/679). The author knew both the monastery of Lonrey (Saint-Cyran, not far from Bourges) and the twin establishment of Méobeque. The protagonist recounts the vision to his brothers immediately after awakening. The Visio Baronti was probably written in *Gaul by a monk (Ciccarese 232). With respect to similar accounts from previous ages the vision of the afterlife is enriched with new elements pertaining to the description and the figure of the protagonist, who completes a journey in the afterlife that acquires an evermore precise geography. The language is far from classical, clearly tending toward a more colloquial style. The author is well aware of the limits of his style and apologizes for this to the reader. From the numerous citations from *Gregory the Great's Dialogues and several references to the Rule of St. Benedict, the Visio Fursei (see Ciccarese 185ff.), the work of *Gregory of Tours and the *Bible, it seems evident that the author of the Visio Baronti was an erudite monk.

CPL 1313; BHL 997; PLS 4, 2125-2138; W. Levison (ed.), MGH (SRM) V, Hannover 1910, 368-394; M.P. Ciccarese, Visioni dell'aldilà in occidente, Florence 1987, 236-268 (with It. trans.);

J.N. Hillgarth, Christianity and Paganism, 350-750, Philadelphia 1986, 195-204 (Eng. trans.); DHGE 6, 882-885; P. Dinzelbacher, Vision und Visionsliteratur im Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1981, 13-51; M.P. Ciccarese, La Visio Baronti nella tradizione letteraria delle visioni dell'Aldilà: RomBarb 6 (1981/82) 25-52; M.P. Ciccarese, Le più antiche rappresentazioni del purgatorio, dalla 'Passio Perpetuae' alla fine del IX secolo: RomBarb 7 (1982/83) 33-76; F. Brunhölzl, Histoire de la littérature latine du Moyen Âge, trans. H. Rochais, Turnhout 1990, 1, 140-141; A. Morgan, Dante and the Medieval Other World, Cambridge 1990, passim; C. Carozzi, Le voyage de l'âme dans l'audelà d'après la littérature latine (Ve-XIIIe siècle), Rome 1994, 139-186 and passim; Y. Hen, The Structure and Aims of the Visio Baronti: JTS 47 (1996) 477-497.

Y. Hen - A. Di Berardino

VISIO FURSEI. Visio Fursei, written in 656 or at the beginning of 657, narrates a trip into the afterlife of a thaumaturge and Irish missionary monk Fursy (Fursa, Furseus, Fursey), founder of monasteries, concerning whom the Venerable *Bede (HE 3,19) makes several biographical mentions. The monk went to *England, where he had founded the monastery of Cnobheresburg, but then because of the invasions of the pagan King Panda, he was forced to flee to *Gaul, where King Clovis II (639–657) allowed him to establish a monastery. He was buried at Péronne, in Picardy. While still young, during his sickness, he received a vision of the afterlife, where he was received by two bishops, who enjoined upon him the duty of preaching for one day (that is, 12 years) and at the same time offered him an entire series of moral instructions. Last, Fursy returns to his body, awakens and sees himself surrounded by relatives, friends and church officials.

CPL 2101; BHL 3209-3210; BCLL 384; Krusch, MGH (SRM) IV, 423-440 (incomplete); DHGE 19, 476-483 (extensive bibl.); DACL 14, 383-385 (Péronne); C. Carozzi, Le voyage de l'âme dans l'au-delà d'après la littérature latine (Ve-XIIIe siècle), Rome 1994, 676-692 (text). P. Grosjean, Notes d'hagiographie celtique: AB 75 (1957) 373-420, esp. 389-390 n. 2 and 392-393; W.M. Newman, Charters of St. Fursy of Péronne, Cambridge, MA 1977; M.P. Ciccarese, Le visioni di S. Fursa: RomBarb 8 (1984-85) 231-303; M.P. Ciccarese, Visioni dell'aldilá in occidente: fonti, modelli, testi, Florence 1987, 184-229; C. Carozzi, op. cit., 99-138 and passim; D. Edel, The Celtic West and Europe: Studies in Celtic Literature and Early Irish Church, Bodnein 2001, 70-71; M.P. Brown, Life of St. Fursey, Norwich 2001 (repr. 2003); S. Hamman, Die Vita Fursei als chronologische Quelle: AB 122 (2004) 283-298.

A. Di Berardino

VISIONS (iconography)

I. Abraham's Vision at Mamre - II. Vision of Jacob at Bethel - III. Vision of Ezekiel - IV. Vision of The Shepherd of Hermas - V. Vision of Perpetua and Felicity.

I. Abraham's Vision at Mamre. Unique in painting, the vision of *Abraham at Mamre (Perraymond 1989; TIP) is found on a fresco from around the mid-4th c., placed in the soffit of an arcosolium of the hypogeum from the Via Dino Compagni (Ferrua 1990, n. 49), which, mindful of Gen 18:1-3, visually portrays the patriarch's meeting with the three visitors, the messengers of his future fatherhood; we see this also with the disputed cover of the so-called St. Soter sarcophagus (Perraymond 2000), which has been preserved in the catacombs of St. *Callistus and is datable to the 2nd third of the 4th c. (Deichmann 1967, n. 379).

With respect to the mosaic technique, there are two witnesses that offer a contribution, with the most complex iconographic scheme, namely the event in question, that is, a panel dating back to the 5th c., from the basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome (Wilpert - Schumacher 1976, n. 29) and the left wall of the presbytery of the basilica of San Vitale of *Ravenna, later by nearly one century (Deichmann 1958, nn. 313, 315), which, ornamentally resolving the verses from Gen 18:9-12, set forth Abraham while he is preparing to serve the plate with the calf to the three guests sitting at the prepared table, with Sarah listening in, in the first case, kneading the dough, in the second, perplexed and standing in front of the home.

One should not overlook the fact that, according to some epigrams (Mazzoleni 1989), similar artwork also decorated the basilica of St. *Ambrose of Milan (Ambr., Hymns, Inscr., Frag. 3, BA 22,108) and the walls of a hypothesized Spanish basilica (Pud., Dittoch. 4: PL 60,93; Argenio 1967; Pillinger 1980).

With respect to sculpture, two late *sarcophagi appear very specific, both of which are datable to the 5th c. and from the Gallic area, respectively preserved at *Toulouse (Caillet-Loose 1990, fig. 104) and at Lucq de Bearn (Ws 182, 2). These sarcophagi, unveiling a fusion between the scene of the vision of Mamre and that of the sacrifice of Isaac—in fact the figures of the three visitors appear alongside Isaac himself, still a young man, ready for sacrifice—emphasize the union between Isaac and Christ himself, as would later be made explicit by (what was for *Augustine) the homogenous and constant *exegesis that began with the apostle *Paul (Gal 3:6) and continued uninterruptedly in the thought of such authors as *Clement of Alexandria (Paed. 1,5: SC 70,150-152), *Tertullian (Adv. Iud. 10,6: CCL 2, 27), Ps.-*Cyprian (De mont. Sina et Sion 3,3: CSEL 3,3,106-107), *Melito of Sardis (Fragm. 11: SC 123,236), *Ambrose (De Sacr. 4,27: BA 17,100) and Augustine (Sermo 2,8: NBA 29, 20), to mention only the most significant of these writers.

At Mamre, near Hebron, upon the wish of the emperor *Constantine, a basilica was erected in memory of the venerated place (Mader 1929).

II. Vision of Jacob at Bethel. Although the iconographic prototype of the vision of Bethel, that is, "God's house" (Gen 28:10-16), and its location which, because of this event changed its primitive name of "Luz" (Perraymond 1989; TIP), is recognizable among the Jewish frescoes of the synagogue of *Dura Europos (Kraeling 1956, pl. 26), *Rome provides the sole two Christian testimonies that pertain to it: (1) The façade of a sarcophagus, from the late Constantinian period, kept in the lapidary of the catacomb of S. Sebastiano (Deichmann 1967, n. 183), in fact, shows—barely legibly—the figure of *Jacob sleeping, with his head resting on a pile of rocks and an empty ladder alongside him. (2) In a painting of the soffit of an arcosolium of the cubicle B from the hypogeum of the Via Dino Compagni, dating back to the mid-4th c., two angels ascend and descend a ladder in accord with the account of the vision and face the patriarch, who is partially reclining on a rocky bulge and who is portrayed with his eyes open (Ferrua 1990, n. 48) to emphasize the miraculous event.

Finally, to provide a complete picture we should note the presence of the solitary ladder on the lower register of the Reliquary of Brescia (var. aus. 1990, n. 5 b.li).

III. Vision of Ezekiel. Christian thought regarded the vision of Ezekiel (Ezek 37:1-10) as the unquestionable symbol of the final resurrection (Justin Martyr, Apol. I,58: PG 6,253; Dial. 80: PG 6,667; Tert., De carnis resurr. 29-30: CSEL 47,3,67-69; Cypr., Test. libri adv. Iud. 58: PL 4,793; Greg. Nyss., Anima et resurr. 136: PG 46,135; Greg. Naz., Monitum in orat. 7,21: SC 405,232-236; Aug., Genesis ad litt. 10,5,8: NBA 9/2,508) or more generically as an expression of faith in it (Clement of Rome., Ep. Cor. 50,4: SC 167,182; Cyril of Jerusalem, Cath. 18,1: PG 33,1018; Epiph., Ancor. 99,4-6: PG 43,196), and Ezekiel becomes the confirming witness (Hilary of Poitiers, Tract. myst: SC 19 bis, 83; Ambr., De exc. Sat. 2,69-73: CSEL 73,7,287-289; Paulinus of Nola, Carm. 31,311-326: CSEL 30,318; Rufinus, Exp. Symb. 42,3: CCL 20,178; Quodvult., De prom. et praed. Dei 2,36,82: SC 101,478-480). Although the vision already represented among the frescoes of the synagogue of *Dura Europos (Kraeling 1956, pls. 69-71), but totally ignored by Roman painting, it is documented by a discrete number of sculptural witnesses (Perraymond 1989; TIP), all belonging to the capital city, with the exception of the two sarcophagi, one of which is preserved at Capua (Dresken-Weiland 1998, n. 11) and the other at Gerona (Sotomayor 1975, pl. 1/3).

These discoveries—whose chronology is very homogenous, not lying outside the first thirty-year period of the 4th c., with the exception of a mutilated cover, discovered at Maius (Bisconti 1989, fig. 19) and datable between the late Gallienic period and the tetrarchy—usually focus on the image of Christ who, assisting the prophet, recomposes the "dry bones," which are identifiable in the small cadaver extended at their feet, which can appear alone or with the head supported by the skull, or rather with more skulls and figurines of "those who are about to be resurrected," which are either standing and lying down around them (Wilpert 1929-36, n. 194/9; Deichmann 1967, nn. 5, 7, 12, 14, 23, 176, 693, 807; Sotomayor 1975, pl. 1/3; Bisconti 1989; Fiocchi Nicolai 1990; Dresken-Weiland 1998, n. 11).

One must also recall a golden glass, discovered at Cologne and datable to the 4th c., where Ezekiel appears by himself intent on performing the miracle by means of the virga* pointed toward the ground on which lie parts of human bodies which are in the process of recomposition (Klinkeberg 1906, fig. 110), and a miniature, of a very different and later schema, from the 10th c., belonging to Ms A.F. gr. 510 of the Bibliothèque Nationale of Paris (Omont 1902, pl. 58).

IV. Vision of The Shepherd of Hermas. To the 1st decades of the 3rd c. belongs the sole graphic testimony inherent to the third vision of The Shepherd of *Hermas (SC 23,103), which can be perceived in a fresco from the catacomb of S. Gennaro at Capodimonte (Fasola 1975, pl. 14). The graphical transliteration of the text shows three young girls proceeding to construct a tower, symbolically representing the church, making use of large, well-elaborated stones—or rather, the saints, believers and penitent sinners—tossing aside those that are imperfect and leaving them unused on the periphery.

Given that the composition's evident meaning is baptismal (in the text the tower is situated on the waters [Herm., Vis. 3,2; 4,9: SC 53,104, 108 and 110], but the iconographic variant can be interpreted in light of the Similitudes [Herm., Sim. 9,3: SC 53,294]) as penitential and funerary (Herm., Sim. 9,16,1-2: SC 53,327), it is possible to infer that the inspiring short work, from the mid-2nd c., was read publicly or that it at least enjoyed considerable esteem among the faithful at the time in which the artisan brought his work to completion (Liccardo 1987; Perraymond 1989; TIP).

V. Vision of Perpetua and Felicity. Preserved in the Burgos Museum, a sarcophagus, datable to the beginning of the 5th c. (Ripoll López 1993, fig. 2), appears to require a complex interpretation because it offers on the rearward side an unusual depiction, unique in its genre, which turns out to be decipherable only according to the first vision that *Perpetua—who had been condemned ad bestias (*see damnatio ad bestias)—had in a dream during her imprisonment (Passio Perp. et Fel. 4,1-10: SC 417,112-116).

Executed certainly with the objective of strengthening faith in the hope of eternal reward, the scene in question in fact reveals a ladder, stubby with piercing and sharpened blades, on which Perpetua, to reach paradise, prepares to leap, but not before having avoided a monstrous animal, after she has been brought to her feet by the support of her catechist Saturus (Perraymond 1989; TIP).

H. Omont, Fac-similés des miniatures des plus anciens manuscrits grecs de la Bibliothèque Nationale du VI^e au XI^e siècle, Paris 1902; J. Klinkenberg, Die Kunstdenkmäler der Stadt Köln, Cologne 1906; A.E. Mader, La basilica costantiniana di Mambre presso Hebron secondo la tradizione e gli ultimi scavi della Göress-Gesellschaft: RivAC 6 (1929) 249-312; G. Wilpert, I sarcofagi cristiani antichi, Vatican City 1929-36; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura Europos, The Synagogue, New Haven, CT 1956; F.W. Deichmann, Früchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden-Baden 1958; R. Argenio, Il Dittocheo e l'epilogo di Prudenzio: Rivista di Studi Classici 15 (1967) 40-77; F.W. Deichmann - G. Bovini - H. Brandenburg, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarcophäge. I. Rom und Ostia, Wiesbaden 1967; M. Sotomayor, Una posibile "ley" de la iconografía paleocristiana: la "ley" de la "subrogación": Archivio Español de Arqueología 45-47 (1972-74) 205-212; U.M. Fasola, La catacomba di S. Gennaro a Capodimonte, Rome 1975; M. Sotomayor, Sarcófagos romano-cristianos de España. Estudio iconográfico, Granada 1975; J. Wilpert - W.N. Schumacher, Die römischen Mosaiken der kirchlichen Bauten vom IV.-XIII. Jahrhundert, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna 1976; R. Pillinger, Die Tituli Historiarum, oder das sogenannte Dittochaeon des Prudentius, Vienna 1980; G. Liccardo, Alcuni aspetti della catechesi antica nella pittura ispirata al Pastore d'Erma nella catacomba di S. Gennaro a Napoli, in Studi in onore di Giuseppe Diligenza, Anversa 1987, 33-42; F. Bisconti, Un coperchio di sarcofago paleocristiano nel cimitero Maggiore, in "Quaeritur inventus colitur," Misc. in onore di padre U.M. Fasola, Vatican City 1989, 23-49; D. Mazzoleni, Patristica ed epigrafia, in Complementi interdisciplinari di Patrologia, Rome 1989, 319-365; M. Perraymond, Sogni, visioni e profezie nell'antico cristianesimo: Abramo, Giacobbe, Ezechiele, Pastore d'Erma, Felicita e Perpetua, in Atti del XVII Incontro di studiosi dell'Antichità Cristiana (Roma, 5-7 maggio 1988), Augustinianum, Rome 1989, 549-563; J.P. Caillet - H.N. Loose, Le vie d'éternité: la sculpture funéraire dans l'Antiquité Chrétienne, Paris-Genève 1990; A. Ferrua, Catacombe sconosciute. Una pinacoteca del IV secolo sotto la via Latina, Florence 1990; V. Fiocchi Nicolai, Frammento di sarcofago cristiano da Vescovio (Forum Novum) presso Torri in Sabina: RivAC 59 (1990) 121-140; G. Ripoll López, Sarcófagos de la antigüedad tardía hispánica: importaciones y talleres locales: Antiquité Tardive 1 (1993) 153-158; J. Dresken-Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarkophage. II, Mainz a.R. 1998; M. Perraymond, Visioni (s.v.): TIP 302-304; id., Riflessioni iconografiche sul coperchio del cosiddetto coperchio di S. Sotere in Callisto: RivAC 76 (2000) 601-620.

M. Perraymond

VISIONS of the AFTERLIFE. Human beings have always sought a response to the question of their own destiny after death: visions of the afterlife, present in every age and every religion (there are numerous examples in Classical Antiquity: Ulysses, Pythagoras and Aeneas), represent an attempt to offer some certainty to human beings who are worried about their future lot.

In ancient Christian literature, initially inserted with the objective of edification and broader contexts, visions of the afterlife gradually assumed their own peculiar physiognomy, becoming a literary genre in its own right that was expressed in increasingly complex and articulated accounts, with their own compositional structure and recurring themes and elements that are common to the different exemplars: in this context the genre would become established and develop esp. in the West between the 7th and the 8th c. AD.

First among all the visions of the afterlife was the canonical *Apocalypse (Rev 1:12-16; 4:2-8; 20:11-13; 21:1-2; 21:10-23), which constitutes the obligatory point of departure for the vision of the afterlife, offering points for subsequent amplifications. But, given the sobriety and scarcity of information, Christians also drew on other sources, esp. apocryphal texts, to establish a more concrete and definite image of the world and to represent the afterlife with the addition of ever new descriptive details. We are referring to a series of works of Jewish and Middle Eastern origin, in which eschatological visions and prophecies combined with myths and esoteric revelations to form that complex of writings called "apocalyptic," that became widespread between the 2nd c. BC and the 2nd c. AD, some of which possess a heavily Christianized character: 4 Esdras, the Book of Enoch, the Apocalypse of Peter and the Apocalypse of Paul. The Visio Pauli enjoyed noteworthy fame, an apocryphal apocalypse written originally in Greek, for which there exist versions in various languages, esp. in Latin, reworked in various ways (*Augustine would put unsuspecting readers on guard from easily believing the fables contained in this apocalypse, a text whose authority the orthodox church did not recognize: In Ioh 98,8): its diffusion nourished the popular imagination, which was hoping to fill the gaps and silences of *Scripture on life in the other world. (See in this respect the famous passage from 2 Cor 12:2-4:

*Paul's reticence only stimulated the believer's curiosity and imagination, allowing one to abandon oneself to every type of conjecture!)

For specific antecedents and models in ancient Christian literature, one could cite the Passio Perpetuae et Felicitatis, a vision attributed to Saturus, a prisoner awaiting *martyrdom (ch. 11), which would influence all subsequent martyrial literature, a vision that was bent on strengthening faith and the hope of the martyrs in a future reward; St. *Jerome's so-called Dream, recounted by the author to the young *Eustochium, which was important for some elements that would serve as an outline for the entire literature of visions: the unforeseen sickness, the comatose state or death, the unexpected reanimation and detailed report of the vision amid the astonishment of those present (Ep. 22,30); a passage from *Sulpicius Severus's Vita Martini (7,6), reproduced on Jerome's model for the narrative context; and the dream of a widow mentioned by *Evodius bishop of Uzalis, in a letter to St. Augustine (Ep. 158,3). In all these passages one can already detect motifs and elements that we will find later: paradise as a garden of boundless extension, the blessed with white garments, the angel-guides, the fragrance that grants satiety, and the celestial palace.

The vision of the afterlife which continued to mature in a fragmentary way during the first centuries became a true and proper literary genre with *Gregory the Great, the heir and the initiator of a tradition that would run the entire Middle Ages onward and would culminate in the grandiose construction of Dante's poem. The model, to which all subsequent authors make reference, is the text of the Dialogues IV,37-38, where Gregory, explaining to the deacon Peter the significance of those killed by accident, cites the unusual experience of some individuals (the monk Peter, the noble Stephen, an unnamed soldier struck by the plague at *Rome), all individuals who were believed to have been dead and were miraculously brought back to life, who state that they were in the otherworld and provide a description of it. All the foundational motifs of the representation of Gregory's afterlife are found almost unchanged in the literature of the visions that take their cues from it: the black smoke of hell in which souls judged guilty are tossed, the narrow bridge that hangs over it and performs the function of a probatio in order to separate the righteous from the unrighteous, the struggle between the angels and demons for the possession of the soul struggling between good and evil, the dwellings of the righteous, and paradise described as a marvelous garden with perfumed flowers.

Substantial analogies with Gregory the Great are present in the historical work of his contemporary *Gregory of Tours (Historia Francorum IV,33 and VII,1), although in the latter's account of *Salvius's vision with its detailed description of the afterlife, we are faced with a story that is far more extensive and organically structured, with an autonomous physiognomy, the schema-type of which serves to inform each subsequent composition of this literary genre.

The first link of a long chain that followed was represented by the visions of the young *Augustus recounted in the Lives of the Fathers of Mérida (I,1-28), a small *Visigothic work from the 1st half of the 7th c., passed down under the name of a certain *Paul, deacon of Mérida, which imitates the traditional formulation: the flourishing and perfumed garden, the blessed clothed in white, and satiety conferred by heavenly food. Passing from the continent (the *Italy of Gregory the Great, the France of Gregory of Tours, the *Spain of the author of the Vitae sanctorum Patrum Emeretensium) to Ireland, we find the Vita Fursei (Visio Fursei*). Written in 656/657, it narrates a trip into the afterlife by an Irish monk, Fursy, the founder of monasteries, who was still young during a sickness: two bishops, Beoanus and Meldanus, impose on him the obligation of preaching for one day (= 12 years), and they offer him a series of moral instructions. The schema is that of the traditional one: the new element is established by the vision as a seal of the holiness of the protagonist, a type of reward granted in anticipation (biographical mentions and summary of the vision are found in the Venerable *Bede's Historia Ecclesiastica III,19). With the Visio Baronti,* the first literary composition entirely dedicated to a vision of the afterlife and providing an example adopted as a clarification of a doctrinal thesis or an event to be inserted in the biography of a saint, one passes to an account of noteworthy breadth and complexity, conceived unitarily and organically structured, and composed to benefit the spiritual health of the reader. Written in 678/679 in *Gaul, the anonymous work recounts the vision of a certain Barontius, a monk from the monastery of Lonrey, according to the traditional schema, but developed and enriched: a true and proper trip into the otherworld with an extensive description of the protagonist's itinerary. In the path of this tradition, which was consolidated but notably developed, the abbot of Bierzo St. *Valerius, native of Astorga, in NW Spain, recounts three visions of the afterlife in his Dicta ad beatum Donadeum scripta (2nd half of the 7th c.).

A decisive contribution to the literary genre—in the 1st half of the 8th c.—is given by the visions narrated in *Boniface's epistolary (Ep. 10 and 115) and in Bede's Historia Ecclesiastica (V,12-14): for the first time we find affirmed, alongside hell and paradise, the existence of a place of punishment/transitory enjoyment for penitent sinners and those who are not perfectly good, what would in time become *purgatory. With this third otherworldly kingdom, the finality of vision would be enlarged to include, in addition to the personal conversion of the readers, also the stimulus to intensify the practices of piety for the deceased. An example of this organic representation of the Christian afterlife, characterized by the tripartition of hell-purgatory-paradise, is the Visio Wettini, dated to the year 824 in its first composition in prose and subsequently redacted in a poetic form by Walafrid Strabo.

Over the course of the 9th c. a particular type of vision of the afterlife was born and took root, a vision that was primarily political in nature and end, primarily flourishing during the Carolingian dynasty, and subject to eschatological judgment: the reward or the eternal punishment attributed to it thus became an expression of the author's political convictions (Visio cuiusdam paupercolae mulieris, Visio Bernoldi and the Visio Karoli).

By the end of the 9th c., the vision of the afterlife clearly constituted a literary genre of a consolidated tradition, as attested to by Hincmar of Reims, who, in the Visio Bernoldi, cites as guarantors of the veracity of his narrative the authors of preceding visions: Gregory the Great, the Venerable Bede, Boniface and Visio Wettini.

C. Fritzsche, Die lateinischen Visionen des Mittelalters bis zur Mitte des 12. Jahrhunderts, Rom. Forsch. 1886, II, 247-279 and III, 337-369; J.A. MacCulloch, Early Christian Visions of the Other World, Edinburgh 1912; A. Rüegg, Die Jenseitsvorstellungen vor Dante, 2 vols., Einsiedeln-Cologne 1945; F. Bar, Les routes de l'autre monde: descentes aux enfers et voyages dans l'au-delà, Paris 1946; H.R. Patch, The Other World According to Descriptions in Medieval Literature, Cambridge, MA 1950; P. Dinzelbacher, Die Visionen des Mittelalters. Ein geschichtlicher Umriß: ZRGG 30 (1978) 116-128; M. Aubrun, Caractères et portée religieuse et sociale des "Visiones" en Occident du VI^e au XI^e siècle: Cahiers de Civ. Méd. 22,2 (1980) 109-130; P. Dinzelbacher, Vision und Visionsliteratur im Mittelalter, Stuttgart 1981; M.P. Ciccarese, Alle origini della letteratura delle Visioni: il contributo di Gregorio di Tours: SSR 5 (1981) 251-266; M.P. Ciccarese, La Visio Baronti nella tradizione letteraria delle Visiones dell'aldilà: RomBarb 6 (1981/82) 25-52; M.P. Ciccarese, Le più antiche rappresentazioni del purgatorio, dalla "Passio Perpetuae" alla fine del sec. IX: RomBarb 7 (1983) 33-76; J. Amat, Songes et visions. L'au-delà dans la littérature latine médiévale, Paris 1985; M.P. Ciccarese, Le visioni di S. Fursa: RomBarb 8 (1984/85) 5-77; M.P. Ciccarese, Visioni dell'aldilà in Occidente, Florence 1987; var. aus., Sogni, visioni e profezie nel cristianesimo antico. XXIX Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Augustinianum 29 (1989); C. Carozzi, Le voyage de l'âme dans l'au-delà d'après la littérature latine (V^e-XIII^e siècle), Rome 1994; Y. Hen, The Structure and Aims of the Visio Baronti: JTS 47 (1996) 477-497.

M.P. Ciccarese - L. Longobardo

VITA BRIGIDAE. Written in 7th-c. Ireland, the Vita Brigidae is a collection of miracles of Brigit of Kildar (2nd half of 5th c.–ca. 524), which, as appears from a 9th-c. manuscript of Reims, known today thanks to the transcription of Mabillon, had three redactions, respectively carried out by Ultán, Ailerán and Cogitosus. The only text that has come down to us, however, is that of Cogitosus which, although deriving directly from the first biography—perhaps the lost work of Ultán or Ailerán (Esposito)—introduces a setting of edifying reflection with recourse to biblical comparisons, which turns out, in any case, to be innovative in the context of Irish *hagiography.

CPL 2147 and 2148; BHL 1455-1456; M. Esposito, Notes on Latin Learning and Literature in Mediaeval Ireland: Hermathena 49 (1935) 120-165; S. Connolly, The Authorship and Manuscript Tradition of Vita I s. Brigitae: Manuscripta 16 (1972) 67-82; S. Connolly, Verbal Usage in Vita Prima Brigitae and Bethu Brigte: Peritia 1 (1982) 268-272; S. Connolly, Some Palaeographical and Linguistic Features in Early Lives of Brigit, in Irland und Europa: Die Kirche im Frühmittelalter, P. Ní Chatháin - M. Richter eds., Stuttgart 1984, 272-279; F. O'Briain, Brigitana: Zeitschrift für Celtische Philologie 36 (1978) 112-137; R. Sharpe, Vitae s. Brigitae: The Oldest Texts: Peritia 1 (1982) 81-106; Patrologia IV, 475.

P. Marone

VITA COLUM CILLE (Life of Columba). Poem-prayer of Christian inspiration that was typical of Ireland, composed probably around 600, to give praise to the Prince Colum Cille (St. *Columba), a man of learning completely at the service of the church, who over the course of his life was a protector of many churches and a preacher in Britain.

P. Grosjean, Pour la date de fondation d'Iona et celle de la mort de s. Colum Cille: AB 78 (1960) 381-390; M. Herbert, The Preface to Amra Colum Cille, in Sages, Saints and Storytellers, in Celtic Studies in Honour of Professor James Carney, D.Ó. Corráin - L. Breatnach - K. McCone (eds.) (Maynooth Monographs 2), Maynooth 1989, 67-75; Patrologia IV, 475-476.

P. Marone

VITA FRUCTUOSI. Written evidently by one of *Fructuosus's followers near *Braga around 680 and for a long time attributed to *Valerius of Bierzo, the Vita Fructuosi is a biographical text which, nonetheless, often leaves space for hagiographical considerations. Having recourse to sources of different genres, the contemplative spirit of Fructuosus (beginning of the 7th c.–665), at the level of the intellectual work of *Isidore of Seville (ca. 560–636), is presented as an extraordinary example of the sanctity of *Visigothic *Spain.

CPL 1293; Díaz 261; BHL 3194; PL 77, 459ff.; F.C. Nock, The Vita sancti Fructuosi, Washington, DC 1946; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, La Vida de San Fructuoso de Braga, Braga 1974; A. Maya Sánchez, Vitas Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensium: CCL 116, Turnhout 1992, LXXXVIIXCV; Patrologia IV, 106.

P. Marone

VITAE PATRUM. After St. *Benedict of Nursia (chs. 42 and 73), the monks of the Middle Ages use this name as the title for the collections of translations of Eastern monastic writings, which were very mixed compilations corresponding to the Gerontikon of the Greeks or the Paradise of the Syrians. H. Rosweyde in 1615 published 10 books of them and an appendix. Several recent works have been redone on the manuscripts in the various languages, and it turns out that it is possible to follow the path of the translators and identify the sources. Rosweyde's books 3 and 7 (PL 73) are not at all trustworthy, and it is instead necessary to go back to the translation of *Paschasius studied by J.G. Freire, A versão latina por Pascásio de Dume dos Apophthegmata Patrum, I-II, Coimbra 1971, and the Commonitiones sanctorum Patrum Coimbra 1974. Rosweyde's books 5 and 6 are nonetheless a good translation made by the Roman deacons Pelagius and *John, from an excellent Greek collection; but Rosweyde's must be corrected according to C.M. Battle, Die "Adhortationes sanctorum Patrum," Münster W. 1972.

G. Philippart, Vitae Patrum: AB 92 (1974) 353-365.

J. Gribomont

VITALIAN, army general (d. 520). A *Gothic official at the service of the emperor and a native of *Scythia, Vitalian took advantage of the religious agitation and the dangerous revolt of the people of *Constantinople of 512 in order to march on the city, making friends through pro-*Chalcedonian slogans. The emperor *Anastasius I, being unable to face the difficult situation any other way, appointed Vitalian as the magister militum and the supreme commander of all the troops in *Thrace, promising him to send the pope to a council at Heraclea to bring an end to the *Acacian schism. But the project of the council failed, and Vitalian once again attacked the capital in the autumn of 515, undergoing a terrible defeat that forced him to withdraw northward to Thrace. Upon the death of Anastasius, Vitalian was at the side of the new emperor *Justin during the phase of the expurgation of anti-Chalcedonian bishops and sought to take revenge esp. on *Severus, who, after the failure of the revolt of Antioch of 513, had publicly mocked him in his 34th homilia cathedralis. The relative of a Scythian monk by the name of Leontius, he became the protector of the Scythian monks and the patron of the *theopaschite-trinitarian formula at Constantinople. We know from a letter written by the papal legates on 29 June 519 that he wrote to Pope *Hormisdas in defense of the monks, but the text has not been preserved. He died in battle in 520.

V. Schurr, Die Trinitätslehre des Boethius im Lichte der "skythischen Kontroversen," Paderborn 1935, 127-136; E. Stein, Histoire du Bas-Empire, Brussels 1949, 178-181; C. Capizzi, Sul fallimento di un negoziato di pace ecclesiastica fra il papa Ormisda e l'imperatore Anastasio I: Critica Storica 17 (1980) 23-54; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, 2/2, Brescia 1999, 405-408.

C. Dell'Osso

VITALIAN, pope (d. 672). A native of Segni; he succeeded *Eugenius I, who had died on 2 June 657, and was consecrated on 30 July. Upon his election, *Constans II's Typos of 648 was still in effect; it was opposed by Pope *Martin I and condemned by the Lateran Council of 649. He immediately sent a delegation to *Constantinople: he wrote to the emperor Constans (Jaffé 2085) as well as the patriarch Peter (Mansi 11,572), who received his letters favorably, and his name was reinstated into the diptychs, a practice that was excluded since the time of Pope *Honorius (d. 638). Moreover, he received Constans II with great honor at *Rome during the emperor's visit to the city during July of 663—the last emperor to visit Rome was Valentinian *III in 450—even though it ended with his sacking the city and the stripping of a great quantity of bronze from it. The emperor through his long stay in *Italy had acquired many goods in the South through his activities. Under his pontificate, Maurus of *Ravenna obtained from the emperor Constans, who had established himself in Sicily, exemption from Roman jurisdiction, drawing vociferous protests on the part of Vitalian (Jaffé 209-210) and a break between the two churches of Rome and Ravenna upon the death of Maurus in 673. Vitalian, just as his predecessors, continued to be interested in the Angles (Jaffé 2089), some of whom had also come to Rome on pilgrimage; moreover, he sent the Greek monk Theodore of Tarsus (668–690) to be archbishop of *Canterbury, whom he himself consecrated.

CPL 1735; Verzeichnis 576-577; PL 87, 999-1010; PLS 4, 2090; LP I, 343-344; DTC 15, 3115-3117; BS 12, 1232-1235; P. Conte, Chiesa e primato nelle lettere dei Papi del secolo VII, Milan 1971, 456-464 (see the index); P. Felici, San Vitaliano papa, assertore dell'unità con l'Oriente: Oikoumenikon 12 (1972) 394-400; B. Navarra, S. Vitaliano papa, Rome 1972 (see RSCI 27 [1973] 759-781); V. Monachino, I tempi e la figura del papa Vitaliano, in Storiografia e Storia (Misc. E. Duprè Theseider), II, Rome 1974, 573-588; P. Corsi, La spedizione italiana di Costante II, Bologna 1983; EPapi 1, 606-609.

A. Di Berardino

VITALIS, Apollinarist (d. ca. 385). Around 375, the priest Vitalis, ordained by *Meletius of Antioch, appeared in *Antioch as the leader of an important group, which appealed to the teaching of *Apollinaris of Laodicea (see Soz., HE 6,25: PG 67,1357 B). He went to *Rome to submit his teaching to Pope *Damasus, who granted him a letter of communion, reserving, however, the final decision to *Paulinus, bishop of the anti-Meletian party of the church of Antioch, a party that was supported by Rome (see Ep. per filium meum Vitalem: PL 13,356-357). When, upon the death of the emperor *Valens (9 August 378), Meletius of Antioch returned from exile, in order to ascend to the see of Antioch, Vitalis as well as Meletius of Antioch and Paulinus, found themselves soon set aside (Theodoret of Cyrrhus, HE 54: PG 82,1203).

A fragment from Vitalis's De fide was transmitted by *Cyril of Alexandria in his treatise De recta fide ad reginas (PG 76,1216 = fr. 172 Lietzmann, 273). This brief text affirms that Christ is τέλειος θεός and τέλειος ἄνθρωπος; it anathematizes those who say that "Christ had a heavenly body, consubstantial to God according to the flesh"; but at the same time it anathematizes those who do not confess that "the flesh of the Lord is consubstantial to human beings"; and it also condemns those who say that the humanity of Christ is void of a rational soul, who say that it was the divinity of Christ that suffered, not the flesh of Christ, and who "divide" the Savior and do not confess that the Logos and the human being are one sole thing.

CPG 3705 Suppl. 205; H. Lietzmann, Apollinaris von Laodicea und seine Schule, Tübingen 1904, 9, 15, 152ff.; frag. 273 and E. Schwartz, ACO I, 1, 5, 67-68; F. Diekamp, Das Glaubensbekenntnis des apollinaristischen Bischofs Vitalis von Antiochien: Tübinger Theol. Quartalschrift 86 (1904) 497-511; E. Amann, v. Mélèce d'Antioche: DTC 10, 527-528.

E. Cavalcanti

VITALIS and AGRICOLA, martyrs. A tradition that has now become established maintains that Vitalis and Agricola were two Bolognese martyrs—one the servant; the other, the master—who were fraternally associated by faith and religious zeal. Both were crucified during the *Diocletian persecution and buried in a Jewish cemetery; they remained there for an indeterminate amount of time, because the faithful had forgotten about them. Only the intervention of the Milanese bishop *Ambrose, who came to the knowledge of this fact through divine inspiration, permitted the discovery of their remains. The two were translated, therefore, with the great joy of the population and the disdain of the demons, because from that point onward they became dispensers of salvific miracles for the spirit and the body.

In fact, this account is nothing more than a harmonization of a number of sources (literary, liturgical, architectural, iconographic, devotional etc.) so diverse and distributed over time as to become undeniably revealed as "effective moments of veneration, . . . true and proper historical rhythms pointing toward a specific religious context" (Ropa, 2004). At the origin of this tradition are, however, some ancient documents that make it possible to trace the first phases of the successive hagiographical branches and the historical consistency of figures who were there at the beginning.

First in order of time one must consider Ambrose's testimony. He speaks of the two individuals in the Exhort. virg. I,1–2,10, a text in which he recasts in all likelihood a homily delivered during the dedication of a church (perhaps in 393). He therefore addresses the argument from a particular perspective. In fact, he recalls that, having found himself at Bologna while the translation of the body of a martyr was being celebrated and having subsequently and fortuitously been invited into the city where he was now speaking (Florence), the relics of the same martyr were brought with him in the manner of apophoreta, that is, as "gifts for the banquet" to which he had been invited (Serra Zanetti), relics that were then placed under the altar. Concerning the martyr in question, he provides only a few bits of information. His name was Agricola, he was a meek man, and he had been highly regarded by all people. He owned a slave named Vitalis, of whom he was also a teacher in the faith. The magistrates at first, perhaps out of respect for his person or more likely in order to lead him to apostatize, postponed his martyrdom, then sought to scare him with the punishment of his slave. Agricola, however, did not allow himself to succumb and for this reason was crucified. Both slave and master were thus buried in Iudaeorum solo inter ipsorum sepulcra, the place in which they would then be rediscovered and from which, at least Agricola, would be translated, having been buried among a large number of Christians and Jews. With respect to Vitalis, nothing is known about the date, circumstances or occasion of his martyrdom; nothing is known about the punishment nor the subsequent translation of his body; nothing, last of all, on the city receiving the prestigious gift. Ambrose, of course, speaks to a specific purpose and in the context of a rhetorically well-prepared elegy in which he insists esp. on the same glory of the slave and the master; nevertheless, one has the clear impression that he himself depends on an oral tradition that was rather vague, at least with respect to the exact historical consistency and characterization of the two individuals.

Subsequent pieces of information are supplied from later sources, although it is difficult to say with what level of reliability. The Vita Ambrosii, redacted by the deacon *Paulinus of Milan in 411/412 or more likely in 422, clearly adds information on the origins of the cult. He specifies, in fact, that the Christian people would have remained in ignorance concerning the presence of the martyrs in the Jewish cemetery unless they had not revealed themselves to the bishop of the church of Bologna. The translation of both bodies, and no longer that of Agricola alone, then occurred amid the great joy of the faithful and the poena demonum, the latter group being forced to recognize the power of the martyrs. Florence was the place of the basilica dedicated by Ambrose, who, according to the testimony of his biographer, had a more prominent role in the entire event than what the autograph leads us to believe (Vita 29).

Two subsequent authors shortly thereafter also speak of the cult, its spread and some local characteristics. From *Victricius we in fact come to know that only the relics of the martyr Agricola had reached Rouen (De laude sanctorum 11), although *Paulinus recalls that in his city of Nola, the relics of both martyrs were found placed under the altar, who were joined together in death by the same punishment: crucifixion (Carm. XXVII, vv. 428-435). *Gregory of Tours also had information about one and the same punishment. Writing about 100 years after, Gregory probably does not depend on either Ambrose or Paulinus, but rather on local Bolognese traditions, which were gathered by pilgrims who had gone there and hence returned to their homeland with precious relics and memories. Moreover, he bears witness to the presence of the combined cult of the two martyrs in *Gaul, and precisely near the Cathedral of Clermont, whose construction was ordered around the mid-5th c. and dedicated to them (De Gloria martyrum 42; Hist. Franc. II,16).

Alongside this chief line of the cult, which seems to have been actively promoted outwardly by the Bolognese bishop *Petronius—early medieval *Verona possessed a church dedicated to the martyrs, who were also subsequently commemorated on the local calendar and preserved in a homily preached in the city of Venice, possibly owed to Petronius—one must recall a singular derivation/deviation attested at *Ravenna. There, around the mid-5th c. under the episcopate of *Peter Chrysologus (430–450), veneration for a certain martyr named Vitalis took root (which is why the extraordinary basilica still visible today was erected), who was regarded as the husband of Valeria and the father of *Gervasius and Protasius. The biographical characteristics of this original familial-hagiographical reconstruction are well delineated in a ps.-Ambrosian letter, today regarded as produced at Ravenna and datable to the mid-5th c. (BHL 3514; PL 17,743-747). Scholars have now agreed in recognizing in this second Vitalis a germination of the Bolognese martyr, and trace back the entire operation within the historical-cultural framework that was subsequently produced after the moving of the imperial court from Milan to Ravenna. One might think, moreover, that precisely this outcome of the "unowed appropriation" could have prompted as a response the redaction of two other ps.-Ambrosian letters (AASS, Nov. II,1, pp. 246-249), this time of Bolognese origin, probably from a different author and not easily datable, but certainly, for reasons given above, subsequent to the other (the first, perhaps dated to the beginning of the 6th c., and the second from the 8th/9th c.). During these times, with some differences, Ambrose's role was noticeably increased, to the point of being the inventor of the Bolognese martyrs through divine inspiration; the date of their martyrdom is specified, namely 4 November, and the circumstances were the persecutions of *Diocletian and *Maximian; praise is given to the figure of Vitalis, whose martyrdom is narrated; emphasis is placed on the atmosphere of wonder that accompanied the translation of both martyrs; and, finally, a reason is given for their burial in the Jewish cemetery, namely the persecutors' desire to hide the bodies. Above all, what Ambrose had given the church whose dedication he celebrated (see Exhort. virg. II,10)—namely, the martyrs and their burial—were then transferred to the Bolognese church and held sacrosanct over the centuries.

The history of the cult, its transformations and stratifications still extended for a long time, but to follow it would lead us well beyond the limits of the patristic age.

With respect to the period that we have treated, we could say, in conclusion, that we have very little historically verifiable information about these martyrs. The antiquity of the combined cult, continually attested at Bologna, could indicate, in addition to their "Bolognese origin," a real commonality of life and probably death. The actual punishment underwent by Vitalis and the reason for which the two men were buried in a Jewish cemetery remain uncertain (A. Benati asks whether they themselves were Jews) and, esp., the circumstances of their execution. The tradition that places the event under the reign of Diocletian and Maximian is late and generic, although, as was mentioned above, the first and most ancient source in our possession is Ambrose's Exhortatio virginitatis. Still taking note of the restrictions imposed by the literary genre and the peculiarities of that occasion, a substantial lack of certain information comes from his text. The only certain piece of information remains the significant and variegated itinerary that this cult had, an itinerary that, as always occurs in hagiography, is neither coincidental nor void of historical meaning but expresses, on the contrary and with particular strength, the demands, feelings and pressures of the context that produced and promoted it.

Ambrose, Exhort. virg.: SAEMO 14/2, 197-271; Victricius of Rouen, De laude sanctorum, 11: CCL 64, 69-93; Paulinus of Nola Epp. 18 and 37: PL 61, 237-243, 352-357; Paulinus of Milan, Vita Ambr. 29, ed. Bastiaensen, 91-92; AASS Nov. II, 1, 233-253; BHL II, 1254-1255, nn. 8689-8696; Mart. Hieron., 584-585, 623-624; 633-634 (cf. 216-218, 327-328); Martyr. Rom., 496; H. Delehaye, Trois dates du calendrier romain. Saint Vital: AB 47 (1928) 55-59; H. Delehaye, L'hagiographie ancienne de Ravenne: AB 48 (1930) 9-10; H. Delehaye, Origines du culte des martyrs, 78, 328-329; G. Cantagalli, I martiri bolognesi SS. Vitale e Agricola, Bologna 1927; G. Cantagalli, I complessi stefaniani di Bologna, Bologna 1931; BS 12 (1969) 1225-1228; P. Serra Zanetti, Ambrogio - Esortazione alla verginità 1-10: una proposta di lettura, in Vitale e Agricola. Il culto dei Protomartiri di Bologna attraverso i secoli. Nel XVI centenario della traslazione, ed. G. Fasoli, Bologna 1993, 3-20; A.M. Orselli, Vitale e Agricola: modelli di santità per la chiesa bolognese, ibid., 21-25; G. Ropa, Momenti e questioni del culto tardoantico e medievale dei martiri Vitale e Agricola, ibid., 27-46; E. Morini, Una presenza nascosta del martire bolognese Vitale nel Sinassario della chiesa di Costantinopoli, ibid., 47-52; E. Lodi, La tipologia eucologica dei Protomartiri nella celebrazione liturgica, ibid., 53-60; A. Benati, I martiri, il martirio e la traslatio del 393, ibid., 61-77; Vitale e Agricola, Sancti doctores. Città, Chiesa, Studio nei testi agiografici bolognesi del XII secolo, ed. G. Ropa - G. Malaguti, Bologna 2001; A. Melloni, Il martirio dei santi Vitale e Agricola dopo il Novecento, in Martirio di Pace. Memoria e storia del martirio nel XVII centenario di Vitale e Agricola, ed. G. Malaguti, Bologna 2004, 9-13; G. Malaguti, Riflessioni sulla data del martirio dei santi Vitale e Agricola, ibid., 31-59; G. Ropa, Momenti del culto dei martiri Vitale e Agricola: le epistole pseudoambrosiane, ibid., 61-103; G. Zarri, Santità martiriale, santità episcopale e chiesa cittadina: l'esempio di Bologna, ibid., 237-256.

E. Zocca

VITALIS of Antioch (4th c.). Bishop of *Antioch in *Syria (314–ca. 320). He likely presided at the Councils of *Ancyra (314) and *Neocaesarea (ca. 317). One must not confuse him with the *Vitalis, also of Antioch, who was an Apollinarist and died in ca. 385. We know nothing else about his life.

J.A. Fischer - A. Lumpe, Die Synoden von den Anfängen bis zum Vorabend des Nicaenums, Paderborn 1997, 460-461, 492; S. Parvis, Marcellus or Vitalis: Who Presided at Ancyra 314?: SP 34 (2001) 197-203.

S. Samulowitz

VITAS SANCTORUM PATRUM EMERITENSIUM. A collection of information and extraordinary events accomplished by individuals who were related to the monastic world of Mérida and its environs, composed at *Mérida shortly before 650. To this initial nucleus was added a collection of the lives of the bishops of Mérida, among whom *Massona and Renovatus (d. 632) appear, with which the work, consisting of 21 chapters, closes. Chapters 9-20, more than half the corpus, are dedicated to Massona, metropolitan of Mérida (570–606). The author is anonymous, although the work was attributed to *Paul the Deacon. Inspired by *Gregory the Great's Dialogues, these Vitas use a hagiographical perspective to praise the virtues of the individuals considered, to which are added divine intervention and protection in their actions. On the whole they exalt the Catholic world in opposition to the *Arian circles and other radical groups or infidels, which at that time were rather strong at Mérida.

CPL 2069; BHL 2530; PL 80, 115-180; CCL 116; J.N. Garvin, The Vitas Sanctorum Patrum Emeritensium, Washington, DC 1946; M.C. Díaz y Díaz, Index scriptorum latinorum Medii Aevi hispanorum, Salamanca 1958, n. 214; A. Camacho, El libro de las Vidas de los Santos Padres de Mérida, Mérida 1988; U. Domínguez del Val, Estudios sobre la literatura hispano-cristiana, IV, Madrid 1998, 472-479.

A. Viciano

VIVARIUM. A monastery N of Mt. Moscius (Punta di Stalettì) on the Gulf of Squillace in Calabria. Founded by *Cassiodorus around 550, after his return from *Constantinople. With the founding of this center of study, Cassiodorus decided to complete a cultural program suited to the demands of the young monks. At Vivarium a scriptorium flourished which remained famous because of its production of scriptural manuscripts. The evangelary (Paris, Bibl. Nat., lat. 9389) is a copy of an evangelary written at Vivarium in 558. The library of the Vivarium included biblical texts, *commentaries on the *Scriptures, works of history, medicine, *rhetoric, dialectic, music and agriculture. After the destruction of the library over the course of the 7th and 8th c., the works were lost and later discovered even beyond the Alps: not only at Monte Cassino, Bobbio, *Milan and Florence, but also at Luxeuil, Aquisgrana, Corbie, Leone and St. Gall. Well known in this regard was the work of Benedict Biscop, who enriched the library of Jarrow. Some manuscripts of Vivarium have been recently rediscovered by Lowe (see E.A. Lowe, Codices Latini Antiquiores, III, Oxford 1938, nn. 391-398).

Sources: Cassiodorus, Variae VIII, 32 and XII, 14.

Studies: G. Radke: PWK 9A,1, 495; E. Josi, EC 12, 1564-1565; M. Cappuyns, Cassiodore: DHGE 11, 1349-1408; H. Leclercq, V.: DACL 15, 3133-3134; H. Thiele, Cassiodor, seine Klostergründung V. und seine Nachwirkung im Mittelalter: Studien und Mitteil. zur Gesch. des Benediktiner-Ordens und seiner Zweige 50 (1932) 378-419; A. van de Vyver, Les Institutiones de Cassiodore et sa fondation à V.: RBen 53 (1941) 59-88; G. Bardy, Cassiodore et la fin du monde ancienne: Année theologique 6 (1945) 383-425; P. Courcelle, Les lettres grecques en Occident de Macrobe à Cassiodore, Paris ²1948, 313-388; G. Bardy, Les origines des écoles monastiques en Occident: Sacris Erudiri 5 (1953) 86-104; P. Courcelle, De la Regula Magistri au corpus vivarien des Chroniques: REA 56 (1954) 424-428; P. Courcelle, Nouvelles recherches sur le monastère de Cassiodore, in Actes du Vᵉ congrès int. d'archéologie chrétienne, Vatican City 1957, 511-539; T. Klauser, V., in Robert Böhringer. Eine Freundesgabe, Tübingen 1957, 337-344; A.V.M. Hubrecht, Cassiodorus Senator en het Monasterium Vivariense: Hermeneus 30 (1959) 130-133; P. Riché, Educazione e cultura nell'occidente barbarico dal VI all'VIII secolo, It. trans. Rome 1966, 136-140; G. Ludwig, Cassiodor. Über die Entstehung der abendländischen Schule, Frankfurt a.M. 1967, 145ff.; A. Petrucci, Scrittura e libro nell'Italia altomedievale: il sesto secolo: Studi medievali 10 (1969) 158-213; A. Ceresa-Gastaldo, Da Vivario a Roma: Appunti per la storia del codice Vaticano Latino 5704: Giornale Italiano di Filologia 22 (1970) 39-46; G.L. Houghton, Cassiodorus and Manuscript Illumination at V., Diss. Binghamton 1975; G. Cavallo, La produzione di manoscritti greci in Occidente tra età tardoantica e alto medioevo: Scrittura e Civiltà 1 (1977) 111-131; T. Klauser, War Cassiodors V. ein Kloster oder eine Hochschule?, in A. Lippold - N. Himmelmann (eds.), Bonner Festgabe: Johannes Straub zum 65. Geburtstag am 18. Oktober 1977, Bonn 1977, 413-420; M.L. Angrisani, Materiali per uno studio della produzione libraria latina antica ed altomedievale in Italia: Boll. del Comitato per la preparazione dell'ed. naz. dei classici gr. e lat., n.s. 24 (1976) 87-112; n.s. 26 (1978) 111-137; n.s. 27 (1979) 139-151; J.J. O'Donnell, Cassiodorus, Berkeley, CA 1979; L. Viscido, Norme per la trascrizione del testo biblico a V.: VetChr 15 (1978) 75-84; var. aus., La cultura in Italia fra tardo antico e alto medioevo. Atti del convegno 12-16 novembre 1979, Rome 1981; H. Hagendahl, Cristianesimo latino e cultura classica: da Tertulliano a Cassiodoro, It. trans. Rome 1988 (original edition Göteborg 1983), 190-209; G. Cavallo (ed.), Libri e lettori nel medioevo. Guida storica e critica, Bari 1983, with: A. Petrucci, La concezione cristiana del libro fra VI e VII secolo, 18ff.; G. Cavallo, Aspetti della produzione libraria nell'Italia meridionale longobarda, 106ff.; L. Vi- scido, Studi cassiodorei, Soveria Mannelli 1983; S. Leanza (ed.), Atti della Settimana di studi su Flavio Magno Aurelio Cassiodoro, Cosenza-Squillace, 19-24 settembre 1983, Soveria Mannelli 1986, with: M. Pavan, I valori della tradizione classica nell'insegnamento del V., 392-405; U. Pizzani, Cassiodoro e le discipline del quadrivio, 49-71; S. Pricoco, Spiritualità monastica e attività culturale nel cenobio di V., 357-377; G.C. Alessio et al., Dall'eremo al cenobio. La civiltà monastica in Italia dalle origini all'età di Dante, Milan 1987; K. Corsano, The First Quire of the Codex Amiatinus and the Institutiones of Cassiodorus: Scriptorium 41 (1987) 3-34; S. Leanza (ed.), Cassiodoro: dalla corte di Ravenna al V. di Squillace. Atti del Conv. Int. di Studi, Squillace 25-27 ottobre 1990, Soveria Mannelli 1993; E. Zinzi, Studi sui luoghi cassiodorei in Calabria, Soveria Mannelli 1994; W. Buergsens, Flavius Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator: Einführung in die geistlichen und weltlichen Wissenschaften, Bochum 1998; G.P. De Simone, L'esperienza monastico-culturale del V., in var. aus., Il monachesimo occidentale: dalle origini alla Regula Magistri. XXVI incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Roma, 8-10 maggio 1997, Rome 1998; A. Caruso, Cassiodoro, Soveria Mannelli 1998; M.C. Doria, Educazione e cultura in Cassiodoro, in M. Rotili (ed.), Memoria del passato, urgenza del futuro. Il mondo romano fra V e VII secolo. Atti delle VI Giornate di studio, Naples 1999, 135-139; L. Holtz, Insediamenti monastici e diffusione del libro, in O. Pecere (ed.), Il monaco il libro la biblioteca. Atti del Conv., Cassino-Montecassino 5-8 settembre 2000, Cassino 2003, 65-83; C. Kakridi, Cassiodorus "Variae," Munich 2005; L. Viscido, Cassiodoro Senatore, Variae, Cosenza 2005.

M.L. Angrisani Sanfilippo

VIVENTIOLUS of Lyons (d. ca. 524). Viventiolus was a very learned monk, who lived in the monastery of Condat in the Jura. *Avitus of Vienne (see Epp. 17, 19, 57, 59, 67, 69, 73) regarded his spiritual gifts and learning worthy of a bishop. In fact, he became the bishop of *Lyons around 515, after the death of his abbot Eugendus. In the kingdom of the *Burgundians, he was one of the most eminent leaders of the church of *Lyons, performing an important role in the councils, esp. in that of Epaon in 517. He died around 524. An epitaph discovered in the 14th c. in the church of Saint-Nizier allows us to know the date of his death: 12 July, which is also that of his feast day.

Two of his letters have survived: the first is a circular letter written to convoke the aforementioned council of 517; the second, sent to Avitus of Vienne, is an invitation to participate at the feast of St. Justus. The style of his Latin is elegant and polished.

Editions: CPL 1068-1069; Ep. ad ep. prov.: PL 67, 993; MGH, Auct Ant. 6, 2, 165; MGH, Conc. 1, 18-19; CCL 148A, 22-23; SC 353, 98-101; Ep. ad Avitum: PL 59, 272; MGH, Auct. Ant. 6, 2, 89.

Studies: A. Coville, Recherches sur l'histoire de Lyon du Ve au IXe siècle (450-800), Paris 1928, 308-316; H.G.J. Beck, The Pastoral Care of Souls in South-East France during the Sixth Century, Rome 1950, 12, 43, 60; BS 12 (1970) 1319; F. Martine, Vies des Pères du Jura: SC 142, 54-55 (bibl.); M. Heinzelman, Bischofsherrschaft in Gallien, Beihefte der Francia 5, Sigmaringen 1976, 113-129; O. Pontal, Histoire des conciles mérovingiens, Paris 1989, 63-65; Patrologia IV, 286-287; BBKL 12 (1997) 1533-1535.

M. Maritano

VOCONIUS. Known only through *Gennadius of Marseille, who writes that he was "bishop of Castellanum in Mauretania." (He does not say whether he was in Mauretania Caesariensis or in Mauretania Sitifensis.) Voconius wrote against the enemies of the church: Jews, *Arians and other heretics. He composed, moreover, an excellent volume on the *sacraments (De viris ill. 79). He preserves a long and polemical speech of African origin, which in the manuscript tradition was attributed to *Augustine and is now claimed to be the work of *Quodvultdeus (incipit: Debitor sum, fratres, fateor), which bears the title Contra quinque haereses, against, that is, the five types of the church's enemies (CCL 60, 259-309; PL 42, 1101-1116).

CPL 410; CPPM 1, 1204; PCBE 1, 1227.

A. Di Berardino

VOLUSIANUS (d. 437). R.A.A. Volusianus, son of the *pagan aristocrat and pontifex Maximus Ceionius Rufus Albinus, the prefect of *Rome in 389/381, and a Christian mother whose name is unknown (PLRE 1, 1039, n. 16). He was the uncle of *Melania the Younger. He was proconsul at *Carthage before 412, prefect of Rome (417–418) and prefect of the praetorium in the West (428–429). He was baptized on the feast of *Epiphany on his deathbed at the behest of his niece Melania, while he was at *Constantinople in 437 on an official mission to arrange the imperial marriage of *Valentinian III and *Eudoxia. While still a pagan, he combated the *Pelagians. He was in contact with *Augustine, who regarded him highly, and exhorted him to read the Christian *Scriptures and explained to him its difficulties (Ep. 132 in 411/412). In fact Volusianus, claiming to be open to putting himself in his school, relates to Augustine the discussions and difficulties that his circle of friends had had about the Christian religion (Ep. 135). *Marcellinus also asked Augustine to respond to Volusianus's difficulties (Ep. 137), who sent him two letters (Ep. 137 to Volusianus, Ep. 138 to Marcellinus) providing clarifications on the Christian religion and also the pagan objection that Christianity was incompatible with the empire's needs (Ep. 137,20).

PLRE 2, 1184-1185; Ph. Martin, Une conversion au Ve s.: Volusien: Revue August. 10 (1907) 145-172, A. Chastagnol, Le sénateur Volusien et la conversion d'une famille de l'aristocratie romaine au Bas-Empire: REA 58 (1956) 240-253; M. Moreau, Le dossier Marcellinus dans la Correspondance de saint Augustin: RecAug 9 (1973) 3-181; PCBE 2, 2340-2341.

A. Di Berardino

W

WAGER – BET. The entry "wager - bet," to be understood in this context as "the gambling of a sum of money in a game of dice" and therefore as "a bet or risk against fate," deserves to be treated at least in respect to the ps.-Cyprian homily titled De aleatoribus that was presumably composed in the 2nd half or at the end of the 3rd c. in an African context. This work is a true and proper invective which, according to its title, is primarily addressed to those who play dice, but, as it is developed, condemns all games of chance and those who practices wager money against fate, esp. if the player is a Christian and even more so if he is a bishop of the community.

The same term alea, which in the first meaning signifies "dice" (see the Greek term kybos) or "a game of dice," in a second meaning signifies "the action or condition of risk or chance"; the proper sense indicates the object, that is, the instrument of the game, although the translated sense indicates the testing of fate, fortune; in other words, the person who takes a risk (by rolling dice or in another way) challenges destiny and decides to put at risk what he possesses. A bet/wager can therefore reverse every situation and make it dangerous. For this reason a gambling table, that is, where one plays, takes a chance, and where one gambles is a place of insanity (dementia) and folly (furia), and the players are losing their mind (insaniunt) (see De aleat. 9,1-2).

As the literary and archaeological sources attest, games of chance, and dice in particular, are widely attested in the ancient world: in both Jewish and Greco-Roman society. The game of dice must have been played to such an extent that it created a lucrative business for the artisans who made them along with other accessories, such as boxes for tossing dice, as well as the table upon which one tosses dice (an inscription in Rome, CIL VI, 9927, recalls a certain Lucilius Victorinus as an artifex artis tessalarie lusorie [sic]. Moreover, the etymology of the Latin term alea that is read in the work of *Isidore of Seville, Orig. 18,60 (alea, id est ludus tabulae, inventa a Graecis in otio Troiani belli a quodam milite nomine Alea, a quo et ars nomen accepit) identified the discovery of the practice of the game precisely during the time of the Trojan War. Perhaps the inventor was Palamedes, the mythical son of Nauplius. But if, in all likelihood, the discovery of the game of dice (aleae, tesserae, kuboi) originated as merely a way to pass time, it gradually acquired the nature of a game of risk that led to wagers in money (or in other goods, even land) upon the outcome of the sum reached by throwing dice. But it was precisely the risk that incited the passion and the fierceness that led to people's ruin. Hence, the criticism of the condemnation even by non-Christian authors (see Plautus, Curc. 609; Horace, Ep. 1,18,21; Ovid, Ars 1,452; Quintilian, Inst. 6,3,72; Martial, Epigr. 5,54; Juvenal 1,88; 11,175-177; 14,4; Suetonius, Claud. 5; 39). Because of the economic damage that it caused to losing gamblers, the game of chance was declared illicit, and according to Martial, in Roman society it was only permitted during the Saturnalia (see Epigr. 1,84). During the time of the emperor *Justinian (527–565), the game was definitively prohibited, and because the law had a primarily moral foundation, bishops were asked to collaborate so that this legislation might be kept; one was allowed to play a game of chance only inasmuch as it did not cross over into a wager of a solidus and provided that one was rich (Cod. Iust. 3,43,1.2).

Justinian's condemnation, esp. in its ethical reasons, was not absolutely innovative but rather reiterated what had already been expressed by the Council of *Elvira held between 300 and 303 in the Spanish province of Baetica. Canon 79 prohibited the game of dice with a wager of money; the person who violated this canon was subject to *penance and would have to wait one year before receiving the *Eucharist (si quis fidelis aleam . . . luserit nummis, placuit eum abstineri; et si emendatus cessaverit, post annum poterit communioni reconciliari). One should note the expression luserit nummis ("will play with money"), that is, "he will have wagered a sum" of money: the money wagered, the risk of the loss of capital and esp. the irrationality of tempting fate constituted, therefore, a grave concern and required disciplinary provisions that remained in effect, but not permanently. During the Middle Ages, the game of dice would again be largely practiced both among the common people and the lords and always with a wager of money (one thinks of the game of "zara," which was played with three dice and required a winning score between 4 and 7: see Dante, Purg. 6,1-3). Returning to the Council of Elvira, one should note that its times were not very distant from the composition of the treatise De aleatoribus, but were actually very close. Both the conciliar canon and the ps.-Cyprian homily, therefore, reveal the same concern and denounce the same vice: gambling and betting. But in the treatise De aleatoribus another reason justifies the condemnation of the game of chance and foolish wagering. They are also portrayed as an instrument of idolatry, inspired by the devil: a net in the mesh of which even Christians fall and lose their souls not just by testing fate but even by sacrificing to the one who was its inventor. The wager for victory is therefore transformed into a loss: a loss of one's own money, but esp. of the grace given by *baptism, and therefore the loss of one's *soul. Even when the player wins the wagered money, he has nonetheless lost the freedom of being a son of God and has returned to being a slave of the devil. The hand that tosses the dice is the same hand that obtains the condemnation of the gambler and the player of chance.

S.Ch. Rayment, Roman Anti-Gambling Measures: Classical World 43 (1950) 121-122; B. Biondi, Il diritto romano cristiano. II. La giustizia - Le persone, Milan 1952, 283-284; E. Nardi, Monobolo & C: Rendiconti dell'Accademia delle Scienze dell'Istituto di Bologna 76 (1987-1988) 5-24; M. Marin, Citazioni bibliche e parabibliche nel De aleatoribus pseudociprianeo: Annali di Storia dell'esegesi 5 (1988) 169-184; S.T. Carroll, An Early Church Sermon Against Gambling (CPL 60): The Second Century 8 (1991) 83-95; N. Purcell, Literate Games: Roman Urban Society and the Game of Alea: Past and Present 147 (1995) 3-37; J. Schwartz, Gambling in Ancient Jewish Society and in the Graeco-Roman World, in M. Goodman (ed.), Jews in Greco-Roman World, Oxford 1998, 145-165; C. Nucci (ed.), Pseudo Cipriano, Il gioco dei dadi, Bologna 2006 (Biblioteca patristica 43).

C. Burini De Lorenzi

WAR. In accordance with the message of Christ, which requires love for one's enemies (see Mt 5:44), the fathers of the church, as men and as Christians, have a great aversion to war and desire peace in justice, even if they recognize the fact that serious violation of rights can in extreme cases justify war: every war has its roots in sin. Christ did not have recourse to arms in order to establish the "kingdom of God," but neither did he demand that soldiers, e.g., the centurion, abandon their way of life: he urged everyone to be converted and not to sin, in whatever situation they might live. Paul uses the imagery of military armor to illustrate the battle against wicked forces and the opposition of the carnal man to the service of God (Rom 13:12; Eph 6:10-17; 1 Th 5:8; 2 Tim 2:3).

The Christians of the first centuries wanted to apply the evangelical ideal of peace to their lives (see Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. IV,34,4) and held the faith to be irreconcilable with any type of violence or killing. Further, esp. in the first three centuries, as they were not required to take responsibility in the management of the empire, they had little sense of duty to military service. (The military was formed for the most part out of volunteers and professional soldiers; it was not obligatory for the sons of soldiers. Sometimes soldiers carried out "civil" service in special forces.) Christians justified their refusal to serve in the military for two fundamental reasons (see Passio Maximiliani; Tertullian, De Cor. 1 and 11): first, the military way of life led almost necessarily to committing acts of violence and killing; second, enlistment and certain other moments in this way of life required acts of pagan worship. At the beginning of the 3rd c., if a soldier converted to Christianity he was required not to kill anyone, even if he received the order to do so, and also not to take the oath; if a member of the faithful enlisted, he was excommunicated (Hippolytus, Trad. Ap. 16). But there is a distinction made between bellare ("combat" and therefore also killing) and militare (serving as a soldier): the first is always prohibited, the second tolerated, provided that no morally unjust acts or acts of idolatry were carried out. Therefore positions with regard to military service vary from absolute intransigence to resigned acceptance (to earn a living) which sought to reconcile it with the Christian faith and tolerated formalities here and there: see in the Passio Iul. 2, the case of the veteran Julius, who was a soldier for 27 years; the Christian soldiers mentioned in the Passio Maximiliani 2; see also Tertullian, De Cor. 1,4. Christians admired the Roman military order (Clement of Rome, Ad Cor. 37) and professed loyalty toward the authorities (see Athenagoras, Supplication, 37,2), yet they were critical of war and of the life of the soldier (Tatian, Discourse 11,1; 19,2; 23,12; Athenagoras, On the Resurrection of the Dead 19). *Clement of Alexandria insists that Christians must be pacifists (cf. Prot. 11, 1162-4; Strom. IV,8,61) and emphasizes the antipedagogical function of military expenses (Paed. 1,12,98-99). *Origen deduces from the preeminence of the commandment of love an absolute condemnation of every homicide (Com. Rm 9,31) and presents the Christians as "soldiers" dedicated to prayer in order to defeat the demons, who stir up wars (C. Cels. 8,73-74). *Tertullian, at first more open on the question (Apol. 30,4), moves to a rigorist attitude regarding evangelical coherence and prophetic radicalism (Idol. 19). *Cyprian denounces the spread of violence in war and its atrocities (Ad Donat. 6). *Lactantius, too, condemns the imperialist violence of the state (Div. Inst. VI,6) and rejects war because it kills (VI,20,15-17). After the conversion of *Constantine, the relation between church and state began to change: Christians became involved and were made jointly responsible in the management of public order; they elaborated the theory of "just" war, placing it under moral law. They tended to make the defense of the faith coincide with the defense of the empire; therefore, they were reinstated in the military. But they sought at the same time to influence the political situation in the direction of greater humanity and efforts toward peace.

The Council of *Arles in 314 excommunicated deserters (can. 3); *Eusebius on the one hand presents Constantine as praying before every battle and bearing the emblem of the cross in his "crusades" (Vita Const. II,4; IV,56) but on the other hand considers war as a calamity (HE 1,2 and 5, proem.). *Ambrose exalts the fortitude "which in war defends from barbarians and in peace protects the weak," provided that it be animated by justice (Off. I,129). *Gregory of Tours describes the battles of *Clovis which he fought in order to defeat the *Arians (Hist. Franc. II,35f.). Yet at the same time the church of the 4th c. recalled the persecutions undergone (Gregory of Nazianzus, Or. 2,87) and became conscious of a certain incompatibility which appears in the canonical texts (Can. Hipp. 14 and 74). *Basil advised those who kill in war or in defense of the weak to abstain from receiving Communion for three years (Ep. 188,13). Noble examples of nonviolence remain, as that of St. *Martin of Tours: "I am a soldier of Christ; I am not permitted to fight" (Sulpicius Severus, Vita Mart. 4). A small minority (clergy and monks) were dispensed from military service: an admonition to a prophetic attitude but also a sign of distinction and separation from the laity engaged in the world.

At the beginning of the 5th c., imperial decrees (of *Honorius and *Theodosius II) prescribe that only Christians can be in the military (cf. CTh 16,8,16; 5,48; 10,21). Augustine—as many Fathers—recognizes the benefits brought by the Roman Empire to the various peoples but also that "this result has been gained by many and monstrous wars, with much slaughter of men and much spilling of blood" (Civ. Dei 19,7). One cannot justify wars of conquest and the unbridled desire to dominate: "If justice is not respected, what are states if not great bands of robbers?" (Civ. Dei 4,4; cf. 4,6). The desire for peace is inscribed in the very heart of man (Civ. Dei 19,10-20), and paradoxically, one enters war in order to arrive at peace (Civ. Dei 15,4; 19,12; Ep. 189,6). Taking his inspiration from Cicero (Off. 1,34-37), he holds those wars to be "just" which are fought in response to injuries (Quaest. In Hept. 6,10; Civ. Dei 19,7; cf. also 3,10) and which have as their purpose the reestablishment of violated justice. Moreover, those who enter such a war should be constrained to do so, when all attempts at reconciliation fail (cf. Civ. Dei 4,15; 19,7; Ep. 229,2). One's conduct in war should be inspired by patience and benevolence (Ep. 138,14). It would be much better, however, to procure peace by means of peace rather than by war (Ep. 229,2).

Christians benefited from the pax Romana and were aware that this was acquired by war. Yet they preferred to testify to their faith by opposing every form of violence; they condemned the cruelties and slaughter connected to armed combat while recognizing the validity of military service and, in extreme cases, even the necessity of war; they affirmed that care for peace in justice should animate everyone, even the soldier.

R.H. Bainton, The Early Church and War: HTR 39 (1946) 189-212; E. Ryan, The Rejection of Military Service by the Early Church: Theological Studies 13 (1952) 1-32; S. Windass, Le christianisme et la violence. Étude sociologique et historique de l'attitude du christianisme à l'égard de la guerre, Paris 1966; A. Colombo, La problematica della guerra nel pensiero politico cristiano dal I secolo al V secolo, Milan 1970; R. Klein, Das Frühe Christentum in Römischen Staat, Darmstadt 1971, 187-216; H.T. Mc Elwain, St. Augustine's Doctrine on War in Relation to Earlier Ecclesiastical Writers (A Comparative Analysis), Rome 1972; J. Helgeland, Christians and the Roman Army from Marcus Aurelius to Constantine: ANRW II, 23,1 (1979) 724-834 (bibl.); L.J. Swift, War and the Christian Conscience, I. The Early Years, ibid., 835-868; J.M. Hornus, It Is Not Lawful for Me to Fight: Early Christian Attitudes Toward War, Violence and the State, Scottdale, PA 1980 (original Fr. ed.: Évangile et labarum, Genève 1960); M. Toschi, Pace e Vangelo. La tradizione cristiana di fronte alla guerra, Brescia 1980; L.J. Swift, The Early Fathers on War and Military Service, Wilmington, NC 1983; P.A. Gramaglia, Non uccidere e non violenza nel sec. IV, in Atti della V settimana di studi "Sangue e antropologia. Riti e culto," Rome 1984, 1603-1699; E. Pucciarelli (ed.), I cristiani e il servizio militare: testimonianze dei primi tre secoli, Florence 1987; M.F. Berrouard, s.v. Bellum: AL 1, 638-646 (bibl.); J. Fernández Urbiña, Cristianos y militares: La Iglesia antigua ante el ejército y la guerra, Granada 2000; R. Cacitti, "Mihi non licet militare." Fondamento biblico, sacramento battesimale e istanze morali del rifiuto della guerra nel cristianesimo delle origini, in G. Merlo (ed. by), Lombardia monastica e religiosa. II, Milan 2001, 11-64.

A. Hamman - M. Maritano

WARNAHARIUS (Warner) (7th c.). Presbyter of Langres (Lingonica civitas). In response to Caraunius of Paris, who had asked him for information about the *martyrs of the city, he wrote two texts: one concerning the three martyred brothers of Cappadocia, namely, Speusippus, Eleusippus and Meleusippus, who were put to death during *Aurelian's persecution; the other treats Desiderius bishop of Langres, who had been killed by the *Vandals as soon as they had occupied and sacked the city. The first is a legendary text, belonging to the so-called epic passions; the second is much more historically grounded and tends to emphasize the ferocity of the barbarians.

CPL 1308-1310; PL 80, 185-200; MGH, Ep. 3, 457; Patrologia IV, 345; BBKL 10, 976-977.

M. Simonetti

WATER. In Sacred *Scripture, water is a theologically bivalent element: bearer of life or death; sign of blessing or curse; indicator, by its abundance, of the messianic kingdom that has come, or of the kingdom of hell. Thus the water above and below the firmament of Gen 1:6 represents the angelic hierarchies and the opposing powers, respectively (Origen, Hom. Gen. 1,2; Basil, Hexam. 3,9; Jerome, Ep. 51,5.7), and its division indicates the discernment human beings must carry out between spiritual and carnal desires (Origen, Hom. Gen. 1,2). The use of water in the liturgy is already present in Scripture, and it is from Scripture that the symbolism proper to water in the Christian liturgy is derived.

While the presence of water in baptism is testified to by specific events such as those described in Acts 8:36 and 10:47, the Fathers deepened its meaning through typological interpretation, searching out its prefigurement in numerous OT and NT texts. The creative capacity of water, such as to be able to communicate new life and give birth to new creatures, is related to Gen 1:2 (Tertull., Bapt. 3,4; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,4; Ambr., De myst. 9; De sacram. 3,3; John Chrys., Catech. II,25), while its power to destroy the old man and sin is anticipated in the water of the flood, according to a type already present in 1 Pet 3:18-21: the water of the flood prefigures baptism because, cleansing the sins of humanity, it "baptized the world" (Tertull., Bapt. 8); by it the ark was "as though baptized without being submerged" (Aug., In Io. 7,3); it buried evil (Ambr., De myst. 11) and became the bearer of salvation for those entering the ark, just as the water of baptism saves only those in the church (Cypr., Ep. 69,2). It thus bears not only destruction but also renewal (Leo the Great, Serm. 60,3). The twofold function passing from the water of the flood to the baptismal water is also attributed to the latter through the typology of the water of the Red Sea, also found in the NT (1 Cor 10:2). The baptismal water, cleansing the filth of sin, generates a new person capable of singing the new song of the exodus (Orig., Hom. V,5 in Ex.). The water of the Red Sea, however, above all liberates, and it is this function that is primarily emphasized when compared with the baptismal water (Tertull., Bapt. 9; Orig., *Hom.*VI,4 in Ex.; Cypr. Ep. 69,15; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,5; XIX,3; Ambr., De myst. 12; Greg. Nyss., Bapt. Chr.; Aug., Serm. 353,4; Leo the Great, Serm. 55,5); the latter is superior to the former in that it is capable of making one rise again, while the water of the Red Sea could not prevent the Jews from dying in the desert (Ambr., De sacr. 1,22). The water that gushed from the rock by Moses's action (Num 20: 1-11), like those of Marah that became sweet when he threw in a stick (Ex 15:22-25), is seen as a type of the baptismal water, sanctified by Christ, the Rock (Tertull., Bapt. 9; Cypr., Ep. 63,8), or by the wood of the cross (Tertull., Bapt. 9; Adv. Iud. 13,12; Ambr., De myst. 14; Dyd., Trin. II,14)—here also the typology is already scriptural (1 Cor 10:4; Jn 19:34). Other instances of water in the OT interpreted as figures and foretastes of the baptismal water are (1) the water an angel miraculously caused Hagar and Ishmael to find when they were about to die in the desert, having used all the water in the skin (Gen 21:14), an episode that indicates the need for a divine water, given the insufficiency of the water of the synagogue (Greg. Nyss., Bapt. Chr.); (2) the water in which Naaman washed (2 Kgs 5:1ff.), recalled by *Ambrose (De myst. 17-18) and *Gregory of Nyssa (Bapt. Chr.); (3) the living water of Ezek 47:1-3, from which derived, esp. in the early years, the practice of baptizing in a running spring (Didache VII,1,3).

There are also episodes in the gospels where water is interpreted as a figure of the water of baptism: the water of the Jordan where Christ was baptized is a prototype of the water in which Christians are baptized (Hil., In Matth. 2,5; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. XII,15; XXI,1; Greg. Naz., Or. 29,20; Ambr., In Luc. 83; Jerome, In Matth. 1; John Chrys., Hom. XII,2 in Mt.), also called the "beginning of the gospel," as the water of creation was the "beginning of the world" (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,5); the water of the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5:1-9: Tertull., Bapt. 5; Chrom., Serm. 14) and the water that flowed from the side of Christ (Jn 19:34: Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,10; Ruf., Symb. 21). For Origen, the water about which Christ speaks to Nicodemus (Jn 3:5) indicates that baptism is from above, being identical to the water mentioned in Ps 148:4 (Com. Rom. V,8). For *Basil water is an image of death "receiving bodies like a tomb" (De Spir. XV,35). Besides its use in baptism, water is an indispensable material for the eucharistic celebration, and here also the meaning it acquires is taken from Scripture. *Justin calls the *Eucharist the combination of consecrated bread, wine and water (1 Apol. 65.67). The practice of tempering the eucharistic wine with water is testified to by *Irenaeus (Adv. haer. V,2,3) and *Hippolytus (Trad. Ap. 21); *Cyprian offers scriptural proof (Pr 9:1-5 and Mt 26:28-29), giving it a symbolic interpretation based on Rev 15:15, where the water represents the peoples: thus the water united with the wine "is the people united to Christ" (Ep. 63,5.13). An explanation of this mixture was given even earlier: the water is the salvation brought about by the blood of Christ (Clem. Al., Paed. II,2). For *Augustine the presence of water in the chalice is based on Jn 19:34 (In Io. 120,2). For *Theodore of Mopsuestia it indicates that the Eucharist, like baptism, commemorates and causes one to participate in the death of Christ (Hom. XV). The water that flowed from the rock (Ex 17:1-7) is for *Ambrose a type of the water added to the eucharistic chalice, as is the water that flowed from the side of Christ (De sacr. V, 3,4), but for Cyprian "every time that in Sacred Scripture water is spoken of by itself, it proclaims baptism" (Ep. 63,8).

Beyond the sacramental typology, water offers the Fathers other reasons for symbolic comparisons, first among these being the Word (Orig., Hom. XIII,3 in Gen.); the water of Cana (Jn 2:1-11) is the insipid Scriptures before the coming of Christ, who explains them (Orig., Com. Io. XIII, 436 ff.; Aug., In Io. 9,3-4), or the sign of the union in Christ of humanity and divinity, with explicit redemptive value (Sedul., A solis ortus cardine, N), or finally human nature that will be changed in the glory of the resurrection (Max. Tur., Ser. 101,3); the water of Jacob's well (Jn 4:6) is the OT that Christ, asking it of the Samaritan woman, accepts (Orig., Com. Io. XIII,23-25), while the water which he gives represents what "surpasses what is written" (Orig., Com. Io. XIII,31-37; Hom. III in Cant. 2,8). The water is a sign of the Spirit (Ignat., Rom VII,2; Aug., In Ps. 103 [102], par. 2,3); of the church (Ambr., Hex. IV,1-3); of the Jewish people (Aug., In Io. 17,2); of the virginal womb that regenerates the faithful as Mary generated Christ (Leo the Great, Serm. XXV,5). In general, water is considered "the most beautiful among the four elements" constituting the world (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,5), a sign of God's providence (Theodor., Or. de Prov. 2) and always obedient to him (Ambr., Hex. IV,1,1-2). The liturgical practice of blessing the baptismal water is not scripturally based but is witnessed by tradition (Tertull., Bapt. 4; Hip., Trad. Apost. 21; Clem. Al., Exc. Theod. 82; Cypr., Ep. 70,1; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. III,3; Basil., De Spir. 66; Ambr., De sacr. I,5; Greg. Nyss., Bapt. Chr.; John Chrys., Catech. II,10). The use of blessed water outside of baptism is rather late; the similarity of this to Jewish, *pagan or syncretistic rites caused the practice to be discouraged (Tertull., Bapt. 5). The first forms of the blessing of water are found at the end of the 3rd c. in *Egypt (Sacr. Serap.), for use in exorcisms and for the curing of illness. At Antioch and throughout the East at the feast of *Epiphany, in memory of the sanctification of the water of the Jordan, water destined for the personal use of the faithful was blessed (John Chrys., Bapt. 2). In the West the first testimonies to the use of blessed water are found in Pope *Vigilius and pertain to the consecration of a church (Ep. I,4); the water called "Gregorian" was prepared for this use with salt, wine and ashes. Conversely, the use of water for washing the hands during the eucharistic rite was very early (Tertull., Apol. 39).

DACL 4, 1680-1690; DTC 4, 1978-1984; B. Capelle, L'"aqua exorcizata" dans les rites romains de la dédicace au VI[e] siècle: RBen 50 (1938) 306-308; A.V. Nazzaro, Simbologia e poesia dell'acqua e del mare in Ambrogio di Milan, Naples 1977; M.G. Bianco, A proposito di 'Aquae rubescunt hydriae': Augustinianum 33 (1993) 49-56.

F. Cocchini

WEDDING at CANA (iconography). The first miracle of Christ (Jn 2:2-11), mentioned by the fathers of the church as a symbol of the transformed elements of Communion (Cyp., Ep. 63 Hartel: PL 5,383; Cyr. of Jer., Mystagogica IV: PG 33,1098), is amply represented in Christian iconography. The oldest depictions of the wedding at Cana appear in funerary contexts of the mid-3rd c. The favor with which the scene was met, often accompanied as it was by the much more commonly found multiplication of the loaves, is to be explained by a desire to express figuratively the themes of faith and of the sacramental means which grant salvation to the Christian. One of the first representations seems to be a lunette of an arcosolium in the catacomb of Sts. Marcellinus and Peter: against the background of a scene of the banquet, Christ, standing, with a staff in his hand, touches the hydriai ("water jars"), a key element in understanding these scenes depicting the gospel miracle (Wp 57). The same scene, associated with the multiplication of the loaves, is repeated in another niche of the same catacomb, from some decades later (Wp 186,1). Much more frequent are depictions in continuous friezes on *sarcophagi, containing successions of episodes with clear allusion to the saving food and to the means of salvation (Ws 8,3; 127,1-2; 157,1; 218,1; 220,2; 226,2-63). In particular we may mention the so-called dogmatic sarcophagus (Ws 96): in two scenes placed next to each other, to the right of the clypeus with the deceased, Christ with the staff touches the hydriai placed at his feet, and places his hands on the baskets of bread borne by the two apostles. On the cover of a sarcophagus of St. *Victor of Marseille (Ws 17,2; F. Benoit, Sarcophages paléoc., pls. XLIII,2), the miracle is portrayed together with the less-known OT episode of the explorers of Canaan (Num 13:2ff.).

Outside the funerary context, the miracle of the wedding at Cana appears in the mosaic in the vault of the baptistery of Naples (J.L. Maier, Bapt. de Naples, pl. IV) and on the mosaic of St. Apollinare Nuovo in *Ravenna (F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna, pl. 120). *Mary, present as the "instrument" of the miracle in the gospel, appears rarely in scenes of the banquet of Cana. Some examples are provided by the small underground basilica of Deir Abu Hennys, by an illumination in the so-called evangelary of Rabbula, and by a fresco in the church of St. Sergius at *Gaza (G.A. Wellen, Theotokos, 64). On the panels of the wooden doors of St. Sabina in Rome, the episode is carved next to the multiplication of the loaves (var. aus., Age of Spirituality, 438). In depictions on gold-glass, Christ, with or without staff, is represented in the center among the hydriai, which have the particularity of always possessing lids (F. Zanchi Roppo, Vetri paleocristiami, figs. 19-46). In the minor arts, the scene is portrayed vividly in a number of diptychs (W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten, pls. 109, 111). On the silver casket of St. Nazarius, Christ is portrayed, on one side, on a throne among the apostles: at his feet there are five baskets of bread and six hydriai, an evident allusion to the gospel miracles and to the *Eucharist (var. aus., Storia di Milan, 682). In the 5th c. we know moreover from *Asterius of Amasea that some Christians wore very sumptuous garments, on which they had pictured episodes from the gospels, among which was the wedding at Cana (see PG 40, 166-167).

DACL 2, 1802-1821; EC 2, 479-480; LCI 2, 299-305; var. aus., Storia di Milano, I, Milan 1935; F. Benoit, Sarcophages d'Arles et de Marseille, Paris 1954; G.A. Wellen, Theotokos. Eine ikonographische Abhandlung über das Gottesmutterbild in frühchristlicher Zeit, Utrecht-Antwerpen 1961; J.L. Maier, Le Baptistère de Naples et ses mosaïques, Fribourg 1964; F. Zanchi Roppo, Vetri paleocristiani a figure d'oro, Bologna 1968; F.W. Deichmann, Ravenna. Haupstadt des spätantiken Abendlandes, 11/2, Wiesbaden 1974; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz [2]1976; Age of Spirituality: A Symposium, New York 1979; C.A. Moreora Azevedo, O milagre de Caná na iconografia paleocristá, Porto 1986 (cf. RivAC 63 [1987] 452-456); TIP 232-234.

A.M. Giuntella

WEEK. The Christian week is a collection of Jewish, astrological and Christian elements.

1. The Israelite-Jewish week, which consisted of seven days and with the Sabbath as the final day, remained the foundation of the Christian week. Early Christianity simply adopted it: Christianity also called the last day "Sabbath," and the second to last day paraskeuē (i.e., the day of preparation for the celebration of the Jewish Sabbath, that is, the eve of the Sabbath, or Friday) or the day before Sabbath, although the other days of the week were simply called day one, two, three, four and five. Sunday was therefore called "the first day of the week," before receiving the new title of the "Lord's day."

2. The Sabbath in Greco-Roman antiquity was put in parallel to the day of the god Cronus/Saturn (here perhaps the Jewish influence had a role: Flavius Josephus, C. Apion. II,31-32.; Tertull., Nat. I,13; Apol. 16,11). Cronus/Saturn subsequently became the first day of the "planetary week," which was called thus because every day of the week was under the dominion of one of the seven planets, which, according to the ancient perspective, revolved around the earth and positively or negatively influenced the course of the world. Strangely, the Western Christian church adopted these names that were pagan-astrological in origin: the dies Solis ("sun's day") became in German Sonntag (Eng. "Sunday"); the dies Lunae ("moon's day") became lunedì in Italian (Fr. lundi; Ger. Mon[d] tag; Eng. "Monday"); dies Martis ("Mars's day") became martedì in Italian (Fr. mardi; in Ger., from the god Thingus, resp. Tyr/Ziu, became Dienstag; Eng. "Tuesday"); dies Mercurii ("Mercury's day") became in Italian mercoledì (Fr. mercredi; in the northern countries it was given the name Wotan—cf. Eng. "Wednesday"; the Ger. term Mittwoch is a more recent creation); in the same way dies Jovis ("Jupiter's day") became in Italian giovedì (Fr. jeudi; in the northern countries the name Donnerstag [Ger.], "Thursday" [Eng.] is derived from the god Donar, resp. Thor); last, dies Veneris ("Venus's day") became in Italian venerdì (Fr. vendredi; in the northern countries Freitag [Ger.], "Friday" [Eng.], is the day of the goddess Fr(e)ia, the northern Venus). In the English linguistic area dies Saturni ("Saturn's day") became Saturday. The order of the week, however, remained that of the Jewish order (Sunday is the first day and not the second day of the week).

3. For the Christian elements connected to the week, see *Sabbath; *Sunday; *Fasting and Abstinence (for Wednesday and Friday).

E. Schürer, Die siebentägige Woche im Gebrauche der christlichen Kirche der ersten Jahrhunderte: ZNTW 6 (1905) 1-66; F.H. Colson, The Week, Cambridge 1926; F.J. Dölger, Die Planetenwoche der griechisch-römischen Antike und der christliche Sonntag: Antike und Christentum 6 (1941) 202-238; R.L. Odom, Sunday in Roman Paganism, Washington, DC 1944; G. Schreiber, Die Wochentage im Erlebnis der Ostkirche und des christlichen Abendlandes: Wissenschaft. Abh. d. Arbeitsgemeinschaft f. Forschung d. Landes Nordrhein-Westf. 11 (1959) 207-220; W. Rordorf, Der Sonntag. Geschichte des Ruhe- und Gottesdiensttages im ältesten Christentum: Abh. z. Theol. d. AT u. NT 43, Zürich 1962, 11-44; Id., Le christianisme et la semaine planétaire: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 189-196; M. Klöckener, Dies: AugL 2, 414-419; E. Zerubavel, The Seven Day Circle: The History and Meaning of the Week, New York 1985; W. Witakowsky, The Idea of Septimana Mundi and the Millenarian Typology of the Creation Week in Syriac Tradition, in V Symposium Syriacum (OCA 236), ed. R. Lavenant, Rome 1990, 93-109; Ch. Pietri, Le temps de la semaine à Rome et dans l'Italie chrétienne (IV^e-V^e siècle), in Christiana respublica, Rome 1997, pp. 201-249.

W. Rordorf

WIDOWS. In Christian antiquity the widows, because of their precarious social and economic situation, belonged to the world of the poor and those needing assistance, and were the beneficiaries of the respect and the love with which the gospel embraces the unfortunate. The needy were helped by the communities (see Acts 6; Trad. Ap. 50; Ign. Ant., Smyr. 6,2; Polyc. 4,1; Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 67). In particular, they were the object of the bishop's care (see Didasc. II,4,1; II,26,1-3). Various Fathers such as *Ambrose and *John Chrysostom, and the councils (*Carthage 418 and *Chalcedon 451) exhort the bishop to watch over and defend widows.

Facing these hardships, it is understandable that a widow, if willing and able, could enter a new marriage. In the early church the choice was made between widowhood and remarriage (see 1 Cor 7:39-40), but also, realistically, for the young widows the counsel was given to remarry (see 1 Tim 5:14). A few more rigorist thinkers—for ascetical reasons and not to appear inferior to pagan moralists—looked on remarriage with suspicion and referred to it as "a respectable adultery" (Athenag., Leg. 33,4), a type of bigamy (Tertull., Monog. 10,7). The majority of authors, however, adopted a more open and sympathetic stance (see Hermas, Mand. IV,4,1-2; Clem. Alex., Strom. 3,1 and 3,12; Epiph., Haer. I,48,9; III, 59,4-6; John Chrys., Hom. de libello rep. 4). They tolerated remarriage, but other subsequent marriages were frowned on (see Const. Ap. III,2,2-3; *Greg. Naz., Or. 37,8; Basil Caes., Epp. 160,4; 188,4). Generally speaking, although regarding remarriage with severity, seen as a concession to human weakness, the Fathers did not prohibit such marriages (see Ambr., De viduis 12.68; Aug., De bono vid., 12.15; Jer., Contra Iovin. I).

The term widow also indicates a special category of persons who have a specific position and function within the community and who must meet certain requirements: they had to be 60 years of age, married only once, borne good witness as mothers of their families, and be well known for their social concern and life of prayer (see 1 Tim 5:9-16). *Ignatius of Antioch mentions "the virgins called widows" (Smyrn. 13,1: perhaps assimilated to the virgins because of their chastity); *Polycarp refers to them as "altars of God" (4,3; see also Didasc. III,6,3 and Const. Ap. II,26,8). *Tertullian seems to allude to an ordo viduarum (see Virg. vel. 9,2-3; see also Monog. 11,1), for the possibility of the penitents having recourse to their intercession (see Pud. 13,7). Some were "instituted" for prayer, but they did not receive the *laying on of hands (see Trad. Ap. 10.23; Didasc. III,1,1 and III,6,2). They also performed activities within the church, in favor esp. of the women: preparing them for *baptism (Statuta eccl. ant. 12), being present at their baptism, anointing them with oil, covering them with a veil when they descended into the baptismal pool, visiting the sick (see Testam. Dom. 1,40; 2,4 and 8), but they esp. dedicated themselves to asceticism and prayer (Didasc. III,5,2; Test. Dom. 1,41; Chrysostom, Vidua eligatur 1): the deaconesses gradually supplanted them. Some widows gathered the virgins and the widows in their own home, dedicating themselves to the spiritual and ascetic life, as in the case of *Marcella and *Paula at *Rome (see Jer., Epp. 127 and 108); others had an important role in the education of their children (as did Antusa for John Chrysostom; *Monica for Augustine), and performed an active role in Christianizing society.

H. Leclerq, Veuvage, veuve: DACL 15 (1953) 3007-3026; B. Grillet, in the introductory portion to SC 138, Paris 1968, 21-83; G. Stählin, Das Bild der Witwe: JbAC 17 (1974) 5-20 (with bibl.); A. Covito, L'"ordo viduarum" nella Chiesa antica: La scala 43 (1989) 176-197; A. Nazzaro, Figure di donne cristiane: la vedova, in R. Uglione (ed.), La donna nel mondo antico. Atti del II conv., Turin 1989, 187-219; B. Thurston Bowman, The Widows: A Women's Ministry in the Early Church, Minneapolis 1989; R. Bruno Siola, Viduae e coetus viduarum nella Chiesa primitiva e nella normazione dei primi imperatori cristiani, in Atti dell'Accademia Romanistica Costantiniana. VIII convegno internazionale, Naples 1990, 367-426; H. Marchal, Veuvage, veuve: DSp 16 (1994) 522-529; J.U. Krause, Witwen und Waisen im frühen Christentum. I-IV, Stuttgart 1994-95; V. Recchia, Le vedove nella letteratura istituzionale dell'antico Cristianesimo e nella tipologia biblica: Invigilata lucernis 21 (1999) 303-332.

M. Maritano

WILFRID of York. (ca. 634–709). Born to a noble family in Northumbria around 634, during his teenage years Wilfred spent 3 years at the monastery of Lindisfarne. Afterward, he spent time at *Rome on pilgrimage and then several years in *Gaul: he derived from this trip absolute fidelity to the pope and a disregard for the lack of couth and ignorance of his fellow countrymen. Having returned to his homeland, he took part firsthand in the conquest of Roman customs over those of the Celts with respect to the observance of *Easter and the Council of Whitby (664). Appointed during the same year as bishop of *York, he left to consecrate priests in Gaul. Disliked by his fellow countrymen, including *Theodore of Canterbury, because of his haughtiness and harshness, he was forced to undergo persecutions of every sort by local rulers, who deprived him of his dignity, imprisoned him and, when facing the stance taken by Rome in his favor (twice he had to go to Rome), they sought in every way to avoid acknowledging such support. Only at a very advanced age, in 705, did he reclaim the monasteries-episcopates of Hexham and Ripon. He died in 709. The monk Stephen of Ripon (Eddius Stephanus), his companion in travel and trial, wrote an important biography about his life, which clearly possesses an apologetic tone (MGH, Script. rer. merov. 6, 193-263).

DCB 4, 1179-1185; BS 12, 1092-1094; H. Mayr-Harting, Saint Wilfrid, London 1986; W.T. Foley, Images of Sanctity in Eddius Stephanus' Life of Bishop Wilfrid, An Early English Saint's Life, Lewiston, NY 1992; Patrologia IV, 426-427.

M. SIMONETTI

WILLIBRORD of Utrecht (658–739). A marginal autograph annotation in the calendar of Echternach written by Willibrord himself (Cod. Paris. Lat. 10837), namely the one which the Venerable *Bede mentions (BHL 8395-8397; HE 5,13; 6,10-11,19), and some acts inserted in the Liber aureus Epternacensis constitute the most ancient sources on the life and activity of Willibrord. Born in 658 and an oblate in the monastery of Ripon at the age of six when his father Wilgilis retired as a hermit on the Humber estuary, he became a disciple of *Wilfrid of York, who favored the liturgical and monastic observance of *Rome. Willibrord transferred in 678 to the Irish monastery of Rathmelsigi (Cluain Melsige, modern-day Clonmelsh, Co. Carlow), where he found *Egbert of York, and departed in 690 with 11 companions in order to evangelize Friesland. He placed himself under the protection of his palace teacher Pippin II and during a visit to Rome around 692 had himself fortified with full missionary powers conferred by Pope *Sergius I (687–702), who ordained him archbishop of the Frisians (with his new name "Clemens") on 21, according to others 22, November 695. Willibrord, equipped with various liturgical books and objects of worship, established his cathedral at Utrecht and in 698 withdrew to the monastery of Echternach, to whose monks he left his martyrology-calendar (CPL 2037). The martyrology is the famous Epternacensis, the most ancient exemplar preserved of the Hieronymian Martyrology (beginning of the 8th c.). The hostility of Radbod king of the Frisians and the events surrounding Frankish politics upon the death of Pippin II explain the momentary withdrawal from the mission of Frisia. Christianity definitively conquered the terrain after the death of Radbod (719), thanks to the collaboration of Boniface. Willibrord died on 7 November 739 and was buried at Echternach (modern-day Luxembourg).

BHL 8935-8945; BS 12, 1113-1121; LCI 8, 616-623; BBKL 18, 1521-1530; F. Flaskamp, Wilbrord-Clemens und Wynfrith-Bonifatius: Sankt Bonifatius, Gedenkgabe zum zwölfhundertsten Todestag, Fulda [2]1954, 157-172; H.-J. Reischmann, Willibrord—Apostel der Friesen. Seine Vita nach Alkuin und Thiofrid, Sigmaringendorf 1989; G. Kiesel - J. Schroeder (eds.), Willibrord—Apostel der Niederlande, Gründer der Abtei Echternach, Luxembourg [2]1990; P. Bange - A.G. Weiler, Willibrord, zijn wereld en zijn werk, Nijmegen 1990; M.C. Ferrari et al. (eds.), Die Abtei Echternach 698-1998, Luxembourg 1999.

V. SAXER - S. HEID

WINE. In Jewish literature wine is an ambiguous sign; on the one hand, it is a sign of God's blessing and of joy (Gen 27:28; Ps 104:14-15; Pr 31:6-7; Eccl 10:19; Is 36:17); on the other, its dangers are noted (Gen 9:21; 19:32ff.; Is 5:11 and 22). Wine was used in offerings to God (Ex 29:40; Lev 23:13; Num 15:5); *Melchizedek offered bread and wine (Gen 14:18). In the NT, *John the Baptist did not drink wine (Lk 1:15), although *Jesus was accused of being a glutton and a drunkard (Mt 11:18; Lk 7:33). Jesus compares his blood to wine and his teaching to new wine (Mt 9:17; Mk 2:22; Lk 5:37-38).

In ancient Christian literature this term was used in four different contexts: (1) moral-pastoral, (2) liturgical, (3) sacramental and (4) exegetical.

In the moral works, the Fathers defended the modest pleasure of wine against such rigorous movements as those of the *Ebionites, *Encratites, *Marcionites and *Manicheans. *Paul advised *Timothy to drink wine as a medicine (1 Tim 5:23). The firstfruits of the wine were the prerogative of the prophet during the first centuries of the Christian church (Didache 13,6) and, afterward, the bishop (Apos. Con. 2,34,5) and the clergy (Apos. Con. 7,29,3). The pleasure of wine is not evil or sinful, although intemperance and drunkenness are (John Chrys., De stat. 2,5); wine is God's gift, and one must use it properly (Basil, Hom. 14,1); *Clement of Alexandria, in an entire chapter of his Pedagogue, explains this point: "In what manner should one participate at banquets" (Paed. II,3). Many Christian authors criticized the inordinate use of wine in widespread intoxication by men and women. Such drunkenness, already condemned per se, gave place to excesses of every sort, moral dissoluteness, and physical and mental degeneration. Criticisms were also leveled against the immoderate use of wine during special occasions (refrigeria, martyrial feasts etc.), which being festive and communal, created a solidarity in drunkenness.

Christian texts mention it as the matter of pagan libations (Act. Thom. 77; Ps.-Clem. of Rome, Hom. 2,15). It was an important element in the rites of some extremist sects as, e.g., in the rite of *Mark the *Gnostic magician, whose description is provided by *Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. 1,13,2). It was no less important in the ritual banquets of the community of *Qumran (Community Rule 1QSa 2,17-22), which were very similar to the liturgical banquets of the first Christian communities. For the Eucharist, wine was an essential matter both in the orthodox and heterodox liturgy, with the exception of some rigorist sects (see *Aquarians). For liturgical use, the color of wine was never determined in antiquity, but there did exist some demands regarding quality (Apos. Con. 2); the type of use both in the liturgy and daily life was in harmony with the custom of that time, that is, normally water mixed with wine (the first testimony comes from the writings of *Justin Martyr [1 Apol. 65,5]), but exceptions are not lacking: e.g., can. 3 of the Synod of *Trullo from 692 condemned the Armenians who used wine not mixed with water in their eucharistic service; to drink "acratos" wine, that is, unmixed wine, was synonymous with drunkenness (John Chrys., Hom. in Eutrop. I,1).

The aforementioned rigorous movements prohibited the use of wine not only in daily life but also in the liturgy, in reference to the words of *Jesus in Mt 26:29 (John Chrys., Hom. in Mt 82,2), or simply because they considered it a diabolical work (Epiph., Haer. 47,1); they are thus called aquarii, hydroparastae and hydrothei. Against their belief, the following authors defended the orthodox tradition esp.: Irenaeus of Lyons (Adv. haer. V,1,3), *Clement of Alexandria (Strom. I,19,96,1), *Cyprian of Carthage (Ep. 63,5) and *Epiphanius (Haer. 30,16).

The wine of the Eucharist was identified with the blood of Christ at the beginning by Paul (1 Cor 10:16) and *Ignatius of Antioch (Rom. 7,3). Irenaeus identifies its true identity (Adv. haer. IV,17,5). *Cyril of Jerusalem was one of the pioneers of the teaching of the conversion of the elements (Catech. myst. 1,7; 2,9; 5,7).

In the exegetical field many passages of Scripture that contain the word wine were interpreted by the Fathers in a eucharistic context, but there are very many passages where the wine is considered a symbol of the divine teaching (Law and *Prophets), that is, the wine existing before Cana (Orig., Comm. in Jo., frag. 74), or rather the very words of Christ (Orig., Comm. in Jo., frag. 74); and wine frequently signifies in the metaphorical sense the Pneuma (Hipp., Bened. Jacobi 18), or the grace of the *Holy Spirit (Orig., De princip. I,3,7).

E.R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Graeco-Roman Period, VI, New York 1956; W. Rordorf, La vigne et le vin dans la tradition juive et chrétienne: Ann. Univ. Neuchâtel (1969/70) 131-146 [= W. Rordorf, Liturgie, Foi et Vie, Paris 1986, 493-508]; J.P. Nowak, De sobrietate et ebrietate in primaeva ecclesia, Diss. UPS, Rome 1994; P. Laurence, Ivresse et luxure féminines: les sources classiques de Jérôme: Latomus 57 (1998) 885-899; Della vite e del vino. Il succo dell'immortalità nelle lettere e nei colori, ed. O. Longo e P. Scarpi, Milan 1999; Vino. Tra mito e storia, ed. M.G. Marchetti Lungarotti e M. Torelli, Milan 2006.

G. Ladocsi

WING (Flight of the Soul). In antiquity the immortal *soul, which escapes the body at death and rises to heaven, was often compared to a bird that rises in flight on its wings. In agreement with *Plato, esp. with the Phaedrus (many commentaries), the philosophical tradition developed the theme of the soul/bird with its wings and flight along various lines: physical death, *ascesis, the passage through the material world (Posidonius) and the contemplation of spiritual reality (Beauty). As *Philo had done previously, the Christian authors enriched the entire context with biblical passages (esp. Ps 54:7). They also Christianized it, adding various themes: sin (*Origen), the dove of the *Holy Spirit, virginity (*Methodius, *Ambrose), the virtuous life—love of neighbor, humility, chastity (*Augustine), prayer, elevation to God (*Gregory of Nyssa), the devil, who like a predator hinders the soul's flight, the death of the saints (*Gregory the Great). Esp. from the 4th c. flight was taken as a symbol for overcoming distance in the epistolary literature.

P. Courcelle, Flügel I: RAC 8, 29-65 (bibl.); K. Thraede, Flügel II (epistolary theme): RAC 8,65ff.; V. Poeschl, Bibliographie zur antiken Bildersprache, Heidelberg 1964, 478; S. Poque, Le langage symbolique dans la prédication d'Augustin d'Hippone, Paris 1984, 331-341; D. Dideberg, Amor: AugLex I/1-2 (1986) 294-300, esp. 298.

B. Studer

WISDOM BOOKS

I. Job - II. Solomonic books - III. Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus (Sirach).

Christians distinguished the poetic books of the OT with the adjective "wisdom" because of their content; the *Jews, however, included these books in the broader category of the Ketuvim ("writings"). They are as follows: Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the *Song of Songs (= Solomonic books); Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus or Sirach (they were considered deuterocanonical and therefore not included in the Jewish canon). Some even included the book of *Psalms among the sapiential books, which in this encyclopedia has been treated separately.

I. Job. Citations or allusions to Job occurred already in the NT (Mt 19:26; Mk 10:27; Lk 1:52; 1 Cor 3:19; Phil 1:19; 1 Th 5:22; 2 Th 2:8; Jas 5:11; Rev 9:6), but not to the same extent in the most ancient Christian literature of the 1st and 2nd c., which seems to have not had much interest in this biblical book. Nevertheless, *Clement of Rome (1 Cor. 17,3-4; 26,3) and *Justin Martyr (Dial. 46,32; 79,4; 103,5) were exceptions. The first writer to make extensive use of the book of Job was *Clement of Alexandria (esp. in the Stromata: 15 explicit citations); Clement found an argument in Job for his doctrine of authentic Christian "gnosis." Shortly thereafter, the book of Job made its first appearance in Latin Christian literature in the writings of *Cyprian (Testimonia; De op. et eleem. 18, ecc.). The first Christian commentator on Job was *Origen, whose *exegesis, however, has mostly been lost: Greek fragments exist in the catenae (CPG I,1424; CPG IV,213-215), and Latin fragments can be found in the writings of *Hilary of Poitiers (see below) and perhaps even in the commentary of the priest *Philip or ps.-Jerome (PL 26,619-802), which, at least, certainly contains Origen's ideas (Altaner, 203-204). Origen explained the mystery of *evil, which had been debated in the book of Job and had recourse to the doctrine of the preexistence of souls and their initial fall; it is interesting that he did not see in Job a type of Christ but rather a prototype of all the martyrs. After Origen one must recall, among the Greek fathers, the commentary by *Evagrius of Pontus, from whose work numerous fragments remain in the catenae (CPG II,2458), and what has come down to us likewise in fragmentary form from *Athanasius (CPG II,2141). Hilary of Poitiers's commentary has been almost entirely lost, whose few fragments, however, are to be considered nothing more than a translation of Origen's commentary (Tract. in Job: PL 10,723-724; CSEL 65,229-230). *Didymus of Alexandria's commentary, which goes until Job 16:2 (ed. Henrichs - Hagedorn - Koenen, I-III, Bonn 1968-1973) has been recently discovered in the papyri of Tura; Didymus's exegesis is known to us otherwise in a different edition through the fragments contained in the catenae, which end at Job 34:25 (CPG II,2553). Even in Didymus's work one can detect the presence of Origen's doctrine concerning the preexistence and the fall of the soul and that of the apokatastasis. Didymus likewise derived from Origen the interpretation of Job as a symbol of the persecuted righteous person and the one subject to temptation (and not a type of Christ). Scholars have attributed a Commentary on Job to a certain *Julian the Arian, who lived in the 4th c. (?) (CPG II,2075; D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Iulianus, Berlin 1973), in which the Job-Christ typology (later adopted by *Gregory the Great) appears for the first time. From *John Chrysostom we possess a sermon on Job (PG 63,477-486) and a commentary, which has been transmitted by the catenae, whose authenticity has been questioned. Of the four spurious sermons published in PG 56, the first is for the Byzantine feast of Job (6 May); the other three belong to *Severian of Gabala. With John Chrysostom the ancient Christian exegesis on Job reached one of its supreme heights, which would then only be surpassed by *Gregory the Great's Moralia in Job. Elaborating a genuine osmosis of biblical spirituality with moral philosophy, John Chrysostom saw in Job the model and the height of all the virtues of the biblical and Greco-Roman tradition. A commentary on Job, which has not come down to us, was also composed by *Theodore of Mopsuestia, who regarded it as the work of a pagan author. Among the commentaries on Job, one must also recall, after Chrysostom, the work of *Olympiodorus (PG 93,13-469: lengthy extracts in the catena of *Niceta, and, according to the recent hypothesis, material belonging to Olympiodorus even in the Latin commentary now commonly attributed to Julian: see CPG III,7453 and below).

Among the Latin fathers, with the exception of Hilary whose work was mentioned above, the first commentator was *Ambrose, who delivered some sermons on Job that merged into the treatise titled De interpellatione Job et David (PL 14,793-850; CSEL 32,211-296). Augustine's Adnotationes in Job have a pronounced theological tone (PL 34,825-886, see PL 32,635; CSEL 28/2,509-628); in the context of the fight against *Pelagianism, Augustine harmonized his exegesis with the well-known doctrine of the universality of sin and limited salvation through gratuitous divine choice: Job is the just man, but he was conceived and born in sin, he therefore knew that he did not merit any reward for his just conduct of life. A point of view diametrically opposed to Augustine's was expressed in the Expositio libri Job, which has been commonly attributed to *Julian of Eclanum after the authoritative study written by Vaccari (Un commento a Giobbe di Giuliano di Eclano, Rome 1915; but against Stiglmayr in ZKTh [1919] 269-288), in a work with an Antiochene mark, whose Julian authorship would seem to be validated precisely by the Pelagian interpretation, which gives the reader the complete sense of a response to Augustine's exegesis (ed. PLS 1,1573-1679; extensive bibl. in Altaner, 390-391, and DSp 8,1224-1225). One should also recall, among the Latins, the commentary of ps.-Pelagius or ps.-Jerome (PL 23,1407-1470), in addition to the aforementioned commentary of ps.-Jerome (PL 26,619-802), which is to be reattributed to the priest Philip (see the study by Ciccarese) and contains material from the writings of Origen (see above). The most extensive and best work, however, in all of patristic literature on Job is perhaps Gregory the Great's Moralia in Job, which, being more than a work of exegesis, is a true and proper manual of moral and ascetic theology (ed. Gillet-De Gaudemaris, Paris 1952, SC 32); it was composed under the form of homilies delivered by Gregory to the monks of *Constantinople between 579 and 585 (see the dedicatory letter to *Leander of Seville). Because this entry cannot treat the rich moral and ascetic contents of this work, the reader is referred to the article in the DSp 6,876ff. and 8,1222-1223). We make note only that, from the strictly exegetical point of view, the typology established by Gregory saw in Job the type of the suffering Christ and consequently that of the church (Praef.: Job represents the *mystery of Christ's passion, not only for having prophesied it in his speeches but also for having portrayed it in his sufferings. And because Christ constitutes an unum with the church, Job, as any other saint who bears in himself the *image of Christ, is also a type of the church).

DSp 8, 1218-1225, with an extensive bibliography (1224-1225) on the Greek and Latin fathers. Further bibliographic references can be found under the various clavis numbers of the CPG mentioned above and in the work of Altaner, 390-391 (Julian of Eclanum) and 499-500 (Gregory the Great). For Didymus, see M. Simonetti, in VetChr 20 (1983) 357-363; for Theodore of Mopsuestia: L. Pirot, L'oeuvre exégétique de Th. de Mops., Rome 1913, 131-134. *Isidore of Pelusium's exegesis on Job (who, however, did not compose a commentary on this biblical book) was studied by R. Maisano: Koinonia 4 (1980) 63-68. For the catenae, which are important esp. for the exegesis of John Chrysostom and Olympiodorus, from whom hundreds of fragments have been preserved for us, see CPG IV,213-215 (with further bibliography, even on certain Fathers). Other bibliography: D. Hagedorn, Der Hiobkommentar des Arianers Julian (PTS 14), Berlin 1973; J. Ziegler, Iob 14,4-5a als wichtigster Schriftbeweis für die These "Neminem sine sorde et sine peccato esse" (Cyprian, Test 3, 54), bei den Lateinischen christlichen Schriftstellern, Munich 1985; H. Sorlin - L. Neyrand, Jean Chrysostome, Commentaire sur Job. I: (Chapitres I-XIV); II: (Chapitres XV-XLII) (SC 346, 348), Paris 1988; M.P. Ciccarese, Una esegesi "Double Face." Introduzione alla Expositio in Iob del presbitero Filippo: AnSE 9 (1992) 483-492; U. Hagedorn - D. Hagedorn, Die älteren griechischen Katenen zum Buch Hiob. I: Einleitung, Prologe und Epiloge, Fragmente zu Hiob 1,1-8,22 (PTS 40), Berlin-New York 1994; var. aus., Le Livre de Job chez les Pères, Strasbourg 1996; G. Cremascoli, L'esegesi biblica di Gregorio Magno, Brescia 2001; M. Perraymond, La figura di Giobbe nella cultura paleocristiana tra esegesi patristica e manifestazioni iconografiche, Vatican City 2002; Gregorio Magno esegeta: rapporti tra Commentari e Omelie, in Gregorio Magno nel XIV centenario della morte, Rome 2004, 141-152.

II. Solomonic books (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs). When collecting the data of the preceding Hebrew tradition, Christian antiquity unanimously attributed to *Solomon the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs. Starting from *Origen onward (Prol. in Cant.: GCS 33,75ff.), these three books were considered a unitary trilogy in which one saw the symbol and the figure of human teaching, that is, secular wisdom and its traditional tripartite division into *ethics, physics and metaphysics, and they were made to correspond, respectively: Proverbs, ethics; Ecclesiastes, physics; Song of Songs, metaphysics.

S. Leanza, La classificazione dei libri salomonici e i suoi riflessi sulla questione dei rapporti tra Bibbia e scienze profane, da Origene agli scrittori medievali: Augustinianum 14 (1974) 651-666; Id., L'esegesi di Origene al libro dell'Ecclesiaste, Reggio Calabria 1975, 25-31; M. Harl, Les trois livres de Salomon et les trois parties de la philosophie dans les Prologues des Commentaires sur le Cantique des Cantiques (d'Origène aux chaînes exégétiques grecques), in Texte und Textkritik. Eine Aufsatzsammlung, ed. J. Dummer, Berlin 1987, 249-269; Letture cristiane dei Libri sapienziali: XX incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 1992; C. Kannengiesser, Handbook of Patristic Exegesis: The Bible in Ancient Christianity, Leiden 2004, 296-310 (with information identifying the commentaries of the Fathers in the editions: 306-310).

1. Proverbs. Because of its moral content, the book of Proverbs was often cited and used by the Fathers for exhortation (the most ancient citations occur in the *Epistle of Barnabas, *Clement of Rome, *Ignatius of Antioch and *Polycarp); there were not, however, many commentaries explicitly dedicated to the entire book or to individual sections. The pearl of patristic literature on Proverbs was the Homilia in principium Proverbiorum by *Basil the Great (see below). The book's inspiration and canonicity was never called into question; *Theodore of Mopsuestia himself did not outright deny the canonicity of Proverbs but maintained that Proverbs and Ecclesiastes were at an inferior level of inspiration (sapientiae gratia rather than prophetiae gratia: a doctrine condemned by the Second Council of Constantinople, 553). The Greek fathers' *exegesis of Proverbs has been preserved for us in large part in the Catena of Procopius, which is unpublished (the text attributed to Procopius in PG 87,1221-1544 is not authentic, although the partial Latin translation by Corderius in PG 87,1779-1800, which was created from a manuscript of the Procopian translation, seems plausible); the text of Polycronius was published in a Latin translation by Th. Peltanus (Antwerp 1614; other catenae, in some way connected to the translation of Procopius such as that of the Vat. gr. 1802, which was partially published by Angelo Mai [Nova Patrum Biblioth. VII/2,1-81]: all dependent, including that of Procopius, on a more ancient catena now lost), until then only partially explored and not always reliable with respect to the attributions of authorship. We possess various scholia and fragments written by *Hippolytus (CPG I,1883; PG 10,615-630; H. Achelis, GCS 1/2,155-167: a moral exegesis), Origen of Alexandria (CPG I,1430; PG 13,17-34; 17,149-160; C. Tischendorf, Notitia editionis codicis bibliorum Sinaitici, Leipzig 1860, 76-122: *allegorical and spiritual exegesis), *Didymus of Alexandria (CPG II,2552; PG 39,1621-1646; 95,1297B; 39,180-182: a literal explanation and spiritual application), *Evagrius of Pontus (CPG II,2456-2457; critical edition of fragments in the catenae by P. Géhin; perhaps material by Evagrius under the name of *Origen, PG 17,161-252; Syriac fragments: J. Muyldermans, Evagriana syriaca, 133-134 and 163-164; Evagrius deeply felt the influence of the book of Proverbs in all his work, also changing its pontificating style; see esp. the Metrical Sentences for Monks and Virgins, a true and proper imitation of Proverbs), *Gregory of Nazianzus (CPG II,3052,6), *Eustathius of Antioch (CPG II,3366; PG 18,675-686; Pitra, Analecta sacra II, p. XXXVIII; M. Spanneut, Recherches sur les écrits d'Eustathe d'Antioche, Lille 1948, 122-123, on Pr 8:22 and other texts: theological and allegorical-christological exegesis), *Eusebius of Caesarea (CPG II,3469, 7; PG 24,76-78), *Apollinaris of Laodicea (CPG II,3683; A. Mai, Nova Patrum Biblioth. VII/2,76-80; other fragments still unpublished), *Epiphanius of Salamis (CPG II,3761,3), *John Chrysostom (CPG II,4445-4446; fragments in PG 64,659-740 and an entire commentary in the Cod. Patm. 161, to be published in the CCG), *Cyril of Alexandria (CPG III,5205, 3; PG 69,1277-1278 on Proverbs 8:22: literal and theological exegesis), *Olympiodorus (CPG III,7464; PG 93, 469-478, of doubtful authenticity; a literal exegesis of a moralizing tone, but at times allegorical), and Julian the Deacon (A. Mai, op. cit., 80). Various interpretations in different contexts appear in the writings of *Isidore of Pelusium (PG 78). The entirety of a direct translation of *Basil of Caesarea's Homilia in principium Proverbiorum has survived to our day: on Pr 1:1-5 (CPG II,2856; PG 31,385-424), which, moreover, was cited very often in the catenae: a true jewel of the exegetical literature on Proverbs in which the author explained the initial verses of Proverbs, after having emphasized the sublime character of Proverbs, which is very useful for the education of customs, and of Ecclesiastes, which unmasks the vanity of earthly things by directing us to divine and eternal values, and after having outlined the mystical interpretation of Song of Songs.

Another homily on Pr 6:4 under the name of the same Basil has also come down to us (PG 31,1497-1508).

Among the Latin fathers, *Augustine commented on some passages from Proverbs in the Sermones (CPL 284): Pr 9:12 (according to the LXX) in Serm. 35 (PL 38,213-214); Pr 13:7-8 in Serm. 36 (PL 38,215-221); and Pr 31:10-31 in Serm. 37 (PL 38,221-235). To Salonius of Geneva is attributed a debated commentary under the form of a dialogue on Proverbs and Ecclesiastes which, following the literary genre quaestiones et responsiones, addresses and solves the chief exegetical difficulties of the two books (CPL 499; Pr: PL 53,967-994; Eccl: PL 53,994-1012; ed. C. Curti, Salonii Commentarii in Parabolas Salomonis et in Ecclesiasten, Catania 1964). The exegesis of *Gregory the Great on Proverbs has been preserved by *Paterius in Liber testimoniorum . . . ex opusculis S. Gregorii (CPL 1718; PL 79,683ff.; on Pr: PL 79,895-906). *Bede composed an Allegorica expositio super Parabolas Salomonis (PL 91,937-1040), which has been incorrectly transmitted to us also among the works of *Rabanus Maurus, and in the Libellus de muliere forti (Pr 31: PL 91,1039-1052); moreover, his fragments on an Allegorica interpretatio in Proverbia Salomonis, on chapters 7, 30, 31 and 36 (PL 91,1051-1066): for all these writings, see CPL 1351-1352.

L. Bigot: DTC 13, 932; A. Barucq: DBS 8, 1469 and 1472-1473. For the catenae: CPG IV, 225-226. On Hippolytus: M. Richard, Les fragments du Commentaire de S. Hippolyte sur les Proverbes

de Salomon: Muséon 78 (1965) 257-290; 79 (1966) 61-94; 80 (1967) 327-364. On Origen: M. Richard, Les fragments d'Origène sur Pr. 30,15-31, in Epektasis. Mélanges J. Daniélou, Paris 1972, 385-394. On Evagrius: G. Mercati, Intorno ad uno scolio creduto di Evagrio: RBi 14 (1914) 534-542 (= Opere minori 3, ST 78, 393-401); H. Urs von Balthasar, Die Hiera des Evagrius: ZKTh 63 (1939) 86-106, 181-206; M. Richard: Muséon 79 (1966) 70-71; Quasten II, 177-178; critical edition of all the scholia, Evagrius Ponticus Scholies aux Proverbes, par P. Géhin, SC 340, Paris 1987; Syriac fragments: Muyldermans, cit. supra. On Eusthatius: M. Spanneut, cit. supra. On John Chrysostom: M. Richard, Le Commentaire de S. Jean Chrysostome sur les Proverbes de Salomon: Συμπόσιον. Studies on St. John Chrysostom, Thessaloniki 1973, 99-103, and Muséon 78 (1965) 257-263. On Olympiodorus: M. Faulhaber, Hohelied-, Proverbien- und Prediger-Catenen, Vienna 1902, 89 and 113. On Isidore of Pelusium: R. Maisano, L'esegesi veterotestamentaria di Isidoro di Pelusio. I libri sapienziali: Koinonia 4 (1980) 39-75. On Bede: A. Vaccari: Miscell. Geronimiana, Rome 1920, 5-7 (other bibl. in CPL 1351-1352). For the use of Proverbs and esp. 8:22-25, in the context of the Arian debate, see M. Simonetti, La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome 1975, passim, and Studi sull'arianesimo, Rome 1965, 9-87.

2. Ecclesiastes. The first patristic commentary on Ecclesiastes was that of Hippolytus, only one fragment of which remains (H. Achelis, GCS, Hippolytus Werke I/2, 179). We have more abundant fragments, reconstructed through various *catenae, for the exegetical work of Origen, who composed a commentary in the form of a scholia on Ecclesiastes and eight homilies (ed. S. Leanza, L'esegesi di Origene . . . , and new fragments from Cod. Vindob. Theol. Gr. 147 in CCG 4, Suppl.), characterized as usual by allegorical interpretation that exercised a decisive influence on subsequent patristic exegesis. In the Catena of Procopius we also find fragments of Dionysius of Alexandria's Commentary on Ecclesiastes, which is limited to the first chapters (Feltoe's edition is not very reliable, Cambridge 1904; see A. Labate, Il recupero del Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Dionigi Alessandrino attraverso le catene bizantine: Koinonia 16 [1992] 53-74; better edition in CCG 4, Catena of Procopius, and new fragments from the Cod. Vindob. Theol. Gr. 147 in CCG 4, Suppl.; the Dionysian authorship of the fragment on Ecclesiastes 12 edited by Bienert is subject to debate: Kleronomia 5 [1973] 308-314), with the mystical-allegorical interpretation, which is understood esp. to overcome the difficulties deriving from the "Epicurean" teaching of Ecclesiastes. We possess, however, in its entirety the Metaphrasis in Ecclesiasten Salomonis by *Gregory Thaumaturgus (PG 10,988-1017), which some codices erroneously attribute to *Gregory of Nazianzus: more than a commentary, it is a succinct paraphrase with a prevailing moral intent; it is noteworthy, however, because it also introduces for the first time the hermeneutical hypothesis of the prosopopoeia (Gk. prosōpopoiia; lit. "a dramatizing"; a solution that was then continually followed by subsequent interpreters), such as the alternative to the allegorical interpretation to explain the embarrassing "Epicureanisms" of Ecclesiastes. The *papyri of *Tura have also recently restored to us almost in their entirety the extensive commentary by *Didymus of Alexandria (Kommentar zum Ecclesiastes, ed. Binder-Liesenborghs-Gronewald, Bonn 1969ff.), whose exegesis of Ecclesiastes at first was known only through the few fragments of the catenae but which did not always correspond to the interpretation of Tura; both the commentary of Tura and the catenist fragments, however, reveal an exegesis that was primarily allegorical and tropological, with frequent ecclesiological applications. We also possess entire homilies on Ecclesiastes by Gregory of Nazianzus (PG 44 and P. Alexander, Leiden 1962), which was likewise marked by a mystical and moralizing exegesis. *Gregory of Nyssa's objective, whose interpretation had a vast resonance in later ages and was widely used in the catenae, is to demonstrate that *Solomon, far from exhorting the reader to pleasure, taught instead the disregard for sensible goods, the vanity of which he points out to the reader. The "Epicurean" passages are treated by having recourse to the theory of the prosopopoeia, in which there existed a hypothetical hedonist interlocutor of Solomon; or rather it is supposed that Solomon posed objections to himself and then answered them. The same apologetic intent of defending the book of Ecclesiastes from the accusation of Epicureanism stands at the basis of *Jerome's Commentary on Ecclesiastes (ed. M. Adriaen, CCL 72), another work that had a wide influence in subsequent centuries until the end of the Middle Ages: a sober commentary, which tempers with rare equilibrium the mystical-allegorical interpretation with the philological erudition typical of Jerome's best commentaries.

The commentary attributed to Salonius (ed. C. Curti, Catania 1964) in reality depends on Alcuin and was composed under the form of a dialogue between an interlocutor who poses difficulties and the writer who resolves them, according to the method of the literature of quaestiones et responsiones*. The Commentarius in Ecclesiasten (PG 93, 477-628) by *Olympiodorus of Alexandria clearly has the character of a compilation, almost a catena under the guise of a commentary; this work primarily depends on Origen of Alexandria, Dionysius of Alexandria, Gregory of Nyssa, Didymus of Alexandria, *Nilus and Evagrius, and mostly develops according to mystical-allegorical exegesis. From the exegesis of Nilus and Evagrius, of whom mention has been made, we only possess fragments in the catenae and other collections of an analogous genre: their interpretation was also allegorical and moral. The only commentary that has come down to us from the Antiochene school is that of ps.-Chrysostom (ed. S. Leanza, CCG 4), with a polemically nonallegorical interpretation. But also from the commentaries by the Antiochenes, with the loss of the original Greek, we possess the commentary of *Theodore of Mopsuestia in a corrupted form according to the *Syriac translation (ed. Strothmann). One must also mention Theodore's erroneous teaching on the lower level of inspiration of the books by Solomon (CCG 4,61). The following texts close the patristic period: among the Greeks, the Explanatio super Ecclesiasten by *Gregory of Agrigentum (PG 98,741-1181, critical edition by G.H. Ettlinger and J. Noret in CCG in 2007), along with that of Jerome which is the best patristic commentary.

The commentary on Ecclesiastes—the only work that has come down to us by Gregory of Agrigentum—reveals the author's vast cultural formation, showing that he had become well versed in both classical (*Aristotle, *Philo, Mimnermus and the Greek orators) and Christian authors (Basil the Great, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, John Chrysostom and the preceding commentators on Ecclesiastes), and manifests a noticeable interest in philosophical and theological problems, with particular attention to the problem of free will. From one point of view, or more specifically, the exegetical point of view, the brief prologue placed before the work was important, in which Gregory, beginning from Pr 30:33 ("press milk and you get butter") with a transparent metaphor, identifies the historical-literal sense with the milk and the spiritual sense within the butter (PG 98,741-742), according to a clear bipartite exegetical schema that seems to privilege the spiritual sense. In the commentary, however, the literal interpretation is then dominant, more often by itself, at times followed by the spiritual without the literal. It has no foundation, and the tripartite exegetical schema (literal + allegorical + anagogical interpretation) has no connection to Gregory's work, a theory suggested by Cataudella as the dominant characteristic of Gregory's commentary ("this schema—clearly distinct in its three parts—is found substantially the same in the entire commentary, which therefore gives the impression of a clear architectonic construction, which is both ordered and precise": Q. Cataudella, Storia della Sicilia, IV, Naples 1980, 17). In reality, Gregory did not employ any fixed exegetical scheme in a consistent and systematic manner, not even that of the bipartite division, which was theoretically articulated in the Prologue, but rather allows himself to guide the tenor of the biblical text, which in many cases better lends itself to the deepening of the historical-literal sense (even the extensive and intricate philosophical and theological discussions fall within this type of interpretation). At times he developed spiritual interpretations (both allegorical and tropological), without denying the literal sense. Finally, at times the text required—or at least so it seemed to Gregory—the rejection of the literal sense and the adoption of a spiritual interpretation alone, according to the well-known Alexandrianizing principle that one does not uphold the literal sense where it yields unsatisfactory results and is therefore unworthy of the majesty of the divine Word (see, e.g., Comm. in Eccl. 10,11: "One must understand this expression anagogically and only in this manner"; other examples can be found in S. Leanza, Sul Commentario all'Ecclesiaste . . .). With respect to the complex interpretation of Ecclesiastes, Gregory, at the beginning of his commentary, received from the preceding exegetical tradition and appropriated the traditional christological interpretation, which sees in *Solomon the type of Christ, who mystically spoke to the church (PG 98,745ff., which was derived from *Gregory of Nyssa's idea on the allegorical meaning of the noun Ἐκκλησιατικῆς). This typology, however, is not then exploited in the subsequent portions of the commentary, which privileges, as we said, the literal interpretation. From the preceding exegetical tradition, Gregory also derived the apologetic and moralizing character of the commentary that sought to demonstrate, in debate with those who found in the book of Ecclesiastes hedonist and Epicurean teachings, that this book in fact teaches disregard for earthly goods, inasmuch as it invites one to search for spiritual and eternal goods (PG 98,752ff., 805-809, 829, 897). Moreover, in contradistinction to preceding interpreters, Gregory did not seem excessively disturbed or preoccupied by the "Epicurean" content of the book of Ecclesiastes (for this point, see S. Leanza, L'atteggiamento della più antica esegesi cristiana . . .). In any case, to the traditional solution of the prosopopoeia, which avoided the difficulty of the most embarrassing passages by attributing the hedonistic affirmations of the book of Ecclesiastes to imaginary interlocutors of Solomon, Gregory added or substituted a more attentive and appropriate consideration of the literal sense, which allowed him to attenuate the importance of the so-called Epicurean passages and to interpret them as an acceptable invitation to a moderate use of earthly goods according to the divine plan and the necessity of nature (PG 98,833, 873, 1072-1076). Gregory of Agrigentum's strong personality, which is already evident in the position he assumed before the Epicurean question, is manifested even more in the notable spirit of independence that he showed toward the preceding interpreters—who are continually but always anonymously called into question—and most esp. in the freedom with which he polemically challenged and refuted the exegesis of famous Fathers like *Origen of Alexandria, *Dionysius of Alexandria, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Nilus (for documentation, see S. Leanza, Sul Commentario all'Ecclesiaste . . .), an approach all the more noteworthy in a period in which exegesis was widely downgraded in the catena genre and only with great difficulty did commentators try to question the authority of the "venerable Fathers."

Among the Latin authors, *Gregory the Great, in Quaestio sup. Eccl 3,18ff. (= Dial. IV,3-4: PL 77,321ff.), faced the thorny passages in Ecclesiastes that assert the identity of nature and the end of the human *soul and that of beasts by resolving it with the expedient theory of the prosopopoeia. For other commentators of less importance or of whom we have little knowledge, see Leanza, L'Ecclesiaste nell'interpretazione dell'antico cristianesimo (see bibl.). Among the catenae, those of *Procopius have already been edited (CCG 4 Suppl., ed. S. Leanza) and that of the three Fathers (*Gregory of Nyssa, *Gregory Thaumaturgus and *Maximus the Confessor: ed. S. Lucà, CCG 11); the Catena Hauniense was recently edited by A. Labate (Turnhout 1992). Other catenae remain unpublished: Catena Barberiniana (Cod. Vat. Barb. gr. 388), Catena of Polychronius; see A. Labate, Nuove catene esegetiche sull'Ecclesiaste, in ANTIDORON Hommage à M. Geerard, Wetteren 1984, I,241-263).

Comprehensive Treatments: S. Leanza, L'Ecclesiaste nell'interpretazione dell'antico cristianesimo, Messina 1978; Id., L'atteggiamento della più antica esegesi cristiana dinanzi all'epicureismo ed edonismo di Qohelet: Orpheus n.s. 3 (1982) 73-90.

Individual studies: on Origen: S. Leanza, L'esegesi di Origene al libro dell'Ecclesiaste, Reggio Calabria 1975; on Dionysius of Alexandria: S. Leanza, Il Commentario sull'Eccl. di Dionigi Aless., Scritti in onore di S. Pugliatti, V, Milan 1978, 399-429; on Didymus of Alexandria: S. Leanza, Sul Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Didimo Aless.: SP 18 (1982) 300-316; M. Simonetti: VetChr 20 (1983) 375-385; On Nilus: S. Lucà: Sileno 1 (1977) 13-39; Biblica 60 (1979) 237-246; Augustinianum 19 (1979) 287-296; on Evagrius of Pontus: Evagrius Ponticus, Scholies à l'Ecclésiaste, ed., intr., tr., notes and index by P. Géhin, SC 397, Paris 1993; A. Labate, L'esegesi di Evagrio al libro dell'Ecclesiaste, Studi in onore di A. Ardizzoni, Rome 1978, 485-490; P. Géhin, Un nouvel inédit d'Evagre le Pontique: son commentaire sur l'Ecclésiaste: Byzantion 49 (1979) 188-198; on ps.-Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia: S. Leanza, in CCG 4, 53-62; On Gregory of Agrigentum: S. Gennaro, Influssi di scrittori greci nel Comm. all'Eccl. di Gregorio di Agrigento, Misc. di Studi di Lett. crist. ant., III, Catania 1951, 162-184; on the catenae: CPG IV, 227-228; A. Labate, Nuove catene esegetiche sull'Ecclesiaste, in Antidoron, Homm. à M. Geerard, I, Turnhout 1984, 137-159; for the eschatological interpretation of Ecclesiastes 12: Augustinianum 18 (1978) 191-207; G.H. Ettlinger, The Form and Method of the Commentary on Ecclesiastes by Gregory of Agrigentum: SP 8 (1985) 317-320; S. Leanza, Due nuovi frammenti dionisiani sull'Ecclesiaste: Orpheus 6 (1985) 156-161; S. Leanza, Sul Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Gregorio di Agrigento, in Il cristianesimo in Sicilia dalle origini a Gregorio Magno, ed. V. Messana - S. Pricoco, Caltanissetta 1988, 191-220; A. Labate, Sulla catena all'Ecclesiaste di Policronio: SP 18/2 (1989) 21-35; D. De Gregorio, Gli insegnamenti teologici di S. Gregorio di Agrigento nel suo "Commento all'Ecclesiaste," Rome 1989; S. Leanza, L'esegesi patristica di Qohelet: da Melitone di Sardi alle compilazioni catenarie, in Letture cristiane dei Libri sapienziali. XX incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome 1992, 237-250; A. Labate, Il recupero del Commentario all'Ecclesiaste di Dionigi Alessandrino attraverso le catene bizantine: Koinonia 16 (1992) 53-74.

3. Song of Songs. In the history of ancient Christian exegesis, more than any other biblical book, the Song of Songs boasts of a constant and uninterrupted interpretive tradition in the allegorical sense, which had its best expression in the commentaries of *Origen, *Gregory of Nyssa and *Gregory the Great. The sole exception to this exegetical orientation was the naturalistic interpretation offered by *Theodore of Mopsuestia, which was condemned at the Second Council of *Constantinople (553). Moreover, even before the book was interpreted by Christians, the Song of Songs was interpreted allegorically by the *Jews, who saw in it a nuptial allegory of the love between God (the husband) and Zion or Israel (the wife). The most ancient Christian commentary on the Song of Songs was that of *Hippolytus (which is extant in a continuous text up to 3:7 in the *Georgian translation; and in various fragments in *Greek, *Syriac, *Armenian and *Paleoslavonic; and the *Latin translation of G. Garitte [CSCO 263-264]). Hippolytus transferred the allegorical Jewish interpretation into a Christian sense by identifying Christ as the husband and the church as the wife (only rarely and sporadically does one find mention of a psychological interpretation, which would, however, be typical of Origen, who identified the human soul in the wife).

The most important commentator on the Song of Songs of all Christian antiquity, however, was Origen, whose exegesis established an obligatory point of reference for all subsequent interpreters. Origen commented on the Song of Songs in a series of homilies and in a long commentary written in ten books. The original Greek is almost entirely lost apart from a passage on Song 1:5, and the Philocalia* and various scholia in the Catena of Procopius; the first two homilies remain in the *Latin translation of *Jerome, which contains the interpretation of Song 1:1–2:14

(ed. W.A. Baehrens, GCS 33,27-60), and in *Rufinus's translation, which contains the initial part of the commentary until Song 2:15 (ed. Baehrens, ibid.). Jerome considered these writings the magnum opus of this Alexandrian father (Hom. in Cant., Prol.: Origenes cum in caeteris libris omnes vicerit, in Cantico Canticorum ipse se vicit ["Although in other books Origen outdid all other interpreters, in the Song of Songs he outdid himself"]). Origen derived the allegorical interpretation of the ecclesiological type from Hippolytus, which he primarily set forth in the homilies; but his great innovation was his psychological interpretation (the wife = the soul), which in Hippolytus's work was almost entirely absent and which would subsequently have, after Origen's example, an enormous influence. In the commentary he gave a threefold interpretation for every verse: literal, allegorical (= *ecclesiological) and tropological (= psychological). The chief theme of the allegorical-ecclesiological interpretation was the opposition between the OT and NT oikonomia: the friends of the spouse are the prophets; the daughters of Jerusalem (whom the wife addresses) are the Jewish people who have not accepted the message of Christ. For Origen the church did not begin in the NT times but existed since the creation of the world and has lived in expectation of the coming of Christ, the husband; the coming of Christ and his mystical union with the church mark the passage from the imperfection of the law to the perfection of grace. In the tropological-psychological interpretation, the wife is the perfect soul that mystically adheres to the divinity of Christ, and the little girls are the imperfect souls who adhere only to Christ incarnate. Origen's interpretation of the Song of Songs had an enormous influence not only—as was said—in the history of exegesis but also in Western *mysticism and *spirituality (St. Bernard of Clairvaux, St. Teresa of Avila, St. John of the Cross etc.). After Origen, one should recall the commentary on the Song of Songs by *Methodius of Olympus (which has been lost but is attested by Jerome, De vir. ill. 83; see, moreover, from the same Methodius, hints of exegesis on the Song of Songs in the Symposium), that of *Athanasius (which seems to include in a single work the interpretation of the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes: see L'Eccl. nell'interpret. dell'ant. crist., op. cit., 23), from which a few fragments have survived to our day, and that of *Apollinaris of Laodicea (15 fragments in the Catena of Procopius: PG 87,1545ff.).

The 15 homilies on the Song of Songs by *Gregory of Nyssa deserve greater attention (the commentary goes until Song 6:8: ed. H. Langerbeck, Leiden 1960; A. Cortesi, Le Omelie sul Cantico dei Cantici di Gregorio di Nissa, Rome 2000), which alongside Origen's Homilies and commentary and Gregory the Great's Expositio in Cant. Canticorum, without a doubt make up—and not only from the patristic period—the most beautiful commentary on the Song of Songs. Gregory of Nyssa had Origen's model in mind, concerning whom he voiced much praise in the dedicatory prologue to the virgin Olympia but from whom he intentionally distanced himself. Among other things, in distinction from Origen, Gregory of Nyssa's exegesis had a noteworthy philosophical substrate (frequent allusions to Plato's Dialogues, a debate with Aristotle on the doctrine of the indefinite progress of the soul, dependence on *Plotinus, etc.: see Langerbeck, ed. cit., praef.), and reveals, however, different theological ideas (Quasten II,269). Under the more strictly exegetical profile, one can distinguish in Gregory of Nyssa's Homilies two types of interpretation: in the first part, he exclusively follows the tropological-psychological interpretation (wife = soul); in the second (from Homily VIII onward) the allegorical-ecclesiological interpretation prevails. Together, however, by overcoming Origen's equilibrium between the two interpretations, Gregory gave more importance to the psychological interpretation and to the theme of the mystical union of the soul with the Logos. The Song of Songs corresponds, for Gregory, to the highest level of the spiritual life, to the moment in which the soul, delivered from every bond, reaches the final milestone of perfection, which consists in contemplation of and the mystical union with God.

Among the Latin authors, one should mention the two commentaries by *Victorinus of Petovium and *Reticius of Autun, nothing of which has survived, but who were well known to Jerome (De vir. ill. 74 and 82), although Jerome himself is doubtful concerning the existence of a commentary by *Hilary of Poitiers (De vir. ill. 100: aiunt quidam scripsisse eum et in Canticum Canticorum, sed a nobis hoc opus ignoratur). Five homilies on the Song of Songs by *Gregory of Elvira have survived, which echo the exegesis of Hippolytus and Origen (ed. J. Fraipont, CCL 69). Among the Latin exegetes of the Song of Songs, one should also mention *Ambrose, who did not compose a specific commentary on this biblical book but in fact commented on it almost entirely (with the exception of 10 verses!). In his various works, but specifically in the De virginitate, the Expositio Psalmi CXVIII) and in the De Isaac at anima (a continuous reading of Ambrosian exegesis on the Song of Songs can be easily made from the medieval compilation of the excerpta of Ambrose's works made by William of Saint-Thierry: PL 15,1851-1962): his interpretation is mystical and allegorical and is dependent on Origen and Hippolytus. *Jerome had proposed to comment on the Song of Songs in a specific work (Prol. in Matth: CCL 77, p. 6) that he never composed; even he, however, frequently interpreted the Song of Songs in dependence on Origen in various places of his other exegetical works and his letters.

Among the Greek fathers of the 5th and 6th c. who commented on the Song of Songs, we should mention *Philo of Carpasia, whose interpretation has come down in the ancient Latin translation of Epiphanius, which was made at the request of *Cassiodorus, while the Greek text is known to us in a redaction (the critical edition of the translation of Epiphanius by A. Ceresa Gastaldo: CP 6); *Nilus of Ancyra (a commentary that has been preserved for us primarily in the catena tradition but now also known, albeit partially, in direct transmission: PG 87,1545-1754 and S. Lucà cited in the bibl. below); *Cyril of Alexandria PG 69,1277-1293, and 87,1545-1753 [= Catena of Procopius]); *Theodoret of Cyrrhus (PG 81,27-214), a proponent of the Antiochene school, who nevertheless rejected the naturalistic interpretation offered by Theodore of Mopsuestia (who saw in the Song of Songs a profane love poem written by Solomon for his Egyptian wife) and accepted the allegorical-ecclesiological interpretation. It is not certain if Theodore of Mopsuestia composed a commentary on the Song of Songs:* nothing has come down under his name, not even in the catenae; the Second Council of Constantinople (553) condemned his interpretation of the Song of Songs on the basis of an epistle-treatise that he sent to a friend who had requested that he explain this biblical book. Likewise among the Latin writers, in the 5th and 6th c., we should mention *Aponius's commentary (PLS 1,799-1031; In Canticum Canticorum expositio, ed. B. de Vregille - L. Neyrand, Turnhout 1986) and that of *Justus of Urgel (Explanatio mystica in Cant. Canticorum: PL 67,693-994), who followed the ecclesiological interpretation but was already a forerunner of the medieval mystical interpretation. The most important commentary among those of the Latin language, however, was *Gregory the Great's exposition of the Song of Songs (Expositio in Cant. Canticorum), which literally closed the patristic period and inaugurated the mystical monastic *exegesis of the Middle Ages (ed. P. Verbraken, CCL 144). Gregory inherited from the preceding patristic exegesis, and esp. from Origen and Gregory of Nyssa, the foundational themes of the double allegorical-ecclesiological and tropological-psychological interpretation, but privileged the latter. Even for Gregory the Great, the husband and wife of the Song of Songs represent Christ and the church, or rather the Word and the soul: the first interpretation, namely, the allegorical one, serves the doctrinal understanding of the church, although the tropological interpretation contributes to the ascetic elevation of the individual soul. Gregory's work was intended for praedicatores and for those who have reached the heights of the mystical experience such as *virgins: in the same way that even the Song of Songs is directed toward the perfect, to those who have already had the experience of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes (Gregory takes up, though modifying it a bit, Origen and Jerome's old theme, which saw in the three Solomonic books the three levels of spiritual understanding: incipientes, progredientes and the perfecti).

Among the Greek *catenae, one should recall that of *Procopius (PG 87), that of the three Fathers (*Gregory of Nyssa, *Nilus and *Maximus the Confessor)—perhaps the work of the same author who compiled the catenae of three Fathers on Ecclesiastes—as well as the catena of *Polycronius and ps.-Eusebius etc. There also exists an Ethiopian catena on the Song of Songs.

Comprehensive Treatments: DSp 2, 93-101; E. Cunitz, Histoire critique de l'interprétation du Cantique des Cantiques, Strasbourg 1834; F. Ohly, Hohelied-Studien. Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Hoheliedauslegung des Abendlandes bis um 1200, Wiesbaden 1958; P. Meloni, Il profumo dell'immortalità. L'interpretazione patristica di Cant. 1,3, Rome 1975. For the individual bibliography on the various Fathers, see the works of Ohly and Meloni. We mention here only the bibliography for Origen: O. Rousseau, Origène. Homélies sur le Cantique des Cantiques, Paris 1966 (SC 37bis); J. Chênevert, L'Église dans le Commentaire d'Origène sur le Cantique des Cantiques, Brussels-Paris-Montréal 1969; M. Simonetti, Origene. Commento al Cantico dei Cantici, Rome 1976; La colombe et la ténèbre. Textes extraits des "Homélies sur le Cantique des Cantiques" de Grégoire de Nysse, tr. by M. Canevet, intr. and notes by J. Daniélou, Paris 1967; for Theodoret of Cyrrhus and Theodore of Mopsuestia: L. Pirot (cited in the bibliography for Job), 134-137, and J.-N. Guinot, La christologie de Théodoret de Cyr dans son Commentaire sur le Cantique: VChr 39 (1985) 256-272; for Theodoret and Origen: M. Simonetti, in Letterature comparate, Studi Paratore, Bologna 1981, 919-930; for Gregory the Great: V. Recchia, L'esegesi di Gregorio Magno al Cantico dei Cantici, Turin 1967; for Nilus: S. Lucà, Il commentario al Cantico dei Cantici di Nilo di Ancira, in Studi bizantini e neogreci. Atti del IV Congr. naz. di studi bizantini, ed. P.L. Leone, Galatina 1983, 111-126; Id., La fine inedita del commento di Nilo d'Ancira al Cantico dei Cantici: Augustinianum 22 (1982) 365-403 (contains the Status quaestionis, preceding bibliography, edition of the text known in direct transmission on the Song 6:8–8:14). For the catenae: CPG IV, 222-224 and S. Lucà, in Augustinianum already mentioned. Cantico dei Cantici di Nilo di Ancira: Studi bizantini e neogreci 174 (1983) 111-126; H. Crouzel, La christologie d'Origène selon le Commentaire sur le Cantique des Cantiques, in Praesentia Christi. Festschrift Johannes Betz, Düsseldorf 1984, 421-433; A. Ceresa Gastaldo, Nuove ricerche sulla storia del testo, le antiche versioni e l'interpretazione del Cantico dei Cantici: AnSE 6 (1989) 31-38; G. Ravasi, Il Cantico dei Cantici, Bologna 1992; Gregory of Nyssa, Omelie sul Cantico dei Cantici, ed. V. Bonato, Bologna 1995; E. Cattaneo, Il "Cantico dei Cantici" nelle catechesi mistagogiche di sant' Ambrogio di Milan: La Civiltà Cattolica (1998) III, 29-41; P. Meloni, Risurrezione di Cristo e vita del cristiano nell'esegesi di Ambrogio al Cantico dei Cantici, in Nec timeo mori. Atti del Congr. int. di studi ambrosiani nel XVI centenario della morte di s. Ambrogio, Milan 1998, 639-648; A. Cortesi, Le Omelie sul Cantico dei Cantici di Gregorio di Nissa, Rome 2000 (with extensive bibl.); A. Genovese, S. Agostino e il Cantico dei Cantici: tra esegesi e teologia, Rome 2002; M.A. Barbàra, Lezioni della tradizione catenaria alternative a lezioni della tradizione diretta delle homiliae in Canticum canticorum di Gregorio di Nissa, in Ad contemplandam sapientiam, Studi in memoria di S. Lenza, Soveria Mannelli 2004, 31-46; M. Auwers, La transmission des commentaires sur le Cantique des Cantiques dans l'Épitomé de Procope de Gaza, in Comunicazione e ricezione del documento cristiano in epoca tardoantica. XXXII Incontro di studiosi dell'antichità cristiana, Rome, 8-10 maggio 2003 (SEA 90), Rome 2004, 763-776.

III. Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus (Sirach). 1. Wisdom. We do not possess any patristic commentaries on this biblical book, which was also frequently cited by the Fathers (see Biblia Patristica). According to *Cassiodorus (Inst. div. litt. 5), *Ambrose and *Augustine delivered some homilies on Wisdom, but these have not survived, and Bellator (6th c.) composed an extensive commentary in eight books (Expositio Sapientiae), which has likewise not survived. Paterius (or ps.-Paterius) collected and ordered for Wisdom and Sirach the various comments on these books offered by the teacher *Gregory the Great (Testimonia in libr. Sapientiae et Ecclesiastici: PL 79,917-940). The first commentaries that we possess date to the early Middle Ages: Rabanus Maurus, 9th c. (PL 109,671-762), and then, in the late Middle Ages, the Glossa ordinaria (PL 113,1167ff.), Hugh of Saint-Cher (Opera III, Lyons 1669), etc.

L. Bigot: DTC 15, 742-743; J. Leemans, Athanasius and the Book of Wisdom: EThL 73 (1997) 349-369.

2. Ecclesiasticus (Sirach). Even more than Wisdom, Sirach was overlooked during the patristic period certainly because of its contested canonicity. One barely reads for the first time a synthesis for this book in the Synopsis Scripture Sacrae by ps.-Chrysostom (PG 56,375-376). As in the case for Wisdom, Paterius (or ps.-Paterius) also collected excerpts from *Gregory the Great's exegesis on Sirach (see above; for Sir: PL 79,921-940). The work of Rabanus Maurus, who commented on Wisdom, was likewise significant (9th c.); he was also one of the few to comment on Sirach (PL 109,763-1126): his interpretation, which was *allegorical, was widely used by the medieval exegetes (Glossa ordinaria etc.). One should also recall, for the patristic period, the Nestorian Isho'dad of Merv (9th c.), whose edition has been announced in the CSCO. R. Maisano studied the exegesis on Sirach in the collection of *Isidore of Pelusium's letters; it should be noted that he did not compose a commentary on this biblical book.

H. Duesberg: DSp 4, 61; H. Duesberg - I. Fransen, Ecclesiastico, Turin 1966, 19; J.M. Vosté: RBi 38 (1929) 382-395, 542-554 (Isho'dad of Merv); R. Maisano: Koinonia 4 (1980) 68-72 (Isidore of Pelusium); A. Cacciari, Origene e il libro del Siracide, in Origeniana octava: Origen and the Alexandrian Tradition, Origene e la tradizione alessandrina. Papers of the 8th International Origen Congress, Pisa, 27-31 August 2001, ed. L. Perrone et al., I (Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 144), Leuven 2003, 579-592; J. Leemans, Canon and Quotations: Athanasius' Use of Jesus Sirach, in The Biblical Canons, ed. J.-M. Auwers - H.J. De Jonge (Bibliotheca Ephemeridum Theologicarum Lovaniensium 163), Leuven 2003, 265-277.

S. Leanza

WOMAN. Without question, Eve (see *Adam and Eve) and *Mary were the two biblical figures who had the greatest influence on the conception of woman formulated by the Fathers of the first centuries. For an adequate historical evaluation of this conception, however, one must take into account the weight exercised on it by the historical and cultural context in which it was formed. It is a fact that the position of women in the ancient world, whether Jewish, Hellenistic or Roman (even with significant differences), was one of inferiority with respect to men. This inferiority could be expressed either by a reduction of the spheres in which a woman was allowed to intervene without losing dignity and prestige, or in the effective consideration of their submission and existential inequality with respect to men. The tension between faithfulness to the proclamation of the novelty brought by the gospel (see R. Fabris, La donna nel Nuovo Testamento, in Atti Convegno Nazionale di Studi su La donna nel mondo antico, Turin 1987, 209-222), which also affected the way of thinking about women, and the influence deriving from the atmosphere from which the NT texts themselves had arisen and in which the Fathers lived, is easily recognizable in every patristic text that treats of women (it is particularly remarkable that for *Ambrosiaster, at the level of salvation, the imago Dei is of the woman, see K.E. Børresen, Imago Dei, un privilège masculin? Interprétation augustinienne de Gen. 1,27 et 1 Cor. 11,7: Augustinianum 25 [1985] 213-234). But it is precisely the two figures of Eve and of Mary who made it possible, in most cases, to maintain that tension in a strictly religious setting, since they constituted the two poles within which the discourse on woman took place: Eve, the representative of woman in her existential situation of inferiority, and Mary, the goal toward which precisely this woman who was considered inferior (when not given a decisively negative connotation) inclines and with whom she is called to identify. Besides Eve and Mary, other feminine personalities in Scripture (at times even anonymous) offered material to the Fathers for drawing a portrait of a woman which was new with respect to pagan culture in faithfulness to the data of revelation. The insistent return to moral exhortation (1 Tim 2:9-10; 1 Pet 3:3-6)—which appears in Scripture and seems to limit the woman to an exclusively interior world, considering any exterior interest or care unbecoming—was itself an explicitly new proposal, aimed at differentiating the Christian woman from the pagan (Clem., Strom. 2,146; Paed. 3,56,1-2; 62-68; Jerome, Ep. 148,25-27; John Chrys., Catech. I 34.37.38; Chrom., Serm. 35).

The new position of woman derived from certain "firsts" attributed to her by Scripture: above all the being the first to receive news of Christ's resurrection (Orig., Comm. in Jo. 13,29,179; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. XIV,12; Jerome, In Mt. 28,9; Ambr., In Lc. 2,28; Aug., In Jo. 1; In I Jo. 3,2). But she is also the first to reveal the right way to approach Christ to obtain mercy (based on Mt 9:20ff.; Peter Chrysol., Serm. 34,3). Spiritually, woman is man's equal: both have the same Lord, the same Teacher, the same church (Clem., Paed. 1,10-11; Tertull., Ad ux. II,9). This equality was not always recognized, however: Chrysostom, who admitted it (Hom. 10,3 in 2 Tim.), seems in another text to deny it (Hom. 5,5 in 2 Thess.; see also Aug., Gen. ad. litt. 11,58): created as man's helper (Gen 2:28), she lost that dignity because of her sin (John Chrys., De virg. 46,1). The original guilt is always attributed to the woman, who is thus considered the cause of sin (Iren., Adv. haer. 3,22,4; Tertull., De c. fem. 1,1; Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 13,21; Ambr., Hex. 5,18; De parad. 14,70; Ruf., Symb. 21; John Chrys., De virg. 46,1; Aug., In Ps. 48,1,6): every woman bears Eve in herself, and must consequently do penance (Tertull., De c. fem. 1,1). It is said that woman's debt toward man, contracted by the female sex at the moment of its creation, was paid by Mary, who gave birth to Christ virginally (Cyr. of Jer., Catech. 12,29). Through the relationship with Christ, the situation of woman is transformed (Hilary of Poitiers, In Mt. 33,9; Greg. Gt., Mor. Job XIV, 49,57). In *allegorical interpretation, woman is evaluated in two ways in the Fathers: positively, whenever she is interpreted as the image of the church (Jerome, In Mt. 15,22; 26, 12-14; In Mk. 5,34; John Chrys., In Mt. hom. 51; even the feminine metaphors used in the Bible to indicate God or Christ, in patristic interpretation are applied to the church, see K.E. Børresen, Le Madri della chiesa, Naples 1993, 109-125); negatively, or at least subordinately to man, when she is seen as the soul, while man is the spirit (Orig., Hom 1,15 in Gen.); as the flesh that must follow the spirit (Orig., Hom. 4,4 in Gen.); as the senses while man is the mind (Ambr., De parad. 15,73); as a synonym of weakness (Greg. Gt., Mor. Job XI,49,65). In the church the prophetic function is attributed to woman (1 Cor 11,4-5; see S. Hauser-Borel, Profetesse, martiri, testimoni di Cristo nella storia, in Profezia. Modelli e forme nell'esperienza cristiana laicale, C. Militello [ed.], Padua 2000, 125-154), and the presence of deaconesses is widely attested (1 Tim 3:11; Rom 16:1; Pliny the Younger, Ep. 10,96,8; Clem., Strom. 3,6,53; Orig., Comm. Rom. 10,17; Didasc. Apost. II,26,4-6; III,12,1; 13,1). It is not clear, however, whether a woman deacon received an ordination apt to confer on her an official ministry: the Council of Nicaea (can. 19) affirms that deaconesses belong to the lay state since they have not received the laying on of hands. The Apostolic Constitutions (4th-c. Syriac work), however, report the whole rite for the ordination of deaconesses, which took place through the *laying on of hands by the bishop (Apos. Con. VIII,20,1-2). The Fathers abundantly characterize women as *martyrs (see E. Mazzucco Zanone, Figure di donne cristiane: la martire, in Atti II Convegno nazionale di Studi su: La donna nel mondo antico, R. Uglione [ed.], Turin 1989, 167-196) and in the various states of virgin, spouse (see Donna e matrimonio alle origini della chiesa, E. dal Covolo [ed.], Rome 1996), mother and widow (see A.V. Nazzaro, Figure di donne cristiane: la vedova, in Atti II Convegno Nazionale di Studi su La donna nel mondo antico, cit., 167-196). In this they draw on models already known in pagan culture and on those in Scripture or those which from the first centuries were presented as new examples of woman—e.g., Monica, Nonna, Macrina, Melania, to whom reference could be made in actual contemporary situations.

DACL 5,1300-1353; DSp 5,131-151; J. Daniélou, Le ministère des femmes dans l'Église ancienne: LaMaisonD. 60 (1960) 70-96; R. Gryson, Il ministero della donna nella chiesa antica, Rome 1974; E. Giannarelli, La tipologia femminile nella biografia e nell'autobiografia cristiana del IV secolo: Studi Storici 127, Rome 1980; M.G. Mara, Le funzioni della donna nella Chiesa antica: Rivista di pastorale liturgica 19/2 (1981) 5-16; A. Fabris - W. Gozzini, La donna nell'esperienza della prima chiesa, Rome 1982; P.A. Gramaglia, in Tertulliano, De virginibus velandis. La condizione femminile nelle prime comunità cristiane, Rome 1984, 92-144; A. Pastorino, La condizione femminile nei Padri della chiesa, in Sponsa, mater, virgo. La donna nel mondo biblico e patristico, in Atti Convegno nazionale di Studi su La donna nel mondo antico, R. Uglione (ed.), Turin 1987, 223-242; C. Moreschini, La donna nell'antica poesia cristiana, 243-264; L. Storoni Mazzolani, Una donna tra mondo antico e Medio Evo: Galla Placidia, in La donna nel mondo antico, R. Uglione (ed.), Turin 1987, 195-205; A. Rousselle, Donne cristiane e fondazioni testamentarie (III-IV secolo), in Il Tardoantico alle soglie del Duemila, Diritto religione società, G. Lanata (ed.), Pisa 2000, 141-165; F. Vera, Los "ejemplos" femininos en San Ambrosio: Excerpta and dissertat. in sacra Teologia (Pamplona) 44 (2003) 151ff.

M.G. MARA

WOMEN, PIOUS (iconography). The episode narrated in Mt 28:10, Mk 15:46–16:8, Lk 23:55-24:8 and Jn 20:1-18, about the finding of the empty tomb by the pious women (according to the texts, from one to three in number), has not yet been found represented in Roman cemeterial painting, but it has been found in a painting of the baptistery at *Dura Europos (before 256); in it, the pious women move from right to left toward the closed tomb, carrying ointments and torches; above the sepulcher, two stars are interpreted as the symbol of two angels. The presence of this scene for the first time in a baptistery is apparently due to its clear eschatological symbolism. In the plastic arts, the scene appears at Rome (Ws 325) and Milan (Ws 243,6), with the angel and the two Marys at the tomb, elements which are repeated in a fragment at Aix (Le Blant, Sarc., n. 208); on the sarcophagus of Servanne (Ws 15,2), a third pious women is added. Only two women are depicted on two wooden panels of the church of S. Sabina at Rome (ca. 430): in the first the angel is manifested to them; in the second the risen Jesus is beside them. In the so-called minor arts, the scene is attested in the ivory diptych of Monaco (4th–5th c.) (three women, two soldiers, a wingless angel), in that of Milan (5th c.) and in another at London (two women and two soldiers). In the marble capsella at S. Giovanni Battista at *Ravenna (5th c.) two women are before the crucified Christ, who is about to ascend to heaven, drawn by the divine hand; this instance thus contains a fusion of two different moments in the gospel narrative. In the ampullae of Monza and of Bobbio (6th c.), two or three pious women appear with an angel with nimbus and wings. The best-known example of mural decoration is that of S. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna (early 6th c.), with two women and the angel, while in manuscripts the episode occurs in the Evangelary of Rabbula (586), at f. 13a, with three guards on the ground, the angel and two women; beside it, the same women are at Jesus's feet as he ascends to heaven.

DACL XV, 1, cols. 570-573; EC VII, col. 141; LCI II, cols. 55-57; R. Bartoccini, La capsella marmorea di Ravenna: RivAC 7 (1930) 299-302; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1952, n. 116, plate 35 (London diptych); F.W. Deichmann, Frühchristliche Bauten und Mosaiken von Ravenna, Baden Baden 1958, plate 206; Id., Ravenna. Geschichte und Monumente, Wiesbaden 1969, 187-188; A. Grabar, La fresque des Saintes Femmes au tombeau à Doura: CArch 8 (1956) 9-26; A. Grabar, Ampoules de Terre Sainte, Paris 1958, plates 11,2; 19;28; 34/39; Cecchelli, Rabb. Gosp., 70-71, f. 13a; Volbach-Hirmer, Arte, 75, fig. 92 (diptych of Milan) 76, fig. 93 (diptych of Monaco); E. Dyggve, Sepulcrum Domini: Festschrift F. Gerke, Baden Baden 1962, 11-20; C.H. Kraeling, The Excavations at Dura Europos. II. The Christian Building, New Haven 1967, 213 ff., plates 20; 26/28; J. Engemann, Palästinensische Pilgerampollen im F.J. Dölger Institut in Bonn: JbAC 6 (1973) 5-27; E. Dassmann, Sündenvergebung durch Taufe, Busse und Martyrerfürbitte in den Zeugnissen frühchristlicher Frömmigkeit und Kunst, Münster 1973, 43-44 and 377; W.F. Volbach, Elfenbeinarbeiten der Spätantike und des frühen Mittelalters, Mainz 1976, nn. 111, 112, 176; A. Saint Claire, Scheda n. 520, in K. Weitzmann (ed.), Age of Spirituality: Late Antique and Early Christian Art, Third to Seventh Century, New York 1979; G. Jeremias, Die Holztür der Basilika S. Sabina in Rom, Tübingen 1980, plates 2, 10; A. Recio Vegazones, Maria Magdalena, protagonista de la escena "Mulieres ad Sepulcrum Domini," en la iconografía sepulcral de Occidente (siglos IV-V), in "Memoriam Sanctorum Venerantes," Miscellanea in onore di Mons. Victor Saxer, Vatican City 1992, 667-688; M. Casadei, Scheda n. 61, in A. Donati (ed.), Dalla terra alle genti. La diffusione del cristianesimo nei primi secoli, Milan 1996; T.W. Potter, Scheda n. 108, in ibid.; J. Dresken-Weiland, Repertorium der christlich-antiken Sarcophage. Band II, Mainz am Rhein 1998, nn. 249; 250, 2; M. Perraymond, Donne pie (s.v.), in F. Bisconti (ed.) Temi di iconografia paleocristiana, Vatican City 2000, 168-169.

M. PERRAYMOND

WORKS of AID and CHARITY

I. In the primitive church - II. In the Christian empire.

I. In the primitive church. From its beginnings the church recommended works of mercy and encouraged every kind of initiative in private charity; but it also organized assistance to needy brothers and sisters and mutual help among communities. The Christians thus continued a cherished tradition of the Jews of Palestine and of the Diaspora, making their own some traits of the Jewish tradition, its religious motives and the links with liturgical acts. The inspiration of Christian charity was new, however, since it was rooted in love for God and neighbor, and taught and lived out by Jesus; as such, it overcame all nationalistic, ethnic or political discrimination, reaching out to all those in need (Gal 6:10; Eus., HE 9, 8). Above all it changed the concept of the poor person, from someone rejected, into a person in need of help and esp. loved by God. The Christian *Minucius Felix writes "poverty is not a cause for shame, but for glory" (Oct. 36). Within Christianity, poverty is frequently associated with holiness: the saint is also poor. The poor person, i.e., the indigent, was rejected by Roman society or merely tolerated, as expressed in a Pompeian graffito: "I hate the poor.

If someone wants something for nothing, he is crazy. He must pay for it" (CIL 4,9839b); and Plautus writes: "One who gives a poor person something to eat does wrong: in fact what he gives him is lost, and prolongs his unhappy life" (Trinummus II, 2,58ff.). *Lactantius asks polemically: "Why don't [the pagans] think they have to help one who is hungry, or thirsty, or cold? . . . The only certain and genuine task of liberality consists in sustaining needy and useless persons" (Div. Inst. 6,11: PL 6, 72 and 76). These observations should not be overgeneralized, however, since there were always compassionate persons, esp. under the influence of Stoic morality.

The Christian tradition has preserved the memory of the church of Jerusalem, where the generosity of believers was effective in helping those in need (Acts 2:44; 4:34-37), always under the supervision of the community's leaders (Acts 4:35-36). The charitable works of the first Christian communities did not aim to respond to every need; there was always a place for private charity (Acts 9:27, 39), taken up in a particular way by Christian women, after the example of the "strong woman" of the OT (Didasc., 3; Clem. Al., Paed. III, 49,5; 67,3; Tertull., Ad ux. II, 4). Like the Jewish institutions which they continued, Christian works developed along the lines of familial needs. In the first place they were directed to widows, to orphans, to the elderly without family who were unable to work and had no one to care for them, to those imprisoned for their faith, and for the ransom of prisoners. The community then intervened, according to its capacity, on behalf of the whole family, if families were unable to meet their natural obligations; they also helped, financially, young needy women to marry (Ambr., De off. 2,15,72: PL 16, 129), or in the education of orphans and the abandoned (De off. 2,15,71: PL 16, 129). There being no banking system, the church took it upon itself to look after the deposits of widows and orphans that were entrusted to it as protection against the abuses of the powerful. A particular category was lepers, who were separated both from family and from the cities: "cast out by all, they form a class unto themselves" (Greg. Nyss., De pauperib. amandis: PG 46, 477B). The forms of Christian solidarity were noted even by pagans; e.g., *Lucian of Samosata, the emperor *Julian and others such as *Nectarius, Augustine's correspondent, who wrote: you "take care of the afflicted, administering medicines to sick bodies; in short, you do everything so that the suffering do not feel their illness for too long" (Aug., Ep. 103,3: letter of Nectarius).

Another commitment of Christian solidarity regarded women forced into prostitution. *Ambrose counted prostitutes among the poor, i.e., among those most abandoned by society (De off. 2,15,70) and therefore most in need of Christian solidarity. Even the emperor in 428 allowed bishops to free prostitutes from lenones (CTh 15,8,2). Christians also gave particular attention to burial of the dead. Lactantius writes: Ultimum illud et maximum pietatis officium est peregrinorum et pauperum sepultura (Div. Inst. 6,12,25; cf. 6,12,39). Already at Jerusalem there was the communitarian commitment to the burial of foreigners. In the 2nd c. *Aristides writes that "when one of their poor leaves this world, and one of them sees it, they provide for his burial" (Apol. 15,7 in the Syriac text). *Tertullian tells us of the "common fund" which, besides for other works of aid, served also for egenis humandis (Apol. 39,6). The Apostolic Tradition (early 3rd c.), attributed to *Hippolytus, confirms this organization and its purpose; if it was written at Rome it shows us the Roman communitarian organization for burial. The emperor Julian too saw "care for the burial of the dead" as characteristic of Christians (Ep. 84,429D Caltabiano).

One of the most characteristic forms of ancient Christian charity was the agapē*. It is difficult to discover the origin of this practice, of which 3rd-c. evidence allows us to grasp only the main outlines. In general, this was a meal offered to the poor of the community, either in the house of a well-off person who provided the food, or in a place belonging directly to the church. The bishop or his representative presided at the agape; he blessed the offerings and made sure that those who were absent also received their portion. There was also a form of agape open only to widows who, besides their due portion, were sometimes also given a separate distribution of foodstuffs (Trad. Apost. 26, 27; Tertull., Apol. 39, 16-19; Didasc. syr. 9). Despite the obvious inconvenience involved in such meetings (cf. Trad. Apost. 30), the agape helped strengthen bonds between the faithful of all levels of society (Clem. Al., Paed. II, 1,6-8), although their occasional character limited their importance.

To respond effectively to needy brethren, the churches had to organize other forms of assistance and establish suitable ministries. Deacons, widows, virgins and deaconesses looked after these works in the name of the communities; they exercised their ministry under the oversight of the leaders of the churches, presbyters or bishops, in some cases assisted by their counsel. The diaconal ministry, established from the last decades of the 1st c., became increasingly important (Colson; Hamman), and the institutions of deaconesses and of widows were quick to help out in numerous tasks, esp. in those areas where the activity of women was preferable: the catechesis of women, care of the sick, comprehensive care of orphans, visits to Christians in prison, etc. To assist the poor, churches solicited gifts and offerings from the faithful. From the earliest times, free offerings, in money or in kind, composed a large part of the income; these were ordinarily collected during the liturgical assembly (Just., 1 Apol. 67). To offset the possibility of insufficient or uncertain revenues, many churches, following the practice of the synagogues, sought to impose a fixed, regular contribution. This practice is attested in central Syria in the early 2nd c. (Didache 13,3-7; Didasc. syr. 9; cf. Apostolic Constitutions II, 25-30; VIII, 30). African churches did likewise: in the early 3rd c., the community of Carthage had a common fund, replenished by monthly quotas in imitation of pagan religious and funerary collegia (Tertull., Apol. 39). A notable aspect of the charitable organization of Christian antiquity was that not all donations were accepted; those of the impious and of public sinners were ruthlessly rejected. The Didascalia syriaca forcefully proclaims: "Better to die of hunger than to accept the donations of the enemies of God" (18 Connolly = IV, 8,6 ed. Funk).

The mutual help of Christians was not limited to the immediate circle of the local community, but extended its concern to all the churches. Already St. Paul had taught his churches to help their needy brethren in every way they could (Rom 12:13; 15:26); he gave great importance to the collections for the "saints," since he saw in them the sign and guarantee of unity among the churches (1 Cor 16:1; 2 Cor 8:1-15). There is much evidence from the first centuries of solidarity among Christians when a particular church or region was beset by exceptional trials. The sense of organization, pragmatic realism and financial resources of the great churches (Rome, Carthage) made possible prompt and effective intervention even in the most distant countries. In around 170, *Dionysius of Corinth wrote to Pope *Soter (166–175): "From the beginning you have had the wonderful practice of doing good to all the brethren, of sending aid to many churches established in individual cities. In this way you comfort the needy, precisely through that aid, which, from the earliest times, you continue to send, administering necessities to the brethren who labor in the mines" (Eus., HE 4, 23,18); a century later, *Dionysius of Alexandria praises pope *Stephen (254–257) for sending "regular aid" to the churches of Syria and Arabia (Eus., HE 7,5,2); or, during the same period, to Cappadocia (Basil, Ep. 70). *Cyprian of Carthage attested no less active solicitude toward the needy of the African communities; he used large sums to ransom Christian prisoners. Finally, one of the most expressive forms of the universal dimension of Christian charity was Christian *hospitality, practiced toward all just as it was practiced within the local community—at first directly, involving all the members of the church, laity and clergy; later, from the end of the 3rd c., organized through hostelries financed by a common fund.

II. In the Christian empire. After the peace of Constantine, works of charity had to address new and increasingly burdensome responsibilities; the economic crisis and growing poverty directed ever increasing numbers towards the church's charitable services. Free offerings and the agape became minor things. But the church did not stop, and by this time could count on income from its assets; it multiplied construction of appropriate buildings for the various works it was engaged in (orphanages, hospices, xenodochia, homes for the elderly, etc.). Charitable help became better conceived and organized, e.g., with specific structures and lists of the needy: a matricula pauperum (Aug., Ep. 20,2 Divjak) and a matricula viduarum (Jer., Ep. 92,3: PL 22, 766). The poor were inscribed in a specific register to indicate those persons who regularly received help as opposed to occasional recipients or beggars.

Private initiative was encouraged more than ever, sometimes with surprising generosity (Fabiola, Pammachius: Jer., Epp. 66 and 77). But there was always more to do, and resources were never sufficient to satisfy all needs (Aug., Serm. 61,1; John Chrys., In Mt. hom. 66). Beginning in this era works were assumed by monastic institutions which, from that time, have never ceased to offer an example of authentic Christian charity. An important early instance of assistance was the structure created by Basil at Caesarea, called Basileiad. According to the needs of society, Christian assistance was also shown in taking in, feeding and defending those who made use of the right of asylum in churches. This form developed slowly in the course of the 4th c., with notable hardship for Christian communities and bishops.

Various articles in RAC (Almosen, Armenpflege, Humanitas, Hungersnot, . . .), in DACL (Agape, Infirmiers, hôpitaux, Hospices, Hôteliers, . . .); DSp 10, 1328-1349; EAM 8, 906-922 (hospital); L. Lallemand, Histoire de la charité, Paris 1902; W. Liese, Geschichte der Caritas, I, Freiburg i.Br. 1922; H. Bolkestein, Wohltätigkeit und Armenpflege in vorchristl. Altertum, Utrecht 1939; S. Giet, Les idées et l'action sociale de s. Basile, Paris 1941; B. Reicke, Diakonia, Upsala 1951; J. Colson, La fonction diaconale aux origines de l'Église, Paris 1960; A. Hamman, Vie liturgique et vie sociale dans l'antiquité chrétienne, Paris 1968; J.G.

Clayton, The Development of Charitable Institutions in the Early Church to About AD 400, Diss. Abst. Intern. 1972 n. 8; Ch. Munier, L'Église dans l'Empire Romain, Paris 1979, 95-105; S. Scicolone, Basilio e la sua organizzazione dell'attività assistenziale a Cesarea: Civiltà Classica e Cristiana 3 (1982) 353-372; T.S. Miller, The Birth of the Hospital in the Byzantine Empire, Baltimore 1985, repr. 1998; Caring and Curing. Health and Medicine in Western Religious Traditions, ed. R.L. Numbers - D.W. Amundsen, New York 1986; C. Burini - E. Cavalcanti, La spiritualità della vita quotidiana negli scritti dei Padri, Bologna 1988; M.D. Grmek (ed.), Storia del pensiero medico occidentale, 1, Antichità e Medioevo, Rome-Bari 1993; R.J.S. Barrett-Lennard, Christian Healing After the New Testament. Some Approaches to Illness in the Second, Third and Fourth Centuries, Lanham-New York-London 1994; U. Falesiedi, Le diaconie. I servizi assistenziali nella Chiesa antica, Rome 1995; J.-U. Krause, La prise en charge des veuves par l'église dans l'Antiquité Tardive, in La fin de la cité antique et le début de la cité médiévale, ed. by C. Lepelley, Bari 1996, 115-126; P. Angstenberger, Der reiche und arme Christus. Die Rezeptionsgeschichte von 2 Kor 8,9 zwischen dem zweiten und dem sechsten Jahrhundert, Bonn 1997; C. Corsato, I volti della carità nell'esperienza dei Padri, Suppl. La Provvidenza n. 3, Padua 1997; U. Mattioli, Assistenza e cura dei malati nell'antichità cristiana, in Cultura e promozione umana, ed. E. dal Covolo - I. Giannetto, Rome 1998, 245-278; G. Schöllgen, Die Anfänge der Profesionalisierung des Klerus und das kirchliche Amt in der syrischen Didaskalie, Münster 1998; H. Avalos, Health Care and the Rise of Christianity, Peabody 1999; E. Rebillard, La sépulture des pauvres dans l'Empire romain (I^er^-V^e^ siècles): Antiquité tardive 7 (1999) 269-282; A. Di Berardino, La solidarietà: forme ed organizzazione a Roma (secoli IV-V), in La comunità cristiana di Roma, Rome 2000, 83-112; S.R. Holman, The Hungry Are Dying: Beggars and Bishops in Roman Cappadocia, Oxford 2001; A. Rousselle, Donne cristiane e fondazioni testamentarie (III-IV secolo), in Tardoantico alle soglie del duemila. Diritto religione e società, Pisa 2002, 143-165.

CH. MUNIER - A. DI BERARDINO

WORLD. To understand the cosmology of the *Fathers, two different issues need to be clarified: that of moral character and the more strictly "scientific" study. In the realm of ethics, for *Platonism, the sensible world cannot be home to immutable truth; for the *Stoics, on the contrary, the world is permeated by the divine. For the Fathers these cosmological conceptions constitute the basis of the data of faith.

In relation to the world, Christians find themselves in the same complex situation as Christ did during his journey on this earth: to be not of the world (Jn 15:19; 19:17), but in the world (17:11), and their purpose is the salvation of the world. In a certain sense, Christian writers distinguish between two "worlds": one is the natural world which birthed our very existence and deserves our love; the other is the world of the enemy of God, and one must flee from it. Against the *gnostics, the goodness, beauty and unity of the universe is affirmed in which the *Holy Spirit, Wisdom, the Logos and Providence provide a cohesive whole. Western writers frequently praise the world for bringing life to humanity; the Greek Fathers claim that the visible world is first of all a training ground for the soul (Basil, In Hex. 6,1: PG 29, 117), to bring humanity to the *contemplation of God. The responsibility of human beings toward the universe derives from the fact that they are, in a certain sense, a microcosm. In the plan of the Creator, the mysterious union of the *soul with the *body has *purification of the world and its *divinization as its end.

On the other hand, the ascetic literature expresses the conviction that "the whole world lies in the power of the Evil One" (1 Jn 5:19). Hence the abandonment of the world is, for Christians, the necessary consequence of *love for God (see Theodoret, Hist. relig. (PG 82) 2, 1308; 3, 1324-1325).

To renounce the world is, naturally, first and foremost, an interior stance. There is an indispensable flight from the world for everyone: separation from *sin (Basil, Reg. fus. 7,3: PG 31, 932C), and dedicating oneself to be liberated from everything that impedes salvation. *Origen's thought could be considered the ideological precursor of flight from the world in the monastic sense, a flight that presupposes renouncing everything that can slow one's spiritual ascent. The gospels support this on some specific points: the ancient idea of the struggle between good vs. evil and the common spiritual struggle that Christians experience. In the fervor of their exhortations, the ascetics do not always worry about terminological precision. One must bear this in mind when one finds the presence of expressions regarding a radical opposition between "two worlds" appearing frequently in ascetic writers, though expressed in various dichotomies: the present world/the future world, the visible world/the invisible one, the opinions of the world/true gnosis. One has the impression that there are two radically opposed tendencies: a total oblivion toward material things characterizes the contemplative tension in *Evagrius, while Basil in the Hexaemeron refers to the original project of *creation, when humanity, contemplating the universe, is nourished through the remembrance of God. Practically speaking, the *spirituality of the Fathers is not aware of two opposing "tendencies" regarding the problem of the world. The authors insist on one aspect of redemptive action now and another later: radical resignation always presupposes that those who have obtained perfection will reopen their eyes to discover the wonders of the visible world in "natural contemplation," a vision of the invisible God in the visible universe.

On the scientific front, the Christian view of the world, in its duplicity, is based, esp. during the time of the apologists, on the explanation of its origins.

When facing this problem, Christians come into contact with Platonism, taking up its cosmology. According to *Justin, in fact, God has created (or put in order) the world through the Logos, which was, then, the mediator of the divine will (2 Apol. 6,3). The attestations for this doctrine are found in classic passages like Jn 1:1ff.; Pr 8:22ff. and Ps 32. The creation of the world, according to Platonists, presupposes that matter is eternal and available as a substrate for the work of the Logos (see. 1 Apol. 10 and 59,5). In this conception, Justin certainly appropriated the Platonic ideas of his day. In the Dialogue with Trypho (5,2), the apologist says that if the world must be considered as created, then it must have been created by a principle: with these words Justin follows Plato's explanation, which distinguishes between eternal reality and created reality (Timaeus 28b). It is also significant that in 1 Apol. 10,2 he says that God, in his goodness, created the world from unformed matter for the sake of humanity. This interpretation of Genesis derives from Timaeus (29a; where we read that the demiurge is good and at 30a it says that he created the world from the preceding chaos), and consequently *Middle Platonism. Justin, then, connects the story of Genesis with the Platonic teachings of his day.

In reference to cosmology, and more precisely in the teaching of the preexistence of matter, Justin adds a notable differentiation based upon a biblical doctrine. In Dial. 5,4 he affirms that Plato had obscurely expressed his conviction that the world is destined to perish, given that the "birth" of the world as such implicitly contains an end. But if the world is not passing away, this must be due to the will of God. This affirmation corresponds to what Plato says in Tim. 41ab. The claim that the world is born, but is immortal, is held also by *Celsus (VI, 52a), by Plutarch and by *Atticus. Justin belongs, then, to this strand of Middle Platonism. He affirms, moreover, that Plato derived his cosmological notions from Moses, which is displayed in the Timaeus (1 Apol. 59,1). Unlike Plato, however, Justin never reduces the origin of evil to the creation of matter. In so far as creation is good, it was demons that introduced evil into the world. The absolute transcendence of God is not caused by a concomitant disregard for matter, as the gnostics claim.

For *Athenagoras as well, the Logos is the author of the creation of the world: to do this, the Logos puts matter in order (Supplica 5). But the matter constitutive of the world cannot be deprived of a beginning, like God, because in that case it would be a second principle equal to God; on the contrary, it has been created by God himself. The creation, then, came about in two stages: first God produced the substrate matter, and then the Logos transformed it in the cosmos. God produces the world from matter, that is, the cosmos, the order of things (10,39); the elements emerge through a "separation" (22,2). Matter, according to Middle Platonism, is said to preexist, and its origin is not an object for discussion (10,3; 15,2ff.; 22,2): this means that Christian thought had not yet made peace with the idea of creatio ex nihilo. The devil and fallen angels are tied to matter; their power, which at the time when they fell was opposed to God, was initially created by God himself in order to govern matter, just as the angels were created so that they might exercise providence on behalf of the world, while God possessed the general providence of everything. Not even Athenagoras says that matter is evil or caused by evil, and neither does Justin. A few years later *Tatian, and in a fuller way *Theophilus, discusses the problem of creation from nothing. Tatian does not speak of the "creation" of matter, but uses the Valentinian term probolē, even if one cannot be certain that he intended it as an emanation of matter from God. The second book of Theophilus's Ad Autolycus constitutes the most ancient Christian commentary on Genesis. In a much more concise way than Tatian, Theophilus affirms that God created everything from nothing (II, 4.10.13). Due to the clear explanation which he gives, the doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, confirmed later by Irenaeus, became in the following centuries the "official" doctrine of Christianity. Even Origen asks how it is possible that eminent scholars had not understood this (Princ. II, 1,4); only *Clement remains faithful to Philo's explanation regarding the existence of an intelligible world. On the basis of this conception of creatio ex nihilo, Theophilus thoroughly criticizes the Platonic model of the world. The challenge by Theophilus substantially follows the same lines as Tatian. If, as the Platonists want, not only God but also matter is deprived of a beginning, then we cannot properly speak of God as creator of the world, and the divine "monarchy" is put at risk. God is not created, and thus incorruptible by nature; matter, if it was not created, would be incorruptible like God, and thus equal to him. In short, it would not be anything extraordinary if God had created the world from preexistent matter: in that case, God would not be any different from a human artisan that creates whatever he wants from already available materials. The passage in Gen 1:2 is interpreted in light of creatio ex nihilo, in so far as it presents the existence of matter as "created." In fact, it was still unformed in the first moment (that is, it would have been "created" unformed), but it would have then received its form and shape by God to make the world (Autol. II, 10). It was probably due to his polemic against the heretic *Hermogenes, influenced by the cosmology of Middle Platonism, that Theophilus of Antioch was the first among the apologists to decisively arrive at the doctrine of the creation of the world out of nothing.

Even *Irenaeus has Plato in view in his doctrine of creation, by whom the gnostics, he said, would have been influenced (II, 14). This conviction led him to draw a cosmological model that certainly depends on Theophilus, but extends and surpasses it. God created the world through an act of free will and goodness (II, 1,1); he even created matter by his word, and in this affirmation Irenaeus appropriates a detail of the interpretation of Theophilus, in which the "hands" of God (the world is "the work of your hands") would be his Word and his Wisdom (I, 22,1; II, 2,4ff.; 11,1; 27,2). Consequently, matter did not exist before creation; rather, God is the Creator but only in an absolute sense. The rejection of the hypothesis that God, in his creating, followed a pattern takes place in a context in which Irenaeus discusses the Platonic teachings of the Valentinians, according to which the world would be an image of the plerōma (II, 7,16; II, 8).

Irenaeus decisively contrasts the Valentinian speculation about the formation of matter from Sophia against the doctrine of creatio ex nihilo due to the pure and exclusive will of the Creator (II, 10,2; 30,9). Irenaeus rejects, then, the Valentinian myth in the same way in which the apologists opposed the Middle Platonist doctrine called "the three principles," referring to origins, that is to say, god, matter and ideas.

Once the interpretation of creatio ex nihilo by the providence and goodness of God is in place at the end of the 2nd c., the cosmological debates take another direction, taking the form of an exegesis of the first six days of creation. Many of these writings are lost: what remains is only general notes and a few fragments in authors like *Papias of Hierapolis in Phrygia, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, *Lactantius, Basil and *Ambrose. It becomes a common conviction that the goodness and providence of God manifest themselves in creation, in the most humble of things, and the writers voluntarily affirm and describe the details of created reality to celebrate the One who is the creator of such marvelous things.

DSp 5, 1575-1605; P. Duhem, Le système du monde. Histoire des doctrines cosmologiques de Platon à Copernic, Paris 1914; V. Monod, Dieu dans l'univers. Essai sur l'action exercée sur la pensée chrétienne par les grands systèmes cosmologiques depuis Aristote jusqu'à nos jours, Paris 1933; A. Frank-Duquesne, Cosmos et gloire. Dans quelle mesure l'univers physique a-t-il part à la chute, à la rédemption et à la gloire finales?, Paris 1947; A.J. Festugière, La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste, II, Le Dieu cosmique, Paris 1949; I. Hausherr, L'hésychasme. Études de spiritualité: OCP 22 (1956) 5-40, 247-285; Id., Hésychasme et prière, OCA 176, Rome 1966, 163-237; M. Spanneut, Le stoïcisme des Pères de L'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie, Paris 1957; J. Gribomont, Le renoncement au monde dans l'idéal ascétique de saint Basile: Irénikon 31 (1958) 282-307, 460-475; L. Thunberg, Microcosm and Mediator. The Theological Anthropology of Maximus the Confessor, Lund 1965; H.U. v. Balthasar, Herrlichkeit. Eine theologische Aesthetik, Einsiedeln 1965; A.I. Orbán, Les dénominations du monde chez les premiers auteurs chrétiens, Nijmegen 1970; Th. Spidlík, Stare nel mondo o fuggire il mondo: Vita consacrata 13 (1977) 170-177; Id., La spiritualité de l'Orient chrétien. Manuel systématique, OCA 206, Rome 1978, 121ff., 199ff.; C. Moreschini, Storia della filosofia patristica, Brescia 2004.

C. Moreschini

WRITING. For the majority of antiquity the verb "to write" meant to dictate, as in the case of the verb "to read," which meant listening to a text read by others. Cicero and *Pliny the Younger dictated their own writings. Thanks to rich patrons, *Origen and *Jerome used *stenographers (see *notarius; *stenography), who transcribed the dictated or even the preached text by the author. Arns affirmed that "Jerome did not write any of his works by his own hand." One simply has to examine some of Origen's and Jerome's commentaries to become aware of the fact that at times they were not heavily edited. The same can be said of the captured word and the edited text, as is evident from a comparison between the De mysteriis and the De sacramentis written by *Ambrose. Jerome confessed: "I do not dictate with the same elegance with which I write. In the second case, I have to edit and reedit my style in composing what deserves to be read; in the first case, I dictate what comes to my head" (Ep. 74,6,2; cf., Ambr., Ep. 47,1-2). Whenever it was possible, more than one notarius was engaged in recording the author's dictation via shorthand, and then there were correctors of the text. On occasion several notarii wrote the same text simultaneously, which, when not revised by the author, resulted in multiple copies that differed from one another. Thus differing editions of the text born at the origin of the composition could circulate.

J. de Ghellinck, Patristique et moyen âge, Brussels, II-III, 1947–1949; E. Arns, La technique du livre d'après saint Jérôme, Paris 1953; J. Schlumberger, 'No scribo sed dicto'. Hat der Autor der Historia Augusta mit Stenographen gearbeitet?, in Bonner Hist. Augusta Colloquia, ed. J. Straub, 1975; P. Petitmengin - B. Flusin, Le livre antique et la dictée. Nouvelles recherches, in Mémorial André-Jean Festugière, ed. E. Lucchesi - H.D. Saffrey, Geneva 1984, 247-266; H.C. Teitler, Notarii and exceptores. An Inquiry into the Role and Significance of Shorthand Writers in the Imperial and Ecclesiastical Bureaucracy of the Roman Empire (from the Early Principate to c. 450 A.D.), Amsterdam 1985.

A. HAMMAN

WULFILA or Ulfila (ca. 311–383). Of Cappadocian origin and Christian family, born around 311, Wulfila was still a child when he, along with his parents, became a victim of a group of *Goths who carried him and his family away with them beyond the Danube River. Having retained his Christian faith, he was ordained bishop at *Constantinople in 341 by *Eusebius of Nicomedia and devoted himself to defending *Arian Christianity among the Goths. For seven years he worked N of the Danube River; then a persecution of the Goths, who were still pagan, forced him to seek refuge, along with the Goths who had become Christian in Moesia, at the borders of the empire. In 360 he participated at the Council of Constantinople and signed the *homoian (moderate Arian) formula of faith. He died in 383 during a trip to Constantinople in order to intercede in favor of *Palladius of Ratiaria.

Despite attempts to minimize his evangelizing activity among the barbarians, his work was immediately of utmost importance. To adequately support evangelization on the cultural level, Wulfila created an alphabet well-suited to that language and translated the Sacred *Scriptures into Gothic, a work that proved to be foundational not only for religion but also for culture. We know that he also wrote in Greek and Latin, but from his writings only a profession of faith has survived. Modern scholars have generally regarded him as a moderate Arian on the basis of his signing the formula of 360; but this formula only served to provide support for a radical Arianism (*anomoism), which was directly shaped on the model designed by that of *Eunomius. He transmitted this form of doctrine to Western Arianism which was active between the end of the 4th c. and the beginning of the 5th among the Germanic populations that had become Christian.

CPL 689; SC 267; PWK IXA, 512-531; Patrologia III, 88-90; J. Zeiller, Les origines chrétiennes dans les provinces danubiennes de l'Empire romain, Paris 1918; G. Friedrichsen, The Gothic Version of the Gospel, Oxford 1926; M. Simonetti, L'arianesimo di Ulfila: RomBarb 1 (1976) 297-323; The Life and Work of Ulfila, in The Goths in the Fourth Century, ed. by P. Heather and J. Matthews, Liverpool 1991, 133-153; B. Luiselli, Storia culturale dei rapporti tra mondo romano e mondo germanico, Rome 1992, 453-573; H. Sivan, Ulfila's Own Conversion: HTR 89 (1996) S. 373-386; B. Luiselli, La formazione della cultura europea occidentale, Rome 2003 (see the index).

M. SIMONETTI

X

XENODOCHIUM (Hospital). The xenodocheion (xenos = stranger) was a building where pilgrims and poor people were housed and cared for. In the ancient world, the care of the sick was often connected to the temples, e.g., in *Egypt; in the Greco-Roman world there existed some rare buildings for the care of the sick, esp. the asclepeia, the complexes of the temples of Asclepius (the Roman Aesculapius was the god of medicine). The asclepeia were made of a spring or well, surrounded by sacred woods, and by an area for the sick, called the adyton, where they spent the night, practicing incubatio; surgical interventions and administering medicine were also practiced. At Epidaurus (Greece) in AD 170, the senator Antoninus erected two establishments. *Aristides spent much time in the asclepeion of Pergamum. At *Rome a place was devoted to Aesculapius on the Tiberina island. Libanius, in the 4th c. BC, often consulted Asclepius for his illnesses (Autob. 143; Epp. 706-708; 1300-1301; 1483). During the imperial period, the official physicians who were paid with public money were in charge of the care of the sick. The emperor *Antoninus Pius decreed that the great cities could have ten doctors with privileges, seven for the midsized cities and five for the smallest cities (Digest 27,1,2, Herennius Modestinus). Doctors enjoyed various privileges in the 4th c. (CTh 13,3,2-3), and they were also obliged to aid the poor (CTh 18,3,8 of Valentinian, who decreed that in Rome 14 archiatri ["court physicians"] be paid by the food administration); Valentinian also decreed that the landholdings and the military encampments should have valetudinaria in order to assist slaves and soldiers (J.C. Wilmanns, Der Arzt in der römischen Armee der frühen und hohen Kaiserzeit: Clio medica 27 [1995] 171-187). They were not charitable institutions, as those would be that were of Christian inspiration. In the gospels, Christ, the true physician, often healed the sick; he said to his disciples: "Heal the sick [in whatever town you enter] and say to them, 'The kingdom of God has come near to you'" (Lk 10:9); there also existed the charism of healing: "To another faith by the same Spirit, to another the gift of healing by the one Spirit" (1 Cor 12:9). Believers in Christ "would lay hands upon the sick and they would be healed" (Mk 16:18). The Christian message is an exhortation to charity (Rom 12:13; Heb 13:2-3; Jas 2:14-15; 1 Pet 4:9).

During the first centuries there were no specific institutions, but the private and communal initiative of assisting the poor and the sick was widespread, as in the case of the plague of 252 at *Carthage (Cypr., De mort. 14: PL 4,591-593) and at *Alexandria in 268 (Eus., HE 7,12). The brothers *Cosmas and Damian, who were doctors, were known for having dedicated their lives to caring for the sick. The pagans themselves recognized that charitable work was proper to the Christians: the emperor *Julian witnessed the example of the Christians in favor of those who had been disinherited (E. Kislinger, Kaiser Julian und die (christlichen) xenodocheia, in Fest. H. Hunger, ed. W. Hoerander, Vienna 1984, 171-174). The pagan *Nectarius wrote to *Augustine: "My affirmation is demonstrated even by the very nature of your dealings with which you assist the poor, take care of the afflicted, administer medicine to sick bodies; in some, you do everything you can so that those suffering may not undergo their afflictions for a long time" (Aug., Ep. 103,3).

From the 4th c. onward various charitable and benevolent institutions arose with functions at times similar and with different names that characterized their purposes. Such terms from the Greek world were imported into the Latin world: nosocomium (for the sick), brephotrophium (for abandoned children), orphanotrophium (for orphans), ptochium (for the poor), gerontochium (for the elderly); xenodochium was the term most used in the West (Gk. xenodocheion), when the term hospitalia was not used (habitation for guests). The Arabic canons of the Council of *Nicaea ordered the construction of a building for pilgrims, the poor and the sick (Mansi 2,976). The first hospital building was established by *Basil of Caesarea: a ptōcheion (or ptōchotropheion, a place for the poor; see Basileiad). There was also one at *Alexandria, *Egypt (A. Martin, Athanase d'Alexandrie, Rome 1996, 728-729). At Rome, *Fabiola, prima omnium, established a recovery home for the sick, in which she performed benevolent work; in fact, she even personally walked through the streets of Rome to gather the derelict (Jerome, Ep. 77,6: PL 22,694); *Pammachius established a xenodochium at Portus, the maintenance of which was very expensive, with an annexed basilica (Jer., Ep. 66,5: PL 22,641); for Nola we have the testimony from *Paulinus (Carm. 27,500ff.; 21,384ff.; Ep. 29,13). There was a xenodochium at *Hippo (Aug., Sermo 356,10). In 419 the emperor *Honorius granted bishops the ability to go to the prisons ope miserationis so that they might give medical treatment to the sick, nourish the poor, console the insontes (Sirm. 13); the deacon Dionysius, a doctor at Rome, cared for the poor without asking for money, as the barbarians who had tortured him had done (ICUR 7,12601). The prefect of Rome Glabrio Faustus built a xenodochium (M. Guarducci: Rend. PARA 42 [1969/70] 219-249). Historians know of various xenodochia from 6th-c. Rome: the xenodochia of the Anicii, Valeri and the Via Nova. Pope *Symmachus (498–514) built hospitals (LP 263); at the time of Pope *Vigilius (537–555), *Belisarius established a xenodochium on the Via Lata (LP 296). *Pelagius II (578–590) transformed his personal residence into a place of refuge for the poor and the elderly. Pope Leo III (795–816) made donations to various xenodochia in Rome. *Melania the Elder around 381 established at *Jerusalem a charitable institution; at *Ephesus *Bassianus built a ptocheion for the poor and sick containing 70 beds. At Constantinople *Pulcheria, sister of the emperor *Theodosius II, established charitable institutions (multa publica hospitum et pauperum domicilia: AASS, Sept. 3, 538); Samson, a slightly legendary figure, constructed a famous hospital near the Hagia Sophia (Procopius, ædif. Justiniani I, 2). *John Chrysostom attests to the existence of xenodochia at *Antioch (Cons. ad Stag. 3,13: PG 47, 490-491; In Act. Apost. hom. 45,4: PG 60,319; Ad Matth. 66,3: PG 58,630). In the 6th c. there were various charitable institutions in *Gaul (Council of *Orange, can. 13); in *Spain, Masona established one at Emerita (*Mérida) around 580, remains of which are still preserved.

The distinctive elements of these institutions were more in the attention given to recipients of care than in their cure, in keeping with Christian love for neighbor, esp. emphasizing Christus medicus as the one who heals. These institutions primarily had a benevolent and charitable characteristic, but they were not true and proper hospitals. The monastic communities would make their contribution in this direction. In the Byzantine world, a more defined development of the hospitals took place (called xenōnes) through the work of competent doctors. The Byzantine institutions were the true antecedents of modern hospitals.

DACL 1, 725-848; 7, 546-547; 6, 2748-2770, D.J. Constantelos, Byzantine Philanthropy and Social Welfare, New Brunswick, NJ 1968; S. Scicolone, Basilio e la sua organizzazione dell'attività assistenziale a Cesarea: CCC 3 (1982) 353-372; T.S. Miller, The Birth of the Hospital in the Byzantine Empire, Baltimore 1985, 21997; Symposium on Byzantine Medicine, DOP, Dumbarton Oaks 38 (1985) (various articles); D. Setter, Das europäische Hospital von der Spätantike bis 1800, Cologne 1986; R. Jackson, Doctors and Diseases in the Roman Empire, British Museum, London 1988; A. Nigel, Hospice to Hospital in the Near East: An Instance of Continuity and Change in Late Antiquity: Bulletin of History of Medicine 64 (1990) 446-462; G. Lorenz, Antike Krankenbehandlung in historisch-vergleichender Sicht: Studien zum konkret-anschaulichen Denken, Heidelberg 1990; Th. Steiner, Orientalium more secutus. Raume und Institution der Caritas des 5. bis 7. Jahrhunderts in Gallien, Münster 1991; P. Van Minnen, Medical Care in Late Antiquity: Clio Medica 27 (1995) 153-169; Cultura e promozione umana. La cura del corpo e dello spirito nell'antichità classica e nei primi secoli cristiani. Un messaggio ancora attuale?, ed. E. dal Covolo - I. Giannetto, Troina 1998; H. Avalos, Health Care and the Rise of Christianity, Peabody, MA 1999; RAC 21, 826-914.

A. Di Berardino

Y

YAZDEGERD I (399–420). Persian emperor of the *Sassanid dynasty, called "the Persian Constantine." He put an end to the persecution begun by *Shapur II in the mid-4th c. and granted liberty to the church in Persia; thus, it could be reorganized, esp. with the synod of *Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 410. Yazdegerd thus maintained a good relationship both with the Roman Empire as well as with the Byzantine court, such that in 408 the emperor *Arcadius named him tutor of his son *Theodosius II.

I. Ortiz de Urbina, Storia e cause dello scisma della Chiesa di Persia: OCP 3 (1937) 468-475; K. Schippmann, Grundzüge der Geschichte des sassanidischen Reichs, Darmstadt 1990; R.C. Blockley, East Roman Foreign Policy, Leeds 1992, 46-59; 195-202.

S. Samulowitz

YORK. City of northeastern *England (Eburacum), it was in the 1st c. the general quarter of the Legio IX Hispana originating from *Pannonia and, after 123, that of the Legio VI Victrix originating from Novaesium. Initially only important as a military base, in the 2nd c. it ascended to the rank of a colony with the name of Colonia Eboracensis to then become the chief city and probably the capital of Britannia Inferior after the administrative reform carried out by *Septimius Severus, who died there in February of the year 211. Nearly 100 years later, in 306, *Constantius Chlorus died at Eburacum shortly after *Constantine I was there proclaimed emperor.

A substantial Christian community, which has, however, left no archaeologically recognizable trace, must have existed at York at least since the earliest years of the 4th c.: at the anti-*Donatist Council of *Arles, in fact, among the signatories there also appear three British bishops, and one of these, Eborius, calls himself the episcopus de civitate Eboracensi provincia Britannia. The Christian testimonies of York are full of lacunae until the beginning of the 7th c., where *Bede's account records, for the year 601, a letter from Pope *Gregory the Great to *Augustine of Canterbury, with whom he arranged that, once he had been appointed and after the city had embraced the Word of God, the bishop of York might have the metropolitan dignity and that he would have the power to consecrate twelve more bishops (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. I,29). Once *Paulinus had been ordained bishop of York by the hand of *Justus, archbishop of Durovernis (Canterbury) in 625, he dedicated himself with great missionary zeal to the conversion of the Northumbrians, the king of whom—Edwin—he baptized on 12 April 627 at York in a wooden church dedicated to the apostle *Peter, which was constructed on the occasion after having personally destroyed the altars of numerous remaining pagan temples (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II,13-14). Upon the death of the Christian king Edwin, who was killed on 12 October 633 by the king of the Britons Cadwallon after a 17-year reign—six of which were spent in the faith—Paulinus was forced to abandon the city, at first fleeing to Kent near King Eadbald and then at Hrofescaestir (Rochester), where he became bishop in place of the pastor Romanus, who had disappeared (Hist. eccl. gent. angl. II,20).

The deacon James remained at York, according to the valuable testimony of the Venerable Bede; James was "a man of a truly holy and religious spirit," but the church of York would come under the jurisdiction of the Celtic bishops of Lindisfarne for several decades. In the subsequent year, 634, Pope *Honorius I sent Paulinus a pallium in response to a request made by Edwin before his death and arranged, moreover, that each time the see of *Canterbury or York became vacant, the occupant of the other metropolitan see had to ordain a new bishop for the see lacking a pastor, and that it had supremacy over the newly ordained bishop. The episcopal see of York was restored in 664, although with much difficulty: upon the death of Tuda, bishop of Lindisfarne, the priest *Wilfrid—appointed bishop of Northumbria with a see at York—was sent to *Gaul to be consecrated regularly (the erroneous custom of the Easter observance and the chronic absence of bishops made it impossible for them to have a regular ordination), but because he delayed in returning to his homeland, King Oswiu decided to intervene personally by having *Chad appointed bishop. Wilfrid, who had been regularly ordained bishop in Gaul according to the Roman custom, upon his return did not wish to deprive Chad, who continued to administer his diocese with great missionary zeal and exemplary behavior but, during the apostolic visit of all *England carried out by Theodore—appointed the new archbishop of Canterbury by Pope *Vitalian in place of the deceased Deusdedit—this irregularity became evident and Chad willingly and with great humility retired to the monastery of Laestingaeu, which he himself had founded (today Lastingham in Yorkshire), leaving to the legitimate bishop the leadership of his diocese. His episcopate, which was esp. animated, was interrupted by numerous disputes with the archbishops of Canterbury and with the ruler of Northumbria, who forced him to leave his see twice.

Bishops: Paulinus of York 625 (until 633); vacant from 633 to 664; Chad 664 (until 669); Wilfrid 669; Bosa 678; Wilfrid (recalled) 686; Bosa (recalled) 691; John of Beverley 705; Wilfrid II 718; *Egbert 732 or 734; Aethelbeorht 767; Eanbald I 780; Eanbald II 796.

CE 14, 1073-1075; ODC (3rd ed.) 1773-1774.

M. Ghilardi

Z

ZACCHEUS, antignostic. Bishop of a poorly identified Caesarea (2nd c.). Mentioned solely by the author of the Praedestinatus* (I,11; I,13: PL 53,591), a 5th-c. work, as an opponent of *Valentinus and *Ptolemy and their disciples, whom he anathematized.

DCB 4, 1606.

E. Prinzivalli

ZACHARIAH, pope (741–752). Deacon of Greco-Calabrian origin, son of a certain Polychronius, Zachariah was elected by a unanimous vote on 3 December 741 and consecrated on the 10th of the same month. He succeeded *Gregory III (731–741), with respect to whom he chose a more conciliatory line with the *Longobard (Lombard) king Liutprand, obtaining from him in 742 a 20-year truce, the restitution of ecclesiastical goods previously taken, and the renunciation of any attempt to obtain *Ravenna and the exarchate. Friend and protector of the successor of Liutprand, Ratchis, Zachariah was unable, however, to halt the aggressiveness of the usurper Aistulf, who in 751 broke the truce and invaded the exarchate, holding himself back, however, from papal lands. The deposed Ratchis retired to the monastery of Monte Cassino. In the West, Zachariah began the historical politics of friendship and alliance between the Roman church and the emerging power of the Franks. Charles Martel was succeeded by Carloman (in Austrasia) and by Pepin the Short (in Neustria). In 751—after the withdrawal of Carloman to Monte Cassino—Pepin dethroned the last Merovingian descendent, Childeric III, and had himself proclaimed king by the nobles assembled at Soissons. Zachariah not only endorsed Pepin's election as legitimate but also had him anointed king with holy oil by St. *Boniface, the apostle of Germany. Previously Zachariah—with the collaboration of Bishop Boniface and the two Frankish leaders—had promised to reform the church of France, which was in advanced decay. This reform was carried out in E France with the councils of Austrasia (742) and Leptines (743) and with a synod at Rome, and in W France with the Council of Soissons (744) and a Roman council (745). Finally, the Frankish episcopate approved the results of all the assemblies in a general council (known as the Concilium in Francia habitum) held in 747 in the presence of Pepin, Carloman and Boniface. At *Constantinople the successor of *Leo III the Isaurian, Constantine V Copronymus, even though distracted by wars at the borders, substantially persisted in the iconoclastic positions of his predecessor. Even with him Zachariah attempted a conciliating path with little, if any, fruit; sending to him as a gift the Greek translation of *Gregory the Great's Dialogues. Zachariah maintained the evangelizing work of St. Boniface, communicating with him in a massive epistolary correspondence. With this pope, the construction of the abbey of Monte Cassino was completed, and he consecrated it in person. At *Rome, Zachariah restored the Lateran Palace and adorned the basilica of S. Maria Antiqua. He wisely administered the church's lands, entrusting them to efficient farm settlements (domuscultae).

CPL 1713; Mansi 13, 91-99 (letter to the patriarch Anastasius); MGH, Leges 1, 16-21; MGH, Epistolae III, 94; 302-307; 313-327; 336; 348-349; 356-365; 369-375; 467-468; 479-487 and 710-711; LP I, 426-439 (W. Gundlach - E. Dummler); Jaffé I, 262-270; DTC 15, 3671-3675; R.E. Sullivan, The Papacy and Missionary Activity in the Early Middle Age: Medieval Studies 17 (1955) 46-106; J. Hourlier, La lettre de Zacharie, in Le culte et les reliques de saint Benoît et de Sainte Scholastique, Paris 1980, 241-252; G.S. Marcou, Zaccaria, un pontefice di origine greca: Veltro 27 (1983) 145-153; D. De Francesco, Considerazioni storico-topografiche a proposito delle domuscultae laziali: Archivio della Società Romana di Storia Patria 119 (1996) 5-47; E. Marazzi, I patrimonia Sanctae Romanae ecclesiae nel Lazio (secc. IV-V). Struttura amministrativa e prassi gestionali, Rome 1998, 235-261; EPapi 1, 656-660 (P. Delogu); Patrologia IV, 188-189; LTK[3] 10, 1361-1362 (G. Rigotti).

M. Spinelli

ZACHARIAS of Jerusalem (609–ca. 628). Patriarch of Jerusalem. When the Persians conquered *Jerusalem in 614, Zacharias was taken prisoner along with the Holy Cross and numerous believers. A consolatory document to his community dates to this period, which was composed by *Modestus, abbot of the monastery of *Theodosius, who then became Zacharias's successor. The consolatio was also handed down in a *Georgian and Arabic version. Zacharias was inserted into the calendar of saints with a feast day of 21 February.

CPG III, 7825; PG 86, 2, 3219-3234; Georgian version: CSCO 202, 70-76 and 203, 46-50 (G. Garitte); Arabic version: 340, 49-53 and 98-101; 341, 33-35 and 66-68 (G. Garitte; one strand of the tradition); moreover 347, 143-145 and 185-188; 348, 97-98 and 126-129 (a parallel strand); LTK³ 10, 1301; BS 12, 1451-1453; Beck 448.

J. Irmscher

ZACHARIAS Scholasticus or Rhetor. Born at Maiuma of Gaza (S *Palestine), in the last third of the 5th c., to a large family (among the five brothers the figure of *Procopius of Gaza stands out). From 485 to 487 he studied at *Alexandria and solidified his friendship with *Severus, the future *monophysite patriarch of *Antioch. After having encouraged his conversion, he joined him at Berytus (Beirut) in the autumn of 487 for the study of law (487–492), leading an austere life among the monophysite ascetics. At least from 492, he worked in the profession of scholastikos ("lawyer") at *Constantinople, where he ascended to high offices, among which was that of juridical council of the comes sacri palatii, although remaining in close contact with religious circles, in fact, even living within the monastery itself of the brother priests Philip and Victor. After 512 he abandoned Severian monophysitism. Between 527 and 536 he was promoted to the metropolitan see of Mytilene (Lesbos), and in this office he intervened, in May of 536, at the Constantinopolitan synod in which the patriarch Anthimus was deposed, who was condemned along with his monophysite followers. The date of his death is unknown.

Aside from the Ammonius, that is, the Debate on the Creation of the World, which was held at Alexandria with his professor, the pagan sophist *Ammonius of Alexandria, or short treatises Against the Manicheans written in 527 or shortly earlier, Zacharias's literary legacy, or the one attributed to him, is of a historical character. The biographical document, Life of Severus of Antioch, was written around 515 and preserved in *Syriac (PO 2,7-115). Only one small fragment of the Life of Peter the Iberian has been passed down, and that in a Syriac version, a revision inserted as books 3-6 (from 450 to 491) of an anonymous historical compilation in 12 books which goes from the creation of the world to the year 569. *Evagrius Scholasticus depends on Zacharias's History. Even if abbreviated to this extent, the work remains the most important historical source for the reigns of the emperor *Marcian, *Leo I and Zeno, whose Henoticon he supported.

PG 85, 1011-1178; CPG 6995-7001; M. Minniti Colonna, Zaccaria Scolastico. Ammonio (intr., critical text and translation and comment.), Naples 1973; B. Tatakis, La philosophie byzantine, Paris 1949, 34-37; DTC 15, 3676-3680; EC 12, 1761; PWK 9, A, 2, 2212-2216; P. Allen, Zachariah Scholasticus and the historia ecclesiastica of Evagrius Scholasticus: JTS n.s. 31 (1980) 471-488; Patrologia V, 262-263; Ph. Blaudeau, Alexandrie et Constantinople (451-491): de l'histoire à la géo-ecclésiologie, Rome 2006, passim.

D. Stiernon

ZENO. Byzantine emperor (474–475, 476–491). Tarasis Kodisa—his original name—was born in Isauria ca. 426. Determined to free himself from the *Ostrogothic tutelage of Aspar (who was then assassinated in 471), the emperor *Leo I called the Isaurian leader to *Constantinople, entrusting him with the office of magister militum per Orientem. He took on the Greek name of Zeno and married the emperor's older daughter, Ariadne. The son born from this marriage ideally would have succeeded as basileus with the name Leo II, but while still a child died in the autumn of 474. After the premature death of this child, as regent and coemperor, Zeno became emperor. Zeno, however, was nearly ruined (January 475) by a plot that brought to the throne *Basiliscus, brother of Verina, wife of the deceased emperor, who likewise died in 474. A disastrous interregnum of 20 months followed. At the end of August 476, Zeno returned to power and was able to maintain his throne for 15 years, despite other factional disruptions and civil wars. To rid himself of the turbulent leader of the Ostrogoths who had helped him ruin Basiliscus, Zeno convinced *Theodoric the Great to head toward *Italy to combat *Odoacer, who had been previously appointed by Byzantium as magister militum per Italiam. *Theodoric's victory turned a new page in the history of Italy following the fall of the Western Roman empire.

In the East, the danger of disintegration was represented by *monophysitism, which distanced *Egypt and *Syria-*Palestine from Byzantium. To reestablish religious unity Zeno, who had been counseled by the patriarch *Acacius of Constantinople, in 482 during the advent of Peter Mongus to the Alexandrian see promulgated a document that aimed to reconcile monophysites without irritating Chalcedonians, namely, the so-called Henoticon. The document presented itself as an imperial letter sent "to the most reverend bishops, clerics, monks and laymen of Alexandria, Egypt, Libya and the Pentapolis," but in reality it was intended for the entire empire. The document proclaimed the profession of faith of *Nicaea-Constantinople as the sole orthodox creed, according to the very definition of the Council of *Ephesus. Upon the reiterated condemnation of *Nestorius and *Eutyches, a condemnation was added for those who at *Chalcedon or at another synod had spoken differently of the one Christ, the only Son, and it approved the Twelve Anathemas of *Cyril of Alexandria.

The imperial decree did not entirely satisfy the monophysites: Peter Mongus accepted it but not his church; Calandio of Antioch also rejected it, although *Martyrius of Jerusalem accepted it. It was esp. condemned by Pope *Felix III in the Roman synod of 28 July 484, thus beginning a schism with Byzantium that lasted until 519 (the *Acacian Schism).

Evagrius of Pontus, HE 3, 14; PG 86, 2620-2625; Liberatus, Breviarium 17; PL 68, 1022-1024; EC 5, 365-367; 12, 1792-1793; Cath 5, 605; Fliche-Martin IV, 362-373; G. Ostrogorsky, Storia dell'impero bizantino, Turin 1968, 54-56; PWK 10,A (1972) 149-213; Patrologia V, 40-41; Ph. Blaudeau, Alexandrie et Constantinople (451-491): de l'histoire à la géo-ecclésiologie, Rome 2006, passim; R.M. Harrison, "The Emperor Zeno's Real Name," ByzZ 74, 1 (1981) 27-28.

D. Stiernon

ZENO of Verona (4th c.). *Ambrose remembers him (Ep. I,5,1) as the bishop of *Verona who died around 380, and the local tradition places him at the eighth spot on the list of the city's bishops. Some manuscripts, likewise derived from the local tradition, attribute to him approximately 90 homilies written after 360. This collection has come down to us in two parts: the first (I) included 62 texts, the second (II) only 30. Only 30 or so of these homilies are complete. The remainder are outlines or summaries. It seems clear that the collection was not done by the author himself but was made after his death, probably to meet liturgical demands.

Many of his homilies are exegetical, mostly dedicated to passages from the OT, and one can perceive his interest in the OT's deeds and personages even in different types of homilies, accompanied by a certain anti-Jewish tone. He offers a traditional typological interpretation, primarily in light of *Christology, through which *Jonah, *Jacob, *Job etc. are seen as typoi of Christ. Some homilies treat baptismal and *Easter themes; others treat morality (de continentia, de avaritia etc.). Few are specifically doctrinal (I,2; II,5), but these types of themes are disseminated everywhere. We can perceive a few traces of *millenarism (I,2), but he did have a notable command of Nicene trinitarian theology. Zeno often argued against the Photinians, whose epicenter was *Pannonia, not far from N *Italy. In I,3,19 he provides the ancient reason for which Christ entered *Mary through the ear, that is, by means of the angelic proclaimer's word. Hom. I,39 is the only one dedicated to a martyr, the African Arcadius, which, along with reminiscences of *Tertullian and *Lactantius, has led some scholars to think that Zeno was from Africa.

CPL 208-209; CCL 22; A. Bigelmair, Zeno von Verona, Münster 1904; var. aus., Studi Zenoniani in occasione del XVI centenario della morte di san Zeno, Verona 1976; Patrologia III, 117-120 (bibl.); V. Boccardi, L'esegesi di Zenone di Verona: Augustinianum 23 (1983) 453-485; C. Truzzi, Zeno, Gaudenzio e Cromazio, Testi e contenuti della predicazione cristiana per le chiese di Verona e di Aquileia (360-410 ca.), Brescia 1985; G. Sgreva, La teologia di Zenone di Verona: contributo per la conoscenza delle sviluppo del pensiero teologico nel Nord Italia (360-380), Vicenza 1989; R. Lizzi, Ambrose's Contemporaries and the Christianization of Northern Italy: JRS 80 (1990) 156-173; BBKL XIV, 427-430; D.J. Font I Palma, La relación "Pascua- primavera" en Zenón de Verona, Gaudencio de Brescia y Cromacio de Aquileia, Rome 2003.

M. Simonetti

ZENOBIA (d. after 272). Queen of *Palmyra, upon the death of her husband Odenathus (267), assumed command in the name of her son Vaballatus. Contrary to her husband, she adopted a politic of hostility toward the Roman Empire, enlarging her borders in *Syria, *Egypt and *Asia Minor, to *Ancrya in *Galatia. *Aurelian, who had committed troops elsewhere, recognized the state of affairs (270). Her Hellenistic culture led her to surround herself by such counselors as the Neoplatonist Cassius Longinus, a student of *Ammonius Saccas, and *Paul of Samosata, an administrator of the equestrian rank of the kingdom of Palmyra, bishop of *Antioch from 260, who intervened in the debate on the christological formulation and exhibited a *monarchianism of the *subordinationist type and a person whom Zenobia protected, allowing him to preserve his episcopal see even after the condemnation issued by the Synod of Antioch of 268. Led by ambition, Zenobia aimed to create an independent state and began to mint coins (271). Aurelian intervened and, at the head of his army, took control over Palmyra and imprisoned Zenobia in 272.

PWK 10, A (1972), 1-8; LTK³ 10, 1423; DNP 12/2, 730-734; J. Gagé, La montée des Sassanides et l'heure de Palmyre, Paris 1964, 349ff.; F. Millar, Paul of Samosata, Zenobia and Aurelian: JRS 61 (1971) 1-17; R. Stoneman, Palmyra and Its Empire: Zenobias's Revolt Against Rome, Ann Arbor, MI 1992; U. Hartmann, Das palmyrenische Teilreich, Berlin 2000.

G. PILARA

ZENOBIUS of Zephyrium (5th c.). Bishop of Zephyrium in *Cilicia around 433. After the Council of *Ephesus, under pressure from the emperor, a conciliatory creed, compiled by *Theodoret of Cyrrhus, was approved for resolving the *Nestorian controversy. It was signed by the Antiochenes, who were represented by *John of Antioch, by the aforementioned Theodoret and by the Alexandrians, who were represented by *Cyril of Alexandria (Hfl-Lecl 2, 1, 385-419). Zenobius, however, along with other bishops of Cilicia, went over to the opposition against John of Antioch. He was therefore deposed, perhaps in 435. Exiled to Tiberias, he was able to flee from the place of his confinement. The acts of the council contain Zenobius's letter to Bishop *Alexander of Hierapolis, metropolitan of the province of the Euphrates, who likewise belonged to the opposition, in which the author informs the recipient of the sanctions adopted against Bishop *Meletius of Mopsuestia (Cilicia).

CPG III 6470; PG 84, 792-793; ACO 1, 4, p. 195; PWK 10 A, 14-15.

J. IRMSCHER

ZEPHYRINUS, pope (198–217). According to *Eusebius of Caesarea he presided over the church of *Rome for 18 years (HE 5,28 and 6,21,3) and, according to the Catalogus liberianus, he died in 217 (MGH, Chron. min. I, 74). The Liber pontificalis (I,139), according to which his episcopate lasted 20 years, adds that he issued two decrees concerning the presence of the community in the ordinations and the celebration of the Mass by the bishop with the presence of the priests. Zephyrinus was buried in the cemetery of St. *Callistus, but not underground. During his episcopate, *Origen came to Rome (Eus., HE 6,14,10), whom he perhaps met. Pope *Victor, Zephyrinus's predecessor, had condemned *adoptionism, which was propagated in Rome by *Theodotus of Byzantium called the Tanner; Zephyrinus renewed the condemnation and readmitted the adoptionist bishop *Natalius to communion, but as a layman; Natalius was a follower of Theodotus (Eus., HE 5,28,8-19), who had agreed to leave the schism for a sum of money but had returned through providential intervention (he had a dream that *Jesus rebuked him). Zephyrinus is mainly known through the document of a bitter opponent of his successor Callistus (who had been his deacon)—namely, the Philosophumena (or the Èlenchos), a text attributed to *Hippolytus in which an exposition is given of the theological debates that were current at the beginning of the 3rd c. (9,7ff.). *Epigonus and *Praxeas were spreading *monarchianism at Rome. Praxeas, according to *Tertullian, had prevented the reception of Montanist teaching by the bishop of Rome (Adv. Praxean 1, lines 21-33). Zephyrinus who, according to the aforementioned work, was "a simple man, unlearned and ignorant of the ecclesiastical rules and a lover of gifts and money" (Philos. IX,11) and at Callistus's complete mercy, followed a very ambiguous approach, all in favor of the new heresy; moreover, even his profession of faith was erroneous and ambiguous. In these weighty judgments, the hatred of the author of the Philosophumena toward Callistus played an important role. During the same period there lived at Rome the learned *Gaius, who praised the Roman tradition of *Peter and *Paul (Eus., HE 2,5,7), against the Montanist tradition of Asia (Eus., HE 6,20,3).

DTC 15, 3690-3691; 2, 1336-1337; BS 12, 1464-1465; Quasten I, 249-250; Fliche-Martin, see the indexes of vol. II; A. von Harnack, Die älteste uns im Wortlaut bekannte dogmatische Erklärung eines Römisches Bischofs (Zephyrin bei Hippolyt, Ref. IX, 11), in Kleine Schriften zur alten Kirche, II, Leipzig 1980, 619-625; B. Capelle, Le cas du pape Zéphyrin: RBen 38 (1926) 329-330; M. Simonetti, Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome 1993, 183-215; R.E. Heine, The Christology of Callistus: JTS 49 (1998) 56-91; EPapi 1, 234-237.

A. DI BERARDINO

ZODIAC. Greek astronomers and astrologists used the term "zodiac" to refer to the zone of the ecliptic celestial sphere in which the sun, moon and chief planets turned, making way for multiple relationships. The zodiac—divided into 12 signs (ζῴδια), each one a 30-degree distance from the sun in the arc of a month (Aratus, Phaen. 544; Cicero, De div. II,42-44; Arat. 317; Manilius, Astron. I,682; Sextus Emp., Adv. mathem. 5; Diodorus Sic., II,30; Philo of Alexandria, Abrah. 69; Firmicus, Math. II,1; *Basil of Caesarea, Hex. 6,5)—corresponds to the twelve constellations (Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo, Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius and Pisces). The Sumerians and the Babylonians seem to have been the first (14th c. BC) to name and elaborate (with a double connotation, scientific and religious) the celestial constellations as a fantastic representation of divinities and sacred animals that have influence on future events. The “Chaldeans” divided the earth into twelve regions, each one subjected to a sign of the zodiac. According to a teaching attributed to Zoroaster and retained also by *Manicheism, souls descending from heaven leap through the circle of the twelve constellations (Clem. Alex., Strom. V,103). For the *Mandeans, who were opponents of Babylonian and Greek polytheism, the signs of the zodiac (and the divinities of the planets) are demons who are hostile to human beings, life and light. The teachings of the zodiac underwent great development at *Rome (Cicero translated and paraphrased Aratus), chiefly in *Mithraism and in the solar and astral beliefs. Manilius, under the emperor *Tiberius, provided a detailed treatment of the influence of the zodiac in his Astronomica: it was the age of the triumph of the Eastern cults and astrology. The representation of the zodiac on funerary representations or apotheoses could be an allusion to the astral immortality or could be placed alongside the twelve labors of Hercules, who was regarded by the Christians as a figure of Christ (Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 54; Dial. 69,3). Magic, astrology’s twin, made its success dependent on the position of the planets in the signs of the zodiac. Also, as a result of a false etymology of Stoic origin (ζωοφόρος κύκλος), every manifestation of human life was placed in relation to one or more signs of the zodiac (Varro was interested in the relationship of the signs with agriculture: De re rust. 1,28; 2,1,7). These signs were then used for the construction of horoscopes (a prediction of a royal marriage was made to Julia Domna, the wife of *Septimius Severus: Historia Augusta, Vita Sev. 3,8) and the determination of an individual’s future. An ancient tradition represents the human being as a microcosm in which each vital organ (and behavior) is under the influence of a sign or planets (Orig., C. Cels. 8,58; Basil Caes., Hex. 6,6; Firmicus, Math. II,24; III,1). Even the founding of cities and buildings was preceded by the consultation of the astrologers in order to know the most favorable moment. A 2nd-c. historian, Charax, explains that the hippodromes were built in such a way as to represent the world: “the twelve doors of the zodiac, which governs the land and sea and the transitory course of human life” (FGH 103, 34 Jacoby).

Unknown in the OT, the signs of the zodiac were known by the Jews during the Babylonian exile and translated into Hebrew by the Pharisees, who had been infected with astrology (Epiph., Pan. 16,2), for which the *Qumran community nourished interest (4Q186. 318). *Hellenistic-Jewish exegetes interpreted the twelve loaves of showbread (Lev 24:6) as a symbol of the signs of the zodiac and of the months of the year, and the seven branches of the menorah as a symbol of the planets and days of the week (Flavius Josephus, De bell. Iud. V, 5,217; Ant. Iud. III, 7,182.186). Palestinian synagogues were decorated with zodiacal mosaics as early as the 1st c. BC. For a long time the region of *Syria had a fascination with astrological and zodiacal ideas: *Ephrem rebuked *Bardesanes for his “assiduous reading of books on the zodiacal signs” (Nau 499), and *Isaac of Antioch (XI,242-243 Bickell) affirmed that only during his time (5th c.) were “the Chaldeans healed from their worship of the signs of the zodiac.” Under Ptolemy, Egypt became familiar with zodiacal ideas to the point that the priestly class boasted of having created them (Cicero, De div. I,1,2): in fact, they received stimulus and renewed importance as a representation evocative of celestial immortality on sepulchral monuments and temple walls thanks to the Corpus Hermeticum.

Already in the attacks of *Tatian (Ad Graec. 9; 17; 19), we see Christians condemning divinization, astrology and magic, along the lines of the disregard shown for the arts of Babylonia in Is 47:9-15. For Ephrem “if God is just, he could not have established birthday stars through whose power human beings by necessity become sinners” (Carm. Nisib. 72,16). Nevertheless, starting from the visions of Rev 12 and 21 (the virgin crowned with 12 stars; the heavenly *Jerusalem, established on 12 foundations bearing the names of the 12 *apostles and endowed with 12 doors with names of the 12 tribes of *Israel, protected by 12 angels) to the *gnostic, Manichean and *Priscillianist speculations (Augustine, Haer. 70), “many people” gave heed to zodiacal suggestions (Basil Caes., Hex. 6,7). The first Christian emperor, *Constantine, convinced of the power of the stars, had himself depicted on coins as master of the world crowned by Victory and in his right hand the zodiacal ring. He desired that statues of the 12 signs of the zodiac be placed in the Hagia Sophia of *Constantinople, the likely horoscope of the basilica’s foundation. The treatise Mathesis is from this era (337), the first complete didactic text of Latin prose, composed by *Firmicus Maternus before his conversion. Such bishops as *Eusebius of Emesa likewise adhered to astrological beliefs (Socrates, HE 2,9). The Fathers, though combating astrological fatalism (ps.-Clement, Rec. 9-10; Hipp., Ref. 4-6; Tertull., De idol. 9; Orig., In Gen. 1,14; C. Cels. 2,20; Meth. Olymp., Symp. 8; Eus. Caes., Praep. ev. 6; Cyr. Jerus., Cat. 4,18; Basil Caes., Hex. 6; Greg. Nyss., C. fatum; Aug., Civ. Dei 5; Conf. 4; Enarr. ps. 61; John Philoponus, De op. mundi 4), paid attention to the zodiac, uniting it to the scriptural symbolisms of the number 12. Already *Theodotus the Valentinian connected the 12 signs to the 12 apostles, who preside over spiritual rebirth just as those who preside over physical birth (Clem. Alex., Exc. Theod. 25; 71; Strom. V,38); the parallelism would be extended to the 12 months of the year and the 12 hours of the day (ps.-Cyprian, De pascha comp. 19; Ambr., Exp. Lc. 7,222; Aug., Enarr. ps. 55,5; Zeno, Tract. I,33,4). The *sarcophagi represent the apostles crowned by a star in relation to the 12 months and at the center shaped by the sun of Christ, as was the case later on for the astral pagan divinities (ps.-Clem. R., Hom. II,23). There is no lack of assimilation with the 12 patriarchs either (Philo Alex., Quaest. Ex. II,109.114; Orosius, Comm. 2). Some signs developed and multiplied as symbols (positive but also negative), esp. christological: Aries/Lamb of God, Taurus/sacrificial victim; Gemini/two Testaments, Cancer symbolizes the seven capital vices; Virgo, who precedes Libra, is a symbol of *Mary who gives birth to Christ, the restorer of divine justice; Leo is Christ, who by rising defeats Scorpio, a symbol of the *serpent from the Garden of Eden; Sagittarius and Capricorn are demoniac signs, while Pisces represents the Jews and Gentiles saved by the waters of *baptism of Aquarius/Christ. The representation of the "majesty of Christ" at the center of the celestial sphere indicates his eternal dominion over the changing of time.

A.Y. Collins, Numerical Symbolism in Jewish and Early Christian Apocalyptic Literature: ANRW II.21.2, 1221-1287; A. Bouché-Leclercq, L'astrologie grecque, Paris 1899; F. Nau, Bardesane l'astrologue. Le Livre des lois des pays, Paris 1899; J. Bidez, Le traité d'astrologie cité par saint Basile dans son Hexaéméron: Antiquité Class. 7 (1938) 19-21; D. Amand, Fatalisme et liberté dans l'Antiquité grecque. Recherches sur la survivance de l'argumentation morale anti-fataliste de Carnéade chez les philosophes grecs et les théologiens chrétiens des quatre premiers siècles, Louvain 1945; G. Furlani, I pianeti e lo zodiaco nella religione dei Mandei: MAL VIII s., II/3 (1948) 133-147; U. Riedinger, Die Heilige Schrift im Kampf der griechischen Kirche gegen die Astrologie von Origenes bis Johannes von Damaskos, Innsbruck 1956; J. Daniélou, Les douze apôtres et le zodiaque: VChr 13 (1959) 14-21; L. Koep, "Astrologia usque ad Evangelium concessa" (Zu Tertullian, De idololatria 9), in Mullus, Münster 1964, 199-208; E. Marotta, L'ironia e altri schemi nel Contra Fatum di San Gregorio di Nissa: VetChr 4 (1967) 85-105; H.G. Gundel, Zodiakos. Der Tierkreis in der antiken Literatur und Kunst, Munich 1972; Id., Zodiakos. Tierkreisbilder im Altertum. Kosmische Bezüge und Jenseitsvorstellungen im antiken Alltagsleben, Mainz 1992; J.H. Charlesworth, Jewish Astrology in the Talmud, Pseudepigrapha, the Dead Sea Scrolls and Early Palestinian Synagogues: HTR 70 (1977) 183-200; E. Beck, Bardaisan und seine Schule bei Ephraem: Muséon 91 (1978) 271-333; W.C. Grese, Corpus Hermeticum XIII and Early Christian Literature, Leiden 1979; W. Rordorf, Le christianisme et la semaine planétaire: Augustinianum 19 (1979) 189-196; J. Samsó, Astronomica isidoriana: Faventia 1 (1979) 167-174; B. Bagatti, Osservazioni sullo zodiaco e le stagioni nelle sinagoghe e chiese palestinesi dei sec. V-VI: Studia Hier. 3 (1982) 247-253; W. Hübner, Zodiacus Christianus. Jüdisch-christliche Adaptationen des Tierkreises von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, Königstein 1983; T. Gregory, Temps astrologique et temps chrétien, in Le temps chrétien de la fin de l'antiquité au Moyen Âge. III^e-XIII^e siècles, ed. J.-M. Leroux, Paris 1984, 557-579; B. Teyssèdre, Anges, astres et cieux. Figure de la destinée et du salut, Paris 1986; S. Feraboli, Ricerche sulle monomoiriai di Firmico: SIFC 7 (1989) 213-240; I. Zatelli, Astrology and the Worship of the Stars in the Bible: Zeitsch. f. die Alttest. Wiss. 103 (1991) 86-99; U. Pizzani, Astrologia e astronomia nel pensiero dei Padri, in L'astrologia e la sua influenza nella filosofia, nella letteratura e nell'arte dall'età classica al Rinascimento, Milan 1992, 65-85; M. Albani, Der Zodiakos in 4Q318: Mitteil. u. Beitr. d. kirchl. Hochschule Leipzig, Forschungsstelle Judentum 7 (1993) 3-42; B. Migotti, "Sol iustitiae Christus est" (Origenes): Diadora 16/17 (1994/95) 263-292; J.C. Greenfield - M. Sokoloff, An Astrological Text from Qumran (4Q318) and Reflections on Some Zodiac Names: Rev. de Qumran 16/64 (1995) 507-525; A. Panaino, Visione della volta celeste e astrologia nel manicheismo, in L. Cirillo - A. v. Tongerloo, Manicheismo e Oriente cristiano antico, Louvain 1997, 249-295; G. Luck (ed.), Arcana Mundi. Magia e occulto nel mondo greco e romano II: Divinazione, astrologia, alchimia, Milan 1999; K. Stuckrad, Das Ringen um die Astrologie: jüdische und christliche Beiträge zum antiken Zeitverständnis, Berlin 2000; A. Pérez Jiménez, Cien años de investigación sobre la astrología antigua: MHNH 1 (2001) 133-203; Les Pères de l'Église et l'astrologie: Origène, Méthode, Basile, Grégoire de Nysse, Diodore, Procope de Gaza, Jean Philopon, Paris 2003; J. Dillon, Plotino y su tratado, Sobre si los astros influyen (Enn. II 3): MHNH 3 (2003) 149-158; K. Stuckrad, Geschichte der Astrologie: von der Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, Munich 2003; A. Pérez Jiménez, Influencias astrales en la fundación de ciudades y en las tareas de construcción: MHNH 4 (2004) 173-196; C. Macías - M. Gonzáles, El Banquete de Metodio de Olimpo y sus argumentos contra la astrología: ibid., 5 (2005) 307-342; C. Macías Villalobos, Ciencia de los astros y creencias astrológicas en el pensamiento de San Agustín, Madrid 2004.

M. Girardi

ZOILUS of Alexandria (d. 551). A monk from Palestine, Zoilus was elected as patriarch of Alexandria (d. 540–541), following the deposition of Paul of Tabennesi in 540. Having been imposed upon the community of *Alexandria because he adhered to the Council of *Chalcedon as did his predecessor, he was able to dwell at Alexandria only under the protection of the army. During his patriarchate he defended and supported the Council of Chalcedon, winning for the Chalcedonian confession the monks of Enaton who were near Alexandria. In 546 because of a revolt, he was forced to flee to *Constantinople, where in 551 he was deposed for his opposition to the condemnation of the *Three Chapters. The emperor *Justinian, probably already in 540, sent "a dogmatic letter" to Zoilus in which he demonstrated his Chalcedonian faith and definitively separated himself from the *monophysites and *Severus of Antioch. This letter, which seems to have been the emperor's response to another letter by the same patriarch, has only come down to us in a fragment preserved in the acts of the Council of Constantinople III (680–681). The emperor Justinian sent his edict against *Origen, which was published at *Jerusalem in February 542, to Zoilus and to the patriarch *Mena, Pope *Vigilius and patriarch *Peter of Jerusalem.

CPG 6879; ACO II, 2,1, 352-356; Justinian, Contra Monophysitas, ed. E. Schwartz, Drei dogmatische Schriften Justinians, Munich 1939, 7; J. Maspéro, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie depuis de la mort de l'empereur Anastase jusqu'à la réconciliation des Églises jacobites (518-616), Paris 1922; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, 2/2, Brescia 1999, 474-476; Patrologia V, 69.

C. Dell'Osso

ZOORA, monk (6th c.). Anti-Chalcedonian monk, native of *Syria and former *stylite, he settled in Constantinople in the luxurious quarter of Sykai, where he administered *baptisms and celebrated liturgies, garnering numerous followers to the anti-Chalcedonian side. Although finding himself under the protection of the empress *Theodora, he drew much resistance from the Chalcedonian monks and *archimandrites of the capital, who, around 535 along with the representatives of the laurae and monasteries of *Palestine, launched an attack against him, the patriarch *Anthimus, *Severus of Antioch and *Peter of Apamea. This brought about the deposition of the patriarch Anthimus by Pope *Agapetus I in March 536 and the promulgation of a constitution against Anthimus, Severus, Peter and Zoora by the emperor *Justinian at the end of the synod called by the patriarch *Mena on 6 August 536. The monks of *Jerusalem who had intervened at the synod asked for a resolution in which a decree was made for the destruction of the Eutychian monasteries, esp. those of Zoora, who, along with Anthimus and Severus, during the fifth actio was exposed to every type of accusation.

ACO III, 111, 25; 112, 25ff.; 141, 15-28; 147-152; 119-123; 127-129; 169-181; R. Schieffer, Indices, ACO IV, 3,2,2 508a; Ch. Diehl, Théodora impératrice de Byzance, Paris 1904, 261-263; E. Schwartz, Zur Kirchenpolitik Justinians, in Gesammelte Schriften, IV, Berlin 1960, 276-328; M. Amelotti - L. Migliardi Zingale, Scritti teologici ed ecclesiastici di Giustiniano, Milan 1977, II, 52 (Costitutio contra Anthimum, Severum, Petrum et Zooram); L. Perrone, La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980; A. Grillmeier, Gesù il Cristo nella fede della Chiesa, 2/2, Brescia 1999, 440-444.

C. Dell'Osso

ZOSIMUS (6th c.). Zosimus was a native of *Phoenicia and became a monk in the laura of *Gerasimus in the Plain of Jordan; he subsequently established himself near Caesarea. According to the historian *Evagrius Scholasticus, he foresaw the earthquake of *Antioch in AD 526 (HE 4,7). A collection of his maxims, the Alloquia, have survived (CPG 7361). He used the writings of the monk *Isaiah (see L. Regnault: RAM 46 [1970] 40) and was in turn used by *Dorotheus of Gaza (L. Perrone, La Chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia 1980, 310).

CPG 7361; PG 78, 1680-1701 (incomplete); A. Iordanites: Neva Siwvn 12 (1912) 697-701; 854-865; 13 (1913) 93-100 (as a separate ed.: Jerusalem 1913); K. Kunze: BS 12, 1499-1500; DSp 16 (1994) 1658-1659.

J. Gribomont

ZOSIMUS, Byzantine historian (5th–6th c.). From the intitulatio of his work we only know that he was a comes and already an exadvocatus fisci, a detail also passed down by *Photius (Bibl., cod. 98), who identifies the historian with the two similarly named Sophists Zosimus of Gaza (which is possible) and Zosimus of Ascalon (a suggestion that should not be considered). From the work itself—the Historia nova—one can conclude that the author, a convinced and enthusiastic *pagan, who was not bereft of literary culture, lived at least for some time at *Constantinople, where he wrote his History between 498 (or more precisely 502) and 518.

Starting from the Trojan War, Zosimus in the first of his six books outlines a very quick synthesis of the events of the Greek-Eastern world until the fall of the Macedonian Empire; he then briefly outlines the history of the first Roman imperial era and, starting esp. from the 4th c., gradually broadens his own narration, which is interrupted ex abrupto in 410, although the author had proposed to go beyond that date. The work has, therefore, remained incomplete or has come down to us in a corrupt, incomplete state.

The author of the Historia nova (not in the sense of modern history, but a consideration of the unusual historiographical formulation) was regarded as the Polybius of the Late Empire. His originality consists in attributing the decline of Rome first of all to the "demented presumption" of the monarchical system, and secondly to the abandonment of traditional religion, which had been sacrificed on the altar of Christianity.

He perceived his own work, therefore, as a systematic challenge to Christian *historiography, esp. the Eusebian apologia of the monarchical ideal and the Augustan pax understood as the providential preparation for the spread and triumph of Christianity, which was consecrated by *Constantine's conversion. Aside from confusions and contradictions, Zosimus's work, which was judged harshly by Photius, still represents the last monument of ancient historiography.

Editions: L. Mendelssohn, Zosimi comitis et exadvocati fisci Historia nova, Leipzig 1887, repr. Hildesheim 1963. Ed. with Fr. vers.: F. Paschoud, Zosime. Histoire nouvelle, 6 vols., Paris 1969-89. It. trans. only: F. Conca, Milan 1977.

Studies: M.E. Colonna, Gli storici bizantini dal IV al XV secolo, Naples 1956; PWK X A, 797-841; W. Goffart, Zosimus, The First Historian of Rome's Fall: American Historical Review 76 (1971) 412-441; L. Berardo, Struttura, lacune e struttura delle lacune nell' Ἱστορία νέα di Zosimo: Athenaeum 54 (1976) 472-481; F. Paschoud, Cinq études sur Zosime, Paris 1975; L. Cracco Ruggini, Zosimo, ossia il rovesciamento delle "Storie ecclesiastiche": Augustinianum 16 (1976) 23-36; Fl. van Ommeslaeghe, Jean Chrysostome et le peuple de Constantinople: AB 99 (1981) 329-349; ODB 3, 2231; R. Ridley, Zosimus: New History, Byzantina Australiensia 3, Sydney 1982; E.J. Owens, Zosimus, The Roman Empire, and the End of Roman Britain, in C. Deroux (ed.), Studies in Latin Literature and Roman History 8, Brussels 1997 (Coll. Latomus 239); D.F. Buck, On Two Lacunae in Zosimus' New History: CQ n.s. 49 (1999) 342-344.

D. Stiernon

ZOSIMUS, pope (417–418). Certainly not of Roman origin. In his ecclesiastical politics, he tried to reorganize the hierarchy in *Gaul and to resolve the Pelagian controversy. Immediately upon being elected pope, he granted *Patroclus bishop of *Arles a privileged position that made him primate of the seven provinces of Gaul; this solution, however, could not last long. In the Pelagian controversy, however, Zosimus's stance was rather ambiguous. After having readmitted *Pelagius and *Celestius into ecclesiastical communion (autumn 417), he had to cede to the unanimous and emphatic objections of the African episcopate (Ep. 12). Forced by the interventions of the imperial court and by a new African synod, he finally promulgated in the Epistola Tractoria the open condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius (DS 231), thereby provoking a schism in *Italy. His intervention in the affair of *Apiarius, a priest who had made an appeal to the apostolic see, was likewise marked by trouble. Governing for only one year, he was the first to express the Roman claim to the primacy of jurisdiction (Ep. 12,1) and bequeathed numerous problems to his successors.

CPL 1644-1647; PL 20, 642-686 (Coustant); 20, 693ff. (Ep. Tractoria); 20, 703-704; PLS I, 796-797 - BS 12, 1493-1497; G. Langgärtner, Die Gallienpolitik der Päpste, Bonn 1964, 24-52; W. Marschall, Karthago und Rom, Stuttgart 1971, 150-159, 166-173; O. Wermelinger, Rom und Pelagius, Stuttgart 1975, 134-218 (bibl.); Id., Das Pelagiusdossier in der Tractoria des Zosimus: FZPhTh 26 (1979) 336-368; D. Frye, Early Fifth Century Gaul: JEH 42 (1991) 343-361; M. Lamberigts, Augustine and Julian on Z.: Aug (L) 42 (1992) 311-330; LTK[3] 10 1492; LACL (2002) 732.

J. Gribomont

Complete List of Articles for the Encyclopedia of Ancient Christianity

The use of this listing may aid readers in finding articles not cross-referenced in the main text. Additional information (century/ies in which the subject lived or flourished, or date of death) has sometimes been given here to more easily identify the subject of the entries.

EADBURGA (7th–8th c.)
EAST - ORIENTATION
EASTER
EASTER HOMILIES
EBIONITES
ECCLESIASTICAL CANONS of the APOSTLES
ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATION
ECCLESIOLOGY
ECONOMY
ECSTASY
EDESSA
EDICT of MILAN
EGBERT (7th–8th c.)
EGERIA (4th c.)
EGYPT
EKTHESIS MAKROSTICHOS
EKTHESIS of HERACLIUS
ELEUSIUS of Cyzicus (4th c.)
ELEUTHERUS (Eleuterus, Eleutherius), pope (2nd c.)
ELEUTHERUS (Eleuterus, Eleutherius) of Tournai (d. 531)
ELIAS of Jerusalem (5th–6th c.)
ELIGIUS of Noyon-Tournai (6th–7th c.)
ELIJAH, prophet
ELISAEUS, doctor (Ełišē Vardapet) (6th c.?)
ELKESAITES
ELPIDIUS (4th c.)
ELPIDIUS RUSTICUS (5th–6th c.)
ELVIRA, Council of EMERENTIANA, martyr (d. 303?)
EMERITUS (d. after 418)
EMESA
ENCOLPION
ENCRATISM ENCYCLOPEDIA
ENDELECHIUS (4th–5th c.)
ENHYPOSTASIS
ENNODIUS (5th–6th c.)
ENTERTAINMENTS
ENTRY of JESUS into JERUSALEM (iconography)
EPHESUS
EPHREM of Antioch (d. 545)
EPHREM the Syrian (4th c.)
EPICLESIS
EPICTETUS of Corinth (4th c.)
EPIGONUS
EPIGRAM
EPIGRAMMA PAULINI
EPIGRAPHIC SYLLOGES
EPIGRAPHY, Christian
EPIPHANES (2nd c.)
EPIPHANIUS, monk (8th–9th c.)
EPIPHANIUS of Constantinople (d. 535)
EPIPHANIUS of Pavia (5th c.)
EPIPHANIUS of Salamis (d. 403)
EPIPHANIUS Scholasticus (5th–6th c.)
EPIPHANIUS SYNCELLUS (d. after 431)
EPIPHANIUS the Latin (5th–6th c.)
EPIPHANY, Feast of EPIRUS EPISCOPAL LISTS
EPISTOLA ANNE AD SENECAM
EPISTULA APOLOGETICA
EPISTULA APOSTOLORUM
EPISTULA DE PATRIA
EPISTULA FERMETIS AD HADRIANUM
EPISTULA SCYTHARUM MONACHORUM AD EPISCOPOS
EPISTULA TITI
EPISTULAE AUSTRASICAE
EQUITIUS of Hippo Dyarrhytus (d. after 404)
ERECHTHIUS of Antioch (5th c.)
ESCHATOLOGY
ESDRAS (Ezra) (apocryphal)
ETERNITY
ETHELBERT 6th–7th c.)
ETHICS
ETHIOPIA
EUBULUS of Lystra (7th c.)
EUCHARIST
EUCHERIA (5th–6th c.)
EUCHERIUS (pseudo) (7th c.?)
EUCHERIUS Comes (5th c.)
EUCHERIUS of Lyons (5th c.)
EUCHITES. See *MESSALIANS
EUDOXIA (d. 404)
EUDOXIA (Eudocia, Eudokia) (ca. 400–460)
EUDOXIUS (d. 370)
EUGENIUS, monk (4th c.)
EUGENIUS I, pope (7th c.)
EUGENIUS FLAVIUS (d. 394)
EUGENIUS of Ancyra (4th c.)
EUGENIUS of Carthage (d. 505)
EUGENIUS of Seleucia (6th c.)
EUGENIUS of Toledo (d. 657)
EUGIPPIUS (5th–6th c.)
EULALIA of Barcelona, martyr (d. 303?)
EULALIA of Mérida, martyr (d. 304)
EULALIUS, antipope (4th–5th c.)
EULALIUS of Antioch (d. 331)
EULOGIA
EULOGIUS of Alexandria (d. 607/608)
EUNAPIUS of Sardis (4th–5th c.)
EUNOMIUS of Berea (4th c.)
EUNOMIUS of Cyzicus (d. ca. 394)
EUNUCHS
EUPHEMIA of Chalcedon (d. 303)
EUPHEMIUS of Constantinople (d. 515)
EUPHRATAS of Cologne (4th c.)
EUPHRONIUS of Antioch (d. after 332)
EUPLUS of Catania (d. 304)
EUPREPIUS (4th c.)
EURIC (5th c.)
EUSEBIAN CANONS
EUSEBIANS
EUSEBIUS, pope (d. 308)
EUSEBIUS GALLICANUS
EUSEBIUS of Alexandria (3rd c.)
EUSEBIUS of Alexandria (pseudo) (late 5th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Bologna (4th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Caesarea (Cappadocia) (d. 370)
EUSEBIUS of Caesarea (Palestine) (3rd–4th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Cremona (d. after 418)
EUSEBIUS of Dorylaeum (d. after 451)
EUSEBIUS of Emesa (4th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Heraclea (d. after 431)
EUSEBIUS of Laodicea (d. 270)
EUSEBIUS of Milan (d. 462?)
EUSEBIUS of Nicomedia (d. ca. 341)
EUSEBIUS of Samosata (4th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Thessalonica (6th–7th c.)
EUSEBIUS of Vercelli (d. 371)
EUSTATHIUS, monk (6th c.)